The genre of biographical dictionaries, once begun, continued and developed. This development took a clear line of greater specialization, reflecting the further identification of Muslim groups within the community. At the time when Ibn Sa’d was writing, specialization was as yet unclear among the religious authorities. By the next generation, that of Ahmad ibn Hanbal al-Bukhari, the hadlth transmitters had already emerged as a specialized (and victorious) group, after decades of unconscious building of the image (and reality) of that specialty; hence the beginning of a series of biographical dictionaries right from that generation onwards. The jurists came to emerge as a specialized group shortly thereafter. Biographical dictionaries about them, however, did not emerge until much later, in the fifth/eleventh century, and that was due to developments within the ranks of the jurists themselves. Right from the beginning, the jurists posed as representatives of different local traditions (the Hijaz, Iraq, Syria, Egypt), thereby ending up with “founding” followers, of “schools,” as they are called, each having varying positions in legal details and outlook. It was not until these schools were fully established (with some dying out), at the end of the fourth/tenth century, that the image of the jurists was clear enough to warrant biographical dictionaries which recorded their numbers, views, and achievements; hence the appearance of Abu Ishaq al-Shîrâzî’s Tabaqat al-fuqaha’ in the fifth/eleventh century. With the development of serious animosities between the schools, however, especially in Baghdad and the East in the fourth/tenth and fifth/eleventh centuries, more specialized biographical dictionaries of the jurists of each school began to be compiled. Something similar happened in the field of hadlth, albeit for different reasons, essentially that of authentication— a matter considered of great importance right from the appearance of the first biographical dictionary of the genre, Bukhârî’s aTTa’nkh aTkabir.

As in the case of the people of hadith and law, other groups came to have biographical dictionaries of their own people, but only after their groups could be identified clearly. Since the identity of the Twelver Shi’ites did not become final until the disappearance of the twelfth imam in second half of the third/ninth century, no Twelver biographical dictionary could appear before the following century. Similarly, the tardiness in the emergence of Sufism until the beginning of the third/ninth century caused the delay in the appearance of the first Sufi biographical dictionary until the next century.

The appearance of biographical dictionaries dealing with people associated with particular cities is related to the emergence of some cities as regional capitals for semi-independent dynasties, the result of a dwindling of the power of the central caliphate; hence its first systematic expressions did not come out before the fourth/tenth century, in connection with cities in the peripheries, not in the center. Bukhara, the capital of the Samanids, was probably the first to come out. It is to be noted, however, that there are some biographical dictionaries in this sub-genre whose explanation cannot stem from this particular political development, ‘Abd al-Jabbar al-Khawlns Tâ’rîkh Darayya being a stark example. In a case such as this, one has to think of the author’s individual motives. In the case of ‘Abd al-Jabbar al-Khawlanl, pride in his town and stock was the reason behind his compiling his book. In the cases of the two huge compendia, al-Khatib al-Baghdâdî’s Tâ’rîkh Baghdad and Ibn ‘Asakir’s Tâ’rîkh madinat Dimashq, the motive was not only pride but also, perhaps, a combination of hope and the fear of change; the winds of change were blowing strongly in Baghdad in the latter half of the fifth/eleventh century, and in Damascus in the latter half of the following century.

Of all the regions addressed by biographical dictionaries in the Arabic Islamic library, Andalusia (and, by extension, the Maghrib) deserves special attention. Its output of biographical dictionaries is connected to a great extent with the intellectual and cultural crisis that its scholars underwent at the beginning of the fifth/eleventh century, following several years of devastating civil strife at the close of the previous century, the notorious “al-fitnah al-barbarîyah,” and the subsequent loss of political unity in the peninsula. This crisis, as expressed by two of the most towering intellectuals of Andalusia, Ibn Hayyan and Ibn Hazm, both of whom had witnessed the civil war, centered around the widespread vision that the Andalusians adored any model of thought or literature that came from the East, and that, subsequently, Andalusian literature and thought were a mere imitation of their counterparts in the East; they thus lacked originality and a local identity. It is in this atmosphere that the Andalusian biographical dictionaries grew larger and larger in number. Building on the pre-civil war, though young, tradition of biographical dictionaries (al-Khûshânʏs Qudat Qurtubah and Ibn al-Faradi’s Tabaqat al-‘ulamâ’ wa-al-rüwât Hl-‘Um bi-al-Andalus), the post-civil war authors concentrated heavily on their peninsula, and produced many biographical dictionaries and continuations thereof. It is within this vision that we have to see the biographical dictionaries of Ibn Bassam, Ibn Bashkuwal, Ibn al-Abbar, Ibn ‘Abd al-Malik al-Marrakishi, Ibn Sa’îd al-Andalusi, and even the later works of Ibn al-Khatib and al-Maqqan. The large accumulation of literary output was probably at the basis of the appearance of regional literary histories such as alThaalibfs Yatîmat al-dahr and later al-‘Imâd al-Katib’s al-Kharidah. As expected, Andalusia had its share in this sub-genre.

Although Arabic Islamic biographical dictionaries emerged at the time of the maturity of Islamic civilization, in their first expressions they reveal a relative degree of difficulty in the presentation of their materials. This is due to their attempt at comprehensiveness—a thing quite new in compilation at the beginning of the third/ninth century. What was common before that was the format of the single biography, and they were attempting to put scores of biographies together, making them, at the same time, portray their respective visions of the contemporary stage of the intellectual and cultural development of the Islamic community then. This relative crudeness in inner structure, however, was soon made more refined, and, with the passage of time, achieved complete smoothness when full alphabetization became more or less the standard in compiling biographical dictionaries. It has to be noted, however, that this process took a very long time, and that the cruder forms continued to co-exist with the smoother forms. In the area of hadith in particular, the older forms survived for some time, due to the nature of the discipline (the importance of locating the transmitters in time for the authenticity question), and Dhahabi’s huge Slyar a lam ainubala’ of the eighth/fourteenth century is an instructive example in this respect. And even when full smoothness was achieved, its form was sometimes interrupted by the piety element (beginning biographical dictionaries with “Muhammads,” among other things), making the inner structures of some biographical dictionaries occasionally less than straightforward.

Perhaps what still needs explanation is the whole phenomenon of biographical dictionaries, for it seems that there are few cultures which have been as prolific in producing biographical dictionaries in premodern times as the Arabic branch of Islamic culture.[305] But this is a huge topic that requires separate examination.

[252] The death date of an author will be mentioned only at the first occurrence of that author’s name, unless it proves particularly useful in a certain context to repeat that information.

[253] R. s. Humphreys, Islamic History: A Framework for Inquiry (revised edition, Princeton, 1991), p. 188.

[254] The close association between “tabaqaf ’ and “ta’rikh’’ is very old indeed and dates back to the early stages of the development of the genre in Islam. For one thing, the titles of a sizeable number of biographical dictionaries begin with the word “ta’rîkh,” history [of], such as Bukharfs al-Ta’rikh al-kabir and Ibn ‘Asakir’s Ta’rikh madinat Dimashq (on which see below). For another, several of the foremost compilers of biographical dictionaries have identified their respective works as works of history. Ibn Khallikan, for example, says in his introduction to his celebrated Wifaycit al-a’yân, ed. Ihsan Abbas, 8 vols. (Beirut, 1971–75), 1:19 (on which see below): “This is a concise work in the science of history [hadha mukhtasarunfi al-ta’nkh]“’, there is also (perhaps consequently) a discussion as to whether or not Ibn Khallikan’s Wafayat is actually his very same al-Ta’rikh al-kablr (see Ihsan ’Abbas’ study of the Wafayat in ibid., 8:69–71 (of the pagination in Arabic numerals). More significantly, the late medieval Muslim historiographers place the various kinds of biographical dictionaries among the branches of historical writing. The most notable among these are Shams al-Dîn al-Dhahabi (d. 748/1347), whose expose is preserved in al-Sakhawfs al-1’lân bi-al-tawblkh li-man dhamma al-îa’rîkh (Cairo, 1349 [A.H.]), pp. 84–108, tr. in F. Rosenthal, A History of Muslim Historiography (Leiden, 1952), pp. 316–58: al-Sakhawi (d. 902/1496), in his al-1’lan, ibid., pp. 104–69, tr. Rosenthal, pp. 358–450: Tashkbpriizadah (d. 968/1560), in his Miftah al-sa’adah (second edition, Haydarabad, 1977), 1:231–48, 263–66 (under the rubric ‘Um al-tawarikh), tr. Rosenthal, pp. 452–56: and Hâjjî Khalîfah (d. 1067/1657), in his Kashf al-£unün ‘an asamlal-kutub wa-al-funun (Offset copy of the Istanbul edition, Baghdad, n.d.) 1:271–333 (under the rubric “‘Um al-ta’rlkh“), but also 2:1095–1107 (under the rubric “‘Um al-tabaqat”).

[255] Several works on Islamic history and historiography discuss biographical dictionaries. See, in chronological order, H.A.R. Gibb, “Ta’nkh,” in Encyclopedia oflslam (first edition), Supplement, pp. 233–45:1. Lichtenstadter, “Arabic and Islamic Historiography,” Muslim World 35 (1945), pp. 126–32: F. Rosenthal, op. cit., pp. 88–94 and passim.; and R.s. Humphreys, Islamic History, op. cit., pp. 188–207 and passim. Sir Hamilton Gibb, in his article “Islamic Biographical Literature” (in Historians of the Middle East, ed. B. Lewis and P.M. Holt [London, 1962], p. 54), says that “the composition of biographical dictionaries in Arabic developed simultaneously and in close association with historical composition.” Rosenthal (p. 89) goes even further and states that “In many Muslim minds, history thus became synonymous with biography.” Much of T. Khalidi’s discussion in his article “Islamic Biographical Dictionaries: A Preliminary Assessment,” Muslim World 63 (1973), pp. 53–65, is based on the relationship between history and biographical dictionary.

[256] Rosenthal, op. cit., pp. 88–89, where the biographical component of Greek and Roman historical literature is mentioned.

[257] According to Rosenthal (ibid.,p. 89), “That biography shared in Muslim historiography from the beginning and that it eventually achieved a dominating position in it is obvious.“

[258] Ibid., pp. 89–90. Rosenthal mentions among those reasons the interest in the Prophet Muhammad’s biography, the dogmatic struggle in Islam, the desire of the, historians to be useful and employable, and the Muslims’ “firm conviction that all politics was the work of individuals and understandable in the light of their personal qualities and experiences....Under the influence of theology, even the history of the various branches of learning was conceived as a collection of biographies of the outstanding scholars” (p. 89). This last point was mentioned also by Gibb in “Islamic Biographical Literature,” p. 54.

[259] For the brief surveys, see Heffening, “Tabakat,” in Encyclopaedia of Islam (first edition), Suppl.: 214–15: M. Abiad, “Origine et developpement des dictionnaires biographiques arabes,” Bulletin d’Etudes Orientates 31 (1979 119801), pp. 7–15. For detailed surveys, see I. Hafsi, “Recherches sur le genre tabaqat,” Arabica 23 (1976), pp. 227–65 and 24 (1977), pp. 1–41, 150–86, which deals with the biographical dictionaries reported in the sources, regardless of whether they have survived or not; p. Auchterlonie, Arabic Biographical Dictionaries: A Summary Guide and Bibliography (Durham, 1987), which, contrary to Hafsi’s work, lists only the published works, and “only the best-known, fullest and most useful biographical dictionaries” (p. 1). All of the medieval Muslim historiographers mentioned in n. 3 above include in their respective exposes surveys of the biographical dictionaries known to them. See also o. Loth, “Ursprung und Bedeutung der Tabakat vornehmlich der des Ibn Sa’d,” Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenlandischen Gesellschaft 23 (1869), pp. 593–614: G. Levi Della Vida, “Sira,” in Encyclopaedia oflslam (first edition), 4:439–43:لا. لمدح, Studies in Arabic Literary Papyri, I: Historical Texts (Chicago, 1957), pp. 5–31, esp. 7–8:

w. al-Qadl, “Biography,” in Companion to Arabic Literature, ed. L Meisami (London: Routledge, forthcoming).

[260] In particular, the works of Gibb and Khalidi mentioned above, but mainly those of Rosenthal and Humphreys. Hafsi’s long article has many analytical insights, but its structure does not permit these insights to stand out clearly.

[261] Khalidi, for example, says (p. 55): “The final purpose, for all these writers, is moral edification and/or the acquisition of a skill which would enable the Muslim to understand and practice his religion to better advantage.” Gibb’s concept (p. 54) is more complex: “the conception that underlies the older biographical dictionaries is that the history of the Islamic community is essentially the contribution of individual men and women to the building up and transmission of its specific culture; that it is these persons (rather than the political governors) who represent or reflect the active forces in Muslim society in their respective spheres; and that their individual contributions are worthy of being recorded for future generations.”

[262] There is agreement among scholars that biographical dictionaries are an indigenous, not “imported,” Arabic Islamic genre; see Gibb, op. cit., p. 54; Khalidi, op. cit., p. 53; Abiad, op. cit., p. 9.

[263] Modern scholars have suggested a number of “disciplines” as “predecessors” for the biographical dictionaries, notably history, hadlth/hadith criticism, or both; see, Loth, op. cit., pp. 593–601: Heffening, op. cit., p. 215, Gibb, opo. cit., p. 54; Khalidi, op. cit., pp. 53, 59–603 Hafsi, op. cit., p. 227.

[264] This overlaps with the previous category somewhat. In addition to history and hadlth/hadith criticism, the genres of ayyarn (pre-Islamic battles of the Arabs), genealogy, ma’athir-mathalib (virtues and vices) literature, and biography are suggested; see Loth, op. cit., pp. 598–99: Della Vida, op. cit., p. 440: Lichtenstadter, op. cit., p. 129:

Rosenthal, op. cit., p. 88؛ Gibb, op. cit., pp. 54–58; but mainly Abiad, op. cit., pp. 9–12.

[265] Organization is particularly discussed by Abiad and Hafsi.

[266] These are very difficult to enumerate, since they vary tremendously from author to author; nevertheless, see Gibb, op. cit., p. 55: Khalidi, op. cit., pp. 60–62.

[267] Such as name, descent, field, craft, teachers, students, date of death, character, virtues, resume of career, revealing anecdotes, compilations, and so on; see Gibb op. cit., pp. 56–57: Rosenthal, op. cit., pp. 90–91: Khalidi, op. cit., pp. 62–64: but above all, Humphreys, op. cit., pp. 19093.

[268] Such as Rosenthal and Humphreys. Khalidi is interested in the later medieval period (fifth/eleventh through the twelfth/eighteenth century). Hafsi makes many comments about the development of the genre, but the structure(s) he chose for his article make those comments diffused here and there, and hence less clear than they could be. In spite of the promise in its title, Abiad’s article does not have much to say on the question of development.

[269] One remark in which the relationship is made is in Humphreys’ discussion of the change in the criteria of inclusion in biographical dictionaries between the early dictionaries and those compiled in the fourth/tenth century. He says (op. cit., p. 189) “The earlier dictionaries attempted to provide comprehensive coverage for those broad classes (hadlth specialists or poets, usually) which they included in their purview. But in the 4th/10th century we see a growing tendency to include only subgroups, defined by place of residence, legal or theological sect, etc. Such changes in the criteria for inclusion have important cultural implications, obviously; thus there seems to be a feeling that one’s Islam is not defined by his fidelity to Scripture (Qur’an and hadlth), but by the way in which he interprets it, or that a locality can properly be a Muslim’s primary (though not ultimate) focus of cultural identity.”

[270] Gibb (op. cit., p. 54) suggests, for example, that the study of biographical dictionaries entails finding ‘‘the evidence it supplies or indicates as to changing or enduring social and intellectual attitudes or trends.”

[271] Several scholars note, for example, that the early dictionaries were concerned mainly with religious scholars and then broadened their scope (see n. 18 above). Other scholars make additional remarks here and there. Gibb (op. cit., p. 58), for example, notes how the dictionaries “supply almost the sole materials for the social activities and status of women in Muslim communities” and that the “agricultural and industrial arts are thinly represented...although trade and economic activities are by no means neglected in the Mamluk and later dictionaries.” Similarly, Humphreys notes (op. cit., p. 189) that it is “striking and instructive” that “the productive classes of society—the farmers, merchants, and artisans—never made it into the dictionaries as such, though a few persons of such background do appear under a more respectable rubric.”

[272] Some scholars, notably Hafci (op. cit., pp. 229–34), and before him Heffening (op. cit., pp. 214–15), discussed the various meanings of the word “tabaqat.” The numerous identifications offered by Hafsi, in particular, are quite revealing, as they demonstrate the rather complex meaning(s) of the term when it is used in different contexts over the ages. He says (p. 229): “Le terme tabaqa, au singulier, designe le rang attribue a un groupe de personnages ayant ioue un role dans rhistoire a un titre OU a un autre, classe en fonction de criteres determines d’ordre religieux, culturel, scientifique, artistique, etc.”; and on p. 230, he adds: “tabaqa signifie, suivant les epoques: classe, valeur, generation, merite, degre et groupe.” Still on p. 233, he says: “tabaqa evoque egalement 1’idee de gradation.” As for Heffening, his identification is shorter and more direct: “The word means when used of place: similar, lying above one another, and with regard to time: similar, following one another...and especially:...generation, stratum or category...in hadith: the men included in one tabaqa are those who have heard traditions from those in the preceding one and have transmitted to the members of the following category.”

[273] See above, n. 4.

[274] The words “mashyakhah” and “bamamij” are identical in signification, but the first term is used in the Muslim East, the second in the Muslim West. In Andalusia and the Maghrib, the term “fahrasah” is also used (as in Fahrasat ibn Khayr).

[275] There are other, earlier dictionaries which have been lost and whose structure is, hence, impossible to determine. They include: Tabqaat ahi al-’Um wa-al-jahl (classes of the learned and the ignorant), by Wâşil ibn “Ata’ (d. 131/748); Tabaqat alshu ara’ (classes of poets), by al-Yazîdî (d. 200/815); Tabaqat aTfuqaha’ wa-aTmuhaddithln (classes of jurists and hadlth transmitters/traditionists) and Tabaqat man rawa ‘an aTNabi (classes of transmitters from the Prophet), by al-Haytham ibn ‘Adî (d. 207/822)3 Tabaqat aTfursan (classes of cavaliers), by Abu ‘Ubaydah (d. 208/823): see Heffening, op. cit., p. 215 (copied in Abiad, p. 14). See also Hafsi, op. cit., p. 245. It is, however, to be kept in mind that Ibn Sa’d’s book may be very closely related to the work of his teacher al-Wâqidî (d. 207/822), who was of the same generations al-Yazidi, al-Haytham ibn ‘Adi and Abu Ubaydah.

[276] Cf. nn. 12 and 13 above.

[277] al-Fihrist (ed. Rida Tajaddud, Tehran, 1971), pp. 105, 106.

[278] Ibid., pp. 108, 110.

[279] Ibid., p. 112.

[280] See on this book and its structure, the old study of Loth mentioned in n. 8 above, especially pp. 603–5: Gibb, op. cit., pp. 54–55 (where there is a very brief survey of structure); and Hafsi, op. cit., pp. 229–30. 235, and 242–44, where the structure and criteria for organization are discussed without an attempt at comprehensiveness.

[281] Ibn Sa’d, Kitab al-tabaqat al-kabir (ed. E. Sachau, Leiden, 1905–40), [282] For the significance of this order of the cities, see above the end of section 1.

[283] Since the term “tabaqahr need not indicate, strictly speaking, solely the time factor (although Ibn Sa’d does mention “age” at some points); cf. the meanings of “tabaqah” in n. 21 above.

[284] See Ibn Sa’d, 6:90ff.

[285] Ibid., p. 84ff.

[286] Ibid., p. 151ff.

[287] Ibid., p. 115ff.

[288] Ibid., p. 126ff.

[289] That a whole volume is devoted to women is indeed noteworthy; see also Gibb’s remark in n. 20 above.

[290] The last, ninth, volume of the printed edition contains only the editor’s notes.

[291] On the structure of this dictionary, see Hafsi, op. cit., pp. 230, 239, 245–46. In the introduction to the best edition of the book (ed. Muhammad Mahmud Shakir, second edition, Cairo, 1974), the editor provides an excellent study of the work, including its structure.

[292] See above, n. 3.

[293] Cf. Humphreys’ remark in n. 18 above.

[294] Jim Lindsay, of Westmont College, attracted my attention to a possible earlier “dhayl;’ namely Dhayl tâ’rîkh mavvalîd al-‘ulamâ’ wa-wafayatihim by ‘Abd al-‘A/iz ibn Ahmad al-Kattam (d. 466/1074), which could be a continuation of Muhammad ibn ‘Abd Allah al-Rabâ’i’s (d. 379/989) Tâ’rîkh mawalid al-‘ulamâ’ wa-wafayatihim. Both books have been recently published in Riyad in 1989 and 1990 respectively. Like Lindsay, however, I have not been able to see those books, nor am I able to identify their authors.

[295] On this phenomenon in Andalusia, see Ibn Bassam’s sharp statement in the introduction to his al-Dhakhirah (ed. Ihsan ‘Abbas, Beirut, 1979), 1:11–16.

[296] Preserved in al-Maqqari, Nafh al-tîb (ed. Ihsan ‘Abbas, Beirut, 1968), 3.156–79.

[297] Ibn Sa’Id also wrote an addendum to this epistle; see ibid., pp. 179–86, as did al-Shaqundi; see ibid., pp. 186–222.

[298] A few books appeared slightly earlier, but they are not typically biographical dictionaries. Ibn Abi Tahir Tayfur’s (d. 280/893) Kitab Baghdad, which has partially survived (Baghdad, 1968), is a literary chronicle, not a biographical dictionary. BahshaFs (d. 292/905) Tâ’rîkh Wasit, which has survived (ed. Kurkis ‘Awwad, Baghdad, 1967), is similar to most other dictionaries of cities in that it begins with an expose of the town of Wasit; however, the entries in it can hardly be called biographies at all: their titles carry persons’ names, but the material under each rubric contains nothing other than the hadiths which those persons have transmitted. In that sense, the book is closer in genre to Bukhârî’s al-Tû’rîkh aTkabir and similar works. See Rosenthal, op. cit., pp. 83, 144–45.

[299] Published in Tehran, 1351 [A.H.]. The book has been translated into English as The History of Bukhara by Richard N. Frye (Cambridge, MA 1954).

[300] See Yatimat al-dahr (reproduction of the Damascus edition, Beirut, 1979), 1:8–9.

[301] See above, n. 45.

[302] In addition to the criterion of time, whence only contemporaries receive biographies.

[303] aTDhakhirah, 1:22–32.

[304] Ibn Said al-Andalusi, al-Mughribfi hula aTMaghrib (ed. Shawql Dayf, Cairo, 1953), 1:33.

[305] See above, n. 6.

 7. The Book in the Grammatical Tradition: Development in Content and Methods

Ramzi Baalbaki

Through sheer coincidence, the word Kitab has acquired special significance in the field of Arabic grammar. The sudden and premature death ofSlbawayhi meant that his huge but unfinished and unnamed grammatical treatise had to be given a name by his contemporaries. What better a name than “al-Kitab” could they come up with to reflect the grandeur and exhaustiveness of Sibawayhi’s (d. ca. 180/796) work? The term “al-Kitab,” which is an example of an ‘alam bi-al-ghalabah,[306] can thus refer either to the Qur’an or to Sibawayhi’s treatise, which came to be known as Qur’an al-nahw.[307]

The Kitab of STbawayhi is striking in another aspect related to the concept of “book” in Arabic grammatical tradition. It is the first grammatical work written, and, at the same time, the most comprehensive and imposing among a host of grammatical works that have survived. al-Kitab, of course, did not emerge from a vacuum, but it is overwhelming in its material, technical terms, and analytic methods, given the relative scarcity of grammatical activity in the pre-Sibawayhi period. What is more striking than the unexpected appearance of this major work in grammar is that, unfortunately the later authors added to it hardly anything of real value or importance as far as material and terms are concerned, but tried to depart from some of the analytic methods of blame for the post-Sibawayhi grammarians' inclination to prescriptiveness, and their subjugation of attested usage to a rigid set of rules and to far-fetched explanations which have tarnished the image of nahw and disgraced the nahwiyun, causing them to be viewed not only as poor interpreters,[308] but also as insensitive to the intricacies of Arabic usage. This very insensitivity was at the heart of the emergence of balaghah as a discipline distinct for the lack of originality in the post-Sibawayhi period, characterized by concern for the permissibility of usage—according to the grammarians' criteria. Rather than be concerned with meaning and the disclosure of the impact of the context and the speaker's intention in using the 'awamil (operants, regents), the grammarians' regimen converged on exhausting the different kinds of 'awamil and so-called 'Hal (reasons).

Sibawayhi and from the delicate balance he established between qiyas and sama’. This departure is largely to

It is obvious that Sibawayhi's Kitab is the focal point in the history of Arabic grammatical writing. Consequently, any study of the "book" in this grammatical tradition is bound to have the Kitab as its point of departure. The present author proposes, in order to trace the development of the grammatical book, to examine three stages in the history of Arabic grammar, based on Sibawayhi as the focal point in this history, and according to the following scheme:

1. The pre-Sibawayhi stage, that is, the early grammatical activity leading to and preceding the phase of ta'lîf, and the reports about grammatical writings in this period;

2. Sibawayhi's Kitab, that is, its content, and the set of grammatical notions and methods it portrays; and

3. The post-Sibawayhi stage, that is, the departure from Sibawayhi's methods of grammatical analysis as exemplified in the work of the main figure after Sibawayhi, namely, Mubarrad.

Although this scheme might appear to have been oversimplified so as to suit the purpose of a general survey, it is basically an accurate representation of the development of grammatical activity. It is lamentable that after Sibawayhi one cannot discern any serious attempt at originality. Thus, the satisfaction with only one post-Sibawayhi stage is a reflection of the irreversible tendency of the grammarians of the third century onward toward complication, standardization and prescriptiveness, rather than a deliberate effort on our part to magnify the schism between Sibawayhi and the later grammarians, at least with regard to grammatical analysis.

The first reference to a “book” in the grammatical tradition is encountered in the biography of the allegedly first grammarian, Abu al-Aswad al-Du’alî (d. 69/688)[309] It is, however, highly improbable that Abu al-Aswad, or anyone trying to write preliminary notes on grammar, could have written a book on grammar, as the account quoted by al-Suyûtî claims, unless by “book” no more than a few pages are meant (hence the reference to it as al-Mukhtasar[310]). It is also highly improbable that this “book” could have covered nahw as such—as other accounts, again quoted by al-Suyûtî, indicate—at this early stage. We are thus left with the limited subjects mentioned in the different accounts.[311] These are the following:

1. The parts of speech (kalam): the noun (ism), which indicates a denominative (mâ anba’a ‘an al-musamma), the verb (fi’1), which is a movement (harakah, i.e., in time), and the particle (harf), which has a meaning not signified by the first two parts. The nouns are further divided into explicit nouns, pronouns, and what is neither of those.

2. The particles governing the accusative: inna, anna, laysa (!), la alia, ka anna, and lakinna. A few other “operants” are mentioned in other accounts, namely, those which govern raf (nominative and/or indicative), nasb (accusative and/or subjunctive), khafd (genitive) and jazm (jussive).

3. Three disparate topics: subject and object, admirative constructions, and the construct state.

These subjects, apart from the first, might well have been those that captured the attention of the grammarians of the first and early second centuries, especially since they are the very subjects liable to solecism (,lahn), which is a major factor in the initiation of Arabic grammatical thinking.[312] The division of kalam into parts could hardly have taken place at this stage, as it was of no great importance to the pedagogical aims of the grammarians then. Moreover, the resemblance between the division into parts of speech and their functions, in the accounts of Abu al-Aswad writing down ‘All s views, on the one hand, and Slbawayhi’s treatment of the subject, on the other, can be understood as part of the attempt to credit ‘All with laying the foundations of grammar, especially since parts of speech are given precedence in the Kitab, and are discussed in its very first lines.[313]

It seems absolutely clear that the concept of qiyas did not cross the minds of grammarians at this stage. Not only is there no mention of it in the accounts, but also the timid and confused attempt at classifying particles (manifested in the inclusion of laysa with five other particles followed by nouns in the accusative) does not seem to correspond at all to the concept of qiyas as used by later grammarians. Neither does it indicate that ’amil and ’amal were of interest in themselves at this stage, as the arrangement according to regimen seems to be initiated only for didactic purposes. One can therefore safely dismiss Ibn Sallam’s statement that Abu al-Aswad was the one who laid the foundation of Arabic (grammar) (awwal man assasa al-‘Arabiyah), one to have devised grammatical qiyas.[314]

Unlike the largely unrealistic and unfounded reports on the grammatical activity—especially in writing—of Abü al-Aswad and his contemporaries, we possess reliable material on the pre-SIbawayhi grammarians of the second century, mainly from Sibawayhi himself. The importance of the grammatical stage following the primitive beginnings of grammatical activity, and preceding that of Sibawayhi, lies in the use of qiyas as a method of grammatical analysis, an analytical technique which later became the backbone of Arabic grammar.

The main figures of this intermediate stage are:

1. .. 117/735): He is mentioned seven times by Sibawayhi,[315] and these mentions hardly substantiate the view that he represents a trend highly dependent on qiyas,[316] or that he is the first grammarian who can be identified as “Basran.”[317]

2. Isa ibn ‘Umar (d. 149/766): From the twenty references to him in the Kitab, a number of which simply quote him as a transmitter of certain specific usages, ‘Isa cannot be considered as a representative of the qiyasl trend[318] in the same sense the term came to acquire with SIbawayhi and the later grammarians. In other words, the sophistication characteristic of later qiyas cannot apply to him, although one can detect in some of his ideas[319] a tendency to compare two sentences or phrases and infer that one was given the same treatment as the other on the grounds of their similarity.

3. Abu ‘Amr ibn al-‘Alâ’ (d. 154/770): In his Tabaqat,[320] Zubaydi lists him both under the nahwiyun and the lughawiyun. However, evidence from the Kitab, in which he is quoted fifty-seven times, shows that while the term lughawi, lexicographer, is easily applicable to him, the term nahwi, grammarian, is hardly so. He is quoted mainly in relation to Quranic readings,[321] transmission of poetry,[322] and usages by Arabs, [323] in addition to some of his explanations and reasoning in matters related to lughah, rather than nahw.[324]

4. Abu al-Khattab al-Akhfash al-Kabir (d. 177/793): Although Zubaydi[325] lists him under the nahwiyun, and not the lughawiyun, the evidence furnished by Sibawayhi’s Kitab strongly suggests that the opposite is more likely true. There are fifty-eight mentions of him in the Kitab, all, without exception, on matters concerning lughah, not nahw.[326] Eight of these are on lines of poetry,[327] the rest being on prose material Abu al-Khattab heard from Arabs whose Arabic was usually described by Slbawayhi as being reliable or trustworthy (mawthuq bi-‘Aiabiyatihim).

5. Yunus ibn Habib (d. 182/798): There are 217 mentions of him in the Kitab.[328] In many instances he is quoted as a transmitter of certain usages: two concerning Qur’anic verses,[329] twenty concerning lines of poetry,[330] eighteen concerning usages reported by Abu ‘Amr, or views held by him,[331] and many other cases concerning prose.[332] Apart from al-Khain (see below), YQnus is the earliest grammarian in whose work a definite system can be discerned, sufficiently supported by textual evidence. Elaboration on this system is beyond the scope of this paper, but it should suffice US to point out briefly the main features of his methods of grammatical analysis:

a. He made extensive use of taqdir as an analytical tool. This involved the suppletive insertion of parts of the sentence, mainly the operants which he assumed to be elided.[333]

b. He often formulated grammatical “rules” of universal validity[334]— an extremely important step in the history of grammatical analysis which so far had been mainly concerned with particulars, rather than “rules” which embraced these particulars.

c. He often relied on anomalous examples in drawing conclusions or formulating “rule.”[335] His approach was thus highly reliant on sama’, with an obvious unwillingness to dismiss usages only scarcely used or documented.

6. al-Khalll ibn Ahmad (d. 175/791): Unlike those of the five grammarians above, the role of al-Khalll in the Kitab is integral to the whole work. There are 608 mentions of him in the Kitab, many of which cover whole chapters.[336] Indeed, al-Râzî asserts that Sibawayhi’s Kitab contains data (‘ulum) gathered from al-Khalll.[337] It would therefore be completely unrealistic to claim that it is possible to examine the linguistic analysis of either al-Khain or STbawayhi in isolation. Any conclusion here referring to Sibawayhi’s methods refers, by definition, to him as well as to his master.

Apart from individual grammarians, Sibawayhi refers seventeen times to a group which he calls nahwiyim.[338] The sense of the designation is not very clear.[339] but it should be noted that six out of these seventeen mentions are in relation to hypothetical examples they constructed, as opposed to what Arabs actually said.

The grammatical activity surveyed above, apart from furnishing the background of Sibawayhi’s book, and indeed, of the grammar book for centuries to come, reveals that despite the preoccupation of Sibawayhi’s predecessors with some basic grammatical phenomena, no grammar book seems to have preceded the Kitab. It is unimaginable that Sibawayhi, who frequently quotes his predecessors and gives them due credit, should have intentionally ignored reference to a grammar book before his. As for the reports that ‘Isa ibn ‘Umar wrote two grammar books, Jami’ and İkmâl,[340] we have no single reference to or quotation from either book in Sibawayhi’s Kitab, or indeed in any later grammatical work, and thus very much doubt the existence of either title.

We are left with no more than a single grammar book which might be claimed to have been written before the Kitab or in the same period; namely, Muqaddimahfial-nahw, by Khalaf al-Ahmar (d. 180/796). There is, however, compelling evidence that this book could not have been written in the second century, let alone that Khalaf al-Ahmar is its author:

1. The book is not attributed to Khalaf in the sources, which do not even accept him as a proper nahwi, since his contribution was mainly in poetry and, to a lesser extent, lexicography.[341] Asmâ’î, himself not accepted as a nahwi was nevertheless said to have been a better nahwi than Khalaf.[342]

2. The purpose of the book, as explained by the author, is to enable its reader to “improve his language in any book he might write, in poetry he might recite, or in an oration or treatise he might compose.”[343] This is not in tune with the trend in the second part of the second century. In spite of the fact that the beginning of Arabic grammatical activity was related to a didactic purpose, its development thereafter was largely on different lines, and the didactic element does not distinctly re-emerge until late in the third century.

3. The author speaks of grammatical principles (uşîd). particles (adawat), and operants (’awamH),[344] and arranges many parts of his book according to the government of these operants, listing those governing the nominative, accusative, genitive, and so on, under separate headings. This arrangement, and more particularly the uşûl, betrays the fact that the author was writing later than the second century, for this term was not yet used in the sense of grammatical principles or fundamentals of grammar, nor was such an arrangement of headings—characteristic of the fourth century onward—likely to have been used.

4. The author mentions the Basrans and the Kufans in two places, both concerning terminology, saying that the Kufans use the term istitiT for the Basran qat’ or ijra[345] (instigation), and Ijab for tahqlq[346] (void, exception, lacking the general term). But how could such a reference be made at a time when the two “schools” could not yet have been formed.?!

The formative elements of Sibawayhi’s Kitab can thus be reduced to the general grammatical activity preceding him. and especially that of the grammarians he quotes. Having discarded the Muqaddimah attributed to Khalaf as a work of the third or even fourth century, we can confidently conclude that Sibawayhi’s Kitab is the first book of Arabic grammar. It is interesting to note that this first attempt, which laid the solid foundations of terms and methods alike, has never been surpassed by later authors, nor has its author’s approach to linguistic analysis been seriously challenged, with the single exception of Ibn Madas refutation of the grammarians in his al-Radd ’aid al-nuhat.

Having studied the stage leading to the appearance of the first grammatical treatise, the developments that took place in the nature and methods of grammar books can best be traced by comparing Sibawayhi’s work, on the one hand, with the work of the later grammarians, on the other. We have already suggested that post-Sibawayhi grammarians may be identified as a single group to stress the fact that, from the third century onward, there was an irreversible trend away from some of the essential components of Sibawayhi’s method, resulting in a major change in the concept of what constitutes a grammar book, and for what purpose it is written. Although a detailed study is warranted to trace this development in its various aspects and appreciate the range of differences among grammarians within the general trend, we shall limit this part of the paper to the main features as portrayed in a comparison between Sibawayhi’s Kitab and the first major grammar book to be written after it. namely, al-Muqtadab, by Mubarrad (d. 285/898).

It should be stressed here that Slbawayhi set the main features which characterize the grammar book in general. The difference that one detects between him and the later authors is in aspects of the methods of grammatical analysis; most other features were largely preserved, and the broader ones among them—which should not be lost in the mass of details one encounters in the process of comparison—are the following:

1. The separation between lughah and nahw: The realm of nahw, as presented by Sibawayhi, remained distinct from that of lughah, which has an altogether different history of development.

2. The inclusion of sarf -. Although there was an early realization that the themes of sarf form a distinct entity and may be the exclusive subject of a whole treatise—as they were indeed as early as MazinFs (d. 247/861) Taşrîf— most of the later authors followed Sibawayhi's example in treating the themes of sarf in one treatise, side by side with the linguistic subjects which deal with the jumlah rather than the kalimah. Mubarrad's (d. 285/898) Muqtadab, Ibn al-Sarraj's (d. 316/928) Mujaz and Usui, and ZubaydFs (d. 379/989) Wadih are but a few examples of the continuity of Sibawayhi's method.[347] The phonetic part of sarf, which Sibawayhi considers late in his second volume, also continued to be included in most later books.

3. The shawahid: Not only did the bulk of Sibawayhi's shawahid form the main body of material for the later authors, but they had few additions to make, as they absolutely refused to extend the period of accepted shawahid beyond the second century. It is interesting to note that it was only on the linguistic merit of hadlth that there was a departure from this approach, and then a minor and short-lived one, propagated by proponents of one line of thought—harshly criticized by proponents of another—quite late in the history of grammar.[348]

4. The arrangement of material: Despite minor variations, the arrangement Sibawayhi adopts in the Kitab is generally observed by the later grammarians.

5. The tools of grammatical analysis: Whatever the later grammarians might have introduced to the study of grammar or however they might have drifted away from the delicate balance which Sibawayhi established in his analysis—as between sama' and qiyas, for example—there remains the fact that the "tools" of grammatical analysis used by Sibawayhi —in our view, largely under the influence of al-Khalll—were completely adopted by the later grammarians. Concepts such as taqdir, hadhf 'Ulah, 'amil, ma'mül, asl, and so forth, are featured in the later sources with practically the same range of application as in the Kitab. Furthermore, Sibawayhi's host of terms—again, largely from al-Khalll[349]—carried through to the later grammarians with only a few additions.[350] It is remarkable that even the Kufan terms, despite some of their idiosyncrasies, are largely similar to the terms used and elaborated on by Sibawayhi.

The major areas of difference between Sibawayhi and the later grammarians —represented here by Mubarrad—that reveal the changes that occurred in grammatical writing are the following:

1. On qiyas and sama'. Both authors use these terms in a largely similar sense, but Mubarrad gives more prominence to the first at the expense of the second. For him, qiyas is not only a method of grammatical analysis, but also a purely intellectual process which could be the arbiter in grammatical questions. His use of terms like minhaj ai-qiyas[351] and haqiqat al-qiyas[352]—which do not occur in the Kitab—points to a more closely defined view of qiyas, whereby it is not only used as a grammatical tool, but also referred to as one.

More importantly, Mubarrad seems to have changed the delicate balance Sibawayhi established between qiyas and sama'. In his system, .Si ba way hi puts limitations on qiyas, and respects sama', so that, apart from four examples,[353] he does not dismiss attested forms as wrong. Mubarrad, on the other hand, frequently considered attested forms as unacceptable or wrong and resorts to dismissing the riwayah to prove his point.[354] The matter takes more serious dimensions when Mubarrad's preference of qiyas over sama' prompts him to apply the former, resulting in forms that are contrary to those attested to by the Arabs through the latter. In his refutation of Mubarrad, Ibn Wallad points out that he and the grammarians are not allowed to apply a qiyas which would, even if it were sound, result in something that does not exist in their language, and endorses Sibawayhi's view that the application of qiyas for generating forms is only acceptable if these forms conform to the speech of the Arabs.[355] Unfortunately, Ibn Wallad's support of Sibawayhi is outweighed by the growing acceptance by the later grammarians of the approach which gives qiyas preeminence over sama’—an approach which brought about a major change in the nature of a grammar book, the Kitab, leading to a futile exercise in the application of criteria externally imposed by the grammarian on linguistic data.

2. On amal (regimen) and ta in (causation): The idea that any grammatical phenomenon in an utterance must have a cause to explain it, and that this cause can often be represented by the relation of the element that governs to the element governed by it, has dominated the thinking of almost all Arabic grammarians, mainly through the influence of al-Khalll and Sibawayhi. Furthermore, most of the reasons Sibawayhi cites for particular phenomena are adopted by the later grammarians, including Mubarrad.[356] However, a study of Mubarrad’s employment of the two concepts of regimen and causation reveals basic differences between his approach and that of Sibawayhi, especially as evidenced by the terminology expressing the concept of “operant.” In the Kitab, there are fifty occurrences of the terms ‘amil, ‘amilah, and ‘awamil. However, the majority do not express the concept of “operant.”[357] In an expression like wa-kâna al-‘âmilfihî mâ qablahu min al-kalam (the operant in it was the preceding sentence),[358] the word ‘amil cannot be said to stand for the concept of “operant,” as it lacks the degree of abstraction needed for such a concept. In a few other instances,[359] however, the concept is more clearly expressed. Mubarrad, on the other hand, not only expresses this concept with precision,[360] but also speaks of the different sorts of ‘awdmil, and uses expressions like ‘awamil al-afal,[361] awamil al-asmâ’,[362] tasarruf al-’âmil,[363] and al-’at/’ala ’âmilaynl.[364] Another expression Mubarrad uses is hah al-’awâmil,[365] which shows that the concept of operant has become a “class” in itself. Indeed, he applies language drawn from logic in his discussion of ‘awamil, as in the following passage: fa-idhd ja alta laha ʔawamil ta’mal jtha aimaka an tai’al li-‘awamiliha (awamil wa-kadhalika li-awamil ’awamilihd ilâ mâ lâ nihâyah (if you assign to it operants to act on it, you would need to assign operants to its operants, likewise to the operants of its operants, indefinitely).[366] This approach to ’awdmil continued to be used by the later grammarians and culminated in works devoted totally to ‘awâmil, complete with complex internal division[367]—another noteworthy development in the grammar book.

As for ta’lîl, Mubarrad, like Sibawayhi, assigns causes to explain grammatical phenomena, but his use of this tool is far more sophisticated than Slbawayhi’s. First, he uses the term ‘illah to refer to several phenomena, such as labs,[368] hadhf;[369] ikhtilâf[370] and jawhz[371] Moreover, he uses the term ’Hal to refer, collectively, to the issues or particulars of a certain bâb.[372] This shows how the uninterrupted application of ’illah resulted in a shift of meaning, whereby a grammatical bâb can be said to be made up of a number of ’Hal.

The major features of the difference between Slbawayhi’s use of ta’lîl and that of the later grammarians, represented here by Mubarrad, can be further demonstrated through the following observations:

a. Many of the phenomena for which Mubarrad assigns an ’illah are not given causes by Sibawayhi. Examples include the ’illah for the suffix of the third-person masculine plural being sakin (as in darabu), while that of the third-person feminine plural is not (as in darabna),[373] for many peculiarities of numerals and the tamylz following them,[374] and for the vocative which is mufrad and ending in datnmah.[375]

b. Many of the phenomena to which Sibawayhi assigns one ’illah are explained by Mubarrad by two or more ’Hal.[376] Expressions like wa-sanadhkuru dhdlika bi-istiqsd’ al-’illah JThH[377] show Mubarrad’s tendency to exhaust all the possible reasons for a particular phenomenon.

c. Many of the causes Mubarrad mentions are more complex and sophisticated than those given by Sibawayhi. For instance, whereas Sibawayhi mentions takhfif as the cause for the kasrah after the kâf in ahlâmikim, used by Bakr ibn Wa’il (akhaffmin an yudammfif,[378] Mubarrad dismisses the usage as unacceptable to ahi al-nazar.[379] And whereas Sibawayhi asserts that the elision of the nün of the dual and plural when the geminate energetic nun is suffixed to a verb in the dual or plural is to avoid disambiguity between the singular and the dual or plural,[380] Mubarrad resorts to qiyds,[381] the complexity of which becomes the target of Ibn Wallad’s criticism.[382]

Just as the approach to ‘awamil (in 1 above) gave rise to a new genre of grammatical books, namely, books on ’awamil, the approach to causation is the main reason for another genre of grammatical books, this time works on asrar (i.e., ‘Hal), as exemplified in Ibn al-Anbârî’s Asrdr ai’Arabiyah and al-Ighrab fl jadal al-i’râb, where causation is pursued as a mental exercise in logic more than as a tool of grammatical interpretation.

3. Regarding subdivisions, Mubarrad and the later grammarians, in general, tend to divide and subdivide grammatical phenomena to treat them more precisely, but often, too, to demonstrate their ability to expand on the subject at hand and present all its particulars under one heading. For example, in dealing with the types of definite nouns, Mubarrad divides them according to the degree of their “definiteness,”[383] whereas Sibawayhi makes no such distinction.[384] Similarly, Mubarrad lists four types of badal,[385] whereas Sibawayhi mentions them in different places,[386] without any attempt to show that they are different types of one concept.

4. As for “logical” considerations, several of these have already been mentioned, and this subject deserves detailed study. One can point out here, however, just a few manifestations of Mubarrad’s “logical” approach to grammar as an example of a drastic change in the nature of the grammar book. These include “fanqala”[387] (hypothetical questions and answers), “ihalah”[388] (reductio ad absurdum), and “tasalsul”[389] (successivity). Furthermore, some of the terms and expressions specific to logic and philosophy clearly feature in passages like the one in which he arranges the degrees of definiteness,[390] ‘. ٦ ١a-al-shay لأ ؟,لألاة ١ a’amm ma takallamta bihi, wa-al-jism akhass minhu, wa-al-hayawan akhaşş min al-jism...biannaka taqul kull rajul insan wa-la taqul kull insan rajul” (the thing is the most general connotation of a term, and the body is more specific, and animal is more specific than body. ..so you say every male is a human being but not every human being is a male).

Sibawayhi’s originality was not to be matched by any of the later grammarians. It was only when the new approach of the balaghiyun emerged— mainly out of the preoccupation of the nahwiyun with imposing their own norms on attested usage, and their inability to provide a theory of meaning compatible with their theory on qiyas, ‘amal, and so on—that originality made another appearance. This came with Jurjani’s theory, mainly in his Dala’il al-i’jâz, where he asserts that nahw should be the study of meaning, but that the nahwiyun failed to approach their subject from that angle.[391] But this attempt was again short-lived, and balaghah itself was later plagued with rigidity and the lack of continued revision of theory, Once again, later authors seem to have corrupted the basically sound systems of their forerunners, and thwarted the efforts they made in their first and major books in each of the two subjects.

[306] Ibn ‘Aqls Sharh ’ala alfiyat Ibn Malik, 4 vols., ed. M.M. ‘Abd al-Hamld (Cairo, 1967), 2:185–86

[307] Abu al-Tayyib al-Lughawl, Maratib al-nahwiyin, ed. M.A. Ibrahim (Cairo, 1974), p. 106.

[308] Cp. the saying: ad’afmin hujjat nahwi, in Ibn Khallikan’s Wafayat al-a’yân wa-anba’ abnci[1] al-zaman, 8 vols., ed. I. ‘Abbas (Beirut, 1968–72), 1:119. Examples of some of their poor interpretations are discussed by Ibn Mada’ al-Qurtubl in his al-Radd ’ala al-nuhat, ed. Sh. Dayf (Cairo, 1947). See also F. Tarazl, FT uşül al-lughah wa-al-nahw (Beirut, 1969), pp. 132–33.

[309] al-Suyûtî, Sabab wad’ ’Um al-’arabiyah, in al-Tuhfah al-bahlyah wa-al-turfah alshahiyah (Constantinople, 1885), p. 49ff. For the different accounts on the “first Arab grammarian,” see R. Talmon, “Who Was the First Arab Grammarian? A New Approach to an 011 Problem,” Zeitschriftfiir arabische Linguistik 15 (1985), pp. 128–46.

[310] Ibn al-Anbârî, Nuzhat al-alibba’ fltabaqat al-udaba’, ed. 1. Sâmarrâ’I (Baghdad, 1970), p. 20. Ibn al-Nadlm reports that he once saw four Chinese papers containing material from Abu al-Aswad’s grammatical treatise in the handwriting of Yahya ibn Ya’mar; see al-Fihrist, ed. R. Tajaddud (Tehran, 1971), p. 46. It is very doubtful, however, whether Chinese paper was known to the Arabs by the time of Yahya (d. 129/746), and if Ibn al-Nadlm indeed saw such a manuscript, it was, most probably, forged.

[311] In addition to al-Suyütî and Ibn al-Anbârî, see Ibn Sallam, Tabaqat al-shu’arce, ed I Hell (Leiden, 1916), p. 5; and Zubaydl, Tabaqat al-nahwiyin wa-al-lughawiym, ed. M.A. Ibrahim (Cairo, 1973), pp. 11–12.

[312] This is continuously stressed by the sources, and errors like ashaddu al-harri,” for “mâ ashadda al-harra,” and “inna Allaha barf un min al-mushrikina wa-rasiilihi” for “rasulahu” are invariably cited.

[313] Sibawayhi, Kitab, 2 vols. (BGlaq, 1316-17/1898-99, repr. Baghdad, 1965), 1:2.

[314] Tabaqat al-shu’arcT, p. 5; cp. ZubaydTs Tabaqat, p. 21. Equally untrustworthy is the reference to Nasr ibn ‘Asim as having opened qiyas wide (fataqa alqiyas). This is incompatible with Naşr’s grammatical activity, which is usually mentioned along with that of Abü al-Aswad, and said to be similar to it. See al-Qiftl, Inbah al-ruwah ‘ala anbah al-nuhah, 4 vols., ed. M.A. Ibrahim (Cairo, 1950–73)3:343 و.

[315] For this and other statistics about grammarians mentioned in the Kitab, see ةاةلأحلأدا1يلآ al-Halil ibn Ahmad, der Lehrer Slbawaihs, als Grammatiker (Berlin, 1959), pp. 67–75: and the additions and corrections made by G. Troupeau in “Â propos des grammairiens cites par Slbawayhi dans le Kitab,” Arabica 8 (1961), pp. 309–12. See also G. Troupeau’s Lexique-Index du “Kitab” de Slbawayhi (Paris, 1976), pp. 227–31: and ‘A.M. Hârü’s indexes to his edition of the Kitab (Cairo, 1977), pp. 181–961.

[316] As suggested, for example, by A.M. Ansari in “al-Tayyar al-qiyasl fl al-madrasah al-Başriyah,” Bulletin ofthe Faculty of Arts, Cairo University 24 (1962), p. 20.

[317] Sh. Dayf speaks of him as “ustâdh al-madrasah al-Basrivah”; see al-Madaris al-nahwiyah (Cairo, 1968), p. 22: while M.S. Belguedj says: “on avait en effet quelques raisons de le presenter parfois comme le premier grammarien ‘basrite’)1: see “La demarche des premiers grammairiens arabes dans le domaine de la syntaxe,” Arabica 20 (1973), pp. 168–85.

[318] This is contrary to Dayfs interpretation of ‘lsa’s views, in al-Madaris al-nahwiyah, p. 25.

[319] See, for example, Kitab, 1:272, where he allows the accusative in hâdhâ awwalufarisin muqbilan by comparing it with the accusative in hâdhâ rajulun muntaliqan, that is, treating it as a circumstantial accusative, not as an adjective. See also Kitâb, 1:313, where he reads yâ mataran, likening it to yâ rajulan, and explains the accusative through the nunation (i.e., the sign of indefmiteness) common to both.

[320] Tabaqht al-nahwiyin, pp. 35, 159.

[321] Kitab, 1: 238, 316: 2: 167, 289, 297, 358, 417. Note that Aba ‘Amr was one of the seven authorized readers.

[322] Ibid., 1: 253, 437, 446.

[323] Ibid., 1: 293, 320, 396: 2: 81, 167.

[324] Ibid., 1: 208, 265: 2: 15, 28, 63, 149, 208, 237.

[325] Tabaqbt al-nahwiyin, p. 40.

[326] In Zajjajis Majalis ai’ulama’, ed. ‘A.M. Harun (Kuwait, 2nd ed., 1983), P. 124, Abu al-Khattab has only one majlis (no. 75), again on lughah.

[327] Kitab, 1: 40, 103, 153, 271, 369, 462; 2: 12, 17. For the rest of the quotations, see Troupeau’s Lexique-Index, pp. 227–28.

[328] In addition to Reuschel and Troupeau, see A.M. Ansari, Yunus al-Başrî: hayatuhu wa-atharuhu wa-madhahibuhu (Cairo, 1973), pp. 320–21.

[329] 5;/50, 1: 173,236.

[330] Ibid., 1: 25, 77, 131, 359, 333, 289, 253, 241, 207, 201, 182, 161, 140, .174, 160, 54 :2 :486, 423, 468, 422

[331] Ibid., 1: 1, 194, 20153, 48, 23 :2 :453, 397, 360, 293, 273, 265, 208, .183, 125, 1.15 81, 1.12 81, 74, 63

[332] See, for example, Kitab, 1: 115, 174–249, 248, 231, 213, 207, 203, :470, 404, 402 ,311و 316 ,317 ,322 ,345 ,361و 363 ,372و 379 ,382و ,88 ,110 ,113 ,122 ,125 ,127 ,142و 148 ,153 ,190 ,191 ,258,275 ,284 388 ,288 ,278 ,273 ,249 ,226 ,203 ,201 ,192 ,2: 26 ,31 ,35 ,54 ,70 ,73.

[333] Some of the clearest examples of this can be found in Kitab, 1: 147, .412, 398, 328, 256 173 ,252و

[334] Examples of this are his assertion that any noun made of two conjoined nouns is a diptote (2:50), and that the diminutive (iahqir) invariably reveals the origin of the word’s radicals (2:85). See also 2:283, concerning ishmam.

[335] One example is his claim, based on the form manun, the plural of the interrogative particle man, and on the sentence daraba mannun mannan which he heard from an Arab, that manah can be considered to be declinable as is ayyah, and it is therefore permissible to use the forms manatun, manatan, and manatin. See Kitab, ١ر.1ح d. ٠١ب ؟>, Ham’ al-hawami’ sharhjam’ al-jawami’ (Cairo, 1909), 2:153.

Similarly, he allows iyyaka Zaydan on the basis of a poetic shahid (1:140; cf. Zubaydi’s Tabaqat, p. 53).

[336] Reuschel, al-Khalil, p. 18.

[337] al-Suyûtî, al-Iqtirahfi’ilm usulal-nahw, ed. A.M. Qasim (Cairo, 1976), pp. 205–6.

[338] Kitab, 1: 167, 194, 216, 223, 227, 242, 257, 383, 393, 395, 415, 433, 437; 2: 18, 107, 157, 315. Cf. Troupeau, Lexique, NHW, where three other mentions are cited, but only in the context of the seventeen occasions.

[339] For an examination of this term, see M.G. Carter, “Les origines de la grammaire arabe,” Revue des Etudes Islamiques 40 (1972), pp. 69–97.

[340] Fayrüzâbâdî, al-Bulghah fi târîkh a’immat al-lughah, ed. M. Mişrî (Damascus, 1972), pp. 180–81; and al-Suyütî Bughyat al-wu’atfi tabaqat 0/ ·lughawiym wa-ül-nuhât, ed. M.A. Ibrahim (Cairo, 1964–65), pp. 237–38.

[341] Note that Zubaydl lists him under the lughawiyun in his Tabaqat, p. 161.

[342] Ibid., p. 163: cf. Nuzhat al-alibba’, pp. 90–91.

[343] Khalaf al-Ahmar, Muqaddimahfial-nahw, ed. ε1. TanükhT (Damascus, 1961), p.34.

[344] Ibid., 0.34.

[345] Ibid., p. 53.

[346] Ibid., p. 80.

[347] R. Baalbaki, “The relation between nahw and balaga: a comparative study of the methods of Sibawayhi and Gurğâni,” Zeitschrift far arabische Linguistik 11 (1983), p. 7.

[348] For grammarians who included hadlth as a main source of linguistic data, and those who argued the case for its inclusion, see Baghdadi’s Khizanat al-adab wa-lubb lubab lisan al-‘arab (Bulaq, 1299) l:3ff.; and Kh. Hadithl, Mawqvf al-nuhat min al-ihtijaj bi-ai-hadith ai-sharif (3 افهلآ ١٢ؤ%ل١٥: 191–365.

[349] See the section on mustalahat in G.N. ‘Abâbinâ’s Makanat al-Khalll ibn Ahmad fa al-nahw al-‘arabî (Amman, 1984), pp. 157–76.

[350] For example, the addition of ism al-âla (in Kitab, 2:249, “hâdhâ bab mâ ‘ala ta bihi”), and ism al-marrah (in Kitab, 2:246, “hâdhâ bab nazâ’ir darabtuhu darbatan wa-ramaytuhu ramyatan’”’). For other examples, see Dayfs al-Madaris al-nahwiyah, pp. 61–62.

[351] Muhammad ibn Yazid al-Mubarrad, Kitab al-Muqtadab, 4 vols., ed. M.A. ‘Udaymah (Cairo, 1965–66), 3:147; hereafter Muqtadab.

[352] Ibid., 1:177.

[353] These are the passages in which Sibawayhi describes observed linguistic data as unacceptable; see Kitab, 1: 290: 2: 127, 278, 367.

[354] See, for example, Muqtadab, 2: 22, 116–17, 132–33 (cf. Kitab, 1:408); 3:285; and Kamil, ed. w. Wright (Leipzig, 1864–92), p. 22. For evidence of Mubarrad's rejection of riwayah from other sources, see Ibn al-Sarraj's Kitab al-uşûlfîal-nahw, 3 vols., ed. 'A Fatal! (Baghdad, 1973), 1:123; and Ibn Jinnfs al-Khaşâ'iş, 3 vols., ed. M.A. Najjar (Cairo, 1952–56), 1:75. As for usages which Mubarrad dismisses but that Sibawayhi accepts, or only describes as weak but not to be dismissed, cf. five examples from Kitab, 1: 235, 435: 2: 12 1و 144و 294و with their corresponding passages in Muqtadab, 2: 146, 72–73, 249, 336: 1: 269–70.

[355] İntişâr Sibawayhi 'ala al-Mubarrad, in Muqtadab, 3:313, فآةاأ ل.

[356] Examples of this are the agreement that the implicit verb is the operant which brings about the accusative in certain vocative constructions (Kitab, 1:303: Muqtadab, 4:202), and that ihtida' is the operant causing the nominative in the mubtada' (Kitab, 1:278: Muqtadab, 2:49). But for disagreement, see their discussions of the mustathnd (Kitab, 1:369: Muqtadab, 4:390), and of the apodosis (Kitab, 1:449: Muqtadab, 2:82).

[357] As in Kitab, 1: 27, 37, 64, 74, 79, 92, 104,134 ,179 ,202و 228 ,243 ,248 ,277 ,345 ,360 ,362و 440 ,456 ,457 ,465. و, 108 ,121

[358] Ibid., 1:369.

[359] For example, 1: 3, 48, 231, 245, 347: 2: 61. See also F. Praetorius, “Die grammatische Rektion bei den Arabern,” Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenlandischen Gesellschaft 63 (1909), p. 499, where specialized terms connected with ‘awamil, not found in the Kitab, are pointed out.

[360] As in Muqtadab, 2:5: 4:302, for example.

[361] Ibid., 2:10, 75.

[362] Ibid., 2:6, 7, 38, 345.

[363] Ibid., 4: 156, 300.

[364] Kamil, pp. 163, 448.

[365] Muqtadab, 4:317.

[366] Ibid., 4:80.

[367] al-‘Awamil al-mi’ah al-nahwiyah fl uşûl ‘ilm <لا٠لأآ؟ m قح al-‘arabiyah, ed. al-Badrawl Zahran (Cairo, 214 ed., 1988).

[368] Muqtadab, 3:142.

[369] Ibid., 2:269: 3:166.

[370] Ibid., 2:153.

[371] Ibid., 3: 101, 217.

[372] Cf. the expression, “bab anna wa-inna bi-jamr ‘ilalihr (Kamil, p. 49), لAاخم\\ “wa-hadha yushrah ’aid hiyalihi bi-jamr ‘ilalihi’ (Muqtadab, 2:31–32).

[373] Ibid., 1:271.

[374] Ibid., 2:163–69, esp. p. 166 1.12, and p. 167 1.1.

[375] Ibid., 4:204.

[376] Cf., for example, Kitab, 2:153, with Muqtadab, 3:19, for the fathah in the imperfect followed by the energetic nün, and Kitab, 2:36–38, with Muqtadab, 3:374 (cf. Kamil, p.268, and Ibn al-Sarrâj’s Uşûl, 1:424; 2:90), for the final kasrah of feminine forms of the pattern fa’âlî]

[377] Ibid., 2:136.

[378] Kitab, 2:294.

[379] Muqtadab, 1:20.

[380] Kitab, لادرلآ.

[381] Muqtadab, 3:22.

[382] intişar, in Muqtadab, 3:21, margin.

[383] Muqtadab, 4:281.

[384] Kitab, 2:260[.

[385] Muqtadab, 4:297, cf. Kamil, pp. 438–39.

[386] Kitab, 1: 75ff., 218ff., 224., 393ff.

[387] For example, Muqtadab, 2:3–4,: 4:173–76.

[388] Ibid, 1:36: 4:8. See also his use of ihalah as reported in majlis 55 of Zajjâjî's Majalis, p. 96: and in Ibn Jinnfs Khasais, 1:89.

[389] Muqtadab, 3:3743 4:80.

[390] Ibid., 4:280. Cf. Abu al-Baqa', al-Kulliyat (Cairo, n.d.), p. 358.

[391] For the relation between nahw and balaghah, the emergence of the latter as a reaction to the former, and a detailed comparison between the two key figures of the two fields, namely Sibawayhi and Jurjanl, see my article mentioned in note 42 above.

 8. Women’s Roles in the Art of Arabic Calligraphy

Şalâh al-Dîn al-Munaijid

Those scholars who study the role of women in Islam will notice that throughout the different periods of history, women were actively engaged in every field of endeavor, be it politics, government, or learning. Women were not confined, as some have assumed, to mothering and household occupations.

Women achieved a distinguished position in society by becoming skilled in Arabic composition, and by excelling in penmanship and calligraphy. Quite often, women managed the affairs of palaces, acquired knowledge and became important scholars, and copied books of all genres, including literature, poetry, and Traditions (hadlth). They copied books in a most beautiful way, and competently checked the copies against the originals for correctness. They copied Korans (masahif) and excelled in the manner of presenting them. People in government often relied on women to write the texts of political treaties because of their superior writing abilities.

 Islam Encourages Learning and Writing

At the advent of Islam, only seventeen men and three women of the clan of Quraysh knew how to write. When the Prophet came, he called upon his followers to become learned, to learn how to read and write. The Holy Koran is explicit in this regard. God swore by the pen. He said, “i, by the pen and what they write,”[392] and God commanded His Messenger to read. He said, “Recite (or read, iqra’) in the name of thy Lord who created, created man from a blood-clot. Recite, and thy Lord is the Most Bountiful, who taught by the pen, taught man what he did not know.”[393] God also ordained the cultivation of learning. He said, “Seek ye knowledge even in China.” China, in this context, refers to a remote point, extremely distant from Mecca and Medina (in the absence of modern means of travel and communication), and very hard to reach. He ordained teaching. He said, “He who is learned among you should teach the others.” God instructed the Messenger to seek knowledge, despite its being a difficult undertaking.

One of the earliest verses of the Koran, revealed just after the emigration of the Prophet to Medina, had to do with debt. God ordained the writing, or recording (kitabah), of debts. He said, “O, ye who believe, when you contract a debt one upon another for a stated term, write it down and let a scribe write it between you in equity.”[394] Henceforth, writing came into fiscal legislation for the recording of contracts and for the protection of peoples’ rights.

The Messenger ordained writing in another area, namely writing a will before death. He encouraged every person to write a will before his death, and to divide his personal property among his heirs or donate it to the poor.

Great interest was shown in studying script and writing, in particular writing down the revelation of the Koran. The Messenger was illiterate, in that he did not know how to read or write. God said, “Not before this didst thou recite any Book, or inscribe it with thy right hand.”[395] The Prophet appointed several from among those Companions of his who knew how to write to be his writing secretaries. These included Abu Bakr, ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab, ‘Uthman ibn ‘Affan, ‘All ibn Abi Talib, Zayd ibn Thabit, Ubbay ibn Ka’b, Mu’awlyah ibn Abî Şufyân, and Zayd ibn Arqum. He assigned each one of them a specific task. To Zayd ibn Thabit he assigned the writing down of the revelation, for example. The Messenger, furthermore, set up a special desk (suffah) in the mosque for the purpose of teaching, and he appointed a special staff of teachers to teach writing. Among the teachers were ‘Abd Allah ibn Sa’id ibn al-‘Aşş and ‘Ubadah ibn al-Samit. He also sent Mu’âdh ibn Jabal to Yemen and Hadramaut as a teacher.

The Prophet’s interest in teaching was not limited to the education of men; he directed that women, too, should receive proper education. He asked a woman called al-Shafa’ bint ‘Abd Allah al-‘Adawiyah, who was conversant in the art of writing, to teach his daughter Hafşah that art.

The Companions of the Prophet later called on people to learn how to write. ‘ Ali ibn Abi Talib said, “Teach your children writing and marksmanship.” He also said, “Beautiful writing makes the truth clearer,” and “Take up beautiful writing, it is the key to livelihood.” ‘Abd Allah ibn al-‘Abbâs said, “Calligraphy is the tongue of the hand.”

One more thing should be pointed out, as it clearly indicates the Prophet’s concern for promoting learning. When the battle of Badr ended with the victory over the clan of Quraysh, the number of prisoners was high. Most of them did not have the necessary funds for a ransom. The Messenger consented that each prisoner ransom himself by teaching ten Muslims who were versed in the tenets of Islam to read.

The above considerations, together with enthusiasm for learning, directed the Muslims toward the high road of knowledge and the pursuit of writing capability. These same considerations led also to the diffusion of the Arabic script and to the writing of works that numbered in the millions, including works on religion as well as in the humanities. Muslim scholars who got involved in authoring did so prolifically. The works of some individual scholars reached four hundred in number. Mention can be made here of al-Kindl the philosopher, al-Jahiz the writer, al-Madâ’inî the historian, Ibn ‘Arabi the mystic, and al-SuyutT the theologian.

 The Arabs, Excellence in Calligraphy

In Mecca, the Arabs wrote in a script called the Meccan, an offshoot of the Nabatean script. After the hijrah, the emigration of the Prophet to Medina in 622 C.E., a script called the Medinian evolved. It differed little from the Meccan. The Kufi script appeared after the establishment of the city of Kufah in 638 C E. It marked the beginning of a new era in the history of scripts in that this last and newest script manifested tendencies for improvement and variation.

The Kun script spread along with Islam in all the conquered countries. Each country, however, stamped it with its own particular character, so we began to see the Damascene, or Syrian; the Baghdadi; the Iraqi, or Muhaqqaq; the Egyptian; the Qayrawani; and the Andalusian scripts. Some scripts came to be known after the name of a ruling dynasty, such as the Fatimid, Ayyubi, and Mamluk Kun scripts. The Kun script, in all its variations, remained the script of the masahif, Korans, until the fourth/tenth century. It was then that Ibn Muqlah and Ibn al-Bawwab appeared, and the writing of the masahif in the Naskhi (cursive) script began. The sixth/twelfth century witnesses the complete disappearance of Kufi as the script of Korans; however, it remained used for the decoration of mosques and inscriptions on tombstones. New and more developed styles of script appeared with the passage of time, such as the new Naskh, Ruqa’, Thuluth, Dlwanl, and Ta’liq. Both the Persians and the Turks later excelled in producing other beautiful styles of script.

Using this wealth of scripts, the Muslims produced millions of works and millions of masahif. None of the other ancient civilizations produced as great a number of works as did the Islamic and Arab civilizations--and that includes the Greek, the Syriac, and the Roman.

 The Place of Calligraphy in Islam

Calligraphy occupied a high position in Islam and played an important role in society for the following reasons:

1. Islam encouraged reading and writing from the very beginning.

2. Calligraphy became an official and religious tool.

3. Arabic script was beautiful and amenable to development.

4. Calligraphers were accoladed and supported by Muslim states.

5. Muslim calligraphers were possessed of genius.

Calligraphy invaded all areas of culture and society. Korans, as well as scientific, religious, and literary works, were penned in beautiful styles of calligraphy. Mosques, tribunes (،minbars), palaces, baths, rugs, pillows, seats, swords, helmets, and even scientific instruments, such as astrolabes and globes, were all embellished with calligraphy and calligraphic designs. What may come as a surprise is that the calligraphers who produced masterpieces that drew worldwide admiration were not all men. Women played a very significant role in the growth of Islamic culture.

 Women’s Occupations: Calligraphy

Reading and writing helped women acquire a variety of cultural qualifications that enabled them to become scientists, writers, and poets. Furthermore, it prepared them to assume responsible positions in the state and to work in the courts (diwans) of the caliphs helping in the facilitation of all kinds of transactions. As far back as the third/ninth century, al-Jahiz described these active women by saying: “The kings and nobility had bondswomen who undertook all kinds of daily responsibilities joining the workforce or staff of the diwans. There were women who attended to the affairs of people, such as Khalişah, the maid of al-Khayzuran; and ‘Utbah, the maid of Ritah, daughter of Abu al-‘Abbâs al-Saffah; and Sukkar and Turkiyah, the maids of Umm Ja’far. Furthermore, women appeared in public stylishly dressed and nobody decried that or reproached it.”[396]

Sitt Nasim, one of the favorites (hazlyah) at the end of the Abbasid period, played an important role during the caliphate of al-Nâşir li-Dîn Allah (d. 622/1225). The Caliph taught her calligraphy so she was able to write almost beautifully as he did. When, in his old age, his eyesight weakened and senility overtook him, and he became unable to attend to the affairs of the people, he asked her to respond, as she saw fit, to all the written requests addressed to him. She performed that task for a long time.[397]

Some of the poets and learned men had educated women to assist them. Abu al-‘Atahiyah, the famous poet, had a bondswoman to whom he dictated his poetry, and she copied it down very well. Muhammad ibn al-‘Abbâs ibn al-Furat (d. 384/994), the hadith compiler and hafiz who authored one hundred commentaries on the Koran and one hundred history books, had a bondswoman who check what he copied from other books to make sure that there were no discrepancies. This is not as simple as it seems; it requires a high degree of education.

In the palaces of the caliphs in Spain, al-Nuddar (d. 374/984), a favorite of Caliph al-Hakam ibn ‘Abd al-Nâşir the Umayyad (d. 362/972), distinguished herself. She was not only a poet, but also knoweldgeable in mathematics, and was involved in all aspects of learning and in calligraphy.[398] Lubna (d. 394/1003), the secretary of al-Mustanşir (d. 366/976), was a poetess who excelled in grammar, rhetoric, and mathematics. She produced a variety of fine calligraphic works.[399] And there was Muznah (d. 358/968), the secretary of the Andalusian caliph Nâşir al-Dîn. She was one of the most distinguished calligraphers.[400]

Many women, in fact, distinguished themselves in calligraphy, acquiring rank and importance as a result. Such was the case with Fatimah, the daughter of al-Hasan al-Aqra’. She wrote in mansub style, follwing the manner of the great calligrapher Ibn al-Bawwab. Calligraphers all over the Islamic world imitated her.[401] One day, she wrote a note to Muhammad ibn Manşür al-Kandari, the vizier of Tughril Beg and the first Saljuqi vizier. He was so impressed with her writing style and her eloquence that he presented her with one thousand dinars.[402] When the caliph al-Muqtadir (d. 932) sent the Byzantine emperor a letter declaring a truce between Byzantium and Baghdad, he asked Fatimah to pen it in her beautiful handwriting.[403]

 Women Scholars and Calligraphy

Women’s concern for copying religious and scientific books as well as poetical anthologies grew as time went by. Their undertakings combined scholarship and beauty. Mention is to be made here of Fatimah (d. 966/1558), the daughter of ‘Abd al-Qadir, better known as Bint Quraymazan. She was a scholar in her own right, and a principal of the ‘Adiliyah khanqah (a school for Sufis) in Aleppo. She copied, by her own hand, a great number of books.[404]

Another woman scholar was Sayyidah (d. 647/1249), the daughter of Abd al-Gham al-‘Abdariyah of Granada, Spain, who knew the Koran by heart and was well known for her philanthropic work and for ransoming prisoners. She copied, by her own hand, the whole of al-Ghazzalis ihya’ ‘ulum al-dîn (The Revival of Religious Sciences).[405] al-Rida, the daughter of al-Fath, was a well known writer in Baghdad. She was a prolific writer and copier, and copied the diwan of Ibn al-Hajjaj, a copy of which the historian al-Şafadî saw. Another well known woman in Baghdad was Shuhdah bint al-Ubrl. Nicknamed “the glory of womanhood,” she was a muhaddithah, a compiler of the hadith, who knew by heart the Traditions of the Messenger of God. She was also called musnidat al-‘Iraq, the Iraqi authority. She penned beautiful calligraphy in the fashion of Fatimah bint al-Aqra’. There was none like her at the time. When she died in 574/1178, the Caliph himself presided over her funeral.[406]

 Women Excel in the Copying of Korans

The core of our subject is women’s role in the copying of Korans. Women calligraphers practiced this art all over the Islamic world, from Spain to Syria, Iraq, Persia, and India. They even competed with each other in the copying of wonderful Korans.

Historians mention that in the eastern quarters of Cordova there were one hundred and seventy women copying Korans in the Kufi script. They worked day and night by candlelight which illuminated the streets along three parasangs (farsakhs).[407] One woman who copied Korans was the Cordovan ‘A’ishah, the daughter of Ahmad (d. 400/1009). She was a good poet and calligrapher, and also a bibliophile who collected a great number of books. She was respected and loved by kings.[408]

During the Sanhaji rule in Tunisia, Durrah al-Katibah, the writer, one of the secretaries in the Sanhaji court, acquired great fame. One of her unparalleled works is the Hadinah (The Nursemaid) Koran. In the court of Banii Zîrî there were several foreign bondsmaids, one of whom was from Byzantium. She was captured by pirates during the reign of the SannajI prince al-Manşür, and taken first to Mahdiyah and later to Qayrawan. al-Manşür bought her and changed her name to Fatimah. She was very intelligent, so al-Manşür entrusted her with the nursing of his son, Badis. This is why she came to be known as Fatimah al-Hadinah, that is, the nursemaid. When al-Mu'izz ibn Badis consolidated his power, he raised her position, thus raising the prestige of and respect for his father's nurse and teacher. Fatimah endowed the mosque of 'Uqbah in Qayrawan with valuable books, rare works, and gilded Korans, some of which still exist in the old library. Some of the Korans are written with smelted gold in the old Kufi scripts. One of the endowed Korans was copied by a certain Durrah. On the last page is written, "In the Name of God the Merciful, the Compassionate, Fatimah the Nursemaid, the nursemaid of Abü Manad Badis. I endowed (habastu) this Koran to the Mosque of the City of Qayrawan in the month of Ramadan 410 A H. (1019 C.E.)." And on the other side of the paper is written, "This Koran was copied, diacritically marked, decorated, gilded, and bound by 'All ibn Ahmad al-Warraq for the honorable Nursemaid. May God protect her, at the hand of Durrah, the calligrapher, may God keep her." Fatimah died in 420/1029, but her Koran remains with us.[409]

 Women Calligraphers in the Ottoman Period

During the Ottoman period, calligraphry gained a very high standing in society. Several women calligraphers flourished. Among them were 'Ibrat; Zahidah Salma Khanum; Sharifah 'A'ishah Khanum; Silfinaz Khanum; Faridah Khanum, the Qastumonian; Khadljah Kuzaydah Khanum Celebi; and Nukliah Khanum.

Many of the Ottoman sultans were themselves calligraphers, as were their mothers. Durrah Khanum, the mother of Sultan Mahmüd Khan, copied a Koran in the year 1172/1758. This Koran was held by the Mahmüdiyah Library in Medina. It is said that it was carried away by the Ottoman Turks to Istanbul when they left the Hijaz.[410] The mother of Sultan ‘Abd al-Majid Khan, who ascended to the throne in 1255/1839, penned a copy of Dala’il al-khaymt, which was also among the holdings of the Mahmüdiyah Library in Medina.

Among the most splendid works of the Turkish women calligraphers is a Koran copied by alshanfah and hafizah Zulaykhah Khatiml al-Sa’dî, the daughter of al-Haii ‘Abd al-Karim Zadah Bisâr-İ Yârı, in 1276/1859. “al-Shanfah” indicates that she was a descendant of the family of the Prophet, and “hafizah” indicates that she was one of those who knew the Koran by heart. The calligrapher who knew the Koran by heart, whether man or woman, was thought to be more trustworthy.

The first two pages of this Koran are splendidly illuminated. Within “The Opening” (al-Fatihah) and the beginning of “The Cow” (al-Baqarah), several âyât (verses) are decorated with very colorful folial and floral designs on a gilded background. Though I have seen many gilded Korans, I don’t believe I have seen anything as beautiful as these two pages. The other pages of this Koran have wide, gilded border surrounded by a fine blue line. The verses are separated by gilded circular designs filled with variated ornamentations. The titles of the surahs are placed within gilded panels, within which the number of the surah is written in white. In the margins, the ahzab (60th part) and ajza’ (30th part) are indicated by circular designs within which the word hizb or juz’ is inscribed. The designs have a head and a tail similar, in a way, to a colored spike, and one of them is differently shaped. The script is in beautiful Naskhi script, the binding is leather filigreed in gold. A Jeddah scholar owns this Koran.

It is believed that there exists a spiritual and mystical bond between women and the letters of the alphabet. One writer described a woman calligrapher by saying: “Her ink was like the blackness of her hair, her paper was like the tanned skin of her face, her pen was like one of her delicate fingers, and her knife was like the penetrating sword of her sweet looks.” The eyebrows of a beautiful woman have been compared to the Arabic letter nun, her eye to an ’ayn, her temple to a waw, her mouth to a mim, and her braided hair to a shin. For a woman to be considered really beautiful, one of the qualifications was good penmanship. It was said that a lucky woman was one who combined the beauty of body and face with that of character and penmanship.

[392] The Holy Koran, 68:1.

[393] Ibid., 96:1–4.

[394] Ibid., 2:282.

[395] Ibid., 29:48.

[396] ‘Amr ibn Bahr al-Jahiz, Rasa’ll, 2 vols., ed. A.M. Hârün (Cairo, 1964), 2.156.

[397] Khalil ibn Aybak al-Şafadı, al-Wafi bi-al wafayat, ed. Wadād al-Qāḍī (Wiesbaden, 1982), 16:239.

[398] al-Suyütî, Bughyatal-Wuat, 2 vols., ed. M. Abu al-Fadl Ibrahim (Cairo, 1965), 2:269.

[399] Loe. cit.

[400] ‘Umar Rida Kahhalah, A’lâm al-nisâ’, 3rd. ed., 5 vols. (Beirut, 1977), 5:49

[401] ‘Abd al-Hayy ibn Ahmad ibn al-‘Imâd, Shadharat al-dhahabfi akhbar man dhahab, 8 vols. in 4 (Beirut, 1966), 4:365.

[402] Loe. cit.

[403] Yaqut al-Hamawl, Mu jam al-udaba’, 7 vols., ed. D.s. Margoliouth, E.J.W. Gibb Memorial (London, 1923–27), 6:113: ‘Abd al-Rahman ibn aLJawzl, al-Muntazam fi târîkh al-umam, 10 vols. (Hyderabad, 1359/1940)9:40 و.

[404] Ibn al-‘Imâd, Shadharat, 8:347.

[405] al-Şafadı, al-Wafi, 16:65.

[406] Ibid., 14:128, ed. by s. Dedering.

[407] Muhammad Kurd ‘All “Ghabir al-Andalus wa-hadiruha,” Majallat al-Majma’ al-‘Ilmi bi-Dimashq 2 (1922), p. 265.

[408] Kahhalah, A’lâm ül-nisâ’, 3:6.

[409] Hasan Husni ‘AM al-Wahhab, Waraqat Tunisiyah, 3 vols. (Tunis, 1964), 1:345و Shahirât al-Tünisîyât, 2nd ed. (Tunis, 1966), pp. 80–82.

[410] Muhammad Tahir al-Kurdl, Târîkh al-khatt al-‘Arabi wa-adabuh (Cairo, 1936), p. 340.

 9. Some Illustrations in Islamic Scientific Manuscripts and Their Secrets

David A. King

An estimated 10,000 Islamic scientific manuscripts survive in libraries around the world. Although many were copied after the creative period of Islamic science, they bear witness to a scientific tradition which knew no rival from the eighth to the fifteenth centuries. While many of these manuscripts are illustrated, the illustrations have received scant attention from historians. For example, even though some manuscripts of al-Şufı’s Book on Constellations have been studied by art historians, neither a critical study of the available manuscripts nor a comparative study of the various traditions of illustration has been conducted. Moreover, there are other treatises in which constellation figures occur, and other astrological treatises in which there are illustrations that should be of interest to art historians.

Some attention has been paid to the diagrams in works on engineering (see figure 9.1), and scholars have labored over geometrical diagrams to understand the accompanying mathematical procedures (see figure 9.2). Islamic maps have also fared quite well at the hands of historians, and the state of our present knowledge of Islamic cartography is reasonably advanced. Investigations of diagrams of geometrical planetary models led, in the 19505, to the discovery of a tradition lasting several centuries of Islamic modifications to Ptolemaic planetary theory (see figure 9.3).

My present purpose is to demonstrate the significance of various other categories of illustrations which I have worked on recently and which open up new chapters in the field of Islamic science.

 Some Illustrations in Treatises on Astronomical Instruments

Before mentioning some illustrations in Islamic texts on astronomical instruments, let US look at figure 9.4, from the Shahinshahname, which shows the scene at the Ottoman Observatory in Istanbul. The observatory was built in 1577 and demolished in 1580, and we are lucky indeed to have this miniature. The director, Taqi al-Dîn, is one of the two men contemplating the astrolabe. Some of the books behind him are now in the University Library in Leiden: his mark of ownership is found on several manuscripts in that library. TaqI al-Din himself wrote a treatise on mechanical clocks, and one such clock is featured here. Most of the instruments, notably the astrolabe and two quadrants, and various observational instruments, are of Islamic provenance; one, the terrestrial globe, is European. A terrestrial globe from the workshop of Mercator, with a dedication to Sultan Murad III dated 1579, was auctioned at Christie's of London in 1991; could this be the one illustrated here?

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-8.jpg][Fig. 9.1. Numerous mechanical devices are illustrated and described in this eleventhcentury Andalusian treasure, discovered less than twenty years ago. (MS Florence Bibliotheca Medicea-Laurenziana Or. 152.)]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-9.jpg][Fig. 9.2. A geometrical diagram accompanying the solution of a problem in spherical astronomy. (From a manuscript in the Universiteitsbibliotheek, Leiden.)]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-10.jpg][Fig. 9.3. An illustration of a non-Ptolemaic planetary model from a treatise of the thirteenth-century Maragha school. (From a manuscript in the Dar al-Kutub, Cairo.)]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-11.jpg][Fig. 9 .4 The astronomers of the Istanbul Observatory with some of their instruments This miniature is a veritable gold-mine of information which has yet to be fully exploited CMS Istanbul University Library Yildiz 1404.)]]

A project currently in progress in Frankfurt aims to catalogue all of the historically significant, surviving Islamic astronomical instruments (as well as European to ca. 1550). As many of the instruments as possible are being examined at first hand, and the relevant manuscript sources are also being exploited for information. Sometimes, manuscripts constitute the only available source of information on certain classes of instruments of which no examples have survived.

Figure 95 shows some of the illustrations of unusual astrolabe retia in a treatise on the astrolabe by al-Bîrûnî. These variatons on the standard astrolabe are of considerable historical interest, not least because we now know al-Bîrüns source for his information on them. His predecessor, al-Sijzi, actually mentions the astronomers who devised them and the patrons to whom they dedicated examples of them. Alas, all such instruments have disappeared without a trace, and it is left to the modern historian to piece together the details. Dr. Richard Lorch of Munich is currently preparing a critical analysis of all of the related textual material. Sometimes we are more fortunate in having both text and instrument, although in the following examples the instruments were known to modern scholarship before the texts.

An astrolabe in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York bears the signature of the Yemeni Rasulid Sultan al-Ashraf and is dated 690/1291 (see figure 9.6). A few decades ago, it was pronounced a fake: no Yemeni sultan could have made such an astrolabe. Perhaps, it was speculated, the astrolabe was made for him in Cairo, because the Yemen is a backwater, and no serious astronomy could have been practiced there. We now know of over one hundred Yemeni astronomical manuscripts attesting to an active tradition of astronomy in the Yemen from the tenth century to the twentieth. One of these, preserved in the Egyptian National Library, is an illustrated treatise by al-Ashraf on the construction of the astrolabe and sundial (see figure 9.7). Appended to the text, which may well be in the Sultan’s own hand, is a set of ijazahs by two of his teachers approving six astrolabes which he made and mentioning various features of each. One of these is clearly the New York instrument.

Another case is an astrolabe in the Benaki Museum in Athens which was made by Ibn al-Sarraj in Aleppo in 729/1328 or 1329. It is the most sophisticated astrolabe ever constructed, being universal in five different ways (see figure 9.8). (Most astrolabes have plates serving a series of latitudes; the universal astrolabe with a single plate serving all latitudes was invented in Andalusia in the eleventh century.) A manuscript in Princeton contains an account by the fifteenth-century Egyptian astronomer ‘Abd al-‘Azîz al-Wafâ’T of the use of Ibn al-Sarrâj’s remarkable instrument. (al-Wafa’1 actually owned the astrolabe; his name is engraved on the edge of the rim.) In his treatise, al-Wafâ’î complained that Ibn al-Sarraj had not explained its use, and so he undertook to do this himself. It is fortunate that he did, because the use of some of the parts is not at all obvious. Ibn al-Sarraj emerges as a genius. But who was he? We knew but little about him until 1983, when a richly illustrated manuscript was discovered in the Chester Beatty Library in Dublin (miscataloged as a Persian work on the astrolabe). It turned out to be a treatise by Ibn al-Sarraj, probably in his own hand, describing all of the different varieties of instruments known to him, and all those invented by him (see figure 9.9). Although this treatise was clearly written before he developed his quintuply-universal masterpiece, it provides ample evidence of his background and has yet to be exploited for the historical information that it contains.

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-12.jpg][Fig. 9.5. Non-standard astrolabes illustrated in the treatise on astronomical instruments by al-Marrakushi (Cairo, ca. 1280). The text is based on al-Birum (Central Asia, ca. 1025), who abridged the discussion of them by al-Sijzi (E. Iran, ca. 1000). (MS Cairo Dar al-Kutub K 3821.)]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-13.jpg][Fig. 9.6. The back of the astrolabe of the Yemeni Sultan al-Ashraf, dated 690/1291. This is the only known Islamic astrolabe on which the back is devoted to astrological information and also one of the few on which the sun, moon, and five planets are indicated by their symbols. The very same peculiarities are featured in an illustration found in al-Ashrafs treatise on astrolabe construction (see figure 8.7). (Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, inv. no. 91.1.535.)]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-14.jpg][Fig. 9.7. One of numerous illustrations in al-Ashrafs treatise on astrolabe construction. If any proof were needed that the New York astrolabe was indeed due to al-Ashraf... but none is. The treatise also deals with sundial construction (no medieval sundials are known from the Yemen) and contains the earliest known description of a magnetic compass in any astronomical text.]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-15.jpg][Fig. 9.8. The universal astrolabe of Ibn al-Sarraj (Aleppo, 1328 or 29), the most sophisticated astrolabe ever made. (Benaki Museum, Athens, inv. no. 13178.)]]

 Qiblah Maps

Another genre of illustration serves to display the sacred direction (qiblah) of localities in the Muslim world. The map in figure 9.10 (l.h.s), found in an eighteenth-century Egyptian treatise, is a crude cartographic attempt to demonstrate the qiblah in various localities, which are roughly displayed on an orthogonal latitude and longitude grid. Such maps were prepared already in the ninth century, and later others were with a more sophisticated projection of the parallels of latitude and meridians such that the former are straight lines and the latter ellipses. However, most Muslim cartographers, and surely all scientists, knew that one could not merely read the qiblah off a map by simply joining a locality to Mecca and measuring the direction of the line-segment. The scientists knew that the problem had to be solved on a sphere or on a mathematically acceptable two-dimensional representation thereof. Although very few such maps with orthogonal grids specifically designed to find the qiblah are known, in 1989 there appeared at Sotheby’s in London a cartographic representation of a much more sophisticated kind, on which the meridians are no longer equally spaced, and the parallels of latitude are no longer parallel (see figure 9.11). The combination is so devised as to enable the user to read off the qiblah on the circular scale and to read off the distance from Mecca on the diametral rule. The instrument was clearly made in Isfahan around 1710. It is not too much to hope that somewhere in the vast manuscript sources available for further study of Islamic science, a treatise on the construction of such an instrument might one day be found. In April 1994 it was discovered that the Isfahan world-map represents a cartographic tradition that goes back at least to al-Bîrünî (ca. 1025), who authored a dozen works on mathematical cartography, only two of which are known to have survived. A series of Islamic geographical tables from the fifteenth, fourteenth, and twelfth centuries give, in addition to the usual longitudes and latitudes, here based on al-Bîrün s distinctive values, the qiblah-vahies for 250 localities from Spain to China. The qiblah-values are given to the nearest ten minutes, and it has been shown that they can only have been derived from a world-map centered on Mecca, such as is found on the Isfahan instrument. A preliminary notice of this remarkable cartographic tradition will appear in the article “Samt” in 7716 Encyclopedia of Islam, new edition.

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-16.jpg][Fig. 9.9. An illustrtion of the rete of a universal astrolabe in Ibn al-Sarraj’s treatise on astronomical instruments. (MS Dublin Chester Beatty Library 102). By courtesy of the Chester Beatty Library.]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-17.jpg][Fig. 9.10. On the left, the Ka’bah is depicted—appropriately inclined to the meridian-on a crude cartographic grid from which one can determine the qiblah very approximately by joining one’s city to the Ka’bah (here Bursa is shown connected to the Ka’bah [via Medina]). On the right is a diagram of sacred geography showing various areas around the Ka’bah and indicating the astronomical horizon phenomena which define their qiblahs. (MS CAiro Dar al-Kutub Tal’at majarnT 811.)]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-18.jpg][Fig. 9.11. A z/ZWa/i-indicator from Isfahan, ca. 1710, unique of its genre. The qiblahs and distances from Mecca of 150 localities marked on the cartographic grid—which can be read from the circumferential scale when the diametral rule, center at Mecca, is laid on the marker for the locality in question—are given accurately for all practical purposes. (Private collection, photograph from the Museum of the History of Science, Oxford.)]]

 Diagrams Representing the Sacred Geography of Islam

In various Islamic sources, by no means restricted to scientific texts but including also treatises on the sacred law of Islam and encyclopedias, there are found illustrations of the divisions of the world around the Ka’bah. The diagrams of this kind with twelve divisions of the world around the Ka’bah in the treatises of Yaqut and al-Qazwml are well known (see figure 9.12). Their purpose is to identify regions of the world which have the same qiblah. But these diagrams are secondary, that is, they were based on more elaborate prototypes, in which the way to find the qiblah in each sector was described in detail. The instructions were not to use the qiblahs found by the astronomers using mathematical formulae applied to geographical data, but rather to face the risings and settings of particular fixed stars or of the sun at various times of the year. We now know that schemes for finding the qiblah in different regions by such procedures were advocated from the tenth century onward, and that over the centuries some twenty different schemes of what I call “sacred geography” were formulated. Many of these were illustrated in the manuscripts (see figures 9.10 [r.h.s.] and 9.13–9.15); others were recorded only in words; and some were used on astronomical instruments (see figure 9.16). These popular methods for finding the qiblah were advocated by the legal scholars of Islam, who had little time for the opinions of the scientists. Their authority lay in the fact that such procedures had been used by the sahabah for laying out some of the earliest mosques. But why had the sahabah used such procedures?

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-19.jpg][Fig. 9.12. An eleven-sector scheme of sacred geography from a manuscript of al-QazwlnTs Athar al-bilad (Iraq and Syria, ca. 1250). The information on the qiblah in each sector has been suppressed. Also one of the sectors in the original scheme has been ommitted by mistake (MS Dublin Chester Beatty 4163). By courtesy of the Chester Beatty Library.]]

The earliest Muslims knew that when they were standing in front of the walls of the Ka’bah they were facing significant astronomical directions. Also, the four comers of the Ka’bah were associated with different regions of the world, and intermediate regions with particular segments of the perimeter of the edifice. Thus, when Muslims in those regions wanted to face the appropriate part of the Ka’bah, they should face those very same directions. (This means of facing a distant object is quite reasonable if one bears in mind that the direction of a distant locality is to some extent arbitrary, let alone the direction of a particular part of a distant edifice.) The diagrams were intended to serve as aides-memoires to the faithful, as well as to provide pictorial representations of the entire world and the relation of its regions to the physical focus of Islamic worship, the Ka bah.

 A Diagram for Laying Out the Foundations of a Ventilator

Another remarkable diagram in Ibn al-Sarrâj’s treatises on instruments purports to display the orientation of the ventilators that were a distinctive feature of the skyline of medieval Cairo (see figures 9.17 and 9.18). Why would such a diagram feature in a treatise on astronomical instruments? Since the 1970s, we have known that in the corpus of astronomical tables that was used in medieval Cairo for timekeeping and regulating the times of prayer, one table enabled the user to find by means of the sun the orientation of the ventilator (badahanj), namely, winter sunrise (ca. 27o s. of E.). Inspection of the sole surviving ventilator of any consequence in modern Cairo reveals that it is aligned with the foundations of the house (the Musafirkhane) on whose roof it stands. Indeed, the house and the whole of the medieval city of Cairo are aligned in this direction, the major thoroughfare of the city being in the perpendicular direction.

The fact is that the entire medieval city of Cairo was oriented in the qiblah of the sahabah, towards winter sunrise. Now, the city was built alongside the old Pharaonic/Roman Canal from the Nile to the Red Sea, which at that point flowed perpendicular to that direction, so either the orientation of Cairo is fortuitous, or—and there is no evidence whatsoever for this—the site was chosen because the rectangular street pattern would be qiblah-oriented. A few years after the city was built, the astronomer Ibn Yunus computed the qiblah in Cairo to be 37º s. of E., 10º to the south of the qiblah of the sahabah, and the Azhar and al-Hakim Mosques were erected 109 askew to the city-plan. Many of the religious edifices in Cairo constructed by the Mamluks have their outside walls oriented with the city plan and their inside walls and mihrabs aligned with the qiblah of the astronomers. The City of the Dead outside Cairo is aligned with its main axis perpendicular to the qiblah of the astronomers; architecture in al-Qarafah is oriented due south, in keeping with the qiblah favored by the Shâfı’î school. The different qiblahs accepted in medieval Cairo are shown in figure 9.19. Thus, a diagram of a ventilator in an astronomical text led to the discovery of the basic orientations underlying one of the most important Islamic cities.

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-20.jpg][Fig. 9.13. An eight-division scheme of sacred geography from a manuscript of the treatise on cosmography by Pseudo-Ibn al-Wardi (Aleppo, ca. 1420). There are several different traditions of sacred geography in the numerous manuscripts of his treatise; the illustration in the published text shows two of these but are hopelessly corrupt. (MS Topkapi Sarayi Miizesi Kiitiiphanesi A 3025.)]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-21.jpg][Fig. 9.14. Two different twelve-sector schemes of sacred geography with associated astronomical horizon phenomena for finding the qiblah, as found in a manuscript of a thirteenth-century Yemeni treatise on folk astronomy. (MS Milan Biblioteca Ambrosiana Supp. 73.)]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-22.jpg][Fig. 9.15. An Ottoman scheme of sacred geography with 72 divisions of the world around the Ka’bah, suitable for marking on a horizontal gzW^/i-indicator (see figure 9.17). (MS Topkapi Sarayi Miizesi Kiitiiphanesi B 179.)]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-23.jpg][Fig. 9.16. An Ottoman sundial cum gzTjfo/i-indicator on which a scheme of sacred geography has been included on the circular base. (Berlin Deutsche Staatsbibliothek, Sprenger 2048.)]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-24.jpg][Fig. 9.17. The imposing ventilator on the Musafirkhane in Cairo, one of the few surviving examples. In medieval times, most buildings in Cairo were fitted with such ventilators, all astronomically oriented (Photo Abu Max.)]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-25.jpg][Fig. 9.18. A diagram showing the orientation of ventilators in medieval Cairo, found in the treatise on astronomical instruments of Ibn al-Sarraj (Aleppo, ca. 1325) (MS Dublin Chester Beatty Library 102). By courtesy of the Chester Beatty Library.]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-26.jpg][Fig. 9.19. The different qiblahs accepted in medieval Cairo. In the case of the southerly qiblahs, any direction between the rising and setting of Canopus would have been considered acceptable.]]

 An Illustration of the Significance of the Ka’bah

A series of Arabic texts, mostly not illustrated and all recently investigated for the first time, discuss the orientation of the Ka’bah itself. The base is rectangular (not square, as is often stated). See figure 9.20 [l.h.s.], with its major axis pointing toward the rising of Canopus, the brightest star in the southern sky, and its minor axis pointing toward the setting of the sun at the midwinter solstice. (At Mecca, these directions are indeed roughly perpendicular.) Thus, admonitions to face the rising of Canopus as the qiblah are common in Andalusia and Egypt; winter sunset in Iraq and Iran; and summer sunrise in the Sudan and Ethiopia. But there was no unity of opinion about the orientation of the Ka’bah, let alone about the qiblahs in the different regions.

One notion which is not illustrated in any medieval Arabic text, but which is explicit in various wind-schemes described in the manuscript sources, and which underlies the very origin of the word qiblah, is the following (see figure 9.21). If one stands in front of (istaqbala) the southwest wall of the Ka’bah (facing summer sunrise), one is facing the east (qabul) wind. The north (shamed) wind is on one’s left (shamed), blowing from Syria (alSham), and the South (janub) wind on one’s right (yamin), blowing from the Yemen (al-Yaman). The west wind (dabur) blows on one’s back (dabr). This is evidence enough (and there is more) that the sacred direction (qiblah) of the Arabs in the pre-Islamic period was towards the east. But there are further meteorological and meteoric associations of the Ka’bah, not the least the “Black Stone” embedded in the southeastern corner. While the diagram of the Ka’bah shown in figure 9.20 (r.h.s.) and interpreted in figure 9.22 was taken from an eighteenth-century Egyptian manuscript, its conception was at least half a millennium older; the diagram recaptures some of these associations of the edifice. Note that the Ka’bah is even correctly shown inclined to the meridian. The Aristotelian overtones—the elements and their qualities—are not attested elsewhere, but the geographical features and the association with the winds are. I have argued elsewhere that these pre-Islamic associations of the Ka’bah lend credence to the Islamic belief that the Ka’bah is a copy of a celestial counterpart, al-bayt al-ma’mür. In modern terms, I suggest that this implies that it was built as an architectural representation of a pre-Islamic cosmology, featuring the sun and stars in its alignment and the winds and rains in its attributions.

 Concluding Remarks

In brief, there are numerous illustrations in the Islamic scientific sources which can further our understanding of different aspects of Islamic science and even aspects of Islamic institutions. One should never rely solely on the illustrations if there is an accompanying text. But the need for facsimile editions of important manuscripts and of comparative studies of illustrated texts should be obvious.

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-27.jpg][Fig. 9.20. On the left is a ground-plan of the Ka’bah (the rectangular shape is here exaggerated) and on the right a diagram which associates the edifice—

incorrectly oriented—with the cardinal directions and their intermediaries, the winds, and the qiblahs of various localities. (MS Cairo Dar al-Kutub’ Tal’at majami’ 811.)]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-29.jpg][Fig. 9.21. The basic orientation of the Ka’bah and the directions of the four “cardinal” winds as recorded in various medieval texts. Actually, the minor axis is aligned with the most southerly setting point of the moon.]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-28.jpg][Fig. 9.22. The basic information on the Ka’bah contained in figure 9.20 (r.h.s.). The orientation of the Ka’bah has been “corrected”; in fact (see figure 9.10 [l.h.s.] and figure 9.21), its major axis is at about 30ȯ E. of s.]]

One just has to compare the variety of representations of sacred geography in a few manuscripts of texts that are well known and that have already been published, but not in critical editions (for example, al-QazwTni, Yâqüt, and Ibn al-Wardl), to recognize the need for such studies.

In 1986, I was in the Bibliotheca Palatina Exhibition in Heidelberg, looking at a manuscript of Abu al-Fidâ”s geography from the Bibliotheca Vaticana. The manuscript was opened to an illustration of the names of various regions of the world arranged in twenty-eight sectors of a circle (see figure 9.23). The diagram was quite different from any that I had ever seen, yet I knew that there was no such diagram in the 1840 published edition of that text. When I got home, I checked the appropriate place in the text and found a footnote by the editor at the place where Abu al-Fida’ wrote: “I have made a diagram (za’iraja) from which can be found the position of every traditional climate and this is it..The footnote read: “La figure qui se trouve ici dans !’original a ete placee sous forme d’index â la fin du volume.” In fact, the place names in the diagram have been swallowed up in the index and are no longer identifiable.

When preparing facsimile editions of manuscripts, strict guidelines must be followed, otherwise the result can be useless. Tampering with words that have been partially devoured by worms, removing original folio numbers, reshuffling folios without comment, and merging fragments from different copies of the same work without indication, all these contravene the most basic academic standards. Alas, they are features of the facsimile series published in recent years in Frankfurt, which has already been devastated by one reviewer who is a leading specialist on Arabic manuscripts. But the series has problems other than those which were noted by that reviewer, namely, the meddling with illustrations.

Two examples must suffice here. Firstly, the constellation figures and stars in the illustrations of a fine manuscript of al-Şûfî's Kitab suwar al-kawakib have been altered: the result is thus more suited for the proverbial coffee-table than for the next generation of art historians, who will still have to consult the original manuscript for the illustrations. Secondly, on a diagram of sacred geography in the Istanbul manuscript of the second volume of the encyclopedia entitled Masalik al-abşârfî mamalik al-amşâr, by the early fourteenth-century Mamluk administrator Ibn Fadlallah al-'Umarî, the Quranic verse (3: 97), wa-man dakhalahu kana amin"", "whoever enters (the Ka'bah) will be safe," has been written in gold ink on the representation of the Ka'bah. Now, the modern scribe who "fixed up" the photos of the various manuscripts for the Frankfurt facsimile "edition" erased this inscription to insert another one more bold, and wrote arnin"" with two alifs at the beginning. The illustrations in medieval manuscripts deserve more respect than this.

I hope to have shown how manuscripts in general and illustrations in particular can further our understanding of Islamic heritage. Libraries have these sources in trust and should treat them with the respect they deserve, which means cataloging them and making them available to scholars. We investigators should also treat them with respect, for they hold the key to many a mystery.

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-30.jpg][Fig. 9.23. A diagram showing 28 traditional divisions of the world, from a manuscript of the geographical treatise of Abu al-Fida' (Hama, ca. 1320) which never made it into the published text. (MS Vatican arabo 266.)]]

 Bibliographical Notes

Many illustrations for Islamic scientific manuscripts, some rather spectacular, are reproduced in S.H. Nasr, Islamic Science: An Illustrated Study (London: World of Islam Publishing Co. Ltd., 1976). Some 240 extracts from Islamic scientific manuscripts, many of them illustrated, are to be found in D.A. King, A Survey of the Scientific Manuscripts in the Egyptian National Library QNinoua Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1986). See also John E. Murdoch, Album ofScience: Antiquity and the Middle Ages (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1984), for various illustrations from Islamic scientific manuscripts.

On the activities of Taqi al-Dîn, see A. Sayih, The Observatory Islam, Publications of the Turkish Historical Society, series VII, no. 38 (Ankara: Tiirk Tarih Kurumu Basımevi, 1960), pp. 289–305; and A.s. LJnver, Istanbul Rasathanesi, Tiirk Tarih Kurumu Yayınlarından, V. Seri, Sayı 54 (Ankara: Türk Tarih Kurumu Basımevi, 1969).

On illustrations of constellation figures, see, for example, the works by J. Upton and E. Wellesz cited in the bibliography to the article, "al-Şûfî," by Paul Kunitzsch, in The Dictionary of Scientific Biography, 16 vols. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1970–78), 8:149–50.

On illustrations in astrological texts, see, for example, Zeren Tamndi (Akalay), "Astrological Illustrations in Islamic Manuscripts," Proceedings of the I. International Congress on the History of Turkish-Islamic Science and Technology, Istanbul, /4-78September 1981, pn. -و٢١٦ 'حهاآآ١. ,"\آلالا١لةاًاًهحا ٦١ Astrologicai Work of the Period of Iskandar Sultan," Akten des VII, Internationalen Kongresses fur Iranische Kunst und Archaologie, Munchen, 17–20 September 1976 (Berlin: Dietrich Reimer Verlag, 1979), pp. 418–25: and Stefano Carboni, "Two Fragments of a Jalayrid Astrological Treatise in the Keir Collection and in the Oriental Institute in Sarajevo," Islamic Art 2 (1987), pp. 149–86.

On non-Ptolemaic planetary theory in Islamic astronomy, see G. Saliba, “The Astronomical Tradition of Maragha: A Historical Survey and Prospects for Future Research,” Arabic Sciences and Philosophy 1 (1991), pp. 67–99, and the works there cited.

On illustrations in treatises on engineering, see A.K. Coomaraswamy, The Treatise of al-Jazan on Automata (Boston: Museum of Fine Arts, 1924); Donald لآ. لآ ١ل\\, The Book of Knowledge and Ingenious Mechanical Devices (آ0ؤحاًهاً١١ا (NL) and Boston: Dr. Reidel Publishing Company, 1974); and numerous other writings by Hill. See also Ahmad Y. al-Hasan and Donald R. Hill, Islamic Technology: An Illustrated History (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press; and Paris: UNESCO, 1986). On the independent Andalusian tradition, see the chapter, “Technologia andalusi,” by Donald R. Hill, in Juan Vernet, Julio Samso, et al.. El Legado Cientifico Andalusi (Madrid: Ministerio de Cui tura, 1992), pp. 157–72.

On Islamic cartography, see the article, “Kharita” (Map), by s. Maqbul Ahmad, in Encyclopedia of Islam, new edition (Leiden: EJ. Brill, 1960--) (hereafter El2); and various chapters in The History of Cartography, eds. J.B. Harley and David Woodward (Chicago; London: The University of Chicago Press, 1992), vo\. ‘!.,book 1: Cartography in the Traditional Islamic and South Asian Societies.

On al-Ashraf and his astrolabe, see D.A. King, “The Medieval Yemeni Astrolabe in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York,” Zeitschrift fur Geschichte der arabisch-islamischen Wissenschajten (1955), w· voov. in idem, Islamic Astronomical Instruments (London: Variorum Reprints, 1987), 23 and on Ibn al-Sarraj and his astrolabe, see ibid., 9. Numerous illustrations of other instruments and extracts from treatises on instrumentation are found in idem, “Strumentazione astronomica nel mondo medieval e islamico,” a chapter in Gli strumenti, ed. Gerard Turner (Milan: Electa, 1990), pp. 154–89 and 580–85, the first of a series of richly illustrated volumes on the history of sciences, Paolo Galluzzi, general editor. An abridgement of the English original is published as “Some Remarks on Islamic Astronomical Instruments," Scientiarum Historia 18 (1992), pp. 5–23. On the Frankfurt project to catalogue medieval instruments, see my "Medieval Astronomical Instruments: A Catalogue in Preparation," Bulletin of the Scientific Instrument Society 31 (December 1991), pp. 3–7: and also no. 36 (March 1993), pp. 17–18.

On Islamic sacred geography, see my study in Islamic Art', a survey is in the article, "Makka: As Centre of the World," in El2. See also D.A. King and G.s. Hawkins, "On the Orientation of the Ka'ba," Journal for History of Astronomy 13 (1982), pp. 102–9, repr. in King, Astronomy in the Service of Islam (Aidershot, UK: Variorum Reprints, 1993); idem, "Architecture and Astronomy: The Ventilators of Medieval Cairo and Their Secrets," Journal of the American Oriental Society 104 (1984), pp. 97–133: and idem, Richard Lorch, "Qibla Charts, Qibla Maps, and Related Instruments," in History of Cartography 2:1و pp. 189–205.

On facsimile editions of manuscripts and how they should not be prepared, see J.J. Witkam, "Arabic Manuscripts in Distress: The Frankfurt Facsimile Series," Manuscripts of the Middle East 4 (1989), pp. 175–80. For some suggestions concerning facsimile editions of Islamic scientific manuscripts which would be of use to scholars, see my paper, "Some Remarks on Islamic Scientific Manuscripts and Instrument, and Past, Present and Future Research," in The Significance of Arabic Manuscripts, ed. John Cooper (London: Al-Furqan Heritage Foundation, 1992), pp. 115–43 (some of the illustrations have been shuffled and no longer correspond to the captions).

 10. A Royal Manuscript and Its Transformation: The Life History of a Book

Priscilla p. Soucek and Fili; Cagman

The focus of this essay is a single volume now in the Topkapi Sarayi Library, Istanbul, Hazine 1510.[411] The importance of this book derives both from its intrinsic quality and from the way in which its life history can be reconstructed on the basis of physical and historical evidence. Despite or perhaps because of its checkered career, this book sheds light on a little studied dimension of Islamic manuscripts—the way they have been transformed from the moment of their initial creation until the present day.

Recent studies have stressed how the rulers of Iran during the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries employed calligraphers, painters, illuminators, and binders to produce sumptuous volumes for their personal libraries. Indeed, the commissioning of books bearing royal names and titles appears to have become an attribute of princely status and power.[412] The special prestige attached to books with a royal or princely provenance appears to have encouraged another method of book collection used by rulers, that of appropriating volumes from each other's libraries.[413] Although there are few documentary records of these transactions, the transfer of books from one owner to another has often left physical traces in the manuscripts which can be used to reconstruct the history of a book.

Elements in a manuscript indicating a change of ownership include repainted dedication pages, altered colophons, and the addition or deletion of library seals. In case of illustrated manuscripts, paintings are not infrequently different in date and provenance from the manuscript's text itself. Sometimes illustrations were added over the text, or even over earlier paintings. The motives which led to the alteration of manuscripts undoubtedly varied, but in some cases a group of manuscripts display similarities in the way they were altered; this makes it possible to speculate about the reasons for such changes.

Hazine 1510 is notable for the variety of transformations it has undergone. It contains evidence that it was originally produced for a royal owner and that it was subsequently seized by a rival ruler. It also has both paintings connected with its original patron and others added at a later date. Some of the later paintings obscure earlier ones, others are added directly over the text. These physical changes were accompanied by efforts to conceal the book's original provenance and date. The technique and style of the later paintings link Hazine 1510 with a group of manuscripts some of which also have colophons giving similar falsified dates and provenance.

Evidence suggests that Hazine 1510 has had a long and complicated life. Various components of it can be dated over a hundred and fifty year period during which the manuscript probably traveled from Shiraz to Herat and finally to Istanbul. An identification of these phases demands a knowledge of manuscript production under the Muzafferid, Timurid, Safavid, and Ottoman dynasties. It also can be linked with three rulers: the Muzaffarid Shah Shuja', and the Timurids Shah Rukh and Sultan Husayn Bayqara. What is perhaps even more intriguing is that one of its transformations involved more than a hint of fraud; although, who defrauded whom remains a mystery.

Before turning to the various transformations to which Hazine 1510 has been subjected, it is necessary to examine its contents. The text of 760 folios has three distinct components: a Shah-namah of Firdawsi (fols. 20–4840), a dictionary by Asad! Tusi entitled Lughat al-Furs (fols. 4850–4982), and a Khatnsah of Nizami (fols. 4994–775). The manuscript also contains three dated colophons (fols. 7a, 484b, 7750), two dedication pages (fols, la, 4994), and what appears to be a portion of a chancery document (fol. 4984). Another important component is the manuscript's battered but once splendid binding with lacquer painting on the exterior and filigree and molded ornament on the interior. There are poetic inscriptions on the binding's doublure and the exterior of its flap.[414]

This essay on Hazine 1510 attempts to reconstruct the history and evolution of its component parts—the Shah-namah and its associated text Lughat al-Furs, the Khamsah of Nizami and the binding, and to consider how and when they were joined to form the present manuscript. The primary evidence for this study comes from internal evidence in the Hazine 1510 itself and from its comparison to other manuscripts. This analysis will be divided into several sections. First, the text's provenance and the date of its component parts will be established; then its links with the Timurid rulers Shah Rukh and Husayn Bayqara will be studied; and the binding's importance will also be analyzed.

Only the late Ivan Stchoukine has published comments on the artistic character of this manuscript. He refers to Hazine 1510 in three publications, an article and two monographs: one on Turkish painting, and a second on illustrated copies of Nizami's Khamsah.[415] His analysis of Hazine 1510 focused exclusively on its illustrations and was based on the information in F. E. Karatay's catalogue of Persian manuscripts in the Topkapi Sarayi Library, namely that the Shah-namah and Lughat al-furs were copied by Mansur ibn Muhammad ibn Warqah ibn 'Umar Bakhtiyar in 903/1498 and that the Khamsah was completed in 906/1501 by Lutf Allah ibn Yahya ibn Muhammad al-Tabrîzî.[416] Karatay makes no mention of the manuscript's dedicatory medallions, nor does he raise any questions about the veracity of information contained in its colophons.

Stchoukine concluded that paintings in the Shah-namah portion of Hazine 1510 were added in the Safavid period, circa 1520–25, and that those in the Khamsah portion were added in Turkey circa 1570. He finds specific Turkish parallels for both the painting's landscape and figural elements.[417] This position led him to assume that very similar landscape paintings in an often published Anthology dated to 801/1398 were also executed in Istanbul circa 1570.[418] This manuscript is now in the museum of Turkish and Islamic Art, Istanbul, T. 1950.

Recently three Persian scholars have published comments about the character of Hazine 15105 text. The most extensive description is that by J. Khaliql-Mutlaq in his analytical articles discussing the manuscripts of Firdawsfs Shah-namah which he has been using to prepare his edition of that text. In them he describes both the physical characteristics of Hazine 1510 and the importance of its text recension. His description of Hazine 1510 is more precise than that of F. E. Karatay, as he mentions the Shah-namah's two colophons, in addition to its initial medallion and the document on folio 4982. Although he appears somewhat puzzled by its putative date of 903/1498, J. KhaliqFMutlaq stresses the archaic features of Hazine 15105 text and its close kinship with the Florence manuscript dated to 614/1217.[419] He also brought the Lughat al-Furs portion of this manuscript to the attention of F. A. Mujtabâ'î and A. A. Sadiql, who were preparing a new edition of that work. In their preface these authors mention that Hazine 151O's version of the Lughat al-Furs differs in significant respects from the other manuscripts which they used to prepare their edition. They were not able, however, to evaluate the importance of its idiosyncracies.[420] These Persian scholars, who worked from microfilms, assume the Shah-namah's present colophon date of 903/1498 to be correct.

Despite the attention which has been given to both Hazine 15105 illustrations and to portions of its text no analysis has yet been made of its calligraphy, illumination, or binding, nor of their importance for the manuscript's history. Hence, it is necessary to establish the date and place of the manuscript's origin through an examination of its calligraphy and illumination and by subjecting its colophons to a critical analysis before considering Stchoukine's views on the paintings of Hazine 1510, and those of Khaliql-Mutlaq about its Shah-namah text. A physical examination of Hazine 1510 shows that the two main components of its text, the Shah-namah and the Khamsah, although distinct in their features, are closely related in execution. Both have the same page size (26.1 by 16.3 cm), but they differ in their written surfaces. The Shah-namah has twentyseven lines spaced over 19.2 cm, whereas the Khamsah has twenty-five lines in 17.5 cm.

Despite the fact that both portions of Hazine 1510 have colophon dates from the tenth Hegira century, the character of their illumination and calligraphy connects them with fourteenth-century Shiraz, a city that was a center of both literary culture and manuscript production. Both portions can be proven to belong firmly to that tradition, although at some later moment these connections were intentionally obscured. The affinity of Hazine 1510 with the manuscript tradition of Muzaffarid Shiraz as well as the later deliberate obfuscation of that connection can be documented through a study of its colophons.

The most direct evidence for Hazine 15105 link with Shiraz comes in the Khamsah colophon, folio 775b (figure 10.1). There the calligrapher Lutf Allah al-Tabnzi describes himself as both the manuscript's scribe and illuminator (katabahu wa dhahhabahu) and gives its place of production as Dar al-mulk Shiraz.[421] He also gives his laqab, or honorific epithet, as "Kamal al-Jaiâlî," which probably links him to the last important Muzaffarid ruler, Jalal al-dîn Shah Shuja’ (ruled 765/1357-786/1384). An examination of the colophon also shows tnat its present date, Rajab 9O6/January-February 1501, is not the original one. Only the terminal element sitt (six) is untouched: the number giving the decade has been virtually erased, and the century was modified so that sab’a miyah (700) has become tis’a miyah (900). The original date contained the numbers 7–6: since remaining traces suggest the missing decade was sab’în (seventy), the original date was probably Rajab 776/December 1374 — January 1375.

An examination of the Shah-namah portion of Hazine 1510 shows that its colophon date of 5 DhQ’ al-Hijjah 903 has been altered, in a similar fashion, by erasing the decade and changing sab’a miyah (700) to tis’a miyah (900) (figure 10.2). In this case the erased decade appears to be thamanin (80) which means that the original date must have been 783/1382, thus also within the reign of Shah Shuja’.

A further confirmation of the Muzaffarid origin of this manuscript is offered by the identity of its scribe who gives his lineage for five generations: Mansur ibn Muhammad ibn Warqah ibn ‘Umar b. Bakhtiyar, and adds a nisbah, “al-Bihbihani,” followed by a geographical gloss: min a’mâl Jabal Jiliiyah (figure 10.2). The same scribe has used a virtually identical signature formula in the well-known Anthology now in the museum of Turkish and Islamic Art (T. 1950) dated to Muharram 0 September-October 1398 mentioned above[422] (figure 10.3).

The geographical references in this signature draw attention to Mansur’s link with the village of Bihbihan in the region of Küh Gildyeh situated northwest of Shiraz. Little is known about Bihbihan, which appears to have been a small settlement in a fertile valley, but it was the successor to a much more important town, Arrajan or Kurat Qubad, which had been situated at the juncture of roads linking Isfahan and Shiraz with Ahwaz, Basrah, and Baghdad. Arrajan was ruined by invasions and conflict between the Isma’ilis and various rulers during the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Before its devastation the area was noted for its fertility and abundant water. The dates and pomegranates of Arrajan were especially prized.[423] It is most unlikely, however, that Bihbihan was a center of manuscript production.[424]

A Shiraz provenance for both the Shah-namah portion of Hazine 1510 and the Anthology, T. 1950 is also suggested by the illumination used in both manuscripts which contains dense gold vegetal scrolls silhouetted against blue, black, white, or green fields.[425] This style of illumination was widely used in Shiraz manuscripts from circa 1370 to circa 1430.[426] As befits a royal commission, the headings of various books in the Hazine 1510 Khamsah are executed with more intense colors and heavier gold pigments than are most Shiraz manuscripts.

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-31.jpg][Fig. 10.1. Topkapi Sarayi Miizesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 775b, Colophon of NizmI Khamsah]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-32.jpg][Fig. 10.2. Topkapi Sarayi Miizesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 484b, Colophon of Firdawsi Shah-namah.]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-33.jpg][Fig. 10.3. Turk ve Islam Eserleri Miizesi, T. 1950 fol. 464b, Colophon of Khusraw Dihlavi, ‘Ainah-i Iskandari.]]

The Shah-namah portion of Hazine 1510 also contains two more colophons, one without a signature or date on folio 6b at the conclusion of the text’s preface, and another one on folio 7a (figure 10.4). The latter, written on paper that differs in color and texture from that of the original manuscript, contains the “signature” of one “Warqah ibn ‘Umar Samarqandl,” and is dated 903 A.H./1498.[427] It seems probable that this name was chosen both to mimic that of the original Shah-namah scribe Mansur al-Bihbihanl by using part of his name, “Warqah ibn ‘Umar,” and to harmonize with information contained in the Husayn Bayqara firman now affixed to folio 484a, where the scribe of a Shah-namah manuscript is listed as “Warqah ibn ‘Umar Samarqandl” (figures 10.2, 10.5).

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-34.jpg][Fig. 10.4. Topkapi Sarayı Müzesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 7a, “Colopon Signed by Warqah ibn ʕUmar SamarqandT.”]]

The insertion of this superfluous colophon appears connected with other changes made to Hazine 1510, such as the alteration of colophon dates, all of which had as an aim the deliberate transformation of a Muzaffarid manuscript into one linked with eastern Iran and the Timurid Sultan Husayn Bayqara. Possible motives for these changes will be considered below.

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-35.jpg][Fig. 10.5. Topkapi Sarayi Miizesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 498a, “Firman in the Name of Husayn Bayqara.”]]

Although the illumination and calligraphy of this Shah-namah are of high quality, the manuscript carries no direct indication of the patron’s identity. It does, however, open with a roundel illuminated in a Muzaffarid style which may have once contained the name of its owner. At present this roundel contains the name and titles of the Timurid Husayn Bayqara, who ruled in Herat from 1468 to 1506, written on a heavy gold ground which may well conceal an inscription giving the name of the manuscript’s original owner (figure 10.6).

A scrutiny of the Shah-namah section of Hazine 1510 shows, however, that Husayn Bayqara was not the first Timurid to be connected with it. Three folios bear the library seal of Timur’s son Shah Rukh who ruled from Herat from 1405 to 1447.[428] His name also appears in a dedicatory medallion which has been glued onto the initial page of the manuscript’s Khamsah portion[429] (figure 10.7).

Shah Rukh is less known as a patron of calligraphers and painters than his nephew Iskandar Sultan ibn ‘Umar Shaykh or his sons Baysunghur and Ibrahim Sultan, but he appears to have been a particularly assiduous collector of manuscripts. Another specimen bearing the imprint of his library seal is a very early copy of Khusraw Dihlavi’s Khamsah dated to 756/1355 which was used by Soviet scholars as the basis for a critical edition. This manuscript was copied in Shiraz and one of its two scribes was Muhammad ibn Muhammad ibn Muhammad known as “Shams al-Hafiz al-Shîrâzî,” who is most probably the poet Hafiz.[430]

Shah Rukh could have acquired his stock of Shiraz manuscripts in a variety of ways. His long struggle with the sons of his brother ‘Umar Shaykh, including his defeat of Iskandar Sultan at Isfahan in Mugarram 817/March-April 1415, and his defeat of Bayqara in Shiraz one year later in the spring of 818/1416, provided him with several opportunities to seize manuscripts.[431]

No attempt has yet been made to compile information about the contents of Shah Rukh’s library, but from published data it appears that his books retained their original colophons or illustrations. The use of his seal or the affixing of a medallion containing his name and titles mark manuscripts as his property, but do not present a claim that the books were originally prepared for him.

As was noted above, the Shah-namah portion of Hazine 1510 opens with a similar medallion proclaiming Sultan Husayn Bayqara as its owner. His name and titles are also included in a firman which has been glued to onto folio 498a below the unsigned colophon of Lughat al-Furs, the text of which follows the Shah-namah (fols. 485–4984) (figure 10.5). Although undated, the Lughat al-Furs manuscript appears to be contemporary with the Shah-namah, thus circa 1382, and was perhaps also copied by Manşür al-Bihbihanl. Th efirman below the colophon on folio 498a makes reference to the cost of a Shah-namah manuscript. Before considering this document, however, it is useful to examine the illustrations and binding of Hazine 1510.

It is now appropriate to consider Stchoukine’s views that both landscape and figural elements of its Khamsah illustrations were Turkish.[432] This position led him to assume that very similar landscape paintings in an often published Anthology dated to 801/1398, T. 1950, mentioned above, were also executed in Istanbul circa 1570.[433]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-37.jpg][Fig. 10.6 Topkapi Sarayi Muzesi, Hazine 1510, fol la, Dedication Medallion in the name of Husayn Bayqara.]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-36.jpg][Fig. 10.7. Topkapi Sarayı Müzesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 4994, Dedication medallion in the name of Shah Rukh.]]

Despite flaws in his analysis, Stchoukine did draw attention to two significant aspects of the Hazine 1510 Khamsah illustrations: that they contain figures painted in a style often associated with Ottoman Turkey, and that some of them depict landscapes reminiscent of the well-known examples from the 1398 Anthology. What Stchoukine does not seem to have realized is that landscape and figural components of the Khamsah paintings belong to two distinct phases of its creation, and that the later figural compositions now obscure the earlier landscape paintings.

The presence of landscape paintings under Khamsah figural compositions is sometimes evident only from the back of a painted page where metallic pigments have stained the paper. These stains reveal the presence of trees, mountains, streams, and rocks which are hidden by the later compositions.[434] In other cases, portions of the original landscapes serve as a background to the later figural paintings,[435] and in one case the original landscape scene was never overpainted[436] (figure 10.8).

Stchoukine’s conflation of two stages in the Hazine 1510 Khamsah illustrations led him in turn to the wrong conclusion about the connection of its landscape scenes with similar paintings in the Anthology of 1398. Ironically, his conclusion that both were Ottoman Turkish led him to publish repeatedly those paintings in Hazine

1510 in which the late-fourteenth-century compositions were the most visible.[437]

The only one of the fifteen Khamsah paintings in its original condition is a landscape located in the Sharaf-namah folio 682 (figure 10.8). The landscape consists of two ranges of hills, each outlined by a heavy black line. One is highlighted in gold, the other in red. A stream, once silver-colored, arises on the right and flows toward the bottom of the painting, where it is bordered by strongly colored rocks highlighted with gold.

Although similar landscape elements are also prominent in the paintings of the 1398 Anthology copied by Manşûr al-Bihbihanl, there are important differences between the two groups of paintings. The first is visual; some of the Anthology paintings are more complex with up to four ranges of hills one behind the Other.[438] The second distinction is functional; all of the Anthology paintings occupy the spaces left between the colophons and headings of its sections. Thus, they function as end-papers providing visual interest where otherwise there would have been a blank space or an empty page. In Hazine 1510, however, all the paintings are placed within Nizami’s text.

The scene on folio 682b, for instance, is in a passage describing a spring garden, which may explain why it was not repainted (figure 10.8). Several other paintings in Hazine 1510 are also located in passages which describe a setting rather than a dramatic moment. Most of the paintings in Hazine 1510 make extensive use of gold and silver pigments, which are often still visible under the later additions, or which can be seen on the backs of those pages. For example a row of golden hills appears along the top of the scene of Khusraw’s Lion combat, and a purple landscape highlighted by gold and silver is visible under the later figural composition of Farhad carrying Shinn.[439] From these indications it appears that the original paintings in the Khamsah portion of Hazine 1510 were landscapes in rich hues enlivened with gold and silver but without the addition of any human figures.

Stchoukine’s claim that the landscapes from Hazine 1510 and T. 1950 have an Ottoman Turkish character is contradicted by both documentary and visual evidence. The stylistic features of the Hazine 1510 Khamsah landscape paintings are also paralleled in Muzaffarid manuscripts with figural painting. Tapestry-like settings, the use of rich colors highlighted with gold and silver, as well as a similar treatment of individual motifs are evident in the paintings of a Shah-namah, also in the Topkapi Palace Library, Istanbul, which is dated to 772/1370.[440]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-38.jpg][Fig. 10.8. Topkapi Sarayi Miizesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 682b. “In Praise of Spring”]]

Thus an examination of the text and illumination of Hazine 1510 makes clear that both are of Muzaffarid date, and the same can be said with confidence about the landscape paintings which originally illustrated its Khamsah portion. The questions of when and for what reason figural compositions were added over those landscapes are more difficult to answer. First, however, the date and origin of the Shah-namah illustrations must be established.

A close inspection of the Shah-namah portion of Hazine 1510 suggests that it too has been subjected to considerable alteration. It presently has one double-page illustration (fols. 7b-8a) located between the preface’s spurious colophon (fol. 7a) and the opening of the Shah-namah text (fol. 8b). There are also twenty-one paintings of modest size within the text itself. Although there are no traces of Muzaffarid illustrations, the Shah-namah paintings appear to have been executed over the manuscript’s text.

1. Stchoukine has made a sharp distinction between the Khamsah and Shah-namah paintings, calling the former high quality Ottoman work of circa 1570, and the latter mediocre Safavid examples from 1510–20.[441] There are certainly differences of scale and execution between the two groups of paintings: those in the Khamsah are larger and contain more golden highlights, but these distinctions are counter-balanced by numerous similarities. A comparison of “Dahhak enthroned” from the Shah-namah (fol. 13b) with the enthroned prince from the Khamsah (fol. 5O2b) reveals considerable affinities of the two paintings in compositional structure, coloring, and figural type.

The only major difference between the scenes is that figures in the Shah-namah wear Safavid turbans and kulahs, whereas those in the Khamsah scene have a turban shape closely paralleled in some early Ottoman manuscripts such as the Selim-namah of Shukn executed in the 15205.[442] Even this distinction may be moot because flaking paint reveals that the Safavid turbans of the Shah-namah illustration cover others similar in shape to those in the Khamsah (figures 10.9 and 10.10).

The difficulties which Stchoukine encountered in evaluating the date and provenance of the figural compositions in Hazine 1510 are understandable. The style of their paintings links each with a period of artistic and historical change during the first decades of the sixteenth century which coincided with the formation of the Safavid state, in particular Shah Ismâ’îl’s campaigns in Khurasan during 1510, as well as his defeat by the Ottomans under Sutan Selim in 1514.

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-39.jpg][Fig. 10.9. Topkapi Sarayi Miizesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 13b, “Dahhak Enthroned.”]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-40.jpg][Fig. 10.10. Topkapi Sarayi Muzesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 502b, “In Praise of His Patron: A Prince Enthroned.”]]

Sultan Husayn Bâyaarâ’s son, Badi’ al-Zaman Mirza, was a witness to these events; he was taken to Tabriz by Shah Ismâ’îl in 1510 and then to Istanbul in 1514 by Sultan Selim. The victorious Ottoman army returned to Istanbul laden with booty that included manuscripts from Shah Ismâ’îl’s library, some of which had probably been taken by the Safavids from the Timurid libraries of Herat only a few years earlier. Scribes, illuminators, and painters dislocated by these historical events also moved between Herat, Tabriz, and Istanbul.[443]

These momentous changes are also reflected in the illustrated manuscripts of the period. Traits commonly associated with one center, such as Herat or Tabriz, can be found side by side with others which have clear links to Ottoman patronage. It is against this rather confused background that figural illustrations in both the Shah-namah and Khamsah sections of Hazine 1510 must be studied. Some of the manuscripts with comparable paintings also have colophons linking them to Herat or to the Timurids, but others have a Saravid or Ottoman provenance. Many questions surrounding the place of Hazine 1510 among these manuscripts are beyond the scope of this essay. Here attention will be focused on a reconstruction of that manuscript's history.

Although the two groups of illustrations have much in common, details of each find their closest comparisons in different manuscripts. Thus the Shah-namah illustrations are most comparable to paintings with a clear Safavid pedigree such as those in another Shah-namah copy, Hazine 1499[444] and in a copy of Navâ'î's Khamsah, Revan 810.[445] Manuscripts with the closest artistic ties to the Khamsah paintings can be linked to Ottoman court patronage. They include a copy of 'Al Shir Navâ'î's Gharâ'ıb al-Sighar now in the Egyptian National Library Cairo, copied in 935/1531-32 by Hâjj Muhhmmad al-Tabrizi ibn Mâlik Ahmad, a calligrapher known to have been employed at the Ottoman court,[446] and a second manuscript of Navâ'î's poetry copied by the same calligrapher in 937/153031 now in Oxford.[447]

A group of manuscripts which deserves special scrutiny for its connections to the Khamsah paintings of Hazine 1510 are other examples where paintings have been added over the manuscript's text or inserted into odd spaces in an earlier manuscript. This group includes Hazine 987, a copy of Jamis Dîvân, and on of Navâ'î's Navadir al-Shabab, Revan 805.[448] These manuscripts are illustrated in a style very similar to that used in late-fifteenth-century Iranian manuscripts; this style, however, is also connected with paintings in the Selim-namah of Shukrî and thus, was probably current in Istanbul during the 1520s and 15305. Another link between the illustrative style of Khamsah portion of Hazine 1510 and Ottoman painting is provided by a Dîvân of Kamâl Khaiandî in Vienna, A.F. 92. This manuscript, copied in western Iran circa 1480, was later illustrated with three large paintings and 1,196 vignettes inserted into gaps in the text. Since in execution illustrations are comparable to ones in the manuscripts copied by Hâjj Muhammad al-Tabrizî mentioned above, it is likely that they were added in Istanbul.[449]

This preliminary survey has suggested a connection between the figural illustrations of Hazine 1510 and artistic currents in Tabriz and Istanbul during the early sixteenth century. Yet, as was demonstrated above. Hazine 1510 was certainly in Herat during the latter decades of the fifteenth century. Evidence concerning the manuscript's historical evolution is also provided by its binding and by its firman in the name of Sultan Husayn Bayqara.

Despite its poor state of preservation, the binding of Hazine 1510 adds an important dimension to the manuscript's history. The lacquer painted outer covers are divided into an inner zone consisting of a field broken by a recessed central medallion with quarter medallions in the comers, and a border zone of four-lobed and oblong cartouches. Except for their recessed medallions, the covers are decorated with gold painting on a black ground. The medallions were painted in red and other colors, and are rimmed by small silver-gilt nails which probably once supported metal filigree ornaments.

The binding's doublure has a central field with black and gilt leather filigree ornament silhouetted against a blue paper ground. The outer zone has four-lobed and oblong gilded cartouches flanked by narrow gold bands. The larger oblong fields contain stamped inscriptions.

The back covers of Islamic bindings generally have an attached flap which can be folded under the front cover. Between the flap and the back cover is a rectangular zone which protects the book's outer margin. Naturally the dimensions of the connecting area should be equivalent to the height of the manuscript to be covered.

An examination of the binding of Hazine 1510 reveals a curious feature. The panel between the back cover and its flap carries two zones of ornament on both the interior and exterior. The flap’s internal decoration is identical to that of the covers—a central zone of leather filigree and a frame of gilt and molded cartouches. On this zone’s lacquer painted exterior ten inscribed cartouches are arranged in two horizontal rows.

These exterior cartouches contain verses describing the book for which the binding was made. The first two refer to Firdawsfs Shah-namah, the second pair speak of Nizâmı and his poetry, and the third group, unfortunately damaged, mention the verses of ‘Alî Shrr Navâ’i. The final couplet praises the book as a whole and reiterates its contents. The concluding hemistich leads: Shah-namah va Khamsah va Dîvân-i Amir. Thus it would appear that the binding of Hazine 1510 was made to contain three texts: the Shah-namah of FirdawsL the Khamsah of Nizami, and an undetermined portion of the Divan of ‘All Shir Navâ’L Perhaps more careful reading of the couplet concerning Navâ’î’s poetry will yield clues as to which portion might have been included. The binding would accommodate forty or fifty more folios. The missing Divan and the absence of a reference to Lughat al-Furs do, however, raise the question of whether this binding was originally made for the manuscripts of Hazine 1510. Before considering this question further it is necessary to discuss other aspects of the binding.

Verses inscribed on cartouches framing both covers and flap of the doublure consist of three rubais or quatrains composed by the Timurid poet ‘Abd al-Rahman Jâmî.[450] Two of them are particularly appropriate for their location, for they describe a book and its binding. One quatrain praises the beauty of the book’s pages, using the metaphor of a flowery meadow. Its pages are compared with rose-petals and its calligraphy with basil.[451] Another quatrain extols the book’s pages because they have given fresh life to ages past and describes the dazzling beauty of the book’s cover, stating that its cover has transformed leather into the turquoise sphere of the sky and that its spine is made from braided sunbeams.[452]

These verses by Jami have a significance which goes beyond the history of Hazine 1510. The second quatrain is of particular interest. Its language about renewing the past, and its metaphors of sun and sky for a book binding appear at first fanciful but may in fact be quite literal descriptions of a special book. These terms could describe a muraqqa’ or album consisting of choice specimens of calligraphy from various periods and bound with a golden, jeweled cover.

Jamfs comparisons of its cover to the turquoise sky and of its spine to braided sunbeams provide a surprisingly accurate decription of some extant bindings. These have covers and flap adorned with fîrûzekârî, a technique in which thin slices of turquoise are inlaid into a metal, usually gold, frame. One binding with fîrûzekârî panels on its covers and flap has a spine of braided gold wire which it is tempting to equate with Jamfs “braided sunbeams.”[453]

Extant bindings with fîrûzekârî-decç>rated covers are of Ottoman court manufacture. The binding mentioned above, for example, is dated 997/1588-89 by the Koran which it contains. The taste for turqoise and gold bindings, however, appears to be of Iranian origin, and the Istanbul examples are often attributed to Persian goldsmiths employed at the Ottoman court.[454] Ottoman court records also mention jeweled bindings sent as gifts by Safavid rulers, although none seem to have survived.[455] Jamfs verse suggests that fîrûzekârî bindings were also produced in Timurid Herat.

Jamfs verses do not reveal the identity of the muraqqa’ for which they were composed, but they may be linked with the most famous Timurid album— one arranged in 879/1474-75 for Sultan Husayn Bayqara. Compiled by royal order, it evidently contained choice specimens of calligaphy and painting donated by persons of culture and learning. Although the album itself is lost, its preface survives in the insha’ manual of a high Timurid official, ‘Abdallah Marvarid.[456] culture. In addition to stamped inscriptions on Hazine 1510, Jamfs quatrain about rose-petals and basil is impressed on the doublure of a richly ornamented Safavid binding.[457] A variant of the second quatrain describing the album’s contents and its dazzling binding is inscribed on the lacquer-painted binding of a 1544 copy of Jâmî’s Khamsah. [458] These examples raise the question of whether there is any particular significance to the use of JamTs poetry on the binding of Hazine 1510.

If Jamfs verses were composed to praise an album compiled for Husayn Bayqara, their later circulation confirms the broader popularity of Timurid

It is evident that Jâmı’s verses were not composed specifically for the binding of Hazine 1510, but his quatrain about a book with a golden jeweled binding appears particularly apposite for it. Although this binding did not have a spine of braided gold or a cover of turquoises set in gold, it is likely that some kind of metal fittings once covered the medallions on the binding’s cover and flap now ringed by gilded silver nails.

Some Ottoman bindings combine lacquer-painted covers with jeweled ornament. One in the Istanbul University Library with the customary gold over black lacquer field, has jewel-encrusted filigree medallions attached to its cover.[459] The practice of inlaying leather or lacquer bindings with jewels creates an effect reminiscent of both Safavid and Ottoman metalwork where a dark ground is enlivened with gold and jewel inlays or medallions. Some of the finest examples of such metalwork preserved in Istanbul are thought to be of Iranian origin and may even have formed part of the booty from the Ottoman victory of 1514.[460]

The history of lacquer-painted bindings has yet to be written but the technique was used in Herat from the middle of the fifteenth century onward, particularly on a book’s exterior. An early example inscribed with the name of the Timurid prince Babur ibn Baysunghur (d. 861/1457) has exterior covers painted in gold on a black ground and doublures with leather filigree medallions.[461] One of the most splendid Timurid lacquer bindings is on a manuscript of the Hasht Bihisht copied for one of Sultan Husayn Bayqara’s sons, Sultan Muhammad Muhsin in 902/1496-97 by Sultan ‘Alî Mashhadî. All surfaces of its binding are lacquer-painted. The front cover has a medallion scheme, and the back a field of interlocking lobed medallions.[462]

Another lacquer binding connected with Timurid Herat is that on a copy Sultan Husayn Bayqara’s Dîvân in the Topkapi Museum, E.H. 1636.[463] Its scheme follows a traditional pattern with a central medallion and four quarter medallions in the comers. These units are filled with floral scrolls and cloud-bands executed in two tones of gold over a black ground.

In the Hazine 1510 binding, these same motifs are used to fill its field and border cartouches. Indeed, this style of painting appears to have had a considerable vogue and is found on bindings probably produced in both Safavid Iran and Ottoman Turkey. At present, it is often difficult to establish the provenance and date of such bindings probably because of the mobility of craftsmen in this period.

Provisionally, however, the binding of Hazine 1510 seems to have closer links with Iranian than Ottoman examples in the design and execution of its doublure as well as in its use of border cartouches.[464] Sometimes in Safavid bindings a lacquer painted field with scroll and cloud-band designs is paired with both stamped and gilded medallions and similarly ornamented border cartouches.[465] In other cases the external cartouche frame is painted in the fashion seen in Hazine 1510. One binding of this type even has a doublure scheme with a filigree field and border cartouches which is also closely analagous in design to that of Hazine 1510. It is attached to a manuscript dated to 965/1557-58.[466] The doublure of this latter manuscript is, however, also similar in design to that of the Oxford Lisan al-Tayr copied by Hajj Muhammad al-Tabnzi in 937/1530-31 mentioned earlier.[467]

These comparisons highlight one of the key problems facing anyone who wishes to study the history of bindings. It IS at present difficult to distinguish between similarites due to conservatism in the artistic and technical traditions of bindings and chronological ambiguities created by transferring bindings from one manuscript to another. Redecoration or repair of bindings also adds an element of confusion to their chronology.

At present what can be estabhshed is that Hazine 15105 binding was probably made by an Iranian craftsman during the first decades of the sixteenth century in either Iran or Turkey. If it was originally created to house the manuscripts it now contains, it may be contemporary with the insertion of the firman and the changes made to the manuscript’s colophons, that is, sometime after 906/1503.

Now that the contents and binding of Hazine 1510 have been analyzed, it is appropriate to examine the text with the name of Husayn Bayqara mentioned above. This document is written on another piece of paper which has been pasted over the fourteenth-century page (figure 9.5). Although portions of the paper are abraded as though some of the text had been erased and then rewritten,[468] in the main the document appears to be authentic, if truncated. It lacks headings, seals, colophons, and endorsem ents.[469]

The document is written in two different scripts, and has two sections: an upper one in one in black-outlined gold script which contains invocations, the titles and epithets of Husayn Bayqara and the royal decree, and a lower portion in black labeled as a bar-avard, or estimate of expenses, for the production of a Shah-namah manuscript. The text specifies that the manuscript in question is being forwarded to the accountants (mustawfiyan) of the royal Divan along with th efirman proper. The firman requests that individuals listed in the bar-avard be recompensed for the expenses and labor involved in the production a manuscript which must have been presented (unsolicited?) to Sultan Husayn Bayqara. Those named in the bar-avard are probably to be identified with the “skilled men” (ashab-i khibrat) and the “learned” (ahl-i danish) praised in the opening invocation.

The bar-avard also has two sections: an upper one that gives the total cost of the manuscript, four tümâns, 2,450 dinars, and a lower one arranged in five columns, that lists the amounts to be paid to specified individuals. The five columns are labeled (from right to left): kaghaz (paper), kitabat (copying), tazhib (gilding), jadval (margination), and tasvir (painting).

For each category, the column lists the person(s) to be paid, the cost per item, and the number of items involved. Thus, under paper we see mention of the purchase of kaghaz-i hitayi, or Chinese paper, the name Khwaja Murshıd-İ Kashgarl, the quantity of600 pages (iawraq), and the unit price of twenty dinars a page (waraq) for a total of 12,000 dinars. In the second column, copying, the calligrapher is identified as Mawlana Warqah ibn ‘Umar Samarqandl, who copied 63,000 bayts at 250 dinars per thousand bayts for a total of 15,750 dinars. In the third column under illumination the craftsmen are listed as Sharaf al-Dm and Jalal al-Dîn Kirmanı, and they are to be given a total of 6,000 dinars for executing four illuminated pages. The two marginators, Ustad Ahmad and Mawlana Muhammad Haravi completed sixty juz’ at the price of forty dinars a juz’ for a total of 2,400 dinars. Last comes the painter, ‘Abd-uLWahhab Muşawir-İ Mashhadl, who executed twenty-one scenes at 300 dinars apiece for a total of 6,300 dinars. When added together these sums equal 42,450 dinars, or 4 tümâns, 2,450 dinars. [470]

Various aspects of this text are worthy of closer study, but here the focus will be on its significance for the history of Hazine 1510. This bar-avard describes the cost of a Shah-namah manuscript consisting of 600 leaves, or 60 gatherings, containing 63,000 verses with 4 illuminated headings or pages and 21 paintings. When these numbers are compared to the Shah-namah of Hazine 1510 questions arise. The most difficult to reconcile are the figures concerning the manuscript’s length—63,000 verses on 600 folios or 60 juz’.

The Hazine 1510 Shah-namah, however, has only 484 folios, and approximately 52,000 verses.[471] The relative brevity of this Shah-namah copy has been interpreted by J. Khaliqi-Mutlaq as a sign of its unusual conservatism and fidelity to FirdawsFs original text.[472] Now that Hazine 1510 has been identified as a Muzaffarid manuscript that probably was copied in 783/1382؎ its relationship to other early, accurate copies of the Shah-namah should receive even greater attention, especially in connection with efforts to reconstruct Firdawsi’s original text.[473]

Thejirman’s data on illuminations and paintings is more compatible than its text description with the present condition of Hazine 1510. The Shah-namah could be described as having four illuminations, namely an initial medallion, folio la, two illuminated pages at the opening of the preface, folios 2b-3a, and a fourth page at the beginning of the poem itself, folio 8b. The listing of twenty-one paintings is also accurate if the double page painting situated between the preface and the body of the poem is excluded. The Shah-namah of Hazine 1510 now has twenty-three paintings, but two of them added on blank pages between the preface and body of the Shah-namah may well have been added to the manuscript at a later date (fols. 7b-8a).

Although it is logical to assume that this document describes the manuscript to which it is affixed, such a conclusion leaves major questions unanswered. The basic discrepancy between the firman and Hazine 1510 lies not in the inconsistency of its numbers but rather stems from its implicit origin and purpose. The document appears to describe a routine court transaction in which Sultan Husayn Bayqara accepted a manuscript presented to him by its makers and ordered them to be recompensed for their efforts. The document’s stress on “people of learning” suggests that some of those involved were scholars, and the relatively small sum to be expended for paintings may imply that they were of modest size and quality. Finally, it does not seem probable that the treasury of Husayn Bayqara would have expended the considerable sums listed here for paper, copying, illumination, and margination if it had been suspected that the manuscript in question had been written, illuminated, and marginated more than a hundred years earlier.

If thefirman and Hazine 1510 had separate origins, what is the significance of their present juncture? Here only a provisional answer to this question can be given. It seems probable that the insertion of this document into Hazine 1510 is connected with alterations in its colophon dates: from 783 to 903 in the Shah-namah and from 776 to 906 in the Khamsah and with the addition of a superflous colophon dated to 903 in the name of “Warqah ibn ‘Umar SamarqandĽ” This scribal name, chosen to harmonize with that of the original Shah-namah calligrapher, was then inserted into th efirman after the name of its original scribe had been erased. The superflous colophon’s use of the nisbah “Samarqandl” buttressed “Warqah’s” credentials as a Timurid calligrapher and strengthened Hazine 15105 connection with Sultan Husayn Bayqara’s firman. A desire to provide a Herat pedigree for Hazine 1510, and to harmonize it with the Shah-namah manuscript described in the firman may also have stimulated the addition of twenty-one paintings to its previously unillustrated Shah-namah text. It is even possible that the addition of Sultan Husayn Bayqara’s name to the Shah-namah’s initial medallion had the same goal.

The changes suggested above seem to have had a related aim and purpose: to transform a manuscript from Muzaffarid Shiraz that had belonged to Shah Rukh into one from Timurid Herat which was linked with the patronage of Sultan Husayn Bayqara. The addition of the now missing Dîvân by ‘All Shir Navâ’î could also have formed part of the same goal and given Hazine 1510 yet another connection with Timurid Herat. A new binding inscribed with the verses of Jami and embellished with jewels may have completed this process of transformation.

In order to examine the plausibility of these hypotheses, the questions surrounding Hazine 1510 must be considered in the larger context of its time. It seems unlikely that these changes antedate the death of Husayn Bayqara in 912/1506, or the end of his dynasty the following year. The pillaging of Herat by the Safavids in 1510 must have put both Timurid documents and manuscripts into wider circulation and may provide the terminus ante quern for various changes made to Hazine 1510.

If the transformation of Hazine 1510 occurred after the end of the Timurid dynasty, with the goal of “Timuridizing” a Muzaffarid manuscript, it must have been done in a place where things Timurid had a high prestige. Three possible locations come to mind: the Uzbek domains of Khurasan and Transoxiana, Safavid Tabriz, and Ottoman Istanbul. Further investigation is needed before a definite conclusion can be reached, but stylistic features of the paintings added to the Shah-namah and of the manuscript’s binding point to Tabriz, whereas the Khamsah paintings suggest a link to Istanbul. Perhaps both features can be explained by the well-documented presence of Iranian craftsmen at the Ottoman court and the high prestige which Timurid culture and art enjoyed in sixteenth-century Istanbul.

[411] ١٠٠ V. ¥. لآ١حآةاةلا١ Topkapi Sarayı Muesi Kütüphanesi Farsa Yakmalar Katalogu, [hereafter FYK] (Istanbul, 1961), no. 348, p. 131.

[412] Thomas w. Lentz and Glenn D. Lowry, Timur and the Princely Vision (Los Angeles, 1989).

[413] The history of another Topkapi manuscript, Hazine 762, is a good example of the transfer of a book from one royal owner to another. See Ivan Stchoukine (Les Peintures des manuscrits de la “Khamseh” de Nizami au Topkapi Sarayı Müzesi d’Istanbul (Paris, 1966), ms. no. 13, pp. 71–81).

[414] The authors would like to thank A.H. Morton of the University of London for his transcription of numbers contained in th efirman, and K. Eslami of Princeton University for assistance in interpreting the firmans text. They also benefited from discussing the binding’s inscriptions with F. Bagherzadeh of Paris and A.-M. Schimmel of Harvard University.

[415] Stchoukine, “Origine turque des peintures d’une Anthologie persane de 801/1398,” Syria 42 (1965), pp. 139–40, pl. 113 idem, La Peinture turque d’apres les manuscrits illustres ler partie; de Sulayman ler a Osman //· 1520–1622 (Paris, 1966), pp. 64, 111, pl. 25a & b; idem, Les Peintures des manuscrits, ms. no. 65, pp. 150-51و pls. 79,80.

[416] Karatay, FYK, no. 348, p. 131.

[417] Stchoukine, Peinture turque, pp. 64, 111.

[418] M. Aga-Oglu, “The Landscape Miniatures of an Anthology of the year 1398,” Ars Islamica 3 (1936), pp. 77–98: Stchoukine, “Origine Turque,” pp. 137–39

[419] Jalal KhaliqLMutlaq, “Mu’arrifi wa ‘arzyabLyi barkhi âz dastnavisha-yi Shah-namah,” (2), Iran-namah, 4:1 (1364/1985), 30–31, 35–36, (3)و Iran-namah, 4:2 (1364/1985) 248, 250–53. The authors would like to thank Mr. K. Eslami for bringing these references to their attention.

[420] Asadl TÛSÎ, Lughat-i Furs, ed. Fath Allah MujtabaT, ‘Ah Ashraf Sadiqi, (Tehran, 1365/1986), p. 13. The authors would like to thank Mr. K. Eslami for bringing this publication to their attention.

[421] Lutf Allah also copied a manuscript of Firdawsi’s Shah-namah now in the Egyptian National Library, Cairo, which is dated to 796/1392-94 (1. Stchoukine, “Les Manuscrits illustres musulmans de la bibliotheque du Caire,” Gazette des Beaux Arts 77, no. 3 (January-June 1935), p. 141).

[422] The principal difference between the T. 1950 (fol. 464) colophon and that of Hazine 1510 (fol. 484b) is that the former uses a Persian form for this %\oss·. min a’mal kut gilwyeh.

[423] Heinz Gaube, Die sudpersische Provinz Arragan/Kuh-Giluyeh von der arabischen Eroberung bis ur Safawiden٦eit ٢ي’١حأ١تلة ,1973) ,؟p. 15, 25, 72–77.

[424] As suggested by A. Sarkisian, La Miniature persane du Xlle au XVIIe siecle (Paris, 1929), p. 33.

[425] Hazine 1510, fol. lb, 2a; T. 1950, fol. lb, 2٥.

[426] For an early example see M. Lings, The Quranic Art of Calligraphy and Illumination (Westerham, Kent, 1976), p. 119, pl. 60, and for a late one see ibid., p. 172, pls. 82–83.

[427] The page appears to have been inserted after the manuscript had been written.

[428] Hazine 1510, fols. 6a, 222٩, 377٩.

[429] Hazine 1510, fol. 499a.

[430] Manuscript no. 2179, Tashkent, Institute of Oriental Sciences of the Uzbek Academy of Sciences, Miniatures Illuminations ofAmirHosrov Dehlevi’s Works, cd ر{ Suleimanov, pls. 87. 88. Amir Husraw Dikhlavi, AfazZa* al-anwar, ec ‘l A رم Magerramov (Muharramov) (Moscow, 1975), pp. 7476; another probable Shiraz origin once in the library of Shah Rukh is a ذر٢دكل٠ of Farid ai-Dın ‘Attar’s Jawhar al-zât now in the ftsterreichische ٠٠a٠.or.a.h.b.JO‘r_٠e/ Vienna, A f-84؟. ‘I his manuscript also contains the seal ofرمل0.’ضك.’. r jler Beyazt Jl رنم Duda, Islamische Handschriften:, Persische Handschriften, 2 ٠’ols. (Vienna, 1983), vol. 1. pp. 52–53, vol. 2و figs. 8–9.;.

[431] ‘Abd al-Razzaq Sarnarqandf, Matla’ al-Sa’da\n. ed. M. Shafi’ (Lahore, 1946), vol. 11:1, pp. 162, 164–66.

[432] Stchoukine, Peinture turque, pp. 64111 و.

[433] M. Aga-Ctg. ‘ I he landscape Minniatures,” pp. 77–98; Stchoukine, Gngine turque,” pp. 137–39.

[434] Hazine 1519. fols. 51. 545b, 566a, 636b, 675b, 713a, 775b.

[435] Hazine 1516, fols. 5(f2b, 512b, 547b, 563a.

[436] Hazine 1516, fol. 682b.

[437] Stcno.r me Peintures des manuscrits, pls. 79a, 80 See note 4 above.

[438] Some of these lush settings containing palm trees and pomegranates may depict the calligrapher’s na e re • of Kuh Giluyeh.

[439] Hazme 1.516 fols. 5476 563a; see Stchoukine, Peintures des manuscrits, pls. 79a, 40

[440] Hazne 1511 h (ray. “I he School of Shiraz from 1392 to 1453,” in The Arts of the Book, tri Central Asia. 14th-16th Centuries <Vat’ıs, 1979), pı. 34 fig. 71

[441] Stchoukine, Peirtture turque, pp. 64111 و.

[442] Ibid., no. 8, p. 51, pls. 67

[443] F Çağman, ‘7 Yr: Miniatures of the Dıvan-İ Husayni and the Influence of Their Style, ’ in Fifth International Congress of Turkish Art. ed. G. Feher (Budapest, 1978), pp. 231–59, esp. 241–42

[444] كل’ Peinlure turque, no. 26, pp. 58–59; E. A til, Turkish Art (Washington, DC, 1986), pl. 18.

[445] A. S. Levend, Ali Sir Nevai: III: Hamse (Ankara, 1967), illus. between pp. 16–17, 152–53, 215–17, 264–65.

[446] Ibid., pp. 237–38: I. Stchoukine, “Les Manuscrits illustres musulmans de la bibliotheque du Caire,” Gazette des Beaux Arts 77 (January-June 1935), pp. 151–52; L. Binyon, J.v.s. Wilkinson, B. Gray, Persian Miniature Painting (London, 1933), no. 140, p. 133, pl. 90b.

[447] Oxford, Bodleian Library, Or. 195, Navâ’î, Lisan al-Tayr, in Miniatures Illustrations of Alisher Navoi’s Works, pls. 182–91.

[448] Çağman, “Miniatures of the Divan-i Hüseyni,” pp. 229–30, figs. 22–23.

[449] Duda, Islamische Handschriften I, vol. I, pp. 30–33, Abb. 333–37, see above, notes 33 and 34.

[450] [‘Abd al-Rahman Jami], Divan-i kamil-i Jami, ed. H. Radi (Tehran, 13411962), [n.p.], “Rubâ’iyât;’ nos. 48, 77213 و, pp. 815, 818, 835.

[451] Ibid., no. 48, p. 815.

[452] Ibid., no. 213, p. 835.

[453] Topkapi Palace Museum 2/2132, in The Anatolian Civilisations III, “Ottoman” (Istanbul, 1983), no. E 199, pp. 229–30.

[454] See also c. Koseoğlu, The Topkapi Saray Museum: The Treasury (New York, 1980), pl. 81, p. 202.

[455] E Çağman, “Serzergerân Mehmet Usta ve Eserleri, in Kemal Çig’a Armağan (Istanbul, 1984), p. 54, esp. notes 13, 15.

[456] [‘Abdallah Marvand], Staatsschreiben der Timuridenzeit, ed. and trans. H. Roemer (Wiesbaden, 1952), no. 74, pp. 131–34, 199–200, facsimile fols. 744–764 for a transcription of the text, see M. Haravi, “Muraqqa’-sazi dar dawrah-i Tîmüriyân,” Hunar va Mardum, no. 143, 13055, pp. 34–36.

[457] An unidentified binding illustrated on the cover of the first volume of Türkiye Yazmaları Toplu Katalogu (Istanbul, 1982).

[458] A. F. 6 6, Osterreichische Nationalbibliothek, Vienna (D. Duda, Islamische Handschriften: I Persische Handschriften [Vienna, 1983] vol. II, Abb. 35.)

[459] Çağman, “Serzergeran Mehmet Usta,” p. 54, note 14.; Istanbul University Library, A. 6546, a Qur’han copied by Yedikuh Sayyid ‘Abdallah in 1127/1715. The binding may be earlier than the text it encompasses.

[460] Koseoğlu, The Treasury nos. 74–76, p. 200.

[461] Duda, Islamische Handschsriften, vol. I, 71–72; vol. II, Abb. 18–20.

[462] Aslanapa, “Art of Bookbinding,” p. 64, pls. 17–18.

[463] Ibid., p. 63, ill. 29: Çağmen, “Miniatures of the Divan-i Hüseyni,” pp. 231–33.

[464] For examples with a clear Ottoman provenance, see z. Tarundi, “Rûganî Türk Kitap Kaplarinin Erken örnekleri,” in Kemal Cığ’a Armağan, pp. 223, 226–32, figs. 1, 5–11, 13–21: Soliman le Magnifiaue (Paris, 1990), no. 130: M. Rogers and R. Ward, Süleyman the Magnificent (London, 1988)و no. 24a-b, pp. 80–81.

[465] ‘All Shir Navâ’î, Khamsa, Dorn 560, Leningrad State Public Library, in Miniatures Illustrations, pls. 43–58. This manuscript appears to be of sixteenth-century western Iranian origin, although it has a colophon which alleges that it was copied in Timurid Herat in 898/1492-93.

[466] Haldane, Islamic Bookbindings, pl. 83, p. 82.

[467] Miniatures Illustrations, vA. 183.

[468] The most abraded section contains the calligrapher’s name, “Warqah b. Tlmar,” however, his nisbah “al-Samarqandl,” appears to be original.

[469] Concerning the form of firmans see Tadhkirat aTmuluk: a manual of Safavid Administration, ed. trans. V. Minorsky, appendix 4b, pp. 199–200.

[470] The authors would like to thank Prof. A. H. Morton for assistance in reading this document.

[471] Manuscripts of FirdawsFs Shah-namah vary considerably in length, but a length of 63,000 verses would be compatible with a manuscript of 600 folios copied with four text columns of twenty-seven lines to the page, a common page length. See, for example, Hazine 1515 with 622 folios and twenty-three lines per page (F. Karatay, Farsça Yazmalar, no. 334, p. 127).

[472] Khaliqi-Mutlaq, “Mu’arrifi...Shah-namah,” (3)و IN, vol. 4:2, pp. 240, 250–53

[473] This new date would appear to move Hazine 1510 from its current position as number forty-five to number eight in his list of Shah-namah manuscripts arranged by date, and from number fifteen to number six in his listing of complete copies of the text (Ĩ. Khaliqi-Mutlaq, “Mu’arrifi.. .Shah-nama” (1)و IN, vol. 3:3, 1364/1985, pp, 386–387 Ibid., (2), IN, vol. 4:1و pp. 30–31, Ibid., (3)و IN, vol. 4:2,‘PP· 231, 248).

 11. Faris al-Shidyaq and the Transition from Scribal to Print Culture in the Middle East

Geoffrey Roper

It is well known that printing came late to the Arab and Muslim Middle East; it is also well known that when it did become established, it had significant effects on the intellectual and social development of the area. These have become truisms, because historians have routinely acknowledged and paid lip-service to their importance. However, what they have not done, by and large, is to analyze, or even to spell out, the progress and consequences of this major transformation of social communication, and the changes in human relationships within Middle Eastern society which flowed from it. Such an undertaking, indeed, has not been possible, even for those few historians who are conscious of the need for it, because the materials for such a study have yet to be assembled. Nevertheless, it is possible to draw attention here briefly to a few general points about the nature of the transition from scribal culture to print culture, before illustrating that transition in the career and writings of one leading figure involved in it.

Although block-printing was practiced in the medieval Muslim Middle East, long before in Europe, the technique does not seem to have developed there beyond the printing of single-leaf amulets and talismans: it was apparently never used for the production of books, which remained entirely in the hands of scribes until the eighteenth century, and predominantly so until well into the nineteenth century, despite the widespread adoption of printing elsewhere. This reflects the maintenance of a monopoly of knowledge by a traditional elite group—the ‘ulama’—whose control over the scribal transmission and dissemination of texts served to reinforce established patterns of authority in Muslim society. It has been pointed out, moreover, that, especially towards the end of the scribal era, “knowledge” often tended to be regarded as a mystical and secret entity, and writers tended accordingly to prefer an obscure style of expression; this in turn encouraged what has been called a “magic garden” mentality, promoting esotericism at the expense of both lucidity and rationality.[474]

Printing eventually served to break this monopoly by creating a new culture based not only on a new means of transmitting texts, but also on a new approach to selecting, writing, and presenting them, aimed at a new kind of reader. In the process, it contributed to a demystification of language and literature, a revival of the classical heritage, and a new self·awareness. These led in turn both to a cultural revival (inahdah) and to political movements of a nationalist character. Although it started, among Muslims, as a means for modernizing rulers to educate, communicate with, and influence a new elite of their own creation, it eventually, as in early modern Europe, penetrated much further into society and into the consciousness of significant sections of the population. In doing so, it helped to redefine peoples’ relations with the sacred, with power and authority, and with the community.[475] Moreover, although the technology of printing came to the Middle East from Europe, it was not, as some historians have assumed, just a manifestation of, and vehicle for, Westernization: it had its own direct effects, which operated both on the cognitive plane and on the socioeconomic plane.

In the forefront of this process, which amounted to nothing less than the modernization and renewal of the literary and intellectual culture of the Middle East, were certain litterateurs—udaba'— who, as Carter Findley has pointed out, came from the old literary scribal elite, but evolved into the vanguard of the new culture.[476] It is on one of the most celebrated of these that I now wish to focus, and to try to trace in him and through him the emergence of that new, print-based culture and the transformations that it brought.

Faris al-Shidyaq, later Ahmad Faris Efendi, was very much a product of the old scribal culture—not just in a passive sense, but as an active and enthusiastic practitioner and connoisseur of it. Born in Lebanon in the first decade of the nineteenth century into a Maronite family which had traditionally provided clerks, scribes, and tutors for feudal lords,[477] he grew up in a literary household. His father had collected books on a variety of subjects, which the young Faris avidly read, especially literary works and poetry.[478] These books were, of course, all manuscripts: although Arabic printing had been introduced into Lebanon in 1734,[479] and Arabic printed books had also been imported from Europe since the 16th century,[480] they were restricted to Christian religious and liturgical books, produced in quite small quantities for the use of the clergy: literary and educational books were available only in handwritten copies. Following the family tradition, Faris himself became at an early age a professional copyist, and was employed, among other assignments, to copy the registers and chronicles of the amir Haydar al-Shihabl in connection with the compilation of the latter's composite history of Lebanon and neighboring countries.[481] He also produced, for Christian patrons, numerous copies of other works, in both Arabic and Syriac, some of which survived in ecclesiastical and private collections in Lebanon.[482] al-Shidyaq from the outset strove for high technical and aesthetic standards in his copying. In later years, he remarked, for instance, on the necessity of using the correct implements for writing Arabic—reed pens, not quills;[483] he also recalled that in his youth he had enthusiastically cultivated excellence in handwriting (judat or tajwid al-khatt), and whenever he saw fine script, devoted himself to imitating it.[484] During his stay in Egypt between 1828 and 1835, he continued to copy books for his own use, and possibly for others (although we cannot be certain of this). A copy of ZawzanFs commentary on the Mu’allaqat, for instance, made by him in Cairo in 1833, is extant,[485] and it bears a note that it was still in his possession in 1855/56.[486] He also made notebooks (kurrasah) of extracts of manuscript works that he thought would later be of use to him, such as Damlrfs zoological encyclopedia, Hayat al-hayawan, which he later used when translating an English natural history textbook for publication.[487] Throughout his later life he continued to copy books, and assembled such a large collection of manuscript volumes by this means that he used to worry, so it is said, about what would happen to them after his death.[488] He also made careful copies—often more than one—of his own works, some of which survive in this form.[489]

As well as being a scribe, Faris was an avid reader and collector of manuscripts. During his stay in Egypt, he seems to have immersed himself in classical Arabic literature, most of which at that time was still unpublished, and acquired some manuscripts there.[490] Later, when he went to Europe, he made a point of visiting the great libraries of Paris, London, Cambridge, and Oxford, and reading important works in their collections of Arabic manuscripts.[491] He described in some detail his visit to the British Museum Library (now the British Library) and mentioned some of the works of Arabic literature that he read there—almost certainly, in some cases, for the first, and perhaps the only, time: Ibn Qutaybah, al-Zamakhshan, al-Jahiz, Abu Tammam, and al-Mutanabbl.[492] He noted ruefully that he was not allowed to copy works in their entirety when there, but only to make extracts or summaries.[493] During the last thirty years of his life, when he was living in Istanbul, he frequented the manuscript collections there also, and wrote articles in his newspaper, al-Jawa’ib, enumerating the libraries and their contents, and complaining about the restricted access and poor working conditions in them.[494] Evidence of his love of fine calligraphy and illumination emerges from some of his descriptions of the manuscripts which he had seen, such as the sumptuous copy of Fîrüzâbâdî’s al-Qamus in the Köprülü Library.[495]

But al-Shidyaq’s main concern when studying manuscripts, especially in this latter period, was always to establish accurate texts that faithfully reflected what the classical authors had written. To this end, he made detailed comparisons and evaluations of the manuscript copies he encountered,[496] and as he did so, he became acutely aware of how some of these texts had become subject to corruption (al-tahrif wa-al-taşhîf) in the process of copying, because of the ignorance and negligence of scribes.[497] He noted that manuscript copies were often defective,[498] that is, lacking part or parts of the text; and he was furthermore aware that much Arabic literature had been lost altogether through the destruction of unique or rare manuscript texts.[499] Moreover, even many of those texts that survived were scarce and hard to locate or obtain, as he had discovered. for instance, when trying to find copies of the diwans of the great classical Arabic poets in Cairo when he was a young man.[500]

So al-Shidyaq was well aware that the revival of Arabic literature and culture depended on bypassing the old scribal tradition, much as he revered it and was a part of it, and finding a new means of transmitting and preserving both classical texts and new writing. Fortunately, the development of his own life and work had shown him that just such a means was now available, that could and should be widely adopted in the service of Arabic learning and letters. From the time that he left his native land in 1826, his career was inextricably bound up with, and dependent on, the use of the printing press. At the beginning of that career, it was still a suspect novelty in the Arab and Muslim Middle East; by the time of his death sixty years later, it had become the normal and accepted method of producing and transmitting Arabic texts.

The first press with which al-Shidyaq was involved was that run by the English Church Missionary Society (CMS) in Malta. He spent about eighteen months there in 1827–28, helping to prepare Christian religious texts—commentaries on the parables of Jesus and a new metrical translation of some of the Psalms[501]—for printing and distribution mainly in Lebanon and Egypt. However, ill health caused him to leave Malta for Egypt, where he spent the next seven years. During this time, he worked for a while on the newspaper al-Waqâ’i’ al-Misrlyah—the first Arabic newspaper to be published anywhere— and was therefore one of the first Arabs, if not the very first, to practice the craft of journalism.[502] While thus engaged, he no doubt became familiar with the operations of the state press of Muhammad ‘All at Bulaq, where the newspaper was produced. However, it seems that he soon became disillusioned with Egyptian government service, mainly because of delays in payment of his salary,[503] and by 1832 he was again working for the missionaries in Cairo.

At the end of 1835, al-Shidyaq went back to Malta, and over the next six years again helped to prepare and edit translations of a number of Christian religious books; but in addition to these, he also published at the CMS press a series of secular didactic works on geography, natural history, and language. Three of these were written or compiled by him, being his first published works; another was carefully translated by him from English. He also prepared and produced the editioprinceps of an earlier Arabic grammar, the Bahth al-matdlib of Jibril Farhat (Malta, 1836). This was the first of many manuscript works which were to be published at his hands over the next fifty years.

al Shidyaqs role at the Malta Arabic press in the 1830s and 184 s was S’-teh as ıدا ma be him fully c nscirijs رتم(all that ‘٨’a s involved in this new meth nd its potentialities..Cot only did he prepare copy for ر؛) production and نمارائ nf

,ne press, he al’-/ر actol as a pr tof rcarfer and corrector becoming acutely aware of the importance of vigilance and rneticulousness in these tasks. At the end bull marta tarif, he refers امدد م/-/”, of his own Arabic grammar and reader specifically ıدا his own role in Its printing and asks the reader’s forgiveness for any typographical errors remaining.[504] By that time he had already raised the typographical standards of the Malta press to a much higher level than had existed here previously. Cot only Arabic., but also Ottoman Turkish texts were checked and proofread by him, or was his work erm fined to textual editing and correction he al sr had a hand in designing and preparing the punches ؛دوكا a new Arabic typeface, in three sizes, which was brought into use in 1838, and which has becri admirer] for its beauty and excellence.[505]

The Arabic press in Malta was closed down in 1842, and for the next, fifteen years al Shidyaq’s rork in the field of crJiting arid publishing bore fruit not in the Arab world, but in Europe. He translatol the whole of the Bible into Arabic arid saw ال through the press in England a major undertaking which must have made him (‘illy acquainted with established printing and publishing practicesat a large-scale scholarly press, in this case William Watts in London.[506] He also had published in Bars in 1455 his own extcrisive autobiographical and literary work, كذ كدك/يك ‘ala al aq, for which a special, new Arabic typeface zzas prepared arid cast[507]--again he corrected all the proofs himself’.[508] He also became interested again m journalism and newspaper publishing a prospectus for a new political journal under his editorship as issuer] in Brance in 1858,[509]

In 1857, al Shidyaq was invited to turns to apply his knowledge of publishing and journalism to the foundation of a new state press and newspaper there.[510] Before this carne to fruition, however certain intrigues at the lunisian court causer] the task to be assignor] to someone else.[511] But. his brief stay in his subsequent)رتم great importance to the development رتم؛ f unis was nevertheless’ carter for it was there that he embraced fslarn, a nr] by doing s:, qualified himself for a new and more influential role in the renewal رتم؛ Arab and Muslim,the nineteenth century رتم؛ culture in the second half.

In 1859 or 1860, اه l Shidyaq went to Istanbul, where he lived tor the rest of his life He seems to have beer appointed in the first place as Chief Corrector (Ra’i al-uahhihn) at the mperial ress (alMata’a al-Sltaniyah),[512] his first major task was to launch a nevz Arabic newspaper called al fawdih, which started in 1861 and continuer], with two short interruptions, until 1884. ft was this nezzspaper that brought al Shidyaq his greatest fame, because it was widely distributer], carrying his name, his writing, and his ideas اه ll over the Arab and .Muslim worlds. But. although al Shidyaq had novi achieved his long-standing ambition to edit and publish an Arabic newspaper, journalism by no means displaced book publishing in his career. In 1868, he published his own large-scale treatise on Arabic etymology, Sirr al-layalfi al-qalb wa-al-îbdâl, at the Imperial Press. Then, in 1870, he established the Jawa'ib Press (Matbdat al-Jawdib) with new equipment, and not only did this take over the printing of the newspaper after which it was named, it also published a long series of books, mostly in Arabic but also some in Turkish. These have teen collected, studied, and enumerated by the eminent al-Shidyaq scholar Mohammed Alwan[513] and it is not necessary to go over that ground here except to note his finding that the number of publications totalled 75, and that they fell into essentially four categories: classical Arabic literature; al-Shidyaq's own works; works by other contemporary authors, mostly his friends, supporters, or patrons; and miscellaneous semi-official Ottoman publications. By the time ofal-Shidyaq's death in 1887, he could truly be said to have been not just one of the greatest Arabic writers of the age, but also one of its foremost editors and publishers.

al-Shidyaq did not just passively accept and make use of the printing press in the furtherance of his own career and reputation: he was also an active protagonist and propagandist of the print revolution. "In truth," he wrote, "all the crafts that have been invented in this world are inferior to the craft of printing. To be sure, the ancients built pyramids, set up monuments, erected statues, fortified strongholds, dug canals and water conduits, and paved military roads; however, those crafts, compared with the craft of printing, are but one degree above savagery. After printing became widespread, there was no longer any likelihood of the disappearance of knowledge which had been disseminated and made public, or the loss of books, as was the case when they were written with the pen."[514] It was, perhaps, because he had been precipitated early in his career into the print-oriented world of Malta and Europe that he did not share the antagonism towards printing and the mass production of books that was felt by many of his contemporaries among the educated Arab elite. The latter were no doubt motivated by their instinctive awareness of the threat that it posed to their monopoly of knowledge and authority. On the contrary al-Shidyaq recognized the undesirability of that restrictive monopoly: "Much of our literature," he complained, "is possessed by a few individuals who do not think it in their interest to give it a wider spread among the people."[515] Printing was the way to break out of this situation. Not only would it help preserve literature that would otherwise be lost, something to which he attached immense importance, as the previously quoted passage indicates,[516] but it would also make books much easier for everyone to obtain, read, and collect.[517] Printing establishments would even themselves become centers of culture, places for educated people to make for when visiting a country or locality.[518]

al-Shidyaq was aware that the Arabs and Muslims were backward in this matter, because he had studied the history of printing in China and the West, and devoted a substantial section of his book on Europe to it,[519] as well as articles in al-Jawâ’ib\[520] he also described a copy of the Gutenberg Bible of 1455, which he saw in the British Museum, and other early European printed books.[521] But what really impressed him was the sheer volume of book and newspaper publishing in contemporary Europe: in several of his books and articles, he treats the matter at length, giving detailed statistics.[522] This, he considered, was an important cause of Europe’s ascendancy, and the lack of printing an equally important cause of ignorance and decline among the Arabs and Muslims.[523] What were needed, he wrote, were presses “to print…books useful for men, women, and children, and for every single class of people, so that they know what their rights and obligations are (“هل lahum wa-mâ ’alayhim min al-huqüq)?[524] He was thus suggesting that the printed word could bring about social and political, as well as intellectual, emancipation and advancement.

I have sought to demonstrate that al-Shidyaq was both a major participant in and a protagonist of the print revolution in the Middle East. It remains to consider the effects that his activities, and the products of his endeavors, actually had in bringing about the shift from scribal to print culture in the Arab and Muslim Worlds. In discussing the equivalent shift in early modern Europe, the historian Elizabeth Eisenstein has identified three fundamental changes, or rather “clusters of changes,” which printing brought to the processes of communication and transmission by the written word: the much wider dissemination of texts in all fields; their standardization; and their preservation for posterity. Each of these had far-reaching effects, not only on intellectual, but also on social and economic, development.[525] It may be useful, therefore, to apply this conceptual framework to the effects of the print revolution in the nineteenth-century Middle East, and to al-Shidyaq’s part in it.

One of al-Shidyaq’s biographers has made the point that his role in editing books for the press was really a continuation of his former trade as a copyist of manuscripts;[526] this is true up to a point, but it ignores the quite different effects which his new activities had. The Arabic tracts and textbooks which he edited and published in Malta were distributed on a large scale throughout the Middle East and were widely used in schools. al-Shidyaq enumerated some of the earlier Malta books which he himself used when a teacher in Cairo,[527] and these missionary publications were also widely disseminated amongst the Christian populations of Egypt, Lebanon, Palestine, Syria, and Iraq, as well as finding their way into the hands of some Muslims and, in some cases, into Muslim state schools.[528] The traditional kuttabs, whether Muslim or Christian, had not taught even the Arabic language, still less other subjects, in a systematic, graded manner, and had therefore tended to produce “functional illiterates.”[529] The use of these Malta textbooks, as well as locally produced ones which followed their example, and some which al-Shidyaq later published in Istanbul for the Ottoman state schools,[530] helped to extend basic literacy. Moreover, the provision of instructional books to large numbers of individual pupils, which only printing made possible, encouraged them, at the outset of their education, to regard reading and studying from books as an individual and private activity, and one that was potentially within the reach of all. It is at least possible that some of the changes in perceived relationships between the individual and society, which became apparent among some intellectuals in the Middle East in the latter part of the nineteenth century, may have owed something to this new factor in their earliest childhood intellectual experience.

al-Shidyaq also played a pioneering role in disseminating the means for Arabs to learn European languages. In the scribal era, textbooks for this purpose were to all intents and purposes nonexistent. But a!·Shidyâq’s first published work was an English grammar for the use of Arabs,[531] which was distributed along with other Malta books in the Middle East, and of which a second edition was published at the Jawa’ib Press in Istanbul.[532] He also produced a book of grammatical exercises and dialogues[533] and later, in Paris, a grammar of French in Arabic.[534] Without such aids, the possibilities of Arab intellectuals of that era becoming acquainted with Western knowledge and culture directly through the medium of print would have been much more restricted than they were.

al-Shidyaq’s activities as a journalist and newspaper publisher were, of course, even more crucial in bringing the printed word to a large Arab and Muslim readership. The role of newspapers and periodicals in creating a new reading public and a new social and political awareness in the nineteenth-century Middle East is, I think, generally appreciated, and this is not the place to consider it in detail. But two points can be mentioned which perhaps are not sufficiently recognized. The impact of journals like al-Jawa’ib went beyond the literate classes, because the reading of them was likely in many situations to have been a group activity. In coffee-houses and other places where people gathered, the illiterate and poorly educated also imbibed the printed word through the reading of extracts and passages out loud by their more literate companions. This applied also to some printed books, especially works of classical literature, such as the Maqamat of Hamadham, printed at al-Shidyaqıs Jawa’ib Press in 1880 in an edition which was specifically intended to “please the reader and the listener” (al-qari’ wa-alsami”).[535] al-Shidyaq also had a policy of serializing some classical works in al-Jawa’ib before publishing them separately, such as al-Amidfs al-Muwazanah bayna Abi Tammam wa-al-Buhturi.[536] Even those that were not serialized were always heavily advertised in the newspaper and distributed by its agents in Tunis,[537] Alexandria,[538] Beirut,[539] and elsewhere, as well as by post from Istanbul.

Nor were al-Shidyaq’s activities as a disseminator confined to his own publications: he also acted as an agent and distributor for contemporary Arabic printed books from other publishers, including those in Tunisia and Lebanon.[540] al-Jawa’ib also carried many notices of newly published Arabic books from a variety of sources, including especially the Bülâq Press in Egypt. This was all in keeping with al-Shidyaq’s mission to spread the benefits of the print revolution as widely as possible (see figure 11.1).

The standardization of texts and of their physical presentation was another important aspect of the print revolution in which al-Shidyaq was fully involved. Unlike most of his predecessors and contemporaries who prepared editions of classical Arabic works, he went to great trouble to establish sound texts by comparing and collating as many manuscript copies as he could find and noting their differences; and he encouraged others who edited texts for the Jawa’ib Press to do likewise.[541] Only in this way could a worthwhile and authoritative editio princeps be created. But he was well aware that compositors and editors, too, could make errors, and caveats to this effect were included in several of his books,[542] as well as, often, errata lists.[543] The correction of such errors, however, as well as additions and improvements to the texts themselves, could be incorporated into new, revised editions of books—a characteristic feature of the print era, in contrast to the progressive corruption of text in manuscript copies. This applied, of course, equally to new works, such as al-Shidyâq’s own: five of his books were issued in revised editions under his supervision.[544] The awareness that printing could enable standard, corrected, and authoritative texts to become widely available for reference also made it particularly suitable for the promulgation of laws and state regulations, and al-Shidyaq was involved in this also: with Jawa’ib Press published a number of Ottoman legal codes and enactments in both Arabic and Turkish.[545]

The standardization of language itself was another of the effects of printing enumerated by Eisenstein. In the case of Arabic, this was less marked than in Europe, since strict classical norms applied to the written language, and the literary development of the vernaculars was ruled out. But the publications of al-Shidyâq’s grammars, reading book, and textbooks in Malta did play a part in improving the written Arabic used by Arab Christians, which by the early nineteenth century had in many cases deteriorated into something akin to Middle Arabic, or into what he scathingly called rakakah (feebleness or poverty of style).[546] He also introduced into his publications, especially his translations, many newly coined words for new and alien objects and concepts, “for which,” as he pointed out, “no equivalents could be discovered in classical Arabic…and that,” he went on, “is to provoke the Arabs into putting into circulation new post-classical (nuwallad) expressions which will save them from choking on foreign jargon and protect them from an inundation of it.”[547] Some of these neologisms found a permanent place in the language, and are still in use.[548] It was of course the power of print to circulate and reinforce the new usages that gave al-Shidyaq this seminal role in creating new lexical standards and norms for the Arabic language.

It is appropriate to remark here also that not only new vocabulary, but a whole new style of Arabic prose emerged at this time, and al-Shidyaq was one of the prime movers in this development. There is no doubt that he was steeped in the old classical norms and usages, and he also showed himself to be, in many of his writings, quite fond of obscurity and recondite verbiage. But he nevertheless realized that the new patterns of readership created by the print revolution necessitated a new, simpler, and more direct style, geared primarily to the communication of knowledge and ideas rather than to preserving the mystique of a literary elite. This was equally tme when he was writing school textbooks for the Malta press, and when he was deploying the new medium of journalism later in Istanbul. To this print-based creativity of al-Shidyaq, and some of his contemporaries, can perhaps be traced the origins of the modern standard Arabic written language.

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-41.jpg][Fig. 11.1. The back page of aLShidyaqa newspaper al-Jawâ’ib. no. 1017, Istanbul, 19 Ramadan 12QS 25 August 1880. The right-hand column gives a price list of aLJawa’ib Press books a١ailable from the newspaper offices, starting with al-Shidaq’s own works, including the original Paris edition of his alSaq ala al-saq—”of alien appearance” dala shax. gharib[On the left are other Arabic and Turkish books which can be supplied, including some from “Syrian.” that is Lebanese, presses, followed by a list of those axailable from the Egyptian agent of al-Javaib. (Cambridge University Library, NPR. B. 411.)]]

But if the advent of printing can be held partly responsible for new linguistic and literary standards, the new ways of presenting and packaging texts, to ease the task of the reader, are wholly due to it. In this development, too, al-Shidyaq played an active role. On the one hand, with his background as a scribe and calligrapher, he was keen to ensure that type styles reflected the best scribal norms. As already mentioned, he accordingly helped to design a new typeface for the Malta Arabic press in the 183053 later, when he set up his own Jawa’ib Press in Istanbul, he ensured that its types followed the established Ottoman Arabic tradition, unlike the “alien form” (shakl gharib) of the typeface with which his autobiography had previously been printed in Paris.[549] On the other hand, he made a determined, even if only partly successful, attempt to improve and regularize other typographical and design features of the books for which he was responsible: some of these features, as Eisenstein has demonstrated in the case of European printed books, can be of crucial importance in determining their impact on readers. The books produced at the early Turkish and Egyptian presses were usually modelled quite closely on traditional manuscript layouts and styles of presentation. al-Shidyâq's books, however, both those from Malta and those of the Jawa'ib Press, look different. For the most part he abandoned the marginal commentaries and glosses with which earlier books were often festooned. In some cases running heads were introduced, repeating the title or number of the chapter or section at the top of each page as an aid to those referring to the book.[550] Nearly all al-Shidyâq's books have title pages, setting out clearly and systematically not only the title itself, but also the name of the author, the name of the press, the place and date of publication, and whether it is a first or later edition. This was an important innovation of the print era, to which al-Shidyaq became accustomed in Malta and later adopted at his press in Istanbul, one of the first in the Middle East which consistently did this. This practice, as Eisenstein has pointed out, engendered "new habits of placing and dating," as well as helping the subsequent development of more precise cataloging and enumerative bibliography.[551] Another new feature of the print era to be found in most of al-Shidyâq's publications is a table of contents, with page numbers, likewise enabling the reader to make more systematic use of the book.

Page layouts, under al-Shidyq's guidance, also set new standards, being generally more spacious and easier on the eye than most ordinary manuscripts or earlier printed books from the Middle East. Margins are reasonably wide, and, as already mentioned, unencumbered by glosses or commentaries. The spacing between words tends also to be more generous, leaving a better overall ratio between black and white than on most pages of Bulaq or early Turkish printed books, These were features of the Malta Arabic books on which al-Shidyaq worked early in his career, and they later appeared in the products of his Istanbul press, making them easier to read and therefore more accessible to a wider public. Some of them can be considered as forerunners of twentieth-century Arabic book design.[552]

Another feature of the modern Arabic printed book which differentiates it markedly from its manuscript forebears is the use of punctuation. al-

Shidyâq’s attempts in this field, though, were a failure. By the late 18305, he had become familiar with European books and literature, and had observed the usefulness of punctuation marks in clarifying the structure and meaning of passages of prose. In 1839 he published at Malta his primer and, reading book of literary Arabic, al-Lafiffi kull ma’nâ tarif, and boldly decided to introduce Western punctuation into it, using commas, dashes, colons, exclamation marks, question marks, quotation marks, and full stops (see figure 11.2). He set them out in his introduction, explained their use, and urged that they should be generally adopted in Arabic, “since,” he wrote, “that would save the perpetration of much [error] on the paths of exegesis, and safeguard the reader in reading, and the traverser of the pitfalls of delusion. If this is necessary,” he went on, “in Frankish languages, then it is even more necessary in Arabic, because of...the ramification of clauses (tafrf alfumal) one upon another.”[553] This remarkable proposal was, however, far ahead of its time. Although all these punctuation marks appear throughout the first edition of al-Lafif, they were —apart from the full stop— very seldom used even in other Malta books for which al-Shidyaq was responsible. In the second edition of al-Lafif, published in Istanbul at his Jawa’ib Press in 1881, all the punctuation marks were omitted, as well as the relevant section of the introduction from which I have quoted. Not until the twentieth century was full punctuation widely adopted in Arabic.

The bindings of books, as well as their contents, were another field for standardization. Whereas manuscripts were generally bound individually by or for their owners, mass-produced printed books could have standard bindings issued by their publishers. Generally, these were printed wrappers or boards (sometimes cloth-backed)—such were the standard bindings, for instance, of al-Shidyaq’s Malta books. His Jawa’ib Press in Istanbul continued this practice; but it also issued many of its books in cloth or roan bindings, with titles embossed in gilt on the front and the insignia of the press on the back.[554] They thus became homogenized, mass-produced consumer durables, complete with trade marks—harbingers of a new uniform commodity culture.

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-42.jpg][Fig. 11.2. Two pages from al-Shidyaq’s al-Lafiffl kull ma’nâ tarif; Malta, 1839, showing his use of punctuation marks: dash, comma, question mark, and colon. The typeface, which has been admired for its beauty, was specially cut and cast in Malta, almost certainly to his designs. The only incongruous feature is the use of Western numerals for the page signature. (Cambridge University Library, Moh.315.d.l8 sei.)]]

All these elements of standardization which printing brought to the form and content of books contributed to what Eisenstein has called a new “esprit de systeme” and served to “reorder the thought of readers.”[555] It seems reasonable, therefore, to claim that pioneering print-oriented authors and publishers like al-Shidyaq contributed significantly in this way to the emergence of new modes of thought and patterns of consciousness in the modern Middle East.

Along with increased dissemination and standardization of tests, the third “cluster of changes” associated with the print revolution, according to Eisenstein, was their preservation. al-Shidyq’s views on the loss and corruption of Arabic texts in the scribal era, and tlie potential role of printing in preserving them, have already been indicated. His book-publishing activity at his press in Istanbul was largely dedicated to putting into practice what he had earlier advocated. He published there a long series of carefully edited texts of classical Arabic literature, including especially works of poetry and adab. As well as editing some of them himself, he also created a circle or “school” of editors whom he encouraged to apply similar standards: among those whose names are known are Yusuf al-Nabhani and Rasul al-Najjârî.[556] The new works that he published— both his own and those of other writers, such as Khayr al-Dîn al-Tünisî and Yusuf al-Asir—were also thereby assured of a permanent place in the literature: their works might be forgotten or neglected for a while, but they would never perish completely like many of their predecessors of the manuscript era. This meant a new and more confident response to the challenge of creative writing; for whereas previously much literary effort had gone into the task of retrieving, encapsulating, summarizing, and commenting upon past knowledge and past literary achievement, now, in the print era, this could all, in a sense, be taken for granted. New ideas and original thoughts and expression could claim the full energies of writers, who were now secure in the knowledge that, once published, they too, would be safe for posterity. What this eventually brought about was nothing less than a major reorientation of literature and knowledge— instead of always looking backwards, it could now look forward to new horizons.

This in turn meant a new role for the author, and a new sense of self-awareness and autonomy for writers. al-Shidyaq himself provides a good example of the new role model. Throughout his published works can be sensed a vibrant individualism, even egotism—much of his writing is indeed directly about himself.[557] He also assumes in many places a direct relationship with his readers, addressing them and even suggesting that he is confiding secrets to them.[558] This has been recognized in several studies of European literary history as a feature of the new role of writers in the print era: instead of transmitting texts to present and future audiences or imagined assemblies of fellow scholars, the writer was addressing a large number of persons “who were not gathered together in one place but were scattered in separate dwellings and who, as solitary individuals with divergent interests, were more receptive to intimate interchanges than to broad-gauged rhetorical effects.”[559] Hence, authors emerged who aimed to suggest an intimate relationship with their many unknown readers, while in the process developing their own cult of self: often cited in the case of the European Renaissance[560]—in the Arab renaissance (nahdah) of the nineteenth century, al-Shidyaq can perhaps be seen as a similar phenomenon. This new individualism of the print era also found a manifestation in the conduct of protracted and often vituperative literary disputes between al-Shidyaq and contemporary authors such as Ibrahim al-Yâzijî and Rizqallah Hassun.[561] While such contentions were by no means unknown in literary circles in earlier periods of Arabic literature, the possibilities of print gave them a new potency and currency, encouraging them to be transmitted rapidly across long distances (Hassun lived and published in London, al-Yâzijî in Beirut, while exchanging literary squibs with al-Shidyaq in Istanbul), and bringing them immediately before a wide readership.

But the new authorial assertiveness of al-Shidyaq owed most of all to the fact that printing enabled him to earn his living from writing and publishing. Unlike most of his scribal predecessors, he was not a priest nor an imam nor a legal scholar nor a courtier nor, except for a brief period, a teacher. He was a professional author and editor—an almost completely new phenomenon in the Middle East and the Muslim world. At times, he wrote, translated, and edited for a salary, as in Malta and Egypt and during part of his stay in England; at other times, he wrote speculatively, aiming to sell the printed editions of his works, such as his travelogues, autobiography, and grammars of French and Arabic. In Istanbul, he became an entrepreneurial author-publisher and newspaper editor.

aLShidyaq's independence, however, was not so absolute that he could dispense entirely with patronage. In the Arab and Muslim worlds, as elsewhere, there had always been, among the rich and powerful, those who had attracted and rewarded writers, especially if the writers provided them with pleasing entertainment or gratified their vanity. al-Shidyaq occasionally played this traditional role, especially when seeking preferment or sponsorship: he wrote a number of odes in praise of the Bey of Tunis and other Tunisian notables, for instance, some of which were printed.[562] But the power of the press offered scope for a new kind of patronage: it could provide literature and information not just to gratify a ruler, but to be disseminated on his behalf, to promote his wider aims and interests—in other words, propaganda. al-Shidyaq became aware of this at an early stage in his career, when he worked for the official Egyptian gazette, al-Waqa'r al-Misriyah, which promoted the policies of the Egyptian ruler Muhammad 'All and which he later sarcastically dubbed a mamdah, or praise-factory.[563] When he had his own newspaper in Istanbul, he was under the patronage of the Ottoman Sultan and generally supported his interests, particularly his pan-Islamic pretensions; but he also received, for much of that time, subventions from the Bey of Tunis, the Khedive of Egypt, and the Nawab of Bhopal.[564] Sometimes, of course, these interests came into conflict, and on two occasions this led to the temporary closure of the newspaper on the Sultan's orders.[565] Not only the paper, but some of the Jawa'ib Press books, also, were designed, and subsidized, to support these interests, including books written by the reformist Tunisian chief minister Khayr al-Dîn and the Nawab of Bhopal, and semi-official pro-Ottoman publications, such as the lavish album of portraits of the sultans edited by al-Shidyaq's son, Salim Faris.[566]

al-Shidyaq was generally able to balance these sources of patronage in such a way as to preserve a fair degree of independence for himself, and this was all the easier because the power of print, coupled with his unprecedented and unique skills in using it, made him indispensable to his patrons to an extent that court writers of the scribal era never were.

In conclusion, we can perhaps reiterate that al-Shidyaq personified, both in his career and in his attitudes, the dawn of a new cultural era for the Arab and Muslim worlds, in which the communications revolution caused by the printing press brought radical changes in the intellectual, political, and social life of the area. No historical account of the Middle East in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries can be adequate unless it takes into account the causes, stages, and consequences of these changes. But for this to be possible, much more must be known about the history of the presses, and the nature of what they produced, than is the case at present. The printing history and historical bibliography of the Middle East has been a shamefully neglected subject, both in comparison with equivalent studies in relation to early modern Europe, and in comparison with the study of Islamic manuscripts. The profile of the subject therefore needs to be raised, and historians, bibliographers, and librarians alike must work to rectify what remains a serious defect in our understanding of a vital aspect of the history of Muslim and Middle Eastern civilization.

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-43.jpg][Fig. 11.3. A-B (together). Autographed manuscript, dated 1850, of an appendix on qalb and ibdal in an early draft of al-Shidyaq’s Kitab al-jâsüs ’ala al-qamus, The text differs from his later published work on the subject (Sirral-layalfial-qalb wa-al-ibdal, Istanbul, 1284/1868). (Cambridge University Library, MS Or. 1446, fols. 81v-82r.)]]

[474] c.v. Findley, “Knowledge and Education in the Modern Middle East: A Compatafwe. N’ɔew:١ ’هلا The Modern Economic History of the Middle East in Its World Context, ed. G. Sabagh (Georgio Levi Della Vida Conferences, 10) (Cambridge, 1989), p. 132.

[475] Cf. R. Chartier, “General Introduction: Print Culture,” in The Culture of Print: Power and the Uses of Print in Early Modern Europe, هج K. أًةلأ ٢أةلأ١, trans. L.G. Cochrane (Cambridge; Oxford, 1989), p. 1.

[476] Findley, op. cit., p. 132.

[477] K.s. Salibi, “The Traditional Historiography of the Maronites,” in Historians of the Middle East, ed. B. Lewis and P.M. Holt (London, 1962), p. 223.

[478] Faris al-Shidyaq, alSaq ‘ala al-sâqfî-mâ huwa al-fariyaq (Paris, 1855), p. 22.

[479] Wahid Gdoura, Le debut de Timprimerie arabe a Istanbul et en Syrie: Evolution de Tenvironnement culturel (1706–1787) (Tunis, 1985), passim.

[480] G. Roper, “The Export of Arabic Books from Europe to the Middle BRISMES: Proceedings of the /989 International Conference on Europe and the Middle East, Oxford, 1989), pp. 233–66.

[481] al-Shidyaq, al-Saq, p. 34; A.H. Hourani, “Historians of Lebanon,” in Historians of the Middle East, ed. B. Lewis and P.M. Holt (London, 1962), pp. 230–32

[482] FHib di Tarrazi, Asdaq ma kan, 3 vols. (Beirut, 1948), 2:192–933 Muhammad ‘Abd al-Ghani Hasan, Ahmad Faris al-Shidyaq (Cairo, 1966), p. 33.

[483] [G.p. Badger and Faris aLShidyaq], Kitab al-muhawarah al-unsiyah h al-lughatayn al-Inkilidyah wa-al-’Arabiyah ٢جاٰلا 1840) و p. 134.

[484] al-Saq, p.3>A, ١dev:\, Muqaddimat diwan Ahmad Faris Efendi (Istanbul, n.d.), p. 2.

[485] J. Macdonald, University of Leeds, Department of Semitic Languages & Literatures [now Department of Modern Arabic Studies], Catalogue of Oriental Manuscripts, III: Arabic Mss 101–150 (59هجعا؟>١ \¥)١١, p. 128 .٦١0, < ٦؟.

[486] Top of first page, before the Bismillah.

[487] [W.F. Mavor], Sharh tabaT al-hayawan, trans. Faris al-Shidyaq (Malta, 1841), pp. 3–4.

[488] Hasan, op. cit., p. 34.

[489] M.B. Alwan, “Ahmad Faris ash-Shidyaq and the West,” Ph.D. dissertation, University of Indiana, 1970, pp. 28–29, no. 85, and pp. 226–27, nos. 13–16: ‘Imad al-Sulh, Ahmad Faris al-Shidyaq: atharuhu wa’asruhu, 2nd ed. (Beirut, 1987), pp. 251–52: A.J. Arberry, “Fresh Light on Ahmad Faris al-Shidyaq,” Islamic Culture 26/1 (1952), pp. 156–64: A. Gacek, Catalogue of the Arabic Manuscripts in the Library of the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London (London, 1981), p. 183, no. 303.

[490] al-Shidyaq, Muqaddimah, p. 4.

[491] Ahmad Faris al-Shidyaq, Kitab al-rihlah al-mawsumah bi-al-wasitah ild ma’rifat Malita wa-kashf al-mukhabba’ ‘anfunun Awrubba (1%ذلت ٦١ل٦١\ة ,١ 1867), pp. 128, 338, Ibrahim Abu-Lughod, The Arab Rediscovery of Europe: A Study in Cultural Encounters (Princeton, 1963), p. 121; Al wan, Ahmad Faris, pp. 52, 59, 79.

[492] al-Shidyaq, al-Rihlah, p. 338.

[493] Ibid., p. 337.

[494] Ahmad Faris al-Shidyaq, Kanz al-ragha’ ib fi muntakhabat al-jawa’ib, 7 vols. (Istanbul, 1288-99/1871-81), 1:154–55, 5:184–85; al-Sulh, op. cit., pp. 130و and 241, no. 1.

[495] Ahmad Faris al-Shidyaq, al-Jâsüs ‘ala al-aâmüs (Istanbul, 1299/1881), pp. 93–94.

[496] al-Sulh, op. cit., p. 132.

[497] al-Shidyaq, Muqaddimah, pp. 4, 16–17: al-Sulh, op. cit., p. 241, no. 4.

[498] al-Shidyaq, Muqaddimah, p. 4.

[499] Badger and al-Shidyaq, al-Muhawarah, p. 103: al-Shidyaq, al-Rihlah, p. 382: al-Sulh, op. cit., p. 130.

[500] al-Shidyaq, Muqaddimah, p. 4.

[501] Details of these and other activities of al-Shidyaq in Malta and Egypt are drawn from the archives of the Church Missionary Society now kept at the University of Birmingham.

[502] al-Sulh, op. cit., p. 34.

[503] al-Shidyaq, al-Saq, p. 337.

[504] Faris al-Shidyaq, al-Lafiffi kull ma’nâ tarif(Malta, 1839), pp. 298–99.

[505] Abu al-Futuh Radwan, Tarlkh Matba’at Bulaq (Cairo, 1953), p. 25, “huwa ghayahfijamal al-khatt wa-judat al-tab’r referring to the 1840 edition 0؟ Kitab al-zdri’, aw, amthal Rabbina Yasu’ al-Mas٦hwa-tafsiruha,icY\was set in these types.

[506] al-Kutub al-Muqaddasah (1857 ١لدآلةΘأا١).

[507] al-Shidyaq, al-Rihlah, pp. 306, 309 al-Sulh, op. cit., p. 73.

[508] al-Shidyaq, al-Rihlah. p. 309.

[509] riam, Marseilles (1858). Cf. Bibliotheque Nationale, Catalogue general des livres imp rimes de la Bibliotheque Nationale (Varvs, 1912), 49: co\. 930.

[510] See A. Ameuney’s (Antuniyus al-Amyünî) preface to Faris al-Shidyaq’s PoemsIQasa’id (London, 1857), p. (2).

[511] al-Sulh, op. cit., pp. 77–83.

[512] al-Shidyaq, al-Rihlah, p. 6.

[513] Mohammed B. Al wan, “The History and Publications of al-Jawa’ib Press,” MELA Notes 11 (1977), pp. 4–7. Unfortunately, the detailed bibliography of the Press’s publications, referred to in this article, does not seem to have been published.

[514] al-Shidyaq, al-Rihlah, p. 382.

[515] Badger and al-Shidyaq, al-Muhawarah, p. 103.

[516] See also al-Jawa’ib 614, quoted in al-Sulh, op. cit., p. 130.

[517] Badger and al-Shidyaq, al-Muhawarah, pp. 132–133.9.

[518] al-Shidyaq, alSaq, p. 515.

[519] al-Shidyaq, al-Rihlah, pp. 375–82.

[520] al-Shidyaq, Kanz, 1157–60.

[521] al-Shidyaq, al-Rihlah, p. 337.

[522] Badger and al-Shidyaq, al-Muhawarah, pp. 99, 102, 132: al-Shidyaq, al-Rihlah, pp. 337–78: idem, Kanz, 1:157–60.

[523] al-Shidyaq, Kanz, 1:161.

[524] al-Shidyaq, alSaq, p. 516.

[525] E.L. Eisenstein, The Printing Press as an Agent of Change: Communications and Cultural Transformations in Early Modern Europe (Cambridge, 1979), passim.

[526] Muhammad Ahmad Khalaf Allah, Ahmad Faris al-Shidyaq wa-ara'uhu al-lughawiyah wa-al-adabiyah (Cairo, 1955), p. 84.

[527] "Fares Eshediak's remarks concerning the children in the School at Cairo, of the year 1932,ε" CMS Archives: CM/O73/61.

[528] Cf. numerous reports in the CMS Archives, and in Missionary Register, 1826–53.

[529] Findley, op. cit., p. 133.

[530] al-Sulh, op. cit., pp. 132, and 241, no. 7.

[531] أ١ةآآ٦؟> ة\-ة١\\ةلاةوع, al-Bakurah al-shahiyah b nahw al-lughah al-InkilizJyah (Malta, 1836).

[532] u. ٢د١أَّلاةأ\ Dwcnsoy, Istanbul Belediye Kütüphanesi alfabetik katalog, II: Belediye ve M. Cevdet kitaplar, Arapca ve Farsca basma eserler (VsVavbX, 1954), p. 14, no. 2073.

[533] Badger and al-Shidyaq, Kitab al-muhawarah al-unsiyah (Malta, 1840).

[534] Fares Echckidiak and G. Dugat, Sanad al-rawlfi al-sarfal-Faransawi (Paris, 1854).

[535] Badi al-Zaman al-Hamadham, Maqcimat (Istanbul, 1298/1880), p. 100, colophon.

[536] Istanbul, 1287/1870. Cf. Alwan, “History,” p. 5

[537] See, for example, al-Jawd’ib 872 (1.7.1877)و p. 4, col. 2.

[538] See, for example, ibid. 932 (11.7.1878), p. 4, col. 3.

[539] See, for example, ibid. 1009 (10.6.1880), p. 4, col. 2.

[540] See price list in al-Jawa’ib 1017 (25.8.1880), p. 8, col. 2. Cf. Alwan, “History,” p. 6.

[541] See, for instance, Hamadhani, op. cit., p. 100: idem, Rasa’ll (Istanbul, 1298/1880]), p. 238; Abu Muhammad al-Qasim ibn ‘Alî al-Harîrî, Kitab durrat ’ ‘ awham al-khawâşş (Istanbul, 1299/1881), p. 257, where Ms copies are identified and differences mentioned. Cf. al-Sulh, op. cit., p. 132.

[542] E.g., al-Lafif, p. 299: al-Saq, p. vii.

[543] E.g., Farhat, op. cit. (the list is not present in all copies); al-Shidyaq, al-Rihlah, pp. 387–88: Mikhâ’îl ‘Abd al-Sayyid al-Mişrî, Sulwan al-shâjî ft al-radd ‘ala Ibrahim al-Yazifi (Istanbul, 1289/1872)و after p. 110.

[544] al-Bakitrah (Malta, 1836: Istanbul, 1881): al-Lafif(Malta, 1839: Istanbul, 1881); Kitab al-salawat

al-‘ümmah (Book of Common Prayer) (Malta, 18403 London, 1850); al-Rihlah (Tunis, 1867: Istanbul, 1881): Ghunyat al-talib wa-munyat al-raghib (Istanbul, 1872/1888).

[545] Cf. lists and announcements in al-Jawa’ib.

[546] al-Shidyaq, alSaq, book 2, ch. 3.

[547] Badger and al-Shidyaq, al-Muhawarah, pp. 3–4.

[548] Muştala al-Shihabi, al-Mustalahal al-‘ilmiyahfial-lughah ül-’Arabîyah, 2nd ed. (Damascus, 1965), p. 50: Hasan, op. cit., p. 144: Alwan, “Ahmad Faris,” 210–11.

[549] List of publications available inside front wrapper of Abu Muhammad Ja’far al-Sarraj’s Kitab rnasari’ al-‘ushshaq (Istanbul, 1301/1883).

[550] E.g., al-Shidyaq, al-Jâsüs.

[551] Eisenstein, op. cit., p. 106.

[552] E.g., Hamadhanl, Rasftil, 1880.

[553] al-Shidyaq, al-Lafif, pp. 4–5.

[554] Alwan, “History,” p. 7.

[555] Eisenstein, op. cit., p. 105.

[556] al-Sulh, op. cit., p. 131.

[557] LA. Haywood, Modern Arabic Literature, 7500–7970 (London, 1971), p. 53.

[558] E.g., in al-Saq, pp. 75, 230, etc.

[559] Eisenstein, op. cit., p. 230.

[560] Cf. ibid., and references there cited.

[561] Alwan, “Ahmad Faris,” pp. 64–65.

[562] ¥ﻪاًﺍ’١ﻩ ﺟﺔ ؟>١ﻩﻩلﻪ٩, Qasidah yumdah jiha Ahmad Bash Wall Mamlakat Tunis (Paris, 1851); idem, Poemslöasâ’id.

[563] al-Shidyaq, al-Sâq, p. 255. Cf. Alwan, ‘Ahmad Faris,” p. 41.

[564] Alwan, “Ahmad Faris,” pp. 64–65.

[565] G.p. Badger, “Arabic Journalism,” The Academy 20/497 (1881), p. 3663 idem, “The Press of aTJawdibr ibid. 20/503 (1881), p. 473: Alwan, “History,” p. 5.

[566] Abda’ mâ kân fl suwar Salatin Al ‘ Uthmân/Album des souverains ottomans, ed. Salim Faris (Istanbul, 1188531]).

 12. The Book in the Modern Arab World: The Cases of Lebanon and Egypt

George N. Atiyeh

The book is not only a vehicle of communication, it is first and foremost the outstanding expression and reflection of a culture. The role and position of the book in a society is bound to the nature, historical circumstances, and psychological configurations of that society. In fact, there is no single pattern that applies to all societies outside the common elements that characterize the human race as a whole, and books are no exception. When one considers the role and position of the book in the Arab world, one needs to take into account the above factors, and bear in mind the basic differences that exist between Western and Arab circumstances and the different forces that have gone into play in the Arab world during the modem and contemporary periods. These forces, different in strength and orientation, while bringing the West closer to the Arab world in certain respects, have been unable to eliminate the basic differences between the two. I do not agree with the racist slogan of Kipling that West is West and East is East and the twain will never meet; I believe that there is a continuous and fundamental attraction between the two, regardless of their differences. The story of the book in the Arab world is an expression of this attraction.

In the Arab world, the art of printing, publishing, and distribution of books on a large scale among all classes and among young and old approached the European level and acquired some semblance of maturity almost four centuries after Gutenberg’s invention. Part of the gap created by time and technology has been filled in some Arab countries, yet there is still a long way to go to bridge the gap completely. Unfortunately many of those, who deal with the book have not always been able to keep what was good in the manuscript era, in terms of scholarship, and take full advantage of what is good in the printing age.

Historically speaking, the Arabic printed book appeared first in Europe, in Italy.[567] Other European countries soon followed suit, such as Holland, France, England, and Germany. The Arabic printed book did not see the light of day in the Arab world until 1706. With this in mind, I will try to survey the development of book production and dissemination, and to examine the role played by books in the renaissance of the Arab world, singling out some outstanding examples that were signs of or landmarks in the generation of new trends or cultural orientations.

The Arab world covers four great geographic regions, North Africa and the Nile Valley on the African continent, and the Arabian peninsula and the Fertile Crescent in Western Asia. This being a large area to cover in a short essay, I will limit myself to surveying the two countries that were and remain pioneers in book production, namely, Lebanon and Egypt. Although in the recent past and at present other Arab countries have been playing an increasingly important role, the roles of Lebanon and Egypt were and remain seminal as far as printed books are concerned.

Intellectually, the modern era in the Arab world experienced, in its early stages, the rise of a number of religious, cultural, and political movements directed at the regeneration of Islam, and also aiming at social and political reforms. Some were fundamentalist, although not radical, in approach, such as the Wahhabi movement in the Arabian Peninsula, and the Senusiyah in Libya. Others were less fundamentalist but still religiously inspired, such as the reformist movement of Khayr al-Dîn in Tunis, and the Salaflyah in Morocco. The common denominator among these movements was regeneration or reform, yet the movements took different forms, approaches, speeds, and goals. In Lebanon and Egypt, contact with the West brought with it a variety of movements, a search for new identities, nationalism, rationalism, and secularism, which grew up side by side with religious and conservative traditionalism.

Lebanon and Egypt had something in common that provided them with certain advantages over other Arab countries. Both had continuous early contact with the West, and during Ottoman rule they shared a certain freedom due to the absence or relaxation of Ottoman control. The Ottoman colonial power, which began in 1516—more or less at the same time as the first Arabic book was printed in Fano, Italy, in 1514—was weakened when Muhammad ‘All (1805–49) assumed power in Egypt in 1805, and Mount Lebanon assumed certain autonomy under Bashir 11 (1789–1840). Lebanese autonomy grew under the Mutasarrinyah (1864–1914), and provided the Lebanese with more freedom to run their own affairs.

Variation in the degree of control from province to province in the Ottoman Empire and the extent of contact with the West favored some areas above others in providing an environment favorable to cultural growth and the development of particular modernizing situations. Lebanon and Egypt were thus favored. Among the elements that went into the making of modernity were the influence of Western education on literary, political, and social life: the liberation of man’s mind to pursue the truth on his own advocated by a number of progressive intellectuals; and a new world outlook. The role of the book in this development was crucial. In foct, the book helped loosen the strangle-hold of the ‘ulama’, the religious learned men, over education. In most of the Ottoman Empire, including the Arab world, the ‘ulama’ opposed the introduction of printing. It was only in 1727 that the use of the printing press for printing in Arabic script was permitted, and that was only for the production of non-religious materials. Belief in Islam’s superiority over other religions, because the Koran is God’s eternal word, and veneration of the Arabic language as the medium for revealing the word of God, made the ‘ulama’, the Sultan, and others oppose the use of a metal object, coming from Christendom, to reproduce the honored language of revelation. There were certainly other reasons for this opposition, but those listed above were the weightiest ones. Here one wonders if the absence of printing was not an important element in the late arrival of modernism and modern technology to the Empire. Most of the Empire was rather slower in the assimilation and circulation of the new learning, leaving the Arab world far behind the West in terms of progress. Lebanon and Egypt were the first to realize this and to take advantage of the printing press.

Lebanese commercial and educational relations with the West began in the late sixteenth century, yet the printing of books, first introduced by the Christians of Lebanon and Syria, took until the nineteenth century to achieve significant consequences, inasmuch as most of what was printed early on were religious texts meant to teach, mainly to strengthen and defend the faith. One can easily state that the printing of books in that early period had little effect on the modernization process or on raising the level of culture on a large scale. The seeds of progress, however, were planted.

In an era when the manuscript was the main carrier of information and ideas, one needed to be wealthy in order to afford books. The shop of the warraq (a man who made a profession of transcribing books) became rare, and those few restless spirits who seek knowledge in every age had only church or mosque libraries to resort to. Knowledge had a mystique of its own, and people who possessed it, or owned the tools to acquire it, did not let it go out except sparingly, or often not at all. The dissemination of books on a wide scale did not prevail until the later decades of the nineteenth century when printing with movable type had reached most of the Arab countries and a large reading public became attracted to books. Iraq, for example, had its first movable type press only in 1860 Tunis in 1861, and Morocco in 1912.[568]

It is obvious that there is a symbiotic relationship between books and education. The spread of schools and education in the nineteenth century was accompanied by the development of book production. Like education, book production started hesitantly in the eighteenth century and then began working its way steadily through stages of adaptation and translation, into a stage of more creativity, independence, variation, and much wider influence. Let US look at this process by focusing on the two countries that are most representative of this phenomenon. But before we do that, it should be noted that when we talk about the private publishing that became common at the end of the nineteenth century, we don’t mean publishing houses in the Western sense. Publishing was done either by printing presses that were established primarily for printing books, or by bookstores that were established exclusively for selling books then added publishing and distribution to their activities. What they published, they did, most of the time, at the expense of the author, with little or no control over quality of scholarship or organization of the materials. The gradual move from matbcTah (press) and maktabah (bookstore) to dar (publishing house) was to become fully fledged only in the twentieth century.

 Lebanon and the Book

Printing in Arabic movable type was introduced into Lebanon[569] as early as 1610, in the Maronite monastery of St. Anthony, located in Quzhayya, in North Lebanon, not far from the famous cedars of Lebanon. Only one book was produced in the short life of this pioneering endeavor. It was an Arabic language Psalter, but in a Karshum[570] typeface. Lebanon had to wait until 1734 for a second and more lasting venture.

During the seventeenth century, the light of learning was kept dimly burning mostly by a group of Maronite clergy who had received education in the Maronite College in Rome. Having developed there a greater sense for scholarship, they were able to inject a new vitality into their church and environment. Outside the Maronite community, there were also glimmers of intellectual and literary life, reflected in a weak but persistent manuscript tradition. Copying of books and calligraphy were very much present among Muslim scholars in different parts of what is now Lebanon, such as in Tripoli and Jabal ‘Amil,[571] as well as in the monasteries, where bishops and patriarchs encouraged their monks to copy books carefully and beautifully. Books were treated, by those who could afford them, judiciously and with the full respect usually afforded to precious things.

During the eighteenth century, education and books received a boost from the establishment of new schools. The French Jesuits established a school in ‘Ayn Tura (1728), and Maronite colleges were established in Zgharta (1735), and ‘Ayn Warqa (1789), which played a prominent role in advancing education and scholarship. The growing need for books was satisfied by publishing them in Europe. They were mostly books in liturgy, teaching language, some classics, and anthologies of pious and ascetic works.

The first printing press that advanced the cause of book production in the Arab world was the one set up by ‘Abdallah Zakhir (1684–1748). Zakhir came to Lebanon from Aleppo, Syria, after the split within the Antiochian Orthodox Church (ca. 1724) and his becoming an advocate of Greek Catholicism. In Aleppo, Zakhir had worked for Patriarch Athanathios Dabbas (1685–1724), who was the first in the Arab world to establish a press with Arabic movable type (1706). In 1723, Zakhir, a skilled artisan and intellectual, established his own press at the monastery of Yuhanna al-Sabigh, in the town of Shuwayr, in the Kisrwan district. The setting up of this press met the needs of a growing number of readers and of Maronite Christians who began replacing the Syriac language used in their speech, liturgy, and writing with Arabic.

Because of its clear and beautiful type, Zakhir's press became a model for the St. George Orthodox Press, established in Beirut in 1751. Zakhir himself had cut two new typefaces, both more elegant and closer to the rounder and lighter Naskhi style of writing. In fact, by adopting Arabic type and improving the typeface, Zakhir broadened the horizons for the book in the Arab world. The intellectual content of the books produced by these two pioneering presses was mainly theological and devotional in nature. Neither the worldly literature of Europe nor its political and artistic ideas seem to have had any great impact on the subjects of the books. Almost all had either a religious or a linguistic theme. Both the Shuwayr and St. George presses printed the Psalms, which were used not only as a prayer book to be recited during liturgy, but also as a textbook for learning Arabic. The fact that the Psalms were printed fifteen times between 1610 and 1776 was a sign of the growing interest of the Christian population of Lebanon in the Arabic language.[572]

The dissemination of books was confined to religious groups, or among rich and powerful individuals who were fond of books and were attracted by the prestige that goes with amassing books in private libraries. Among the well known libraries were the Arslan family library in 'Ubay, Jirjls Şafâ's in Dayr al-Qamar, and the libraries of Dayr al-Sharfeh, Dayr al-Mukhalliş, and Dayr al-Balamand.[573]

The first half of the nineteenth century saw important political, social, and educational developments take place. The Egyptian Ibrahim Pâshâ, who occupied Syria between 1831 and 1840, started several schools. This gave a powerful impulse to national education. American missionaries set up a press in Beirut. Before moving to Beirut in 1834, the American Press was first established in Malta, where Faris al-Shidyaq, a key figure in the renaissance of Arabic books and literature, was instrumental in improving its typography by designing an attractive new Arabic typeface and by introducing many of the organizational aspects of modem book production.

The American Press of Beirut probably reached the widest audience of any nineteenth-century press in the Arab world by publishing for writers who were in the forefront of the surging literary revival, like Naşîfal-Yazîjî (1800–71) and Butrus al-Bustanl as well as for the professors at the Syrian Protestant College (now the American University of Beirut).

The American missionaries, particularly those of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, were able to attract many Lebanese and Syrians, converting them to Protestantism through their new, attractive, and serious publications. This prompted the Jesuits to counter the evangelizing activities of the Protestant missionaries by setting up their own press in 1848. In a very short time, and using new equipment, the Jesuit press was able to produce thirty books in 350 thousand copies.[574]

A look at publishing around the middle of the century would show that religious works explaining the principles of religion or dealing with spiritual contemplation were the dominant category, ailqtida’ bi-ûl-Masîh (Imitation of Christ), which was first printed by Zakhir in 1739, went into several printings. There were also many works of polemics among Catholics, Protestants, and Orthodox. Wortabefs Dalll al-şawâb ilâ sidq aiKitab (The True Guide to the Veracity of the Book), published in 1851, was one of them, as was al-Huââ al-amln fi dahd arcf al-brutastantryln (The Faithful Guide to Refuting the Opinions of the Protestants), by the Jesuit fathers.

Language textbooks were numerous, the most important of which were Bahth al-matfilib fi ‘ilm al-‘arabiyah (A Study of What is Needed to Learn the Arabic Language), which was first printed by the American Press in 1827, then went into several editions, and Majma’ aibahrayn (The Meeting of the Two Seas), by Naşîf al-Yazîjî. In history, we find Tannus al-Shidyaq’s Akhbar al-a’yân fi jabal Lubnan (The History of the Notables of Mount Lebanon) (1859), and Tarikh Salatin Bânû ‘Uthman (History of the Ottoman Sultans) (1858), by Ibrahim al-Najjâr. In geography, Cornelius van Dyke’s al-Mîr’at al-wadiyah fi al-kurah al-ardlyah (The Bright Mirror of the Terrestrial Globe) (1852) was one of several works published by the American Press. Van Dyke also published works in mathematics and geometry. It was at about this time that translations of Western novels, such as Paul et Virginie, by Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, began to appear.

This is only a sample of the books that were read or discussed in schools or in the cultural circles and societies that began to form. The book was able to improve the application of grammatical rules, set new directions for the writing of history, cultivate the mind, and bring to the fore new genres in Arabic literature.

The second half of the nineteenth century saw the extension and expansion of education and the modernization of the Arabic language. The revival of the national language inaugurated a literary renaissance which indirectly produced a nationalist consciousness and a feeling of cultural distinction between what was Arabic or Syrian and what was Ottoman. This was also reflected in the rise of non-missionary, or national, schools, colleges, and associations that invigorated cultural consciousness and national feeling.

With the progress of publishing, both of books and of serials, and a growing desire for more knowledge, the intellectual contents of books became varied and wide in scope. Gradually, the subjects turned away from the religiously didactic and language-related, to books dealing with all fields of human knowledge, inaugurating new trends in literature, politics, and the sciences. As advances in book production and the diversification of subjects and levels of scholarship took place, individually owned and run presses were sprouting up all over the place. The outstanding impact, however, came from the establishment of institutions of higher education to which presses were attached or related, and which undertook publishing and editorial programs. First came the Syrian Protestant College (now the American University of Beirut) in 1866, and then the Catholic St. Joseph University in 1874. Both competed for the minds and souls of Christians and Muslims alike. The competition was not necessarily negative in that it encouraged plurality and coexistence. Each wanted to define itself by excelling in certain specific areas. Up to the end of the century, the Catholic Press focused on the production of language and literary works, grammars, dictionaries, and chrestomathies of current and classical works. Many of these early publications are, until today, still widely used, for example, the dictionary al-Munjid.

The American University, on the other hand, took a different direction, that of the sciences. It produced books in medicine, natural sciences, astronomy, and also dictionaries. The two presses, however, were guided by strict moral and religious norms, as well as by a high standard of scholarship. They did not publish any work they thought to be of doubtful value. Furthermore, whatever was published was carefully edited and checked for correctness and presentation. In the two translations made of the Bible by the American and Catholic Presses, there was the belief that the exact and correct translation from Hebrew and Greek was not enough unless it were eloquently and clearly expressed and presented. Translation of the Bible had a considerable impact on Arab culture by making it available to the general reading public. Familiarity with the Bible was instrumental in introducing a variety of motifs and notions into modern Arabic literature.

Alongside these venerable presses, there mushroomed a number of presses that were not restrained by the above norms nor by the promptings of the state or religious institutions. Addressing themselves to a new kind of secular readership, they turned to the translation and adaptation of texts for their literary or entertainment value alone. Driven by a desire to sustain and profit from their presses and publishing activities, the many periodicals and journals that began to proliferate serialized original and translated novels, stories, and plays. These were new genres of literature, unlike what had existed previously in popular and classical Arabic works. They catered to the new crop of literate public, mostly for entertainment.[575] Some were written with a didactic purpose behind them, and most had weak plots and were full of interpolations.

The increase in the number of printing presses was due to several causes. The reading public increased greatly with the spread of education; the government was, relatively speaking, tolerant, especially when it did not feel politically threatened; and the growing number of newspapers and periodicals encouraged reading. A lurking desire for greater and surer information led to the publication of reference tools, such as encyclopedias, dictionaries, and almanacs.

The awakening of the national consciousness translated itself into editions of what were and still are called “heritage” books. This contributed not only to the emergence of modern styles in prose and poetry, but also to energizing the desire to learn more about the history of the country and its ancient cultures. In 1881, Jurjl Yanni (1856–1941) published a history of greater Syria (Tarikh Sûrfyâ), which included Lebanon. Some learned people, such as Nawfal Elias Nawfal (1812–87), began to build their own libraries of classical and other Arabic works and to publish on the history of religions and the sciences.[576]

This cultural awakening, one should emphasize, was not limited to the Christian community, but was shared by their Muslim compatriots. The most eminent expression of the awakening among the Muslims was the creation of al-Maqasid Benevolent Society, which sponsored the establishment of schools in Beirut and the surrounding areas. Among the most distinguished authors and scholars who played a role in its foundation and development v’s al-Shaykh Yüsüf al-AsIr (1815–89),[577] a judge who authored many books and articles on jurisprudence and languages.[578] Because of his great linguistic expertise, he was called upon to help in the translation of the Bible into Arabic. There was also al-Shaykh Ibrahim al-Ahdab (1826–91), another judge and great linguist, and ‘Abd al-Qadir al-Qabbanl (1847–1935), the founder of the newspaper Thamarat al-funun, and a member of al-Funün Society, which should be given credit for buying a press and sponsoring the publication of many books.

By the end of the nineteenth century, Beirut and the rest of Lebanon had more than twenty presses, in addition to the American and Catholic presses. Their output reached several thousand titles and covered all branches of human knowledge. Subject-wise, the end of the century saw the prevalence of humanistic over religious topics; nonetheless, the diversity of subjects was surprising. Topics included the principles of logic, philosophy, literature, natural sciences, history, geography, religious dogma, spiritual readings, rituals, ethics, popular literature, and the newly introduced genres of literature, the novel and the play.

Unlike other Arab countries, the growth of the book industry and the development of printing were carried out by private individuals and institutions, and not by the government. The Lebanese were able to create new fonts, and improve the quality of books and printing in general. Yet books were not always up to good standards in terms of indexing, annotations, structure of the contents, and extent of typographical errors.

The dissemination of books outside the schools was not highly organized. The most common way to advertise a new book, or books in general, was on the book's own cover or last page.[579] In fact, books were sold in general stores, or by the authors themselves. Financing was provided by the author, and at times was subsidized by an association, such as the Muslim al-Funun Society or by a friend of the author.[580]

To publish books, newspapers, and periodicals, one needed to get a permit from the government, especially in Beirut. Because of its growing commercial and educational importance, Beirut was the capital of an Ottoman province (wilayah) in 1888. Until then it had been subordinate to the province of Damascus. The first Ottoman printing law was decreed on 6 January 1857. It was guided by two principles: licensing to publish and prior censorship of all publications. In Lebanon, the effects of this law were slight at first. The presses operated by the various Christian sects were virtually the only ones until the 18705. The Ottoman authorities did not see a great need to censor their publications because they did not present any challenge to the authorities. As of 1871, the position of the maktubji[581] was given greater authority. The occupant of this position was the editor of the official gazette and other government publications, as well as being the censor. In 1885, when exercise of censorship became stricter, books were required to be sent to Istanbul for approval before publication. This prompted many authors to send their books to Cairo for publication, instead. Many of the authors and intellectuals themselves began to move to Egypt during 'Abd al-Hamid the Second's (1876–1908) rule, as it became difficult to publish under the stricter governmental censorship. There were other causes why Syrian and Lebanese authors, journalists, and political activists moved to the Egyptian cities of Cairo and Alexandria.[582] Publishing in the Arab world was greatly invigorated through many decades by this convergence of Syrians and Egyptians. The interaction between Lebanese and Syrian expatriates or immigrants and Egyptian intellectuals produced exciting and trend-setting publications in which the overriding passions expressed by the intellectuals and political activists was the challenge of modernity, that is, the transformation of a “backward” Arab world into a modern one. As an example, one can give the publications of Farah Antun’s Ibn Rushd wa-falsafatuh (Averroes and His Philosophy) (Alexandria, 1903), in which he advocated rationalism and secularism, and seemingly implied that Islam checked all rational inquiry and all science. These were views that contrasted sharply with the prevalent intellectual and religious atmosphere in Egypt. A controversy between Antun and one of the most enlightened Muslim scholars, Muhammad

I ensued. ‘Abduh, in his work al-Islam wa-al-Nasraniyah ma’a al-’Hm ‘ — ‘ (Islam and Christianity on Science and Civilization) (Cairo, 1902), defended Islam and maintained that Christianity was intolerant by nature and that modern European civilization developed when Europe liberated itself from Christianity. At the end of the century, the endeavors of both the Syrians and the Egyptians converged together to give a great boost to book publishing.

The Young Turk revolution of 1908 broadened for a short period the horizon of freedom. All kinds of associations and political clubs were formed and the number of presses increased. With the growth of higher education at all levels and greater communication with the West, Lebanon entered the first decade of the twentieth century with ample freedom and a greater acceptance of scientific values. But no sooner did Turkey enter the First World War than Mount Lebanon lost its autonomy as well as its intellectual vitality. In 1920, under the French occupation which followed the departure of the Turks, Lebanon regained a great deal of its publishing vitality. The American and Catholic presses reequipped themselves with modern machines from Europe and the United States. In 1927, the Catholic Press began the publication of the monumental series Bibliotheca Arabica Scholasticorum, in addition to its many religious and educational publications. Throughout the following decades, it remained one of the most important publishers. It published books not only for Lebanese authors, but also for scholars and institutions around the world, including such prestigious institutions as L’Ecole des Langues Orientales, of Paris, and the Warburg Institute, of London. Likewise, its publications were disseminated all over the Arab world, Europe, and the Americas. The dictionary of Father Ma’lûf, al-Munjid, the grammar of Rashid aLShartanl, Mabadi’ al-‘Arablyah, and the literary chrestomathy of Luis Cheikho, Majani al-adab were sent by the thousands to Cairo, the great marketplace for Arabic books.

The American Press alone published 462 books in 143,073 volumes in 1922, these included Bibles in all sizes and formats, religious, educational, and literary works, as well as series in archaeology, the natural sciences, and oriental studies. Its books were disseminated worldwide.[583]

The 19405 saw the rise of individually owned and run publishing houses. The age of dar, a publishing house that finances its own publications and launches them into the marketplace, arrived in Lebanon. Several such houses were established, among which Dar al-Makshuf published mostly in literature, and Dar Şadir-Rîhânî diversified its publications into the fields of law, sociology, history, and the classics. Dar al-‘Hm lil-Malayln (Knowledge for the Millions Publishing House) was another publisher of works on varying topics. Its English-Arabic dictionary, al-Mawrid, is one of the most widely circulated.

Not all the publishers were in Beirut; there were several outside that belonged to religious congregations and played an important role in the history of the book in Lebanon. They were, in a way, heirs to the scholarly traditions of the Lebanese monasteries. The most important ones were al-Matba’ah al-Bülîsîyah, al-Mukhallişlyah Press, and the press of the Lebanese Mission.

The publishing of books and serials reached its peak after the Egyptian Revolution of 1952. The nationalization of the book industry in Egypt, the greater, sometimes chaotic, freedom in Lebanon, and the long tradidion in printing turned Beirut into the Mecca of publishing in and for the Arab world.

In fact, the Arab, and not the Lebanese market, became the main factor in the growth of the book industry. With the opening of the rich markets in the Arabian peninsula, the focus of interest became set on that part of the world, with its high demand for textbooks, children’s books, and religious works. During the 19705, the number of publishing houses increased tremendously. Most specialized in social, political, or religious publications, and supported the ideological position of one group or another. Beirut became the publishing capital for dissident groups, which flocked to it from all over the Arab world. Books on socialism, nationalism, and secularism were produced for the educated class by these ideological publishers. A great many titles dealt with the Palestine question and the Arab-Israeli conflict, as well as with solutions to the economic and social problems of the region. Literary works, whether creative, such as poetry or fiction, or literary criticism, equaled all other classes in number. Some poets, such as Nizar Qabbam, and novelists, such Ghadah al-Samman, established publishing houses exclusively for publishing their own works, which were popular all over the Arab world.

Scholarly publishing did not suffer greatly as a result of the changes in interests and directions. New universities, such as the Lebanese, Arab, and Holy Spirit (Kaslik) Universities, had successful publications, though they were limited in scope.

Production of new dictionaries and reprinting of old ones became a major industry, but also a source of confusion regarding new terminology in the sciences. Authors who could not publish in their own countries, and those who wanted good production and wide distribution, relied on Lebanese publishers. The ease and convenience of publishing in Lebanon attracted even the most eminent writers in the Arab world. They contracted with Lebanese publishers to reprint and distribute their works. Najib Mahfüz’s Awlad hciratina was serialized in Egypt, but was printed in book form only in Lebanon, because its publication in book form was prohibited in Egypt. It presented the Prophet Muhammad and other prophets in a manner unacceptable to the ‘ulama’. Even during its civil war of 1975–91, Lebanon remained a major center of publishing, although several other Arab countries established their own publishing houses. Lebanon was also among the first to mount book fairs, now a popular phenomenon in all Arab countries. A sobering fact about Lebanon, however, is that it is common to find there pirated books, and unscholarly editions and reprints of the classics, often with the critical apparatus removed, along with the claim that these are new editions.

 The Book in Egypt

The decisive events in the modern and contemporary history of Egypt are the French occupation in 1798; the rise of Muhammad All (1805): the British occupation and the ‘Urâbî revolution (1882); the 1919 revolution and the struggle for independence (this is a period historians like to refer to as the liberal era); the 1952 revolution; and the Camp David agreement (1979). Each of these eו ents had a great impact on the book in Egypt.

The first printing presses with movable type came to Egypt in 1798, brought by Napoleon Bonaparte during his invasion of Egypt. Accompanied by fifty savants, historians, geographers, engineers, linguists, and physicians. Napoleon claimed that the presses he brought were to help in making available the books describing Egypt, which his scholars were supposed to and did write. However, the first book printed was not written by the scholars; it was Amthal Luqmcin al-hakim (The Proverbs of Luqman), published by the Orientalist Jean Joseph Marcel. La Description de !’Egypt, the result of the investigations of the scholars brought by Napoleon, was printed long after his armies had left Egypt in 1801. In fact, his publication program was aimed at trying to identify the principles of the French Revolution with Islam. A few Egyptian scholars, their curiosity aroused, visited the press and asked questions on how it could affect culture, but the French impact on Egypt as a whole was only gradually and indirectly felt after the French departure.

The manuscript era did not begin to cede ground until Muhammad ‘All established, in or about 1822, the famous Bulaq Press.[584] Directed first bו Nicholas al-MasabkJ (d. 1830), who was of Lebanese origin, the press soon became the symbol of modernization in the Arab world. After taking office. Muhammad ‘Al realized that the key to successfully opposing the might of the Ottoman Empire and aggressive Europeans like Napoleon lay in education along Western lines, particularly in practical, technical subjects. Between 1822 and 1842, the press at Bulaq published 243 titles in Arabic. Turkish, and Persian. A glance at the titles shows clearly where Muhammad ‘All’s interest was: forty-eight were on military and naval subjects. He had seen and noted how successful the modern arms of the French had been against the antiquated arms and methods of the Mamluks. It should be noted, however, that the books published in Egypt during the first half of the century were not all in militan' or applied sciences; 55.7 percent were in the humanities, the pure and applied sciences constituted only 27.7 percent, and the social sciences 25.1 percent.[585]

In order to prepare Egyptians for professional schools, and to train officials and translators, Muhammad Al sent students to Europe to study typography, among other things. He also opened several schools, the most famous of which was the school of languages (Madrasat al-alsun). opened in 1836. In 1837 he appointed as its head Rifa'ah Rafi' al-Tahtawi (1801–73). Over the next twenty years, al-Tahtawf wrote or translated thirty-eight books in different subjects, including geography, history, Greek philosophy, as well as military science. Most of these were published by the Bulaq Press. al-Tahtawi had lived in Paris for five years. His book, Takhlis al-Ibriz ilâ talkhis Banz, contains many observations on the manners and customs of the French. The importance of this work, published by Bulaq, resides in telling US how the men who took part in the early modernization of Egypt under Muhammad 'All thought and felt, and the impact of nineteenth-century Europe on a traditionally educated Muslim. The French, al-Tahtawi states in his book, compose books on all subjects, even on such subjects as cooking, which means that even craftsmen must know how to read in order to acquire a complete knowledge of their craft.

Aware that the system of schools he had established could not function without books, Muhammad 'Al bought several presses and attached them to the schools he had founded, such as the Abu Zi'bil Press, attached to the school of medicine.

Bulaq books are sought after now and valued as important early imprints. There were, however, criticisms leveled against their production. The title pages were not independently presented (they were crammed with long introductions inside of which the title and author's name were inserted without distinguishing them visibly from the rest of the text) and the beginnings of new chapters were often not distinguished by larger or different types, scripts, or colors. It was similar, in these respects, to the way manuscripts were produced. Apparently, it was difficult to jump from the manuscript age to the age of printing all at once. The Bulaq printed books, nonetheless, were clear and easy to read, and they had hardly any typographical errors.

Unlike in Lebanon, the early presses in Egypt were owned and run by the government. Private presses hardly existed in Egypt. We know of an ‘Abd al-Raziq press established in 1837,[586] but there is no evidence that it contributed to book publishing. The role of the private sector was to come later. The social and cultural situation in Egypt around 1840 was not ready yet for the development of private publishing, especially in light of the fact that the Bulaq Press welcomed the printing of non-govemmental books at the expense of their authors for reasonable prices,[587] and that the general public was not yet enlightened enough on the value of books.

The original commitment of the Bulaq Press was to government publications, such as annual reports and the official gazette, al-Waqcdi’ al-Mişrîyah. It nevertheless published a huge number of books in all fields, but mostly in those that conformed or coincided with the ideas of Muhammad ‘All for the revival of Egypt. They included books in the military sciences, textbooks, and books on religious and literary subjects, as well as dictionaries. In fact, the first book ever printed there was an Italian-Arabic dictionary. There were also books that might be considered encyclopedias, such as Ma’rifatnameh, in Turkish, and popular works, such as the One Thousand and One Nights and Lata’if Nasr al-Dîn Khöjâ (The Witty Jokes of Naşr al-Din Khoja).

Bulaq books were often given as gifts by Muhammad ‘All to European royalty or to friends and visitors. They were, in fact, read more outside than inside of Egypt. Apparently, the press did not have a bookstore attached to it. Edward Lane, who visited Egypt between 1833 and 1835 and wrote a detailed account of his stay there, does not mention that he himself had seen one.[588] We know, however, that there were a few bookstores in different parts of the city.[589] A bookstore for Bulaq books was established around 1836, yet the dissemination of books among the population was extremely limited.

The fortunes of the Bulaq Press fluctuated after the death of Muhammad ‘All. In 1862, Sa’îd Pâshâ (1854–63), the ruler of Egypt, realizing that the press had fallen on hard times, donated it to ‘Abd al-Rahman Rushdi on the condition that he would keep printing the laws and the forms needed for government operations. Twenty years later, the press reverted to the government and several enhancements were introduced in equipment and typefaces to make it one of the best in Egypt. In spite of its heavy emphasis on military sciences and textbooks, the influence of the Bulaq Press was great in that it represented a leap from the Middle Ages into the modem age. In the first place, it transformed the way books were produced, making them available cheaply, on a large scale, and in solid and adequate binding. In addition to its service to education, it encouraged more people to read and own books. Likewise, it encouraged more people to publish, thus setting in motion the renaissance of Egypt. As was the case in Lebanon, the translation of books from Western languages enriched the Arabic language by the coining of new words and the resuscitation of others. More importantly, it was the carrier of new ideas and methodologies. In a way, it upset the traditional trend then represented by al-Azhar. The books published by that old institution were not only limited in scope, they were rife with glosses and convoluted language full of rhetoric.

The expansion of book publishing after Muhammad ‘All continued to advance as the private sector, especially bookstores, began to assume the initiative, and the educated public increased in number, particularly during the rule of Ismâ’îl (1863–79). Book shops becoming publishers is a pattern that remains alive until now. It was during Ismâ’H’s rule that the Egyptian National Library was established. There was a hiatus when the number and type of books published was reduced, during the rule of Tawfiq (1879–92)₉ due to a new law restricting publications. As for scholarly publishing, which began to pick up during the second half of the century, special mention should be made of the Institut Francais de lArcheologie Orientale du Caire, founded in 1881 by Gaston Masparo. Since 1900, the Institut has been its own publisher, and also acted for several decades as publisher to the Egyptian Antiquities Service, the Coptic Archaeological Society, the Egyptian Geographical Society, and the illustrious Institut d’Egypte.[590]

With the growth of the newspaper and periodical publishing, the printing presses were improved, especially at the beginning of the British occupation and during the rise of the nationalist movement that sought independence for Egypt. The British occupation, in certain ways, provided more freedom of expression, as long as it did not conflict with Britain’s imperial policies. Egypt was set on its way to becoming the intellectual and publishing leader of the Arab world. This was done with some significant assistance from the Lebanese and Syrian intellectuals and entrepreneurs who began to immigrate to Cairo and Alexandria.

The role played by the Syrians (al-Shawam) in the book and publishing industries was a major one. One of the earliest private publishing houses was established by an Egyptianized Syrian, Ahmad al-Bâbî al-Halabl, in 1859. In 1894, al-Hilal Bookstore, later called Dar al-Hilal, was established, shortly after the founding of al-Hilal magazine (1892) by Jurjl Zaydan. Dar al-Hilal issued hundreds of books by famous Arab and non-Arab authors in all subjects, and they were distributed all over the world, wherever there were Arabic readers or institutions with Arab studies. One of the most influential presses, Najib Mitrfs Dar al-Ma’arif, played a leading role, together with al-Manar Press, founded by Rashid Rida, the editor and publisher of al-Manar magazine. Another important bookstore and publisher was Yusuf Tuma al-Bustanfs The Arab Bookstore. These presses and bookstores published many books by the Lebanese and Syrian intellectuals who emigrated to Egypt and got involved with their Egyptian counterparts in the reform movements that were characteristic of the Arab awakening. In addition to making available to a wide readership the ideas and methods of the West, they wrote and published on subjects not tackled before, such as Jurjl Zaydan’s book on Tarikh al-lughah al-‘arabiyah (History of the Arabic Language); Ibrahim al-Yazîjî’s Taqwlm al-lisan al-‘arabî (Rectification of the Arabic Tongue); Sulayman al-Bustânî’s translation of Homer’s Iliad, with an introduction that remains until now a source of inspiration for many literary critics; and Khalil Mutran, who introduced dialogue and unity of structure into Arabic poetry.

By the end of the nineteenth century, Egyptian book production had increased tenfold. In her bibliography on books published in Egypt during the nineteenth century, ’Ayidah Nuşayr (Nossair) lists 9,782 works under 107 subject headings. Among them are 2,762 titles dealing with religious subjects, 2,015 in literature, 1,372 in social sciences, 1,092 in history, 705 in philosophy, and only 242 in the natural sciences. Textbooks numbered 372.

Cairo, with its cosmopolitan environment and high rate of literacy compared to most Arab cities, grew into a giant book market and intellectual center. The period between the 1920s and 1952 is dubbed correctly by many scholars as the liberal age in Egypt. It was a period in which the great writers, such as Taha Hussein, Ahmad Lutfi al-Sayyid, Mahmud ‘Abbas al-Aqqad, Tawfiq al-Hakim, and Ahmad Amm, among others, wrote, theorized on literary criticism, and proposed new orientations for social development in a flowing and elegant language. This was the period that saw the publication of two of the most controversial works in the contemporary history of the Arab world.

In his Fl alshi’r al-jâhilî (On Pre-Islamic Poetry), Taha Hussein, while trying to prove that pre-Islamic poetry was really non pre-Islamic, but had been forged in the post-Islamic period, advocated the use of Cartesian methodology, a method that, if applied to the texts of religion, might cast doubt on their authenticity. In al-Islam wa-uşül al-hukm (Islam and the Principles of Government), ‘Â1Î ‘Abd al-Raziq advocated the idea that the caliphate is not a necessary part of Islam. The implication of this was to sanctify the establishment of a secular state. Rebuttal of these two books was so intense that an entire bibliography could be devoted-to the topic.

This period also saw new endeavors to improve the quality of books. One of the most significant enterprises was the non-profit organization Lajnat al-Ta’llf wa-al-Tarjamah wa-al-Nashr (The Committee for Writing, Translation, and Publishing), directed by a number of eminent intellectuals who felt the need to compensate for the low cultural level of commerciai publishing. The private sector was motivated mostly by profit, which publishers found highly accessible by issuing books of religious nature or pulp fiction. The prominence of religious and heritage books was strengthened by the establishment of the Dar al-‘Ulûm Faculty at al-Azhar University, and by an increasing number of Islamic associations advocating religion as the best defense against colonialism, political as well as cultural. Islamic heritage books and religious pamphleteering became strongly represented on the book publishing scene and so remain until the present time.

With the coming of the 1952 revolution, the scene changed dramatically. Nasser’s Philosophy of the Revolution and al-Mithaa (Charter) of the Arab Socialist Union (the party of the government), set in motion (and turmoil) the nationalization of the publishing industry, in order to help the society transform itself rapidly into a socialist one. Dar al-Hilal, Dar al-Ahram, and Dar al-Ma’arif were taken over by the government, but were given semi-autonomous status. A massive publishing organization was created, al-Mu’assasah al-‘Ammah lil-Ta’lîf wa-al-Nashr (the General Authority for Writing and Publishing), and a governmental plan was drawn. The plan consisted of publishing books and periodicals that it was thought would meet the cultural, literary, political, social, scientific, and religious needs of Egypt. Publishing was to deal with social questions and the Arab revolution, and also with providing Arab libraries with the best in Arab and world heritage. Translations of the best works in world literature were to be undertaken (the One Thousand Books Project), but would not be limited to Western works; African, Asiatic, and Latin American titles would also be inc! uded.[591]

In 1972, al-Hay’ah al-Misryah al-‘Âmmah lü-Kitâb (the General Egyptian Book Organization, or GEBO) replaced the General Authority for Writing and Publishing. It was defined as a non-profit enterprise. All book-related activities, including the National Library and the National Archives, were consolidated and placed under its wings. Among the many activities GEBO now sponsors is an annual international book fair during the last week of January.

At present, the Egyptian government, through GEBO and the semi-autonomous publishing giants of Dar al-Ahram, Dar al-Hilal, and Dar al-Ma arif, remains the largest publisher, in spite of the fact that there is little intervention in the publishing plans of these institutions and the fact that commercial private publishing has been on the increase since President Sadat’s open-door policy was established.

 The Agonies of the Arabic Book

I would have liked to talk about the ecstatic pleasure one derives from the many good works published all over the Arab world, but given the overwhelming number of problems that afflict the Arabic book, one cannot gloss over the glaring reality. Although I will deal mostly with the Egyptian book, the problems are not limited to that country; they apply to most Arab countries, in varying degrees.

The problems facing the book in Egypt may be described as technological, economic, political, and organizational. The four are naturally interrelated and need to be looked at jointly. While struggling with its Arab socialism experiment, Egypt sought and was able to raise the standard of living of its masses. The book was considered one of the basic tools for cultural, economic, and social development. Because of several factors, however, the book suffered on many fronts in terms of quality and dissemination. Tharwat ‘Ukashah, the minister of culture, in a statement made in 1967 stated that, “We find it [the book), dangerously behind in spite of the many efforts, forces, allocated funds, and material and moral encouragement.”[592]

Its new socialized structure alienated Egypt from other Arab countries culturally, and from the technological revolution in printing that was taking place in the 1970s. The decline of book publishing in Cairo took place at the same time as Lebanese publishers were modernizing their equipment and becoming big and efficient distributors of books all over the Arab world. Beirut became the Arab publishing capital, replacing Cairo. The absence of clear copyright laws, and the inconsistent implementation thereof, contributed to the problems in Cairo. Beirut became the beneficiary and the culprit in most cases of copyright violations. Several of Beirut’s publishers excelled in book piracy, a matter morally reprehensible, but hailed by many as making available, and cheaply, works that would not have been available otherwise.

Politics was another factor that influenced the relative decline in book production. Egypt was alienated during the time of the Nasser regime from Saudi Arabia and Tunisia, both big markets for Egyptian books, and from the rest of the Arab world after the Camp David Agreement (1979), when it was boycotted by the members of the League of Arab States. Furthermore, government intervention, which supported only the public sector, created a discouraging atmosphere for authors and publishers.

In 1972, the UNESCO-sponsored Year of the Book, the Arab League Educational, Cultural and Scientific Organization (ALECSO) held a conference in Doha, Qatar (4–10 December) on the dissemination and distribution of the Arabic book. Mr. Bahij ’Uthman, then the president of the Lebanese Union of Publishers, reported on the difficulties in disseminating Arabic books. According to his account, books coming out in one Arab country and going to other countries, like Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Libya, and others, have to receive the imprimatur of a censor before distribution. In some other countries, all imported books have to be distributed by the public sector distribution agencies, which leads to the same kind of restrictions on access. In fact, most of the present distribution companies prefer to distribute newspapers and magazines because it is less risky and more profitable. Smuggling of books by secondary exporters is also a common phenomenon. Reading habits are still not well developed, and with competition from audio-visual media, this situation is not likely to improve. Illiteracy rates are still high. Most works are printed in editions of less than five thousand copies, for an Arab population of 180 million. Moreover, most Arab countries have not yet developed adequately their national libraries or national bibliographies.

Probably the greatest agonies come from an indirect pressure, the control exercised by religious authorities over the doctrinal purity of any book that might be construed as having even an indirect bearing upon the tenets of Islam, and in some cases Christianity. Notwithstanding the sophistication of many Arab writers and their concerns for scholarly research methods and presentation, many are the books that still lack precision in the texts, and suffer from typographical errors, and many are the publishers who seek the least expensive printing and paper, are negligent in placing footnotes, making indexes, ensuring correct and exact citations, and including all the bibliographic information needed on the title page. In conclusion, the Arabic book, in spite of the many and great strides taken towards better, more beautiful presentation, advanced scholarly approaches, and sophisticated language during two centuries of expansion, still has a long way to go. Furthermore, in my opinion, the abundance of religious tracts and belles-lettres has not served to produce a more coherent and cohesive society especially when one considers the many problems and conflicts that trouble the Arab world today.

[567] The earliest Arabic work that has reached US is a book of Christian prayer, Kitab şalât alsawai (Horlogium breve), which was printed in Fano in 1514. The first Koran printed was one printed around 1537 in Venice by Alessandro de Paganino. See Angela Nuovo, “El Corano arabe ritrovato,” La Bibliofilia 89, no. 3 (1987), pp. 237–71. Books in Arabic were produced in Italy by Typographia Medicea, established in 1585 at the advice of Pope Gregory XIII. In addition to the Bible, the press published Avicenna’s Canon Medicinae and al-Idnsfs Kitab Nuzhat al Mushtaq. See Josee Balagna, Limprimerie Arabe en Occident (XVT, xvn’, et xvin siecle) (Paris, 1984).

[568] See, on the history of printing in Arab countries, Khain Sabat, Târîkh al-tiba ahfial-sharq al-‘arabî, 2nded. (Cairo, 1966); see also the dissertations of Moncef Chenoufi, “Le probleme des origines de rimprimerie et de la presse arabe en Tunisie dans sa relation avec la Renaissance (.Nahda) 1847–1887,” Universite de Paris IV, 1970: Fawzi Abdulrazak, “The Kingdom of the Book: The History of Printing as an Agent of Change in Morocco between 1865 and 1912,)” Harvard University, 1989: and Wahid Ghdoura, Le debut de rimprimerie, arabe a Istanbul et en Syrie (1706–1787) (Tunis, 1985).

[569] The reference to Lebanon in this article does not take into account the historical difference between Mount Lebanon, which did not include Beirut, Tripoli, Sidon, and other areas, and Greater Lebanon, which was proclaimed by General Gouraud, High Commissioner of the French Republic. Lebanon became a republic in 1926, and gained its independence from the French in 1943.

[570] Karshunî is Arabic in Syriac script.

[571] Jabal ‘Amil is in southern Lebanon and is inhabited mostly by Shi’ite Muslims. See Muhammad Khain al-Murâdî, Silk al-durarfi a’yân al-qam al-thanÎ ‘ashar, 4 vols. (Cairo, 1301/1883: repr. Baghdad, 1968), 1:7.

[572] See Basile Aggoula, “Le livre libanais,” in Exposition le livre et le Liban jusqu’a 1900 (Paris, 1982), p. 308.

[573] See Muhammad Kurd ‘Aki, Khutat al-Sham, 6 vols. in 3, 3rd ed. (Damascus, 1983), 6:197.

[574] Khalil Sabat, Târîkh al-übâ’ah fi al-sharq al-‘arabî, 2nd ed. (Cairo, 1966), p. 52.

[575] Sixteen of Alexander Dumas’ (pere) novels were translated, including such vworks as The Count of Monte Christo, The Three Musketeers, etc. See M. Yüsüf Najm, al-Qissahfial-adabal-‘arabîal-hadith, 3rded. (Beirut, 1966), pp. 21–31.

[576] The private library of Nawfal was sold to the American University of Beirut.

[577] For more information on al-Asir and al-Ahdab, see Marun ‘Abbud, Ruwwad al-nahdah al-hadlthah (1952, آلأ١اًةذآ), pp. 72–77.

[578] Several books of polemical emendations or corrections of linguistic errors were produced as the language was being transformed from ornate and verbose to a more direct and substantial style. Sa’îd al-Shartunl published al-Sahm al-şâ’ib fi takhtTat ghunyat al-talib (The Correctly Hitting Arrow in Faulting Ghunyat al-Tlib), a criticism of A. Faris al-Shidyâq’s Ghunyat al-talib, a grammar book promoting the new style advocated by al-Shidyaq. Both al-Ahdab and Al-Aslr in turn published rebuttals of alSahm.

[579] An example of such advertisement reads: “This book is sold in Beirut by Messrs Karulla, Fathallah Tajir and Yusuf Kamid.” See Le livre et le Liban, p. 309. Dr. Yusuf Khoury of The American University of Beirut called my attention to al-Maktabah al-Jârrû’ah, a bookstore established by Khain and Amin al-Khoury in 1877 in Beirut. The 1888/89 catalog of the bookstore lists titles published by the bookstore, and religious, scientific, medical, and literary works sold there, including titles from Turkey, Egypt, Mosul (Iraq), and Germany.

[580] See the title page of Yusuf al-Dibs’ book, Mughnl al-muta’allim (The Enricher of the Learned) (Beirut, 1869), where it says, “It was printed at the expense of the author and his friend Rizqallah Khadra.”

[581] See ‘Abd al-‘Azîz ‘Awad, a/-Wârah al-‘Uthmaniyahfi wilayat Sürîyâ, 1864-19/4 (Cairo, 1969), p. 91.

[582] On the Syrians and Lebanese in Egypt, see the chapter on this subject in Albert Hourani, The Emergence ofthe Modem Middle East (Berkeley, 1981), pp. 103–23: also, Thomas Philipp, The Syrians in Egypt (Stuttgart, 1985).

[583] Nasrallah, op. cit., p. 91.

[584] On the Bulaq Press, known later as al-Matba’ah al-Amlrlyah, see the excellent work of Abü al-Futuh Radwan, Tarikh Matba’at Bulaq (Cairo, 1953).

[585] See the English language introduction in ‘Ayidah Nuşayr (Aida I. Arabic Books Published in Egypt in the Nineteenth Century ٢٥اأ٠١ ع 1990). The percentages total more than one hundred because some titles’ subjects overlap categories.

[586] Sabat, op. cit., p. 175.

[587] Radwan, op cit., p. 260.

[588] Edward Lane, An Account of the Manners and Customs of Modern Egyptians Written in Egypt During the Years 1833–35, (London, 1836), p. 190, “The booksellers in Cairo are, I am informed, only eight in number and their shops are but 111 stocked.”

[589] Michaud et Poujoulat, Correspondence d’Orient, 8 vols. in 4, 6:299, Letter 112, Cairo, April, 1831: cited in Radwan, op. cit., p. 300.

[590] John Rodenbeck, “A Scholarly Publisher in Egypt,” Scholarly Publishing (July 1985), p. 320.

[591] Sha’ban Khalfah, Dar al-Kutub al-Qawmlyah (Cairo, 1991), pp. 267–68.

[592] Government of Egypt, Ministry of Culture, “al-Kitab al-‘arablf in Arba’at mu’tamarat (Cairo, 1917), p. 209.

 13. Mass Higher Education and the Religious Imagination in Contemporary Arab Societies

Dale F. Eickelman

Mass higher education in the Arab and Muslim worlds is reshaping conceptions of self, religion, nation, and politics. It is as basic to reconfiguring notions of self and society in the Arab world of the late twentieth century as was the introduction of printed books in sixteenth-century rural France.[593] Ironically, however, we know more about the uses of literacy in medieval and premodern Europe than in the contemporary Muslim and Arab worlds. Many scholars have noted linkages between advanced education and religious activists, or “fundamentalists,” that they are reinstituting older forms of religious understanding and action rather than creating, even if inadvertently, new ones. The result is to deflect attention from both conceptual innovations and emerging networks for communication and action that affect virtually all Muslims and profoundly shape the direction of contemporary Muslim thought. Fundamentalism, the claims of its adherents notwithstanding, is a distinctly modern phenomenon.[594]

In this article I examine the “objectification” of the religious imagination in the Muslim Middle East, the process by which three kinds of questions come to be foregrounded in the consciousness of large numbers of believers: “What is my religion?” “Why is it important to my life?,” and “How do my beliefs guide my conduct?” Objectification does not mean seeing religion as a uniform or monolithic entity, although it is precisely that for some thinkers. I argue that these explicit and “objective” questions are distinctively modern ones that increasingly shape the discourse and practice of all Muslims, even as some legitimize their practices and beliefs by asserting a return to authentic established traditions. I focus on how, at this time in history and in certain contexts, religions have been objectified in the consciousness of many people. In part, this issue is easier to address than why, but it is also more neglected. For something like religion to be objectified in people’s consciousness, it must be discussed, and this entails discourse. If, for reasons of political intimidation or social deference, people do not discuss it directly, then it is discussed publicly for them by “experts” with whom they may or may not agree.

Distinctive to the modern era, this discourse and debate about tradition involve large numbers of people. They also necessarily involve an awareness of other Muslim and non-Muslim traditions, even if understandings of these other traditions are often distorted. Mass education and mass communication facilitate such awareness and, in changing the style and scale of possible discourse, reconfigure the nature of religious thought and action and encourage explicit debate over meaning. Although both mass education and mass communication are important in all contemporary world religions, the full effects of mass education, especially higher education, are just beginning to be felt in much of the Muslim world.

My approach in this article is not linear and evolutionary—in this respect it differs from Habermas',[595] although it is inspired by his emphasis upon forms of communicative action in other respects—but contextual; I seek to describe the salient characteristics of an integrated cultural transformation. Bourdieu's[596] studies of higher education, which explore correspondences and affinities among status, authority, and the "ways of knowing" inculcated by various educational institutions, can serve as a point of departure for understanding the dramatic transformations of religious authority that are occurring in much of the Muslim world today. Bourdieu is most effective in suggesting how the complex practices of educational institutions reproduce unequal relations of wealth and authority in society, but less so in showing how even repressive political systems leave room for contestation.[597] Indeed, some form of resistance to a society's central institutions would appear critical for sustaining the cultural construction of authoritative discourse, if only to coopt sources of possible opposition and dissent. In this respect, Gramsci[598] serves as a useful complement to Bourdieu, who emphasizes the reproduction of existing social arrangements. Although conceptually less tidy, Gramsci suggests that intellectuals and their discourse, although constrained by the established social order, never just reproduce it but create, even if inadvertently, the seeds of resistance and contestation. In order to focus on the development of new "authoritative" discourses and resistance to them, I seek to place such discourses in their specific historical and political contexts.

Some elements of contemporary Islamic ideologies deflect attention away from such specific contexts. Muslims conventionally represent themselves as "People of the Book," yet until recently most Muslims—and certainly those in the Middle East—were not sufficiently literate to read or comprehend directly the Qur’an or other religious texts. Nonetheless, the idea of the book and the text has long pervaded many social contexts. In this respect, the uses of literacy and of the spoken and written word in the Arab “core” of the Muslim world strongly resemble those in the so-called Muslim “periphery.”[599] Even where texts are not present, people behave as if they are. The idea of the Book, by analogy with the divine text of the Qur’an,[600] conveys for many Muslims the idea that valued knowledge is fixed and memorizable. In Morocco, the cognitive style associated with Islamic knowledge remains closely tied to popular understandings of Islam and has important analogies in nonreligious spheres of knowledge.[601]

Memorization of the Qur’an continues to be a virtually unquestioned form of cultural capital for Moroccans, although few still memorize it in its entirety, as was common for an earlier generation. Quranic memorization served as a paradigm for subsequent learning in the religious sciences as well as in other fields of knowledge; ideally, texts were mnemonically “possessed.” Beginning in the 19205 and 1930s, the Moroccan elite began to send their sons to the schools of the French protectorate. As this occurred, the prestige of Islamic higher education, left increasingly to students from rural regions, suffered a rapid decline, although the popular idea of knowledge as fixed and memorizable still prevailed.[602] The advent of mass higher education since the 1970s, however, challenges this paradigm and offers an alternative cognitive style.

 Religiosity and Mass Higher Education

Major changes in basic religious or political perceptions often occur incrementally and are not perceived as significant at the time. Only in retrospect are they recognized as sharp breaks with the past. Discussing ties of dependence in feudal Europe, Marc Bloch[603] wrote that successive generations did not consciously create new social forms but instead gave rise to them “in the process of trying to adapt the old.” Much the same can be said of mass higher education. Even when mass higher education is used to sustain old patterns of belief and authority, its very structure engenders new “authoritative” ways of thinking about self, religion, and politics.

For the most part, mass higher education is a recent phenomenon in the Middle East. It began in earnest only in the 19505. Fifteen to twenty years later, that is, by 1975 or 1980, after large numbers of students began to complete its advanced cycles, its consequences could be more clearly discerned. In Egypt, the number of primary school pupils more than doubled in the decade following the 1952 revolution. Corresponding increases in secondary and university education began in the mid-1960s (see fig. 13.1). The timing of educational expansion varies for other parts of the Middle East. Major educational expansion in Morocco began in the 19605.[604] In Oman, a case to be considered in detail here, educational opportunities began to expand significantly only in the 19705. In 1972–73, there were 25,000 students at all levels in Oman. By 1982–83, there were 142,000, and by 1987–88, 276,000. In 1975–76, a mere 22 students were enrolled in secondary education within Oman. By 1987–88, this number had risen to 13,500. In postsecondary education, a critical mass among Omanis emerged only in the late 1980s.[605]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-44.jpg][Fig. 13.1. Statistics on secondary education in Egypt, Morocco, and Oman.]]

A complementary measure of change is book production. As of 1982, the Arab world was producing 40 books per million inhabitants, far below the world average of 162 titles per million. Although more recent figures are unavailable, the gap appears to be closing rapidly.[606] Likewise, the first cohort of Moroccan to benefit from mass higher education in Arabic, as opposed to French, and to have acquired their pervasive “habits of thought”[607] in the country’s national language, is creating a demand for the “re-imagining”[608] of Islam and national identity. Only in the last few years has a significant readership for “quality” books in Arabic developed in Morocco.[609] For the increasingly influential cohort of university graduates, reading is a means of “appropriating,”[610] organizing, and making objective ideas of society, religion, and self

 Authoritative Discourse

With the spread of mass higher education in the Muslim world, access to the Quran as well as to other books and the ways of knowing inculcated by them, has shifted in form. Religious authority in earlier generations derived from the mastery of authoritative texts studied under recognized scholars. Mass education fosters a direct, albeit selective, access to the printed word and a break with earlier traditions of authority. As Hassan al-Turabi, the Sorbonne-educated leader of the Muslim Brothers in the Sudan and a former attorney-general, has said, “Because all knowledge is divine and religious, a chemist, an engineer, an economist, [and] a jurist are all’ulama’ [religious scholars].”[611] Thus, the privileged position of traditionally educated religious scholars has eroded. Although religious activism has many sources, it appeals mainly to those who have benefited from modern education. In 1953, for example, only 22 percent of the Egyptian Muslim Brothers were not of the educated urban middle classes.[612] In the occupied West Bank after 1967, the occupying authorities encouraged religious activism in order to counter secular nationalism; belatedly, they discovered that popular religious protest offered an equally if not more tenacious opposition to their authority. As early as 1979, a poll at one West Bank university indicated that 43 percent of the students identified themselves with fundamentalist rather than with secular nationalist organizations. Throughout the occupied territories, youths “with a relatively high educational level” are the core of these groups.[613] Muslim fundamentalist discourse, such as that of Morocco’s ‘Abd al-Salam Yasin, [614] assumes a familiarity with the language of Marxist and other “Western” discourses, against which it confidently reacts. Belief and practice are now expressed in public and explicit forms and are more directly related to political action than they previously were.

Sayyid Qutb’s Ma’âlimfîal-tanq (Signposts),[615] said to be the most widely read book among younger Muslims worldwide, would never have had the impact it did without the spread of mass education and the access to analytical and exegetical texts that such education provides. In Iran, the Friday sermon has become the focal political event; in it, government speakers explain policies, problems, and events of the week to audiences much wider than any assembled during the Shah’s regime, notwithstanding the Pahlavi state’s full control over mass communications. These sermons often refer to published sources and arguments for authority, implying an audience familiar with texts and the principles of citation. Not all of the audience can follow such arguments in detail, but they recognize the forms of authority. Even the nonreligious and the antireligious are obliged to follow the sermons to remain abreast of political developments, and the sermons themselves presume an awareness of world events and an ability to understand policy.

 Religion as System and Object

A second consequence of mass higher education is perhaps most evident from contemporary fundamentalist discourse, in which religious beliefs are seen as systems to be distinguished from one another. The fundamentalist thinker Sayyid Qutb, executed by Nasser in 1966, described Islam as a “system” (minhaj) of beliefs and doctrines. Qutb saw Islam as self-contained, yet thinking of religion in this way makes it possible to borrow from other systems and to incorporate changes,[616] thereby increasing the system’s viability. When fundamentalists declare that they are engaged in the “Islamization” of their society, they make explicit their sense of religious beliefs as an objective system. Thus, since the 1980s, Moroccans have commonly referred to activists as “the Muslims” (al-muslimun). Irony is far from absent, since all but about 20,000 of Morocco’s 26 million citizens are Muslim.

 Language and Community

Finally, the standardized language of mass higher education encourages new senses of coimmunity and affinity. Anderson[617] argues, for example, that the rise of written vernacular languages in Europe since the sixteenth century and the spread of print technology have created language communities wider than those of face-to-face interactions yet narrower than the communities created by shared sacred languages. With modifications, this premise can be transposed to many Islamic contexts.

One indication of shifts in the religious imagination of a younger, educated generation in many parts of the Middle East is the effort of the state to coopt fundamentalist discourse. In Morocco in the 19605 and early 19705, both the monarchy and its political opposition employed a “developmentalist” idiom in which “religious” issues were separated from “political” ones. By the late 19705, the public language of the monarchy’s supporters was much more religiously oriented, and the monarch asserted that he was developing a cadre of Ministry of the Interior officials trained in administration and Islamic thought. He claimed that his political actions were modeled upon those of the Prophet Muhammad:

<quote>

In all modesty, Hassan’s school is the school of Muhammad V...and the school of Muhammad ٧ is that of the Prophet.... Most of US know the Prophet only as messenger of God....His political and diplomatic life remain unknown and we await the day when someone firmly attached to his religion and proud of its teachings will write on this subject.[618]

</quote>

From North Africa to Jordan, Egypt, and Turkey, the impact of modern mass education is pervasive. In the context of a set national curriculum in which Islamic studies is one subject among many, students are taught about the unity of Muslim thought and practice. An impersonal relation between students and curriculum is stressed, and matters of controversy among Muslims are excluded. Even while teaching that Islam permeates all aspects of life, the formal principles of Islamic doctrine and practice are compartmentalized and made an object of study. As mentioned earlier, Sayyid Qutb employed terms such as “curriculum” (minhaj) to describe Muslim doctrine as a system of closely related beliefs and principles. This pervasive notion of system is a profoundly new element in modern religious thought, as are the catechisms that are now becoming common for many Muslims, including Ibâdî Muslims who, together with the better known and more numerous Sunni and Shfah, form the third major doctrinal cluster (madhhah) in the wider Islamic community. Such catechisms help their schooled users to understand the key thinkers of their tradition and to explain doctrinal tenets to other Muslims.[619]

 Religion and Education in Oman

The adoption of mass higher education in Oman[620] is sufficiently recent that I was able to witness its beginning in the late 19705. Schooling became widely available after the 1970 palace coup in which Qabus ibn Saʿīd replaced his father, Saʿīd ibn Taymur (1932–70), as ruler. By the early 19805, Oman had a sufficient number of secondary school graduates, members of the armed services and civilian government with in-service training, and university students abroad (and, since the opening of Sultan Qaboos University in 1986, in Oman itself) to engender a transformation in what constitutes authoritative religious discourse. The shift to a print- and cassette-based religiosity and the exposure of large numbers of young Omanis to a written, formal, “modern standard” Arabic through schooling and the mass media have altered the style and content of authoritative religious discourse and the role it plays in shaping and constraining domestic and regional politics.[621]

The overall trend has been one of turning away from ritual and symbolic contexts in which—to cite an account of a contemporary Mayan community in Guatemala—“meaning comes to rest more on usage than on referentiality; learning consists of improvisation rather than rationalization; and mastery of form ultimately takes precedence over understanding of context,”[622] and toward intellectualism and an explicit statement of belief inseparable from the study of texts, or at least an invocation of them. Because the discourse of Oman’s mufti, Shaykh Ahmad ibn Hamad al-Khahli, is authorized, frequent, and publicly accessible, it provides an accurate reading of contemporary religious trends even as it reflects and responds to competing Muslim voices.

For example, when in 1986 a senior religious authority in Saudi Arabia issued a fatwa (authoritative religious interpretation) that was interpreted as hostile to the Ibadiyah, al-Khaim, who is Ibâdî, responded in a nationally televised address by invoking specific texts and thinkers as his authorities. Indeed, the perceived attack from an unsympathetic Muslim authority was part of an overall pattern of competing Muslim discourses shaped by discursive texts.[623] The major difference between the Ibadiyah of Oman and their counterparts in Algeria and Libya is that modern educational opportunities came last to Oman. Students and other Omanis looked to the mufti to formulate appropriate ways of explaining Ibâdî interpretations of Islam to other Muslims. These students constitute the development of explicit statements of belief and practice. Indeed, Oman’s mufti rarely puts his ideas in writing himself, but they are frequently promulgated through cassettes and public addresses that are later transcribed (and occasionally translated) for use in discussing Islam with other Muslims or representing Omani religious traditions to outsiders.[624] One cassette, for example, responds to a letter from an Omani student in the United States who had written the mufti that some of his “Sünnî brothers” had warned against allowing Ibâdîs to lead prayers or participate “in the administration of our mosques and Islamic Centers in this place on the claim that they are a section of the Khawarij,” an early Islamic revolutionary sect that advocated death for Muslims not adhering strictly to its tenets. The student had asked for guidance in responding to such claims and “the reason for not circulating [Ibâdî] books and references in the libraries and in the Muslim Universities.”[625]

Religiously minded younger Omanis, especially those who take seriously the critiques of contemporary Arab and Muslim fundamentalist and radical thinkers, such as the late Sayyid Qutb, find Shaykh al-Khalîlî’s arguments persuasive. The mufti, despite the fact that he holds a government sinecure, cites with approval books banned in Oman, giving the appearance of autonomy from state censorship and control. As in Egypt,[626] state authorities, by “authorizing” some radical discourse, encompass and control it. Omanis harbor few illusions that Shaykh al-Khalîlî’s invocation of prohibited literature will have any effect on its continued interdiction. The mufti’s discourse shows how a spokesperson for the ruling elite can coopt discourse of the opposition, including Marxism, and integrate some traditional practices, such as the dars, into modern contexts in order to sustain authority. Some of the mufti’s most biting critiques are offered as quotations or paraphrases from other writers, which distances him from formulations he nonetheless offers with approval. Shaykh al-Khaim is careful to specify authors, titles, page numbers, and often even publishers—a form of citation familiar to members of his audience with a modern education but absent from traditional religious discourse.

Shaykh al-Khalîlî’s discourse is almost exclusively oral, so that even newspaper summaries of his views are edited by others.[627] He regularly travels throughout the Sultanate, meeting with religious notables, and draws large crowds for his public lessons. When the ruler ordered special prayers in support of the Palestinian people in March 1988, the mufti led the congregation in one of Oman’s largest mosques. Through regular radio programs and a weekly newspaper column, he offers fatwas in response to queries from Omanis. Shaykh al-Khalîlî’s frequent participation in international Islamic conferences—in Jidda, in Cairo, and at Sultan Qaboos University in February and March 1988 alone—is extensively reported. In addition to undertaking this heavy schedule of speaking, the mufti plays a pivotal role in committees that shape public religious expression in schools, the media, and the “suggested” texts for Friday sermons. Again, however, these sermons are in formal Arabic, and thus their specific content is understood only by traditionally educated religious scholars and those who have received a modern education.

Shaykh al-Khalîlî’s articulation of Islamic issues contrasts sharply with the pattern that prevailed in Oman until the 1970s. For the Ibadîyah, the older pattern was sustained by an interlocking universe of religious notables whose literary output centered on poetry and tribal histories that were circulated largely in manuscript form among the educated elite.[628] Alternative constructions of Islam and of Muslim identity were marginal concerns. Textual references were primarily to Omani scholars and did not reflect debate or confrontation with the wider Muslim community. For instance, in Oman of the 1920s and 1930s, the presence of the prominent Tripohtanian Ibâdî writer and Arab nationalist Sulayman al-Bârûnî (1870–1940) had no significant influence on the form of religious discourse.[629] In many parts of Oman, Sünnî, Shî’î, and Ibâdî communities were closely intertwined, but their relations were of juxtaposition rather than of dialogue and interaction. Members of each community were aware of the religious practices of the others, but this awareness did not engender a systematic formulation of sectarian distinctions. This awareness came to the forefront with the introduction of modern education.

Until the last two decades, Ibadi, Sünnî, and Shî’î doctrines and practices were not explicitly thought of as systems that could be compared and contrasted. What was practiced was assumed to be Islamic, pure and simple. Omanis were, of course, aware of other Muslim communities, some very close at hand, but the other communities and their interpretations of doctrine and practice were at the periphery of the moral imagination of religious intellectuals and others.

The intensification of government services, education, and control since 1970 has heightened people’s imagination of Oman as a political community, [630] with territorial limits and spheres of authority accepted by both the ruler’s supporters and his opponents. Although this transformation was accelerated after 1970, it was well under way before then. Sultan Saʿīd may have been a reactionary in the last decades of his rule, but his repressive actions brought a new unity to Oman’s diverse sectarian and ethnic population; their dislike of him engendered a sense of unity that could not be broken even by enticements from neighboring countries then opposed to Oman.[631] The government of Sultan Saʿīd may have been weak in scale, scope, and services, but it provided a clearly defined center against which its opponents united as Omanis. In 1965, a United Nations team that had conducted extensive interviews with Omani exiles in Saudi Arabia, Cairo, and elsewhere concluded:

<quote>

Most persons interviewed made it clear that they would prefer to see Oman united as one country. Some had in mind the unification of the territories previously controlled by the Sultan and the Imam, while others wished to see the Trucial Sheikhdoms also included as part of the future Oman. One person said that there was no Muscat, only Oman. Another said that people from Oman and from Muscat were all Omanis... Oman had been one country before its division and it should be one country again.[632]

</quote>

In post-1970 Oman, the state has heightened the sense of national identity by vastly expanding education, the bureaucracy, the police, military and security services, business opportunities, and by providing infrastructure and communication facilities. In textbooks and formal discourse, Omanis are treated as “citizens” (iaimuwatinun), a role with implied obligations to and reciprocal expectations of the state, the ruler, and his close associates. “Nation” (watari) in the northern Oman interior no longer primarily means one’s community or tribal territory, but Oman itself. Many young Omanis perceive the obligations and expectations framed by the state’s new rhetoric as hypocritical, but this rhetoric nonetheless forms the articulated standard by which policies and decisions are justified. Indeed, requesting the government to adhere to its stated principles is a tolerated form of dissent.

Mass education has had a major impact on the style of religiosity of younger Omanis, even as state authorities seek to use education to preserve “traditional” values and to distance religion from the political sphere. At its most basic, the style of intellectual technology introduced by modern schooling constitutes a significant break with the earlier emphasis upon the written word, mediated by an oral tradition and oriented toward a mastery of accepted religious texts acquired through study under religious scholars recognized by the wider community. At least in formal terms, a curriculum of specifically delineated subjects and prescribed texts is taught by a changing array of teachers, and competence is measured by examination. Nonetheless, as seen in the iconic value of the mufti among Omanis who cannot follow his lessons in formal Arabic, replete with spoken references and page citations, the older style of religiosity exists alongside the new one and is selectively incorporated into contemporary dominant discourse.

The prescribed curriculum has made Islamic studies a nonsectarian subject. This “generic” Islam includes such topics as the life of the Prophet Muhammad and those of his sayings (hadlth) that Sunni, Ibadl, and Shri Muslims all accept as authentic. As a consequence, the curriculum includes no discussion of the development of Ibadism or of major doctrinal divisions within the Muslim community. The same “generic” Islam is propagated in Omani newspapers and periodicals and in the Friday sermons carried on Oman radio and television.

An unintended consequence of making Islam a part of the curriculum is to make it a subject that must be “explained” and “understood.” Yet treating Islam as a system of beliefs and practices implicitly highlights differences within the Muslim community. Thus one Omani from the interior, now a police official, recalled his experiences as a boarder at a secondary school in the late 1970s, his first close association with Omanis from sects other than his own:

<quote>

In religion classes, the teachers, who were mostly Egyptian, were careful to cite only sayings of the Prophet that were accepted by all the sects [madhahib]. Once, when a teacher quoted one not accepted as authentic by the Shî’ah, they walked out of class and staged a protest. We never discussed sectarian matters in class; that was forbidden. In the dormitories, our discussions were often intense. Our purpose wasn’t to convince others to change their sect [maanhab], but to make the best argument possible for our side [tarafina]. (Interview, New York, 20 May 1985)

</quote>

Such discussion requires participants to emphasize the distinctive features of their beliefs. The previously cited letter from a student to Shaykh al-Khalrh indicates that the awareness of sectarian differences is further accentuated when Omanis participate in religious activities with their counterparts, sometimes perceived as hostile or misinformed, from Muslim groups outside Oman.

Participation in Muslim associations and study groups, as well as exposure to video and audio cassettes and the literature of various groups, also shifts shared perceptions of Islamic thought and the context in which it is shaped. Ready access to the printed word and to expositions of Islamic doctrine in transnational Arabic (as opposed to regional and local dialects) largely derives from modern mass education, radio, television, and cassettes and is fairly recent for most Omanis. The state creates and sustains a communications network that touches the lives of most citizens. In other cases, the state interdicts certain communications or expressions of opinion.

The movement to institute Friday sermons at mosques throughout Oman in the 1980s constituted a subtle challenge to state authority. At the same time, it illustrated the importance of the shift from ritual to explicit statements of belief. Among the Ibadlyah of Oman’s northern interior, only the imam in Nizwa offered Friday sermons prior the the “new era.” As young Omanis became educated, however, many of them led movements to have Friday sermons read in mosques throughout the interior, as is now done. One of Oman’s first generation of village schoolteachers observed of the northern Oman interior, “People here do not know Islam; they pray and sacrifice, but they do not know why” (interview, Nizwa region, 9 March 1988). Before the mid-1970s, statements such as this would have been almost incomprehensible in most towns and villages, but by the late 1980s they had become so common that older persons, who disagreed with the notion that “being Muslim” entailed an ability to articulate a credo, could “interpret” such comments for me and could identify the characteristics of those most likely to share them: younger, educated Omanis.

This nascent intelligentsia is independent of state authority and often skeptical of it, pointing out discrepancies between what they see as the law of the Sultanate and the prescriptions of Islamic law (sharpah). Yet these same critics are products of the modern state, educated and employed by it, and they concur with the state, at least for the present, on the limits of public discourse. The mufti’s allusions to earlier forms of—and deviations from—Islamic rule are applied by some of his audience to contemporary local situations. At the same time, however, the mufti is the Omani representative to the Islamic Conference Organization and other international religious bodies. Even arrangements for the hajj (the pilgrimage to Mecca) pass through governmental organizations and are bound by regulations established by state authorities. In 1987, the minister of justice announced plans to coordinate “objective” programs in religious education, sermons, and media discussion of religious issues to “enlighten the public on religious matters and to urge the believers to fulfill their obligations.”[633] It could be misleading to speak of an Omani, Pakistani, Saudi, French, and Moroccan Islam, but the boundaries, administrative and economic ties, and traditions of national entities implicitly shape religious discourse, just as a print-oriented, modernist Islam induces the specific discussion of sectarian diveigences. In Oman, as in other countries, much Islamic literature circulates in samizdat form, not because it is “subversive” in the sense of attacking the state, but because it has not found explicit approval. For example, one Algerian book[634] provides a catechism of Ibâdî beliefs and “correct” sources and indicates its “stand-alone” nature by appending a glossary of key historical events, personalities, and theological terms (kalamiyah) so that interested readers can acquire a “proper” understanding without the tutorials of traditional Islamic learning. Such books had no audience in Oman a decade ago and were not in local circulation.

 Conclusion

Oman provides a recent example of a general shift to a religious activism that marginalized the authority of traditional religious leaders, a trend paralleled elsewhere among both Muslim and non-Muslim populations, including those in Indonesia and India.[635] With this transformation, religious authority shifts from elite specialists recognized as masters of religious texts and often inaccessible rhetorical forms to religious and political activists who seek open religious discussion and action and whose authority is based upon persuasion and the interpretation of accessible texts. This shift reshapes national cultures and politics because it constitutes a critique of arbitrary state authority and questions state efforts, as in Oman and Morocco, to coopt religious activism. While the full political concomitants of the shift are beyond the scope of this article, there are indications among Sh 1 Arab intellectuals in the Gulf, for example, that even the Quran is no longer invoked as an unquestioned source for the legitimization of democratic moves because, as an Arab Gulf businessman put it, “terms such as ‘consultation’ [shûrâ] occur only infrequently and do not constitute a fully developed political theory” (interview, Washington, DC, 27 April 1990). Such a statement implies a reading and analysis of the Qur’an as a text and an explicit notion of theory and interpretation.

The new forms of religious understandings are pervasive but do not inexorably displace older forms. Elements of traditional religious understandings often survive in altered form. Many aspects of madrasah (mosque school) education remain significant. In Morocco, for example, the models of peer learning in madrasah education and in religious brotherhoods have been taken over by religious activists, who are often obliged to meet surreptitiously because of state sanctions against them.

The monarchy, for its part, uses the Qarawiym mosque-university to train senior administrators in the religious sciences in an effort to accord the state greater legitimacy; and religious lessons (dars), often with the monarch in attendance, are broadcast nightly throughout Ramadan, the Muslim lunar month of fasting.[636] In some parts of rural Morocco, wealthy Muslims sponsor small madrasahs, in which men of learning who congregate to study religious texts in the older mnemonic tradition are fed and lodged at the patron’s expense. Fanny Colonna (personal communication, 1975) observed that in the Gurara region of southern Algeria, known for its tradition of religious learning, Quranic schooling was considered better adapted to local needs than the schooling provided by the state. Support for Qur’anic schooling thus also served as a vehicle for contesting state authority.

Madrasahs in Iran now serve as places to train the political elite, a reversal of their role before the 1979 revolution, when many madrasah students were drop-outs from secular higher education, which required them to pass entrance examinations.[637] Because they are trained in both traditional and modern schools, young Iranian mullahs are able to “bridge” religious styles, utilizing aspects of both forms of religious expression as circumstances warrant. Text-based religious activism may constitute a new dominant religiosity but this, does not prevent its carriers from selectively incorporating older forms. Elsewhere, as in the Arabian peninsula and in an Islamicizing Pakistan, jurists and teachers of the religious sciences for all levels of state education receive highly modified forms of what is nonetheless called “traditional” Islamic education.

The Prophet Muhammad’s contemporaries, whose lives bridged the pre-Islamic age of ignorance and the age of Islam, were called mukhadrams. Moroccan intellectuals now in their forties sometimes apply this term to themselves. Many shared the hope of imminent political and economic reform in the heady years after independence. Now they share a disenchantment with the commitment to reform of an earlier generation, having seen that the end of colonial domination, like the enthusiasms for secular ideologies in the 19605 and early 1970s, brought no significant transformations. Some have placed their hopes in the new forms of religiosity with their implicit promise of reform and renewal. Many, however, do so in a way critically different from that of their predecessors. They apply the term mukhadram to themselves, but also point out how their practical understanding of religion differs from that of their seventh-century counterparts. They are not just conscious of adhering to (or reacting against) innovative forms of religious belief and practice; they also think of these new forms as systems that can be differentiated from others and consciously reworked. This consciousness of form prevents authoritative knowledge from being monolithic and states from coopting an objectified Islam for themselves: alternatives can always be envisaged, even as the determinative power of historical context is recognized. As antipathetic as some contemporary Muslim religious activists say they are to the “West” they nonetheless share with those who live in the West a commitment to texts, analysis, synthesis, and personal authority that draws upon their own traditions and heritage.

 Notes

The author wishes to thank the National Science Foundation, The Fulbright Faculty Research Abroad Program, and the MacArthur Foundation Program for Research for supporting his field research. Thanks also are extended to all those who reviewed this paper, which first appeared in the American Ethnologist after its delivery at the conference, The Book in the Islamic World, and is reprinted here with kind permission from the American Anthropological Association.

[593] See, on the introduction of printed books, Natalie Zemon Davis, ,Modern France ؛Society and Culture in Early ١ لأ;Veop\e لأآلأ% علأ١ هاأة لآ·آاً\آ١“ ed. N.z. Davis (Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1975), pp. 189–226. Set ة\٢١٢ـل00ه جلا The Logic of Writing and the OrganUation of Society (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986): and Brian Stock, The Implications of Literacy (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1983).

[594] See Bruce B. Lawrence, Defenders ofGod: Fundamentalist Revolt against the Modern Age (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1989).

[595] See Jurgen Habermas, Communication and the Evolution of Society (Boston: Beacon Press, 1979).

[596] See Pierre Bourdieu, Homo Academicus (London: Polity Press, 1988).

[597] See Jean Comaroff, Body of Power, Spirit of Resistance: The Culture and History of a South African People (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985).

[598] Antonio Gramsci, “The Intellectuals,” in Selections from the Prison Notebooks, ed. and trans. Q. Hoare and G.N. Smith (New York: International Publishers, 1971), pp. 3–43.

[599] Michael Lambeck, “Certain Knowledge, Contestable Authority: Power and Practice on the Islamic Periphery,” American Ethnologist 17 (1990), pp. 23–40.

[600] Johannes Pederson, The Arabic Book, trans. G. French (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984).

[601] Dale F. Eickelman, “The Art of Memory: Islamic Education and Its Social Reproduction,” Comparative Studies in Society and History 20 (1978), pp. 465–516. See also the author’s Knowledge and Power in Morocco !Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1985).

[602] Ibid. See also Jacques Berque, “Dans le Maroc Nouveau: Le role d’une universite islamique,” Annales d’histiore economique et sociale 10 (1938), pp. 193–207: and “Lieus et moments du reformisme islamique,” in Maghreb: Histoire et societes, ed. J.B. (Paris: Editions]. Duculot, 1974), pp. 162–88.

[603] See Marc Bloch, Feudal Society (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1964 [19391).

[604] World Bank, World Development Reports, volumes for 1981–1989 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1981–89).

[605] The statistics on which these graphs are based are necessarily approximate, as countries frequently change their classification of educational institutions. In smaller countries such as Oman, students in military and police academies and in specialized courses sponsored by government ministries are excluded from the statistics on secondary and postsecondary education. Further, students whose education is supported by private funds, a significant phenomenon in a state with oil revenues, are underreported. See Sultanate of Oman (Development Council, Technical Secretariat), Statistical Year Book, volumes for 1979–1989 (Muscat: Directorate General of National Statistics).

[606] Ives Gonzalez-Quijano, “Le livre arabe et !’edition en Egypt,” Bulletin du Centre de Documentation Economiques, Juridiques et Sociales, Cairo. 15 (1989), special issue, p. 18.

[607] See Bourdieu, op. cit., and his La noblesse d’etat (Paris: Editions de Minuit, 1989). See also M’hammed Sabour, Homo Academicus Arabicus (Joensuu, Finland: University of Joensuu Pubheations in Social Sciences, no. 11, 1988).

[608] See Benedict R. Anderson, Imagined Communities (London: Verso, 1983).

[609] Michael w. Albin, “Moroccan-American Bibliography,” in The Atlantic Connection: 200 Years of Moroccan-American Relations, 7786–1986, ١٥٥.. Bookin-Weiner and M. El Mansour (Rabat: Edino Press, 1990), pp. 5–18.

[610] ١٥. ٢أُ٥أَاٱ٦ح The Cultural Uses of Print in Early Modern France, trans. L.G. Chochrane (Princetort, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1987), pp. 6–11.

[611] James Piscatori, Islam in a World of Nation-States (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986). See p. 19, where the author cites Hassan al-Turabi.

[612] Ibid., p. 29.

[613] Jean-Francois Legrain. “Islamistes et lutte national palestinienne dans les territoires occupes par Israel,” Revue francaise de science politique 6 (1986), p. 229.

[614] See Abd Assalam Yassine, La Revolution a / ’heure de l ’Islam (Grignac-la-Nerthe, France, 1981).

[615] Sayyid Qutb, Ma’alim fi al-tarlq [Signposts] (Cairo, Dar al-Shuruq, 1981).

[616] William E. Shepard, “Islam as a ‘System’ in the Later Writings of Sayyid Qutb,” Middle Eastern Studies 25 (1989), pp. 45–46.

[617] Anderson, op. cit.

[618] Hassan 11 (King of Morocco), Discours et interviews (Rabat: Ministry of Information, 1984), p. 162.

[619] See, for example, Bakir ibn Saʿīd A’washt, Dirasdt Islamlyah fi al-uşül al-Ibadlyah (Cairo, 1988). Ibâdî Muslims constitute just under half of Oman’s indigenous population of about 1.1 million. Significant Ibâdî communities are also found in East Africa, Libya, and southern Algeria. Non-Ibâdî examples of catechisms include Muhammad Hamidullah’s Introduction to Islam, 2nd ed. (Gary, IN, 1970), intended as a “correspondence course on Islam” and available in several languages, and Mehmet Soymen’s Concise Islamic Catechism, trans. I. Ekmeleddin (Ankara: Directorate of Religious Affairs, 1979), which was translated from Turkish into English as a “manual” for English-speaking Muslims.

[620] The country’s official name until 1970 was the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman, reflecting a de facto division of the northern half of the country from 1913, following a religious uprising in the northern interior, to 1955 (the coast was controlled by the sultan, the interior by a theocratic Ibâdî imam). With British support in 1955, the northern interior was assimilated into the sultan’s domains and the imam fled into exile in Saudi Arabia. A major uprising two years later required British intervention to suppress. From 1957 to 1970, Arab League supporters of the imam-in-exile urged the United Nations to recognize Oman’s northern interior as an independent state.

[621] Dale F. Eickelman, “Ibadism and the Sectarian Perspective,” in Oman: Economic, Social and Strategic Developments, ed. B.R. Pridham (London: Croom Helm, 1987), pp. 31–50: also the author’s “National Identity and Religious Discourse in Contemporary Oman,” International Journal of Islamic and Arabic Studies 6 (1989), pp. 1–20.

[622] John Watanabe, Mayan Saints and Souls in a Changing World (Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1992), p. 99. For Sumatra, see John Bowen, Sumatran Politics and Poetics: Gayo History, 1900–1989(New ١خلآةلأ, CT. ١a\e University Press, 1991).

[623] Eickelman, “National Identity,” p. 1–20

[624] See Ahmad ibn Hamad al-Khaini, Who Are the Ibadhis?, trans. Ahmad Hamud Al-Maamiry (Zanzibar: al-Khayirah Press, 1988): also his The Spread of Ibadhism in North Africa, trans. A.H. ALMaamiry (Muscat, 1989).

[625] al-Khaim, Who Are the Ibadhis?, p. 1.

[626] See Timothy Mitchell, “L’experience de femprisonnement dans le A cows amiste:’ لأ Intellectuels et militants de !’Islam contemporain, eA. G. Kepel and Y. Richard (Paris: Seuil, 1990), pp. 193–212.

[627] Sayf ibn Nâşir al-Kharûşî, ed. “Muhadarat al-’isrâ’ wa-al-mi’râj, yuhaddithuha samahat al-Shaykh Ahmad ibn Hamad al-Khaini” (Speech on Prophet Muhammad’s Night Journey to the Seventh Heaven by His Eminence Shaykh Ahmad ibn Hamad al-Khaini), TJman, 25 March 1988, p. 11.

[628] Dale F. Eickelman, “Religious Knowledge in Inner Qman,” Journal of Oman Studies 6 (1983), pp. 163–72.

[629] John E. Peterson, “Arab Nationalism and the Idealist Politician: The Career of Sulayman al-Bârünî,” in Law, Personalities, and Politics of the Middle East: Essays in Honor of Majid Khadduri, ةة. ١. آ·’ل؟>٢ة١ل·أ’ا هاأة G.s. ١٩ةآآاا% (Washington, DC: The Middle East Institute, 1988), pp. 31–50.

[630] Anderson, op. cit., pp. 15–16.

[631] United Nations General Assembly, 19th Session, The Question ofOman: Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Oman, A/5846, Annex no. 16, 22 January 1965.

[632] Ibid., p. 65.

[633] Times of Oman (Muscat), 17 December 1987, p. 5.

[634] Awasht, op. cit.

[635] Bowen, op. cit., pp. 242–57. See also Robert W. Hefner, “The Political Economy of Islamic Conversion of Modem East Java,” in Islam and the Political Economy of Meaning, ed. W.R. Roff (London: Croom Helm, 1987), pp. 53–78: Trikoli N. Madan, “Secularism in Its Place,” Journal of Asian Studies 6 (1987), pp. 747–593 and Ananda F. Wood, Knowledge Before Printing and After: The Indian Tradition in Changing Kerala (Delhi: Qxford University Press, 1985).

[636] Eickelman, “Religion in Polity and Society,” in The Political Economy of Morocco, ed. I William Zartman (New York, Praeger, 1987), p. 91.

[637] Yann Richard, L’islam chi’ite: Croyances et ideologies (Paris: Fayard, 1991): and personal communication, 1987.

 14. The Book in the Islamic World: A Selective Bibliography

Michael W. Albin

This bibliography aims to provide those interested in studies of the book in the Islamic world with an introductory list of research up to 1990. It is being issued on the occasion of the International Conference on the Book in the Islamic World, held 8–9 November 1990, at the Library of Congress. Although the field of Islamic book studies is of very recent vintage, there is a substantial body of scholarship from as early as the 19405 on relevant topics. Scholars from many countries, working independently, have contributed to this research. Indeed, a comprehensive bibliography would be many times larger than the current list. In order to orient the user to the material selected for inclusion, the bibliography is divided into four broad categories: General works, including classics of what has come to be called histoire du livre, as well as theoretical works on writing, reading, and liteacy; The Manuscript Tradition, under which heading are works concerned with the production and transmission of Islamic piety and learning, and the book arts in the classical age; Print Culture, which brings together research on the introduction of the printing press and congeries of effects brought about by printed books and periodicals; and, finally, the Book and Society, covering general works on the impact of books on the education and intellectual life of Muslims during the past two centuries.

Although it may not seem proper to single out works for special note, certain writings have become established as classics and must be consulted by specialists in Islamic culture as well as scholars from other disciplines who need general background on the book in Islam. The earliest of these may be F. Rosenthal's The Technique and Approach of Muslim Scholarship تآ.آر للم94ר١. Carter's The Invention of Printing: China and Its Spread Westward (1955) has been quoted and debated for what it has to say about the "barriers" to the printing press. The works by Ibn Durustawayh (ed. 1977) and al-Şülî (ed. 1922) represent a larger body of guides for writers and clerks in the age before printing. A. Radwan's work (1953) on the Bulaq Press of Cairo is the first and most important work to date on this famous press, and includes many documents affording insights into life in the printshop. Last, but perhaps most important of all, is the work that lay the foundation for Islamic book studies East and West, the Fihrist of Ibn al-Nadlm, happily available to US in English translation, thanks to Bayard Dodge.

By way of explanation and apology for the laige section on printing history let it be said that this is the result of the special interest of the compiler and the rich holdings of the Library of Congress in this field. The study of the history of the Islamic book being in its infancy, each and every epoch and facet of books, bookmaking, and book use is in need of further research. Of the making of books about books there should be no end.

 General

<biblio>

Aboussouan, Camille, ed. Exposition Le Livre et le Libanjusqu’a 1900. Paris: UNESCO, 1982. 408 pp.

Beeston, A.F.L. “The Evolution of the Arabic Language, the Arabic Script...and the Arab Books.” In Arabic Literature to the End of the Umayyad Period, V. 1, pp. 1–26. London: Cambridge University Press, 1983. 547 pp.

Caner, IVomas Francis. The Invention of Printing in China and its Spread Westward. 2nd ed. New York: The Ronald Press, 1955. 293 pp.

Chartier, Roger. “Frenchness in the History of the Book: From the History of Publishing to the History of Reading.” American Antiquarian Society Proceedings 97 (1988), 2: 299–329.

Co\e, ١0لأ ١٠, ed. Books in Our Future: Perspectives and Proposals. Washington, DC: The Library of Congress, 1987. 399 pp.

Einsenstein, Elizabeth L. The Printing Press as an Agent of Change. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979. 2 vols. 784 pp.

Febvre, Lucien, and H.-J. Martin. The Coming of the Book: The Impact of Printing, /4504800 Trans, by David Gerard. London: N.L.B., 1976. 378 pp.

The Future of the Book. Pl ٦٠. The Impact of the New Technologies, لاهأ هج. Priscilla Oakeshott and Clive Bradley; Pt. 2: The Changing Role ofReading, ١٥لا üre\ 3 .:New Technologies in Book Distribution, لاهب SKY Associates for the Center for the Book, The Library of Congress. Paris: UNESCO, 1982–84.

Goody, Jack. The Logic of Writing and the Organization of Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986. 213 pp.

Graham, William A. Beyond the Written Word: Oral Aspects of Scripture in the History of Religion. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987. 306 pp.

٢لاةاًل ,١كةذ٦\ ,ةح. The Arts of the Book in Central Asia, 14th-16th Centuries. By Oleg Akumushkin, et al. Boulder, Colorado: Shambhala, 1979. 314 pp.

Hamadah, Muhammad Mahir. al-Kitab al-‘Arabı: makhtutan wa-matbü’an. Riyadh: Dar al-’Ulüm, 1984. 315 pp.

١لحلآةل\هن, Eric A. The Muse Learns to Write: Reflections on Orality and Literacy from Antiquity to the Present. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1986. 144 pp.

al-Hibshi, ‘Abd Allah. al-Kitab fi al-hadarah al-Islamiyah. Kuwait: Sharikat al-Rabî’ân, 1982. 201 pp.

ل١٥لآة\-اهةهج/لاّاّاا The Fihrist of al-Nadim, a Tenth-Century Survey of Muslim Culture. Ed. and trans, by Bayard Dodge. New Yrk: Columbia University Press, 1970. 2 vols.

Kâtib Celebi. Kitab kashf aTzuniln ‘an asaml al-kutub wa-al-funûn. Ed. by Seferettin Yaltkaya and Kilisli Rifat Bilge. Istanbul: Milli Egitim Basimevi, 1971. 2 vols.

Losty, Jeremiah p. The Art ofthe Book in India. London: The British Library, 1982. 160 pp.

Mackensen, Ruth S. “Arabic Books and Libraries in the Omayyad Period.” American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures 52 (1935–36): 245–53: 53 (1936–37): 239–50: 54 (1937): 41–61: 56 (1939): 149–57, “Supplement Notes”.

٢آذ؟.,٦ةبتيأحا\. Interfaces of the Word: Studies in the Evolution of Consciousness and Culture. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1977. 352 pp.

Pedersen, Johannes. The Arabic Book. Trans, by Geoffrey French. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1984. 175 pp.

La Reforme etle livre: UEurope de rimprime 1517-V. 1570). جةح١ لاهب عللآبآدلأع Francois Gilmont. Paris: Les Editions du Cerf, 1990. 531 pp.

RosenthaX, ¥فاآةاً. The Technique and Approach of Muslim Scholar ship. Rome.’. Pontificum Institutum Biblicum, 1947. 74 pp.

Tsien, Tsuen-Hsuin. Written on Bamboo and Silk: The Beginnings of Chinese Books and Inscriptions. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1962. 233 pp.

Turk Kütüphaneciler Dernegi. Basim ve Yayinciligimiain 250, Yili Bilimsel Toplantisi, 10–11 Aralik 1979, Ankara. Bildiriler. Ankara: TKD 1980.

Issei, bıt\ʕ>am\. L’lnformation et la presse ojficielle en Egypte jusqu’a la fin de !’occupation Francaise. Recherches d’archeologie, de phililogie et d’histoire, xvn. Cairo: Institut Francais dArcheologie Orientale du Caire, 1975. 180 pp.

 The Manuscript Tradition

لدحلح, l\a. The Rise of the North Arabic Script and its Kur’anic Development. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, Oriental Institute Publication, 1939. 103 pp.

Arnold, Sir T.W., and A. Grohmann. The Islamic Book: A Contribution to its Art and History from the VII-XVH Century. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Co., 1929. 130 pp. and plates.

XXoscXt, ٢لدا\٦١ةاً ¥.., et. a\. Islamic Bindings * Bookmaking: A Catalogue of an Exhibition, The Oriental Institute, The University of Chicago, May 18-August 18, 1981. Chicago: Oriental Institute, University of Chicago, 1981. 235 pp.

XTtttttgjet, X)avıA. The Illuminated Book, Its History and Production. New eA. London: Faber, 1967. 514 pp.

Gratzl, E., K.A.C Creswell, and R. Ettinghausen. “Bibliographic des islamischen Einbandkunst, 1871 bis 1956.)” In Ars Orientalis II (1957): 519–40.

Huart, Clement. Les calligraphes et les miniaturistes de l’Orient musulman. Reimpression of the 1908 edition. Osnabriick: Otto Zeller Verlag, 1972.

Ibn Durustawayh, ‘Abdallah ibn Ja’far. Kitab al-kuttab. Ed. by Ibrahim al-Samarrâ’î. Kuwait: Dar al-Kutub alThaqaflyah, 1977. 161 pp.

Inayatullah, s. “Bibliophilism in Medieval Islam.” Islamic Culture 12 (1938): 155–69.

James, David. QuPans of the Mamluks. New York: Thames & Hudson, 1988. 270 pp.

al-Khatlb al-Baghdadi, Ahmad ibn ‘Al. TaqyidaT’ilm. Ed. by Youssef Eche. Damascus: Dar Ihya’ al-Sunnah, 1975. 195 pp.

Levey, Martin. “Medieval Arabic Bookmaking and its Relations to Early لاسساً ’آة\ة للألآ ’ة١٢٢ء١ة<ح١\١٢ع١تل Transactions of the American Philosophical Society NS 52, no. 4 (1962): 3–79. (Includes translation of al-Sufyânî’s work.)

Lings, Martin. The quranic Art of Calligraphy and Illumination. London: World of Islam Festival Trust, 1976. 242 pp.

Minorsky, V., ed. and trans. Calligraphers and Painters: A Treatise by Qadi Ahmad, Son of Mir-Munshi. Washington, DC: Freer Gallery of Art, 1959.

al-Munajjid, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. Dirasatfi târîkh aTkhatt al-‘Arabî. Beirut: Da al-Kitab al-Jadid, 1972. 151 pp.

al-Munajjid, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. aTKitab al-‘Arabîal-makhtüt ila al-qarn al-‘âshir. Cairo: League of Arab States, 1960

لآذ١١لاة. The Unique Ibn al-Bawwab Manuscript in the Chester Beatty Library. Dublin: E. Walker (Ireland), 1955. 36 pp.

Robinson, Basil w., ed. Islamic Painting and the Arts of the Book. London: Faber and Faber, 1976. 322 pp.

Safadi, Yasin H. Islamic Calligraphy. London: Thames and Hudson, 1978. 144 pp.

Sarre, Friedrich Paul. Islamic Bookbindings. Trans, by F.D. O’Byrne. London: Kegan Raul, 1923. 197 pp.

Schimmel, Annemarie. Calligraphy and Islamic Culture. New York: New York University Press, 1984. 264 pp.

al-Sijistani, ’Abdallah ibn al-Ash’ath. Kitab al-masahif. Cairo: Mu’assasat Qurtubah, 1986. 223 pp.

al-Sufyani, Abü al-’Abbâs. “Sina’at tafsir al-kutub wa-hall al-dhahab.” New ed. by I. al-Samarrâ’î. Majallat al-Majma’ al-‘Ilmî al-‘Iraqi 8 (1961): 335–42.

al-Şuh, Muhammad Ibn Yahya. Adab al-kuttab. Ed. by M. Bahjat al-Athari. Baghdad: al-Maktabah al-‘Arabiyah, 1922. 272 pp.

7ع‌لاًا ةل-لأللآا,جةة١ا. Musawwar al-khatt al-‘Arabi. Baghdad: al-Majma’ al Iraqi, 1968. 410 pp.

Zayyat, H. “al-Wiraqah wa-al-warrâqün.” al-Mashriq 47 (1953): 305–50.

</biblio>

 The Print Culture

<biblio>

‘Abduh, Ibrahim. Jartdat al-Ahram. Cairo: Dar al-Ma’arif, 1951. 551 pp.

’Abduh, Ibrahim. Tatawwur al-şîhâfah ûl-Mişrîyah, 1798–1951. 3rded. Cairo: Maktabat al-Adab bi-al-Jamamiz, 1951. 322 pp.

Abdulrazak, Fawzi. “The Kingdom of the Book: The History of Printing as an Agent of Change in Morocco between 1865 and 1912.)” Ph.D. dissertation, Boston University, 1989.

Ad, Yûsuf. “Kayfiyat intaj al-kitab qabla al-qarnal-tasi’ ‘ashar.” al-Masarrah nos. 747–46 (March-April 1988): 231–40: nos. 749–50 (May-June 1988): 330–40.

Albin, Michael w. “The Iranian Publishing Industry: A Preliminary Appraisal.” Ubri 36, no. 1 (1986): 1–23.

MIXl. al-Lajnah al-janniyah li-dirasat ahruf altibd’ah al-‘Ârabîyah. Cavwy. ALECSO, 1971. 173 pp.

‘Asim, ‘Ali Husayn. al-Tiba ah al-hâdîthah. 6 vols. Cairo: al-Matabi’ al-Amiriyah, 1959–62.

Babinger, Franz. “Die Einfiihrung des Buchdruckes in Persien.” Zeitschrift des Deutschen Vereins fur Buchwesen und Schrifttum 11–12 (1921): 141–42.

Bacel, Paul. “Abdallah Zaher et son imprimerie Arabe.” Echos d’Orient 11 (1908): 281–87.

Balagna, Josee. L’Impritnerie arabe en Occident. Paris: Editions Maisonneuve & Larose, 1984. 153 pp.

Baysal, Jale. Muteferrika’dan Birinci Meşrutiyete Kadar Osmanli Türklerinin Bastiklari Kitaplar. Istanbul: Edebiyat Fakültesi, 1968. 88 pp.

Bulliet, Richard V. “Medieval Arabic tarsh: A Forgotten Chapter in the History of Printing.” Journal of the American Oriental Society 107., no. 3 (July-Sept. 1987): 427–38.

aLBustam, Fu’âd Ifram. “al-Shammas ‘Abdallah Zakhir.” al-Masarrah (July 1948), special issue.

Chenoufi, Moncef. “Le Probleme des origines de rimprimerie et de la presse arabes en Tunisie dans sa relation avec la renaissance “Nahda” (1847–1887).)” Ph.D. dissertation, University de Lille III, 1974.

Demeerseman, A. “Les donnees de la controverse autour du probleme de rimprimerie.” IBLA 17, nos. 65–66 (1954): 148, 113–40.

Demeerseman, A. “Une parente meconnue de l’imprimerie arabe et tunisienne: La lithographic.” IBLA 16 (1953): 347–88.

Floor, W.M. “The First Printing Press in Iran.” Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenlandischen Gesellschaft 130 (1980): 369–71.

٢هل٠١ةآد,1هة. أ£ debut de l’imprimerie arabe a Istanbul et en Syrie: tvolution de Tenvironnement culturel, 1706-/707 Tunis: University de Tunis, Institut superieur de documentation, 1985. 312 pp.

Gdoura, Wahid. “Le livre arabe imprime en Europe: Une etape importante dans les relations Orient-Occident (1514–1700). Revue maghrebine de documentation 1 (1983): 37–68.

Gerçek, Slim Niizhet. Turk matbaaciligi. Istanbul: al-Diya, 1928. 111 pp.

Groc, G., and I. Caglar. La presse francaise de Turquie de 1795 a nos jours: Histoire et catalogue. Istanbul: ISIS, 1985.

” 0لآا٠١حةأا. Pour une typographic arabe: Contribution technique a la democratisation de la culture arabe. Paris: Sindbad, 1975. 193 pp.

Hitti, P.K. “The First Book Printed in Arabic.” Princeton University Library Chronicle 4 (1942): 5–9.

ا١لأاحهةههةل ,7اع. Histoire de la presse indig’ene en Algerie: Des origines jusqu ’en 1930. Algiers: ENAL, 1983. 40 PP•

لآذ Ebekiv Aciklamah Turk kimya eserleri bibliyografyası. Istanbul: IRCICA, 1985. 148 pp.

İşkit, Server. Turkiyede neşriyat hareketleri tarhinine bir bakxs. Istanbul: Devlet Basımevi, 1939. 484 pp.

Kabacali, Alpay. Turk kitap tarihi. Istanbul: Cem Yayinevi, 1989. 158 pp.

al-Kattam, Zayn al-‘Âbidîn. al-Şihâ/ah al-Maghribiyah nasha’tuha wa-tatawwuruha, /820-/966. 1970 249 pp.

Khalifah, Sha’ban. Harakat nashr al-kutub fi Misr. Cairo: Dar al-Thaqafah, 1974.

Krek, Miroslav. “The Enigma of the First Arabic Printed Book from Movable Type.” Journal of Near Eastern Studies 38, no. 3 (July 1979): 203–12.

Krek, Miroslav. A Gazetteer of Arabic Printing. Weston, MA: The Author, 1977. 138 pp.

“Matba’a.” Encyclopedia of Islam. New edition. Vol. 4, pp. 794–807.

ا١md, آدكلا\أة١٥. Ltcriture arabe en question: Les proiets de l’Academie de Langue Arabe du Cairede 1938 a 1968. Beirut: Dar al-Mashriq, 1971. 142 PP-

Nasrallah, Joseph. Llmprimerie au Liban. Troisieme conference generale de !’UNESCO. Beirut: Sous la patronage de la Commission Libanaise du Mois de !’UNESCO, Novembre-Decembre 1948. 160 pp.

Nuovo, Angela. ٤٤ 11 Corano Arabo ritrovato.” La Bibliofilia 89, no. 3 (Sept-Dec. 1987): 247–71.

Radwan, Abu al-Futuh. Târîkh Matba’at Bulaq. Cairo: al-Matba’ah al-Amiriyah, 1953. 523 pp.

Râ’în, Ismâ’H. Awalm chapkhanah-i Iran. Tehran: Inüshârât-i Ruznamah-i ‘Alik,” 1969. 27 pp.

al-Rifâ’î, Shams al-Dîn. Târîkh al-sihafah alSilnyah. Cairo: Dar al-Ma’ârf, 1969 2 vols.

Şâbât, Khalil. Târîkh aTtiba ahfi al-Sharq al-‘Arabî. 2nd ed. Cairo: Dar al-Ma’arif, 1966. 378 pp.

Sarkis, Salim. Ghara’ib aUktubfi. Cairo: al-Mushir, 1896.

Sarkis, Yusuf I. Mujarn al-matbu’at al-Arabiyah wa-al-mu’arrabah. Cairo: Matba’at Sarkis, 1928. 2,024 cols, plus indexes.

Stewart. Charles c. “A New Source on the Book Market in Morocco in 1930 and Islamic in West Africa.” Hesperis-Tamdua 11 (1970): 209–46.

لةاي١, أح\\انج١لآةيلآ. Der islamische Bucheinband des Mittelalters. ٦Ne\s١ 0a0ew. Harrassowitz, 1962. 193 pp.

</biblio>

 The Book and Society

Abd al-Kanm, Ahmad ‘Izzat. Tarikh al-ta’lîmfî ’asr Muhammad ‘All. Cairo: al-Nahdah, 1938. 798 pp.

Arasteh, Reza. Education and Social Awakening in Iran, /850-/968. 2104 ed.

Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1969. 237 pp.

Berkes, Niyazi. The Development of Secularism in Turkey. Montreal: McGill University Press, 1964. 537 pp.

Buheiry, Marwan R., ed. Intellectual Life in the Arab East, /890-/939· Beirut: American University of Beirut, 1981. 192 pp.

آدةلآ٠٦؟>0اأ ,آحهلاكلآ ١٦. Reform in the Ottoman Empire, 1856–1876. Wmiow. Princeton University Press, 1963. 479 pp.

Dodge, Bayard. Muslim Education in Medieval Times. Washington, DC: Middle East Institute, 1962.

Eche, Youssef. Les bibliotheques arabes publiques et semi-publiques en Mesopotamie, en Syrie et en fcgypte au Moyen Age. Damascus: Institut Francais de Damas, 1967. 447 pp.

١٩ع١م0أ-لأ١أ حلآلآلآ ,١. An Introduction to the History of Education in Modern Egypt. London: Luzac, 1938. 503 pp.

Hourani, Albert. Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1798–1939. London: Oxford University Press, 1962. 403 pp.

SlyWovAaAosephS. Education and Modernisation in the Middle East.٢ج لالأة•. Cornell University Press, 1973. 477 pp.

</biblio>

 Appendix: Ottoman Imperial Documents Relating to tlie History of Books and Printing

 A Copy of a Decree Issued by His Imperial Majesty the Padishah Murad Han{1}

Be it here by known to all governors, sea captains, judges, and other officials stationed in the Imperial domain that two European merchants by the name of Anton and Orasyu [Horatio] Bandini, being bearers of Imperial permission to conduct trade, are buying and selling and doing business by importing certain goods and valuable printed books and pamphlets in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish. Some persons are opening up their shipments by force, and with little or no payment at all are taking their wares and interfering with their trade. It is therefore directed that the said merchants and their agents and employees be allowed to carry on their business in safety and that their merchandise be not seized, and that whosoever disobeys this decree of mine be reported immediately. It is also ordered that their books and goods be purchased in return for the payment of the correct price and that there should no longer be any complaints in this matter. Written in Constantinople on the first of Zilhicce in the year of the Hijrah 996.

 As It Becomes Necessary It Will Be Accomplished
(a Copy of the Imperial Rescript, a Copy of the Noble Imperial Order){2}

This exalted royal order is given to that pinnacle of illustrious persons and notables, the official of the Grand Vezir, Sait, and to that educated select servant of the Palace, Ibrahim, may his nobility increase. It is known that upon the establishment of the rising sun of the religion of Muhammad and that with the brightness of the dawn of Ahmed’s religious community, may God bless him, and it is understood that since that time the enlightened and meritorious masters of religion, God bless them, wrote books and tracts of science and knowledge in order to protect and conserve the verses of the Koran, the traditions of the Prophet, and the entirety of knowledge. And these words served to maintain the good order of the people, and make known the laws of religion and state, and the organization of the state and community. Editing books and writings and collecting eloquent collections of poetry, they progressed and wrote histories and accounts and worked for the preservation and defense of knowledge and works of culture, facilitating and disseminating sciences and arts. People knowledgeable in Arabic and Persian profited from their explaining and teaching, and organizing the regulations for each of the particular sciences and disciplines. This being proper, in order that they would possess eternal happiness in this world and the next and gain a good reward, they did not cease writing valuable and knowledgeable books and tracts. However, with the passing of days and with the years going by as the Chingizids, created chaotic disturbances and Hulâgu rose to power, and with resplendent Andalusia in the hands of the Europeans, and with the convulsions of wars, killing, and destruction, most literary works have disappeared with their authors. Therefore, today in the Muslim lands the dictionaries of Cevheri and Van Kulu in the Arabic language, and books of history and, copies of scientific works which were burned are rare. Also, people did not give proper care and attention, and lacked concern about copying, so works were not carefully copied. These rare books are an inspiration to students of the arts and sciences and to seekers af knowledge.

Among the technical processes, printing is like coining money and impressing paper with a signet ring. Books produced by printing cause several thousand volumes to be produced from a single volume, all of which are accurate copies. With little effort there is great return, making this a desirable activity to pursue. By virtue of your having composed a learned tract about, and having expertise in, the various above-mentioned activities, you will see to the necessities and expenditures without loss of time, so that on a fortunate day this Western technique will be unveiled like a bride and will not again be hidden. It will be a reason for Muslims to say prayers for you and praise you to the end of time. Excepting books of religious law, Koranic exegesis, the traditions of the Prophet, and theology, you asked the Radishah’s permission in the aforementioned tract to print dictionaries, history books, medical books, astronomy and geography books, travelogues, and books about logic. The aforementioned tract was referred to that very learned religious scholar, that most meritoriously pious mariner on the stormy sea of religious questions, that wellspring of the river of legal opinions, that wearer of the garment of piety, the Şeyh-Ül-Islüm and learned jurisconsult, Mevlana Abdullah, may Almighty God increase his goodness. The question was asked: Zeyd claiming expertise in the science of printing, illuminating, and producing copies of the letters and words of dictionaries, logic, philosophy, and astronomy texts, and like works, thus being able to produce exact copies of these books, is there not permission in the Holy Law for this good work? The one who is an expert at printing seeks a legal opinion because producing an accurate edition of a work in a short time, with no errors and many copies, results in there being an increased number of books, which is a benefit to the community. The answer is: Being able to produce this great benefit, this person receives permission with the condition that several educated persons be appointed as proof readers. Great benefit will come from the order based on that legal opinion, allowing for the exception of the religious subjects mentioned in the tract written with the pearl pen of wisdom. This legal opinion is well prepared and it stands out in a vast ocean as exemplary in the Şeyh’s career. What falls from his pen in the form of authoritative opinion is an overflowing garden, a basin of sweet water, a river which waters the desert with springs. The Imperial permission becomes proper on account of this well-explained authoritative declaration, this perfectly eloquent and noble opinion. Copies will be printed of dictionaries, and books about logic, astronomy and similar subjects, and so that the printed books will be free from printing mistakes, the wise, respected and meritorious religious scholar specializing in Islamic Law, the excellent Kazi of Istanbul, Mevlana Ishak, and Selaniki’s Kazi, Mevlana Sahib, and Ghalata’s Kazi, Mevlana Asad, may their merits be increased, and from the illustrious religious orders, the pillar of the righteous religious scholars, the Seyh of the Kasim Paşa Mevlevihane, Mevlana Musa, may his wisdom and knowledge increase, will oversee the proofreading. With the actual setting up of the press, the above-mentioned books in history, astronomy, geography, logic and so forth, after they pass the review of the learned scholars, shall become numerous. However, you will take special care to see that the copies remain free from error and depend on the noble learned men for this. Ordered in the middle of Zulka’de in the year 1139 in Istanbul the protected.

 In the Name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate. And by That Seek God’s Aid, the Tract Entitled, “the Usefulness of Printing”{3}

It is known that it is the inevitable will of God and sovereign divine decree that a community, a society, a people, or an individual, having a desire [to fulfill], becomes successful, blessed, and distinguished if the ruler assents. It is the will of God to arrange everything for the benefit of His servants, who are people of perfect faith, who, by means of His perfect beneficence, unveil the bride of His kindness and expose His hidden desires. This humble, ineloquent person of low endowment, who has need of Almighty God’s mercy, in order to become educated, some years ago sought a degree of clear understanding of the glory of ancient peoples and the adventures of the children of Adam. I read a number of histories of ancient nations and works of various religious men; like an ant I industriously studied, but achieved only a poor understanding. There came to me a sudden, clear inspiration, that there are means and instruments that societies and groups of people could use for benefiting the organization of important human matters and for the glory and power of the empire and the state by which the various ancient states mentioned above became well-ordered, powerful, and enlightened, and preserved and perpetuated their religions. And in countries without law or order there was brought into existence order, intelligence, merit, and right guidance. They [the ancients] did not pause for one second in making inventions, artifices, and praiseworthy works. Certainly, modern men follow the path of the ancients; at present in many a state and nation, various educated scholars are producing laws and organizing state and society. This is a means of perpetuating the state organization and of preserving the history of the state and society. It is a means of protection, and a defense against change and alteration on account of falsehoods or untruths according to religion and morals, and a way of creating safety from sudden catastrophes and the changes arising in the poor memory of men caused by the passing of days and years, thus enabling the laws and ordinances of the state and society to be kept correctly, as if they were a compact inscribed in stone, copper, or iron. They have made many books in order to create a means to knowledge and education by open discussion, and they have made an easy road to invention and innovation. If this point is studied intensely, with the aim of one’s becoming learned in the goodness of religion and the merits of states, then these books, written as if on a tablet created by strength and purpose from emerald, ruby, gold, and silver, are a means for the religion and state of Islam to continue the glory of the state and the good ordering of the important affairs of the community. Books are also a tool for perfecting the nation and the state, a method of increasing the majesty of the empire, and of becoming the protector and preserver, until the last day, of arts and sciences and recorded events from the miscalculations of man. And these writings create a solidarity in the community against factions and disorder, and the laws and regulations preserve the good order of the community from change and innovation. Without need for further explanation, it suddenly became very plain that as an aid and help to the general public, the path to follow was to make an effort to publish in the world, in large numbers, books on the necessary arts and sciences, books that are sound and accurate and in every way acceptable. This [printing of books] is a noble profession and beautiful calling. In order to become free from public and private questioning, and in order for him to become responsible for the completion of this important work, and so that it is clear that he is on a true, straight road in this work, a royal indication and command to this servant is necessary.

 An Explanation of the Benefits of Printing Books

Being interested in the history of ancient nations, it is not obscured or veiled from the eyes that the Beni Israil, in accordance with the commands of their scriptures, have gained distinction through their preserving of the holy Torah, the preservation and conservation of the scriptures of “the protected peoples” being necessary. For fear of their being miscopied by passing through the hands of numerous copyists, they did not seek to publish widely their religious books and the Torah. The destructive war of Nebuchadnezzar occurred because of their sinfulness in Jerusalem. By this evil fortune of the Beni Israil, Jerusalem was completely conquered, the Ark of the Covenant destroyed, and the copies of the Torah and important books gathered by the people in their homes were thrown into the fire. Therefore, most of the books were lost to posterity. The commands of the Holy Law were the means of education for the Beni Israil, but the true copies and unreliable transmissions thereof became indistinguishable, and the people fell under the authority and leadership of Jesus. When the Christians collected the verses of the noble Gospels, they were heedless of their benefits, and were careless and lazy about preserving them and did not think intelligently about publishing this knowledge among the people. When sainted Jesus, God praise that most illustrious prophet, was taken up to the precincts of heaven, the Christians, falling to quarreling about dogma, splitting into many factions, became followers of false paths and ways of unbelief. Valuing the majesty of the Islamic state and the revealed law of the Prophet, may God strengthen, exalt, and glorify him until the day of judgment, the elders of Islam were not heedless of this abyss of horrors nor were they confused about this source of peril. They shunned and avoided this degree of laziness. With the manifestation of the Koran in great glory, the elders took care that every word of the proclaimed Holy Law, every document or page which had been collected and written down, especially the traditions of the Prophet (that sublime path), they made sure that these original texts and the names of their transmitters were collected and organized into books and collections of wisdom. In this matter they desired to copy and write down without defect their remembrances and the acquired knowledge of the Muslims, preserving it in its details and generality, and they wished to disseminate it and make it available to the general Muslim public. This dissemination was a blessing to the entire community. However, with this community being continuously busy with jihad to the East and West, in a short time the majority of Muslims were confused about the splendid miracles, blessed events, and meritorious, blessed prayers. Learned religious leaders, perfect teachers, and the wisest interpreters of law and religious questions, using the Koran, the traditions, and the consensus of the community, and applying the methodology of analogy, they expended much energy bringing to light accurate interpretations and a sound methodology of interpretation in order to correct false practices and to achieve good. Religious scholars did not cease writing books on various sciences and arts or educating and sending forth students in order to guide the affairs of the people of the community. They produced innovative works, and they knew the blessings of paradise because of the benefit and merit they brought to themselves and their community by this splendid effort. They enabled the struggle for righteousness to continue in this community from its beginning and until the last day. Both the earliest and the latest scholars produced books and compilations which were collected together, but later they were destroyed by war and violence, especially during the evil time of violent confusion caused by the tribulations of the Chingizids when the books of Central Asia were thrown into the Jayhun, leaving no trace behind. When Hulâgu conquered the Abbasids, the books and compositions of the scholars and writers were dumped in the Tigris and their writings washed away, and thus beautiful and intelligent works vanished without leaving a trace. Later, after a long period of the tribulations of this world, the country of Andalusia was torn from the arms of Islam. In the Maghrib, the sun of science set in the oppressive darkness of the Europeans. In former times, the Umayyads conquered the Frankish factions in Andalusia, and by several paths came to great wealth, and they produced many Islamic books. However, now, in the lands of Islam, it is a fact that these books are rare and only a handful remain; throughout all the Islamic domain these books are rare. In the same manner as mentioned above, disturbed conditions, destructive events, and destroying fires each became a terrible malady for books, causing students of the sciences to suffer severe difficulties. The men of the current age, being followers of ease and being exhausted, and having debilitating wealth and ease, ignore beauty; consequently, innovative works are not appreciated or preserved. On one hand, the attitude toward the importance of many works, and of books generally, is laziness and heedlessness, and to a degree learning is despised, so that in this happy place, this mighty city, this vast country, may God preserve it from calamities and evil fortune, in the entire Ottoman domains, dictionaries, like Cevheri and Van Kulu in the Arabic language, and the necessary copies of books on history and biography, and works and volumes on like subjects that are important, are scarce and rare. It goes without saying that these books are brimming with information.

 An Explanatory Summation About Printing

Among the arts, the art of printing is a beneficial one; among productive activities, printing is one full of benefits. Printing is a type of inscribing analogous to the action of engraving and writing by the pressing of words and lines on a page, it is like coining money or inscribing walls, or like the impression from a signet ring when pressed down upon a document.

The first benefit among the benefits of printing: ل١ة ١حاآحدا٢ةةا\٠ضة ٦١ innovative art is a clear explainer of the source and wellspring of all the sources, and is an answer to the needs of the people for Islamic books. In order to master Arabic, accurate and comprehensive dictionaries are important. Furthermore, if there are numerous books on history, astronomy, logic, the affairs of the state and nation, and geography, this altogether will create tremendous educational benefits.

The second benefit: From the first appearance of the religion and empire of Islam, in order to well and properly oiganize and strengthen religion, state, and the important affairs of the community, numtiers of interpreters and compilers of nobility and intelligence made compilations and wrote books using the tool of interpretation. The work of the noble compilers and interpreters will become a means of renewal and restoration, because newly printed books, both numerous and accurate, being restored and invigorated as if they had been recently authored, will publish and present to the Muslims all the knowledge of their authors.

The third benefit: With books produced by the art of printing, it is possible to make beautiful calligraphy and splendid specimens of correct composition, eloquent expression, accurate arrangement, and excellent diction, without any mistakes, flaws, or errors. Students of the sciences, in studying and examining such books, are safe from mistakes and are secure from wasting time, because for teaching and learning, accurate texts are a necessity. It becomes unnecessary to compare many texts in order to obtain a correct understanding, and this facilitates learning in the sciences. A peculiarity of books written by pen is that the ink fades due to dampness and drying, and the writing disappears. However, using the methods of printing, its products’ ink becomes stable and enduring, and the illustrations and text are not spoiled by water and dampness; they are safe and secure from the misfortune of becoming wet.

The fourth benefit: That printed works become items of commerce is another beneficial result. When a book is printed, there are several thousand exactly identical copies, and printing is a means of producing many clear, excellent, perfect books in a short time. Therefore, books become inexpensive, and students both rich and poor can obtain books and acquire a proper education in the desirable sciences and diplomas in religious studies.

The fifth benefit: With printing, the indexes and tables of contents of books can be made both by summary and in detail. The summary will appear at the beginning of the book, the detailed listing at the end. In the beginning of the books, by means of Indian numerals, will be indicated the proper place of the chapters and sections, thereby organizing the contents of the book so that the sections and chapters are indicated. If it is necessary to refer to the book, its contents and organization are immediately accessible. The second index allows the terms and words used in the book to be found instantly. This index will be placed at the end of the book. This index is to be organized alphabetically and the sought-after information found by this method has its place in the book indicated.

The sixth benefit: With the price of books becoming low, every single person can possess books, and furthermore, the widespread dissemination of books in town and country serves as a means of reducing ignorance.

The seventh benefit: By becoming numerous through the printing process, books become a foundation for the strength of the empire. Spreading throughout the Ottoman domains, the books of noble and desired sciences will become numerous in the cities and towns, and the libraries will become full of books.

Furthermore, this country’s students will become better educated, and the outlying regions will become more settled and better organized on account of having more books.

The eighth benefit: In the Islamic world the divine duty of jihad has not been abandoned and the warriors are firm. The illustrious Ottoman state, may God preserve it until judgement day, possesses thunderous canons, fierce incendiaries, powerful muskets, and in the activities of the science of war is like the various European masters and its enemies do not pose a difficulty. In the activity of jihad the kings from the Ottoman house, may God support them to the day of judgment, are the leaders and most perfect examples for the Muslims. Because they have attained the perfection of glory and fame among Muslims due to their waging jihad, they will enliven and invigorate the Muslims, and are exalted on account of this. However, it is more worthy to assent to printing, that being a way to make many books exist in the shadow of their royal happiness.

The ninth benefit: All the Christian countries, in making collections in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish, found these books valuable. The aforementioned books, upon being printed, became important and particularly desirable; law.

medicine, Euclidean geometry, and other such works were printed in the three languages, and the quality of the books thus produced can clearly be seen. They are fill! of misspellings and mistakes, and the letters and lines are not easily read. There is no one, finding in his hands a book in Western letters and style, who will see in it any semblance of beauty and decoration or correctness in spelling and orthography. These books are being found in the lands of Islam, having been produced in quantity, and they have become desirable, and are inexpensive. However, their quality and finish is as given above. Those buying and selling books in the Islamic countries are gathering and collecting a benefit, while the Muslims are lower than the unbelievers and polytheists who are taking precedence. In this particular matter, that is, working to make the Muslims take precedence in the book trade, there is a necessary incumbent responsibility, and this gives life to the hope of being allowed to print books.

The tenth benefit: The particularities of this beneficial art’s present establishment in the Ottoman state, as mentioned several times in thorough speech and writing, giving an accurate and certain knowledge to all that this is a most useful and beneficial activity, are such that because of its merits several people have become hopeful of establishing this activity and have made applications to do so. If the discussed activity is a desirable activity, but because of many problems is difficult to accomplish, and if on the verge of its occurring a happy fortune does not appear and there is truly delay, the source and reason for these problems exist in the preparation. At the time of consenting by royal order to the completion of this matter, for the strengthening of science, the lord of the fortunate conjunction and of the age, the conqueror of nations of Iran and Turan, the glorious, the noble, the powerful Emperor of the world, may God exalt and strengthen him, with His Majesty's support your servant will overcome doubt and solve the difficulties with God's help, and this Western activity become visible where it was formerly invisible. This art's introduction being arranged, and its appearing on a propitious day because of the Imperial assent, it will cause a glorious exaltation of fortune and unceasing joy. Books, like those mentioned above, coming into being in the Ottoman domains, completely aside from their meeting the needs of the Muslims, is an important event in itself, ennobling Islam and being a means to happiness of the Muslims. The various peoples of the world, that is, the Arabs and foreigners, the people of the Turks, Tatars and Turkmen, Kurds, Uzbeks, Chagatay, Hindi and Sindi, Persians and Maghribis, Yemenis, Greeks, Ethiopians and the Sudanese, all together having been exalted by Islam, they have need of various kinds of books. Therefore, introducing and bringing about this important and great work certainly increases and augments the glory and majesty of the Ottoman state, and is the cause of a glorious victory for the Empire and a splendid preface and a glorious superscription, lasting until the day of judgment. It will be remembered with goodness by the tongues of the world and will bring forth the good prayers of all believers; without dispute, printing is a means to enliven and make happy the Muslims.

Except for those on law, exegesis, traditions, and theology, books will be printed, such as dictionaries, histories, medical texts and science books, philosophy and astronomy books, and information about nature, geography, and travelogues. By its grace and majesty, publication of the glorious royal rescript giving royal permission in this matter from the exalted world-renowned Emperor, defender of the faith's exalted position, is fitting. His support, through his glorious name, for establishing this innovative Western technique in order to produce abundant numbers of books, is an excellent work, making his honor independent of the need of proof. The majestic legal concurrence comprising the Imperial rescript and the legal opinion of the religious authorities is necessary; therefore, this noble and majestic command will be printed at the beginning of the book to be published and will be independent of the text of the book, making it apparent to one and all that printing is desirable and approved. Furthtrmore, his excellency, the Şeyh-ül-Islâm, that excellent juris-consult and master of the masters of religion, his approval of this beneficial activity, this source of benefits, and his approval of this great endeavor, this noble striving, and of its being the cause for benefits to one and all, will also be published. In setting about this activity, the pronouncement of royal permission, the indication of noble support from the leaders of the religious scholars, and the other self-apparent merits of printing indicate that in every way printing conforms to the Holy Law. Furthermore, with the pronouncement and statement of support being placed in the beginning of every copy, the doubts of all people will be erased. When the book is printed, in order to be accurate and free of any defect or mistake in respect to the perfection of its composition and language, by our own consent, three or four persons will be employed as proofreaders, with their appointment being included in the royal order which is to be printed in the beginning of the first book from the press; this will act as an assurance to the people. Finally, by way of introduction, a brief summary of the merits and benefits of printing will be presented in a clear, two or three page tract in order to inform the community. All will then become cognizant and all the world will offer her their blessings and prayers.

<right>

Translated by

Christopher M. Murphy

</right>

 Contributors

Michael W. Albin is chief of the Order Division at the Library of Congress. From 1976 until 1985, he directed the Library’s field office in Cairo, Egypt. His area of scholarly interest is the history of printing in the Islamic World. He is the author of numerous articles on this subject and has been awarded a Fulbright Islamic Civilization grant to pursue research in the archives and libraries of Iraq and Tunisia.

George N. Atiyeh has been head of the Near East Section at the Library of Congress since 1967. He was educated at the American University of Beirut and the University of Chicago. Before joining the Library, he taught at the University of Puerto Rico and chaired its Department of Humanities. He has authored and edited several books and articles, among which are al-Kindi: The Philosopher of the Arabs, The Contemporary Middle East, 1948–1973: A Bibliography, and Arab Civilization: Challenges and Responses.

Ramzi Baalbaki is an associate professor of Arabic and director of the Center for Middle Eastern Studies at the American University of Beirut. He is a specialist in Semitic languages and the author of several works on Arabic, ‘ا١٢ل١هدا١ علاً Semitic Arabic Writing: Studies in the History of Writing and its Semitic Roots.

Jacques Berque is one of the leading French scholars on the Arab world. He has taught and lectured in many Arab countries and at the prestigious College de France, of which he is an honorary professor. He is the author of more than forty books and articles. His book, Les Arabes d ’hier a demain, was translated into several languages. He is considered one of the top authorities on North Africa. Professor Berque has recently published a new translation of the Koran into French.

Filiz Çağman is curator of the Topkapi Palace Museum Library. She is a well-known scholar of Islamic art and author of several studies, including Topkapi Saray Museum: Islamic Miniature Art and Etudes Medievales et Patrimonie Ture.

Dale F. Eickelman is Ralph and Richard Lazarus Professor of Anthropology and Human Relations at Dartmouth College. Since 1968, he has spent over six years in the Middle East, including time devoted to extensive field research in Morocco and the Sultanate of Oman, with shorter stays in Egypt, Iran, Iraq, and Tunisia. His publications include Moroccan Islam (Arabic translation, 1989); The Middle East: An Anthropological Approach (Japanese translation, 1988); Knowledge and Power in Morocco; and numerous scholarly articles and contributions to edited books. Currently, he is completing a study on changing perceptions of state authority and religious legitimacy in the Arab Gulf. He was president of the Middle East Studies Association of North America.

Wadād al-Qāḍī is professor of History at the University of Chicago, and taught previously at Yale University and the American University of Beirut. She is the author of a work on the Kisamyah movement in history and literature, and the editor of Dirasat ’Arablyah wa-Islamlyah, a festschrift in honor of Dr. Ihsan ‘Abbas. She was awarded the 1993 King Faisal prize for literature.

David a. King is professor of History of Science at the Institut fiir Geschichte der Naturwissenschaften, Johann Wolfgang Goethe Universitat. He also occupied the same position at New York University. Dr. King is the author of numerous studies on the history of Arabic and Islamic science, and is the compiler of a catalog of scientific manuscripts in the Egyptian National Library.

Muhsin Mahdi is the Jewett Professor of Arabic Studies at Harvard University. A leading scholar in this country, he is the author, translator, and editor of several philosophical works on Arabic and Islamic philosophy. Among The Political ةالاًة Ibn Khaldun’s Philosophy of History حاًة wotY ؟ ,لاا للآاأأ الأا Orientation of Islamic Philosophy. He هلعا١هج نف Medieval Political Philosophy: A Sourcebook, and The Thousand and One Nights, contributing to this edition a thorough and scholarly introduction based on the early Arabic, original sources.

Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Munajjid is a well-known scholar in the Arab world, and the author and editor of more than one hundred works. Formerly, he was a counselor at the League of Arab States, in charge of the Institute of Arabic Manuscripts, and the founder of its journal. He is also a member of the prestigious Academy of the Arabic Language in Cairo, and the Arab Academy of Damascus.

Seyyed Hossein Nasr is University Professor of Islamic Studies at George Washington University, in Washington, DC. Previously, he was professor of History of Science and Philosophy and Dean of the Faculty of Letters at Teheran University. He was also a visiting professor at Harvard University and professor of Islamic Studies at Temple University. Among his many works are Three Muslim Sages, Ideals and Realities of Islam, Science and Civilization in Islam, ةآ١٥ An Introduction to Islamic Cosmological Doctrines.

Geoffrey J. Roper has been Islamic Bibliographer at Cambridge University Library and editor of Index Islamicus and Quarterly Index Islamicus since 1982. He holds an honours degree in Middle Eastern Studies from the University of Durham and a doctorate from the same university. He has carried out research on Arabic historical bibliography, including a major study of Arabic printing and publishing in nineteenth-century Malta, as well as a number of published articles and reviews.

Franz Rosenthal was Sterling Professor of Near Eastern Languages at Yale University from 1967 until 1985, when he became professor emeritus. Previously, he had taught at Hebrew Union College and the University of Pennsylvania. Among his publications are Technique and Approach of Muslim Scholarship, History of Muslim Historiography, The Muslim Concept of Freedom, and a masterful translation into English of Ibn Khaldun’s Muqaddimah.

Annemarie Schimmel was professor of Indo-Muslim Culture at Harvard University. She is the author of more than fifty works in German and English. لج١١0اً١%أحلاً ١كس are As Through the Veil: Mystical Poetry in Islam, Calligraphy and Islamic Culture, Mystical Dimensions of Islam, Islam in the Indian Subcontinent, and Islamic Names.

Priscilla Soucek is Hagop Kevorkian Professor of Islamic Art at the Institute of Art, New York University. She co-authored The Meeting of Two Worlds: The Crusades and the Mediterranean Context, and edited Content and Context of Visual Arts in the World: Papers from a Colloquium in Memory of Richard Ettinghausen.

 Index

[Page numbers don’t correspond to this version]

’Abd al-’Aziz al-Wafa’1, 158

’Abd al-Ghafir ibn Ismâ’îl al-Fârisî, 108

’Abd al-Jabbar al-Khawlanl, 107

’Abd Allah ibn Abi Ishaq, 125

’Abd Allah ibn al-’Abbâs, 44, 45, 142

’Abd Allah ibn sa’îd ibn al-’Aşş, 142

’Abd al-Rahman Jami, see Jami

’Abd al-Razzaq Kashani, 62

’Abd al-Salam ibn ’Abd al-Wahhab, 51

’Abd al-Hamld the Second, 241

’Abdallah Marvarld, 198

’Abdul Jalil Bilgraml, 82

Abdulrazak, Fawzi, 14

’Abd-ul-Wahhab Muşawir-İ Mashhadl, 201

’Abldah al-Salmanl, 41

Abu al-’Arab Tamim, 107, 108

Abu Al-Aswad al-Du’alî, 124

Abu al-Barak al-Baghdadl, 35

Abu al-Fida, 174

Abu al-Hasan al-’Amiri, 59, 66

Abu al-Hasan Jilwah, 60

Abu al-’Iyâl al-Hudhall, 22

Abu al-Khattab al-Akhfash al-Kablr, 126

Abu ’Amr ibn al-’Alâ’, 126

Abu Bakr, caliph, 142

Abu bakr al-Marriidhl (al-MarwazI), 39

Abu Hanlfah, 21

Abu Hatim al-Sijistanl, 95

Abu Hayyan al-Tawhldl, 40, 41, 43, 44

Abu Hilal al-’Askari, 96

Abu Ishaq al-ShirazI, 95, 102

Abu Manşür al-Tha’âlibî, 108

Abu Mikhnaf, 97

Abu Nu’aym al-Işfahânî, 41, 95, 111

Abu Qilabah, 41

Abu SaTd al-Sîrâfî, 40, 41

Abu Sulayman al-Mantiqi al-Sijistanl, 95

Abu Talib Kallm, 73, 78, 84

Abu Tammam, 44

Abu Zi’bil Press, 245

al-Ahdab, Ibrahim, 240

Ahmad al-Bâbî al-Halabl, 247

Ahmad Amin, 247

Ahmad ibn IsmaTl ibn Abi al-SuUd, 42

Ahmad Lutfi al-Sayyid, 247

Ahmed III, 284

A’ishah, 146

Akbar, 75

Akhsikatl, 81

Alexandria, 241

’All, 125

’All ’Abd al-Raziq, 248

’All ibn Abi Talib, 142

’All Khan, 71

’All Mashhadl, 199

’All Shir Navâ’î, 196, 197, 202

alif, 7,85

Alwan, Mohammed, 214

American Press of Beirut, 237, 242

American missionaries, 237, 238

American University of Beirut, 239

Amir Khusrau Dihlawl, 78–80, 188

Andalusia, 284, 288

Anderson, Benedict R., 260

Anvarl, 84

Al-’Aqqad, Mahmud ’Abbas, 247

Arab-Israeli conflict, 243

Arab Socialist Union, 248

Arabian peninsula, 267

Arabic language, 235, 237, 238: grammar, 1233 grammatical principles, 128

Arrajan, 182, 186

Arslan family library, 237

Asfar of Mulla Sadra, 9

AsmaT, 127

astrolabe, 154

al-‘A tar, Farid al-DIn, 73

Athanathios Dabbas, 237

Athlr al-DIn Abhari, 59, 63

authority, religious, 266

Avicenna, see Ibn Sina

’awamil (operants), 124, 125, 130–132

Ayidah Nuşayr, 247

Ayn Tura, 236

Ayn Warqa, 236

Azad Bilgraml, 73

al-Azhar, 246

‘Azlzaddln Nasafi, 75

Baba Fighanl, 75, 79

Babur ibn Baysunghur, 199

Bach Mamluk Hajj Zuhayr, 25

Badi al-Zaman Mirza, 196

Badr al-DIn ibn Jama ah, 42, 43

Bahlj ‘Uthman, 250

Bakhtiyar, Manşür ibn ‘Umar, 181, 182

al-Baladhuri, 96

Bandini, Anton, 283

Bandini, Orasyu (Horatio), 283

bar-avard, 200

Bashir II, 234

Basrah, 98

Bayqara, see Sultan Husain Baiqara

Bedil, 81–83

Beirut, 237, 240–243, 249

Bell, Richard, 19

Beni Israil, 287

Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, 238

Bey of Tunis, 223

Bible, 20, 239, 240: Gutenberg Bible, 215

Bihbihan, 182, 186

bindings, 220: Ottoman, 199: Safavid, 200

Bint Quraymazan, 145

biographical dictionaries, 93:

alphabetical arrangement, 105:

arrangement by place, 107:

arrangement by discipline, 108: arrangement by time span, 1063 definition, 94ᑊ dhayl, 103: general, 103: inner structure, 104: restricted, 102 smoothness, 106: specialization, 102· structure, 97, 105: of Sufis, 111: of Twelver Shi Ites, 109 al-Bîrünî, 45, 154, 159 Bloch, Marc, 257 Book, see also Kitab, 17 Book of the Universe, 76 Book of Love, 82 books, xiii, 36, 284, 287: in Arab World, 233: Arabic, 249, 250: burnings, 39: commissioning, 179: as a companion, XV: copying, 35: destruction, 39: diffusion, 9: dissemination, 235, 237, 240, 246, 250: education, 235: in Egypt, 243: electronic, machine-readable, 12, 13: heritage books, 240, 248: imagery, 74, 78: inner, 65: Lebanon, 236: Malta Arabic, 220: need for, 36: printed, 5, 6: printed, spread of, 5: production, 33: provenance, 179: publishing, 241: role of, XV, 235: as tools, 38: trade, 291: transfer of, 179: written, 66

Bourdieu, Pierre, 256 al-Bukhari, 19, 102, 104–106 Bulaq books, 220, 245

Bulaq Press, 212, 217, 245–246

Biirgel, J. Christoph, 71 Butrus al-Bustani, 237

cabbala, 66

Cairo, 164, 170, 241, 242, 249 calligraphy, 143, 144: Ottoman period, 146

Camp David aggrement, 244 Canon of Avicenna, 1 Catholic Press, 239, 242 censorship, 40

Cevheri (aLJawhari), 284, 289 Cheikho, Luis, 242

Chester Beatty Library, 159

Chingizids, 288

Chodkiewicz, Michel, 62

Christianity, 241

Colonna, Fanny, 267

communications revolution, 224

compendia, 43, 45

Corbin, Henry, 60, 61

Cordova, 145

Cornelius van Dyke, 238

curriculum, 264

Dar al-Ahram, 248

Dar al-Hilal, 247, 248

Dar a-llm lil-Malayln, 242

Dar al-Maarif, 247, 248

Dar al-Makshuf, 242

Dar al-‘Ulüm Faculty, 248

Dar Şâdir-Rîhânî, 242

Dara Shikoh, 83

Dayf, Shawql, 134

Dayr al-Balamand, 237

Dayr al-Mukhalliş, 237

Dayr al-Sharfeh, 237

dhikr, 18

dictionaries, 243

Djait, Hichem, 29

Durrah al-Katibah, 146

Durrah Khanum, 146

L’Ecole des Langues Orientales, 242

education, 255, 264: Islamic, 267:

mass, 265

Egypt, 234, 247, 249 257, 260

Egyptian Revolution of 1952, 242244 و

Egyptian National Library, 246

Eisenstein, Elizabeth, 215, 217

English Church Missionary Society, 212

esoteric interpretation, 66

European printers, 1

European languages, 216

Fakhr al-Dîn RazI, 66

Fanl, 75–77, 80, 82

Fano, Italy, 234

al-Fârâbî, 60, 66

Farah Antun, 241

Farhat, Jibril, 212

Farigh, 77

Fatimah, 145

fatwas, 262

Fox, M.v.,34

Frankfurt, 174

Friday sermons, 263–265

Frithjof Schuon, 71

fuhul, 101

fundamentalism, 255 al-Funun Society, 240, 241 Fuzuli, 80, 83

Gdoura, Wahid, 14

Gesu Daraz, 72, 86

Ghalib, 83, 84 al-Ghazzall, 66

Gibb, Sir Hamilton, 116, 117, 119

Gilson, Etienne, 60 gnosis, 58, 6263 و God the Creator, 84

Gospels, 287

Gramsci, Antonio, 256

greater Syria, 240

Hâ’iri Yazdl MazandaranI, 60

Habermas, Jurgen, 256 hadlth, 4, 264, 288 Hafiz, 73, 77, 79

Hafsah, 142

Hafsi, 117, 119

HajjlKhallfah, 41, 42, 43, 46

Hamzah ibn Yusuf al-Sahml, 95

Hashi Bihisht, 199

Hassun, Rizqallah, 222

Hawamrni, 19

al-Hay’ah al-Misrlyah al-‘Ammah lil-

Kitab, 248

Haydar al-Shihabl, 210 al-Haytham ibn Ǻ Adi, 97 Herat, 196, 198, 199
huffaz, 18, 20

Hulâgu, 284, 288

Humphreys, R. Stephen, 93, 116, 118,

119 نم

Husayn Bayqara, see Sultan Husain Baiqara

Ibadi Muslims (Ibadiyah), 261–263

Ibn (Abd al-Malik al-Marrakishl, 103, 104

Ibn Abi al-Hadld, 96

Ibn Abi al-Hawârî, 4142 و

Ibn Abi al-Wafa’, 102

Ibn Abi Hatim al-Râzî, 105

Ibn Abi Usaybi’ah, 95

Ibn Abi Ya’la al-Farra, 102

Ibn al-Abbar, 103, 104

Ibn al-Anbarl, *Abd al-Rahman ibn

Muhammad (d. 577/1181), 132

Ibn al-Bawwab, 25, 143

Ibn al-Dabithl, 104

Ibn al-Faradl, 103

Ibn al-‘Imâd al-Hanball, 95

Ibn al-Jawzl, 96, 111

Ibn al-Kalbl, 97

Ibn al-Murtada, 95

Ibn al-Nadlm, 46, 96, 97, 102

Ibn al-Najjar, 104

Ibn al-Sarraj, Muhammad ibn al-Sârî, 129, 154, 158, 159, 164

Ibn ‘ Arabi, Muhyl al-Dîn, 24, 39, 62, 66,74,75, 143

Ibn Asakir, 108

Ibn Ahur, al-Tahir, 18

Ibn Bashkuwal, 103, 104

Ibn Bassam, 103, 109

Ibn Fadi Allah al-‘Umarî, 96, 174

Ibn Hajar alAsqalanl, 96, 102, 106

Ibn Hanbal, Ahmad, 39–41

Ibn Hayyan, 103, 104

Ibn Hazm, 103

Ibn Hibban al-BusG, 104 105

Ibn Jamah, see Badr al-Dîn ibn Jama’ah

Ibn Khaldun, ʕAbd al-Rahman, 45, 46

Ibn Khallikan, 35, 103, 105, 115

Ibn Mada’, Ahmad ibn ’Abd al-

Rahman, 128

Ibn Makülâ, 96

Ibn Masud, 41

Ibn Muqlah, 143

Ibn Qayyim al-JawzIyah, 39

Ibn Qutaybah, 95

Ibn Ridwan, al-Hasan (d. 453/1061), 38

Ibn Rushayd Al-Sabtl, 96

Ibn Sad, 97, 100–102, 112, 113

Ibn Said al-AndalusI, 109

Ibn Sallam al-Jumâhî, 97, 99, 100, 102

Ibn Shakir al-Kutubl, 104

Ibn Sina (Avicenna), 59, 66

Ibn Sirin, Abu Bakr Muhammad, 44

Ibn TaghribirdI, 96

Ibn Turkah, 59

Ibn Wallad, Ahmad ibn Muhammad, 130

Ibn Yunus, 170

Ibrahim Müteferrika, 284, 286

Ibrahim Pâshâ, 237

’//a/, 124

illustrations, 149

‘Um al-huruf, 24

al-lmam, 17

Institut Francais de lArcheologie

Orientale du Caire, 246

international book fair, 249

Iqbal, Muhammad, 80, 83, 85

iqra’, 17, 57

Iran, 259, 267

Iraq, 235

(Isa ibn ʖmar, 126, 127

Isfahan, 159

Islam, 234, 235, 258, 260, 264

Islamic civilization, 99–102

Islamic Conference Organization, 266

Islamic ideologies, 256

Islamic state, 287

Isma’11 BakhshI, 77

Isma’11 Haqql, 62

Isma’11, 246

Istanbul, 215, 241

Jabal Ail, 236

al-Jahiz, Abu xiv, 38, 43, 44,

95, 143, 144

Jalal al-Dîn al-Suyütî, 95

Jalal al-Dîn DawanI, 61

Jalal al-Dîn Kirmanî, 201

Jalal al-Dîn Rûmî, 64, 71, 72, 81,

84–86

Jamal al-Dın al-Mizzi, 95, 102

Jamal al-Dîn al-Qiftl, 93, 95

Jami, 71, 72, 74, 79, 80, 81, 85, 196, 198, 202

al-Jawa’ib, 211, 213

Jawa’ib Press, 214

Jayhun, 288

Jean Joseph Marcel, 244

Jerusalem, 287

Jesuits, 238

Jesus, 287

jihad, 290

Jordan, 260

aLJurjanl, ’Abd al-Qahir, (d. 471/1078), 132

Ka’bah, 164, 171: orientation, 171

Kamal Khujandl, 196

Karatay, F.E., 181

Khalaf al-Ahmar, 127

Khalidi, 1. 116, 117

al-Khain ibn Ahmad, 127, 129, 130

Khalil Mutran, 247

aLKhallll, Ahmad ibn Hamad, 261–263, 265

KhaliqI, Mutlaq, J., 181, 201

Khalişah, 144

Khamsah, 180, 182, 190, 191, 193, 196, 199

KhaqanI, Afdal al-Dîn, 7284 و al-Khatlb al-Baghdadl, 36, 37, 41, 95, 104–106, 108

khatt, 6 77,79–83

Khawarij, 262

Khayr al-Dîn al-Tünisî, 222, 223, in

Tunis, 234

Khedive of Egypt, 223

al-Khüshânî, 108

Khwaja Murshîd-İ Kashgari, 201

al-Kindî, 59, 143

aLKishshî, 110

kitdb, see also books, 17, 75

Kitab, 18, 123

al-Kitab, 22

Kitab of Slbawayhl, 128

knowledge, 35, 46, 209

Koran (Qur’an), xiv, 1, 17, 22, 65, 77, 78, 235, 256, 266, 267, 284, 287, 288: compilation, 23: form, 25· Hadinah Koran, 146: Hamburg, 1: memorization, 257: miraculous nature, 26: preservation, 18: properties, 23: revelation, 57

Krystal, Arthur, 47

Kufah, 98, 100

al-Külînî, 110

Labd, 21

lahag, 34

Lajnat al-Ta’lîf, 248

Lane, Edwardd, 246 learning, 261

Lebanese Mission, 242

Lebanon, 234, 242, 251

liberal age, 247

libraries, 36: history, 71: public, 38

Library of Congress, Center for the Book, xii literacy, 8

literature, Arabic, 71

lithography, 12 litterateurs, 210

Lisan al-Tayr, 200

Lorch, Richard, 154 love, 81, 85

Lubna, 144

Lughat al-Furs, 180, 181

al-Ma’arri, Abu al-Ala’, 39 al-Madâ’inî, 143 madrasah, 267

the Maghrib, 288

Mahdi Hairi, 60

Mahdi İlâhî QumshaT, 60, 66

Mahdi, Muhsin, 60

Mahfuz, Najib, 243

MaktubjLTM

Male, fimile, 28

Malta, 212

Malta Arabic press, 213, 219, 237

Mamluks,‘244

al-Manar Press, 247

Manşür aLBihbihanl, 187, 188, 191

Muhammad Shahrazurl, 61 al-Muʕizz ibn Badis, 146 al-Mukhallişlyah Press, 242 Mulla Sadra, 58, 6166, 63 و al-Munjid, I muqri’m, 20 muraqqa’, 198 musahhih, 10 mushaf; 22, 26 al-Murtada al-Zabidl, 96 Muslim Brothers, 259 Mutahhar Karh, 73 al-Mutalammis, 22

MutasarriTyah, 234

al-Muwazanah of al-Amidl, 216

Muznah, 145

mystical fraternities, 6, 7

al-NabulusI, ʕAbd al-Gham, 62 nahdah, 210

nahw, 123, 124

al-Najashl, 110

al-Najjar, Ibrahim, 238

Napoleon Bonaparte, 244

al-Narshakhl, 107

Nasif al-Yazîjî, 237, 238

Nâşir Muhammad ‘Andallb, 74

Nâşir-i Khusrau, 74

Nasr ibn ʕAsim, 133

Nasser, Jamal ʕAbd al-, 248, 249

National Archives, 248

National Library, 248

Nawab of Bhopal, 223

Nawfal Elias Nawfal, 240

Nazlrl, 81, 83

Nebuchadnezzar, 287

Nishapur, 108

Nizami, 73, 197

Nizwa, 265

Ndldeke, Theodor, 19, 20 non-Muslim communities, 5

North Africa, 260 novels, 239, 240 al-Nuddar, 144

objectification, 255

Oman, 257, 261, 264, 266

Omanis, 262–265

Omar Khayyam, 88

oral information, 47

oral tradition, 8, 57, 58, 62, 65, 264; in Islam, 66 oral transmission, 36, 57, 59, 60, 61

orthography, 8

Ottoman Observatory, 149

Ottoman state, 290

Ottoman rule, 234

Ottoman printing law, 241

Padishah, 285

page layouts, 220

Pakistan, 267

Palestine question, 243 paper, xiv; Chinese, 133

Petrucci, Armando, 28

philosophy, 63, 64: Islamic, 58;

mashshcTi, 60, 63: Oriental

(IshraqO, 61

photographic reproductions, 12

pilgrimage, 266

plays, 240

poetry, Arabic, 101: Hurûfî, 77 preservation, 19, 221

the press, 6

presses, state ownership, 6

print revolution, 215

printing, 4, 209, 210, 214, 215, 233,

235, 285, 286: Arabic, 210: benefits, 189: and the Holy Law, 292: impact on language, 7: linguistic and literary standards, 219: press, 212, 235

proof readers, 285

Protestantism, 238

Psalms, 237

Psalter, 236

publishers, archives of, 7 publishing houses, 236, 242

punctuation, 220

al-Qabbanl, ’Abd al-Qadir, 240

QabbanI, Nizar, 243

Qabus ibn Sa’îd, 261

aLQadl ’Iyad, 102

aLQarafah, 170

Qarawlyln, 267

al-Qazwlnl, 64, 162

qiblah, 159: finding, 164: pre-lslamic, 171

qiyas, 125, 130

Qur’an, see Koran

Quraysh, 100, 141

qurra, 18

QurrcC, 29

al-Qushayri, 111

Qutb al·Dîn Shirazi, 61, 63

Quzhayya, 236

Ragib Mehmed Paşa, 9

Ramadan, 267

Rasul aLNajjarl, 222 rationalism, 241 religious authority, 259 renaissance, 8

Rice, D.S., 25

al-Rida, 145

Rida, Rashid, 247

al-rîqq 22

Rose, the, 79

rose, 80

Rosenthal, Franz, 116

RushdI, (Abd al-Rahman, 246

<ʕsabiqahı9

Sa’di, 2186, 78, 76, 73 و

Sadr al-Dîn Qunawl, 62, 65

safinah, 15

Safa, Jirjls, 237

safr, 21

sahlfah, 22

Sa id Pâshâ, 246

St. George Orthodox Press, 237

St. Joseph University, 239

Sait Efendi, 284

Salafiyah, 234

Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Safadi, 95, 104, 106

Salim Faris, 223

Salmon ibn Yeruham, 34

sama’, 130

Sami al-Bârüdî, 80 al-Samman, Ghadah, 243

Sanai of Ghazna, 75, 81, 86 al-Sâq ’ala al-sâq 213 sarf; 129

Sarmad, 83

Saudi Arabia, 249

Sayyid, Fu’âd, 15

Sayyid Qutb, 259–262

Sayyidah, 145

school of languages, 244 science, Islamic, 149 scribal tradition, 4, 9, 212 script, Andalusian, 143, Kufi, 143, Muhaqqaq, 143

secularism, 241

Selim-namah, 193, 196 Şeyh-‘ûl-Islam, 285, 292 al-Sha’bî, ’Amir, 45 al-Shâfâ’ bint ’Abd Allah al-’AdawIyah, 142

al-Shâfı’1, 107

Shah Isma’11, 193, 196

Shah Rukh, 180, 188, 202

Shah Shuja’, 180

Shah Wallallah of Delhi, 62 Shah-namah, 180–182, 193, 196, 197 Shahid, Irfan, xiv ShahrastanI, 66

Shams al-Dln al-Dhahabl, 102, 107, 116 Shams al-Hafiz al-Shlrazl, 188 sharTah, 129

Shaykh al-Khallll, see al-Khallll,

Ahmad ibn Hamad al-Shaykh al-Mufid 110 Shfah, 265 al-Shidyaq, Ffis, 210, 237: collector of

Mss., 211: copyist, 211: as disseminator, 216: effects of activities, 215: in Istanbul, 213: as journalist, 216: publications, 214: as role model, 222: in Tunis, 213 al-Shidyaq, Tannus, 238 Shu’bah ibn al-Hajjaj, 41 Shuhdah bint al-Ubri, 145 shura, 6 Shuwayr, 237

Slbawayhl, 123, 127, 129, 130, 132

al-Sijzl, 154

Sirr al-layal, 214

Sitt Nasim, 144

standardization, 220, 221

standardization of texts, 217

state, role of, 7

Stchoukine, Ivan, 180, 181–190, 188
191, 193

al-Şüfı, 149, 174

Sufis, 64

Sufism, 62, 65

Sufyan al-Thawri, 40, 41

al-Suhrawardl, Yahya, 61

Sukkar, 144

al-Sulaml, 111

Sulayman al-Bârünl, 263

Sulayman al-Bustanl, 247

Sultan al·Ashraf, 154

Sultan Husain Baiqara (Bayqara), 72,

180, 187, 188, 197–200, 202

Sultan Muhammad Muhsin, 199

Sultan Murad III, 154

Sultan Qaboos University, 261

Sultan Said, 263

Sultan Selim, 193, 196

surahs, 24

Syriac language, 237

Syrian Protestant College, 237, 239

Syrians, 247

talll, 131

tabaqat, 115

al-Tabari, 96

TabatabaT, Muhammad Husayn, 63

tables of contents, 219

Tabriz, 196

al-TabrlzI, Lutf Allah, 181, 182

al TabrizI, Muhammad ibn Malik

Ahmad, 196, 200

Taha Hussein, 247, 248

al-Tahtawi, Rifa’ah Raff, 244

Taj al-Dln al-Subki, 102, 107

Tamir, ’Arif, 14

tanzJl, ‘ll

TaqI al-Dln, 154

Targum, 34

Tashkopriizadeh, 46, 116

tawatur, 20

Tawfiq (Khedive), 246

Tawfiq al-Hakim, 247

al-Tawhidl, see Abu Hayyan al-Tawhldl technological revolution, 13 textbooks, 238 textual criticism, 4

Throne of God, 65

Tigris, 288

tilâwah2

title pages, 219

Topkapi Sarayi Library, 179

Torah, 287

traditions, of the Prophet, Isee hadlth translations, 5; impact of, 6

Tripoli, 236

Tunis, 235

Tunisia, 249

al-Turabi, Hassan, 259

Turkey, 242, 260

Turklyah, 144

al-Tüsî, 60, 63, 110

typeface, 213, 219: Arabic, 237

‘Ubadah ibn al-Samit, 142

Ubbay ibn Ka’b, 142

Ubbay ibn Ka’b, 142

‘Ukashah, Tharwat, 249

‘ulama’, xiv, 58, 209, 235, 243, 259

Ullmann, M. 49

‘ulum al-Qur Ğn, 44

Umar ibn ‘Abd al-‘AzIz, 19, 21

TJmar ibn al-Khattab, 142

Umayyads, 288

Umld, 79

Ummayah ibn Abi al-Salt, 20

United Nations, 263

al-‘Uqayl, 105

‘Urâbî revolution, 243

‘Urfi, 78

‘Utbah, 144

‘Uthman ibn ‘Affan, caliph, 25, 142

Van Kulu, 284, 289

ventilator, 164

Vesiletu-t Tibaa, 286

al-Wadi’ashl, 96

aLWajlh al-Nah 39

Wall Deccani, 73

al-Waqa’i* al-Misnyah, 212

كلاس library, 39

Warburg Institute, 242

Warqah ibn Nawfal, 21

Warqah ibn (Umar Samarqandl, 187, 201, 202

al-warraq, xiv, 235

West Bank, 259

William Watts, 213

Wolfson, Hairy A., 60

women, 99, 101, 141: copying of Korans, 145: occupations, 144: scholars, 145

word, spoken, 36

Wortabet, w. Thomas, 238

writing, 21, 24, 28

Yanni, Jurjl, 240

Yaqut al-Hamawi, 43, 44, 95, 105, 162

Yasin, Abd al-Salam, 259

al-YazIjl, Ibrahim, 222, 247

Yemen, 154

Young Turks, 242

Yunus ibn Habib, 126

Yusuf al-AsIr, 222, 240

Yusuf Tümâ al-Bustanl, 247

Zakhir, ‘Abdallah, 236–238

Zamakhsharl, 73

al-Zarkashl, Muhammad ibn Bahadir, 44

Zawzanl, 211

Zayd ibn Arqum, 142

Zayd ibn Aslan, 25

Zayd ibn Thabit, 18, 19, 142

Zaydan, Jurjl, 247

Zebun-Nisa, 76

Zgharta, 236

Zubaydl, Muhammad ibn al-Hasan, 129

Zulaykhah Khatiml al-Sa’dî, 146

 [Back Cover]

THE BOOK IN THE ISLAMIC WORLD

THE WRITTEN WORD AND COMMUNICATION IN THE MIDDLE EAST

George N. Atiyeh, editor

<quote>

“The scholarship is sound, persuasive, interesting, and compelling. Most attractive to me is the breadth of the book. It is pleasantly instructive, and with the various illustrations is a delight to the eyes as well as to the mind.”

—Charles E. Butterworth, University of Maryland, College Park

</quote>

The Book in the Islamic World brings together serious studies on the book as an intellectual entity and as a vehicle of cultural development. Written by a group of distinguished scholars, it examines and reflects upon this unique tool of communication not as a physical artifact but as a manifestation of the aspirations, values, and wisdom of Arabs and Muslims in general.

The Islamic system of book production differed from that of the West. This volume shows the peculiarities of book making and the intellectual principles that governed a book’s inner structure, mysteries, and impact on culture. Investigated and explained are the issues involved in printing; the compilation of the Koran, the most important book in Islam; attitudes toward books; the oral versus the written tradition; metaphors of the book in literature; biographical dictionaries, an important genre of Islamic books; the grammatical tradition; womens contribution to calligraphy; scientific manuscripts; the transition from scribal to print culture; publishing in the modern Arab World; and the new electronic media, a non-book vehicle of communication, and its impact on education.

George N. Atiyeh is the head of the Near East Section at the Library of Congress. He has authored and edited a number of books and articles, among which are al-Kindi, the Philosopher ئ(the Arabs-, The Contemporary Middle East, 1948–1973: A Bibliography; and Arab Civilization: Challenges and Responses.

State University of New York Press

The Library of Congress

{1} The Firman (Royal decree) of Sultan Murad III given in October 1588, which allowed European merchants to import books printed in the Arabic script.

{2} The Firman of Ahmed 111, given in 1139/1727, authorizing Sait Efendi and Ibrahim Müteferrika to open a printing house using Arabic script. Authorization was limited to books on practical, that is, secular subjects and excluded those dealing with Islamic sciences.

{3} The essay by Ibrahim Müteferrika entitled Vesiletu-t Tibaa, on the usefulness of printing, in which he exposes the losses incurred by Islamic learning from the absence of the art of printing and the great benefits its establishment would bring to Muslims in general and Ottomans in particular.

#title Regional Cults

#author Richard P. Werbner

#authors Elizabeth Colson, Dale F. Eickelman, G. Kinglsey Garbett, Emanuel Marx, Matthew Schoffeleers, Bonno Thoden van Velzen, Richard P. Werbner

#date 1977

#source <[[https://archive.org/details/regionalcults0000unse][archive.org/details/regionalcults0000unse]]>

#publisher Academic Press

#isbn 9780127449500

#lang en

#pubdate 2023-08-03T10:58:16

#topics anthropology, cults, religion

#cover r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-19.jpg

 [Front Matter]

 [Synopsis]

From the introduction:

<quote>

“Regional cults are found in many parts of the world. They are cults of the middle range — more far-reaching than any parochial cult of the little community, yet less inclusive in belief and membership than a world religion in its most universal form. Their central places are shrines in townsand villages, by cross-roads or even in the wild, apart from human habitation, where great populations from various communities or their representatives come to supplicate, sacrifice or simply make pilgrimages.”

</quote>

This book (which is derived from the 1976 ASA Conference) is the first attempt by social anthropologists to create a theoretical framework for the comparative analysis of these cults. It gives the study of religious organizations a new perspective on major historical transformation from the pre-colonial past to the neo-colonial present, in North and South-central Africa, South America and the Middle East. It advances a basic debateabout opposed theories of religion and society inspired by Robertson Smith, Durkheim and Marx. The focus is on the problems of change in trans-cultural symbolism and relationships which cross political, economic or ethnic boundaries. Most of the case studies are from South-central Africa, allowing a comprehensive view of cults in a core area over a long period of time. The overall coverage is also inclusive of Islamic marabouts, Christian and non-Christian prophets, local territorial mediums, High God oracles. Numerous maps, diagrams and charts illustrate the distribution and regional patterns of the various cults.

The book introduces new concepts and a rich body of data of interest to social anthropologists, sociologists, students of comparative religion, history, politics, economic development and cultural evolution.

 Association of Social Anthropologists: A Series of Monographs

13. J.B. Loudon, Social Anthropology and Medicine — 1976

14. I. Hamnett, Social Anthropology and Law — 1977

15. J. Blacking, The Anthropology of the Body. In preparation

16. R.P. Werbner, Regional Cults — 1977

 [Title Page]

A.S.A. MONOGRAPH 16

Regional Cults

Edited by

R.P.WERBNER

Department of Social Anthropology

University of Manchester, England

1977

ACADEMIC PRESS

London • New York • San Francisco

A Subsidiary of Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, Publishers

 [Copyright]

ACADEMIC PRESS INC. (LONDON) LTD.

24/28 Oval Road,

London NW1

United States Edition published by ACADEMIC PRESS INC.

111 Fifth Avenue,

New York, New York 10003

Copyright© 1977 by association of Social Anthropologists of the Commonwealth

All Rights Reserved

No part of this book may be reproduced in any form by photostat, microfilm, or any other means, without written permission from the publishers

This volume derives mainly from material presented at a conference on regional cults sponsored by the Association of Social Anthropologists of the Commonwealth held at Langdale Hall, University of Manchester, March 31st—April 3rd 1976

Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 77–71803

ISBN: 0-12-744950-7

Printed in Great Britain by Whitstable Litho, Whitstable, Kent

 [Dedication]

For Max Gluckman

In Memory

 Contents

Introduction

RICHARD P. WERBNER

Beyond Naive Holism

Level Specific Analysis

Turner’s Exclusive and Inclusive Domains

The ‘Correspondence’ Theory

Elitist versus Egalitarian Regional Cults

Hierarchy and the Waxing and Waning of Cults

The Interpenetration of Cults

Future Research

References

Part One: Islamic Cult Regions: Historical Interaction or Symbolic Congruence

1. Ideological Change and Regional Cults:

Maraboutism and Ties of ‘Closeness’ in Western Morocco

DALE F. EICKELMAN

Ideologies and the Social Order

Maraboutism as a Part-Ideology

The Sherqawi Zawya

Maraboutism and “Closeness”

Maraboutic Descent

Ideology and Practice

Sacrifices and Social Groups

Conclusion

References

2. Communal and Individual Pilgrimage:

The Region of Saints’ Tombs in South Sinai

EMANUEL MARX

Introduction: The Region and the Wider Universe in the Cult

Three Tribes and their Setting in the Peninsula

‘Tribal Organization’ as Ideology

Annual Migration and Pilgrimage

The Symbolism of Saints’Tombs

References

Part Two: Regional and Non-Regional Alternatives: The Waxing and Waning of Cults

3. Disparate Regional Cults and a Unitary Field in Zimbabwe
KINGSLEY GARBETT

Introduction: The Interpenetration of Cults

The Region of Mutota

The Land-Shrine Community

Lineal and Territorial Aspects

Change in Ritual Territories

Expansion and the Regional Medium

The Decline of Chthonic Cults

Kupara’s Recruitment

The Linking of Local and Territorial Cults

Conclusion

References

4. Bush Negro Regional Cults: A Materialist Explanation

BONNO THODEN VAN VELZEN

Introduction: Radical Economic Change and Cults

Heydays

The Spread of a Regional Cult and its Centralization

Theology

Allocation of Resources and Internal Distribution

Gaan Tata’s Bulwark on the Tapanahoni

Gaan Tata’s Decline

A New Regional Cult?

Summary

References

5. A Continuing Dialogue: Prophets and Local Shrines among the Tonga of Zambia

ELIZABETH COLSON

Cults and their Publics

The Setting and the Cults

Shrine Custodians

Prophets and the Greater Community

The Diversification of Society

Continuity and Change in the Cults

The Gwembe Resettlement: A Test Case

Prophets and Custodians

References

6. Regional and Non-Regional Cults of Affliction in Western Zambia

WIM M.J. VAN BINSBERGEN

Introduction: Change and Types of Cult

Non-Rcgional Cults of Affliction

Regional Cults of Affliction in Western Zambia:

General Characteristics

The Development of Nzila and Bituma as Regional Cults

Conclusion

References

Part Three: Regional Instability: Cult Policy and Competition for Resources

7. Continuity and Policy in Southern Africa’s High God Cult

RICHARD P. WERBNER

Introduction: The Definition of Regions

Change in Congregations

The Development of a Region and the Limits of its Expansion

The Priesthood and its Managerial Problems

Hierarchy and the Making of Oracular Policy

References

8.

Cult Idioms and the Dialectics of a Region

J.M. SCHOFFELEERS

Introduction

The Formal Organisation of the Cult

The Chiefs and the Shrine

The Spirit Medium and the Informal Operation of the Cult

The Medium’s Entourage

The Mbona Medium and the Chiefs

The Encounter between Medium and Principals

Rumour and Possession

The Conceptualization of a Regional Community

References

Notes on Contributors

Author Index

Subject Index

* Maps

Introduction

1 Regional Cults in South-Central Africa

Chapter 1

1 Spheres of Sherqawi Influence in Western Morocco

Chapter 2

1 Holy Tombs in South Sinai

Chapter 3

1 Region of Mutota: Spirit Provinces and Chthonic Cult Areas, Dande (1963) Zimbabwe

2 The Ritual Field of the Region of Mutota (1963–69), Zimbabwe

Chapter 4

1 Gaan Tata Cult and Christian Mission Posts (c. 1900), Surinam

Chapter 5

1 Prophets and Local Shrines: Zambian Tonga and their Neighbours in Zimbabwe

Chapter 6

1 Ethnic Groups and Localities in Western Zambia

2 Origin and Spread of the Nzila and Bituma Regional Cults

Chapter 7

1 Congregations and Shrines of the High God Cult, Northeastern Botswana facing

2 Territorial Divisions in Northeastern Botswana

3 Interlocal Shrine and Band of Adepts, Northeastern Botswana

4 Congregations of Southwestern Region, Botswana and Zimbabwe

Chapter 8

1 Mbona Shrine and Surrounding Chiefdoms (1975), Malawi

* Diagrams

Chapter 7

1. Regions and their Surrounding Vicinities

2. Cult Domain and Ecological Zones: Distribution of Oracles

Genealogies

Chapter 3

1 Perpetual Relations among Korekore, Chthonic and Chikunda Regional Cults

2 Mutota’s Descendants

3 Succession to Mediumships

Chapter 7

1 Genealogy of a Band of Adepts

* Tables

Chapter 2

1 Bedouin Tribes of South Sinai

Chapter 3

1 Index of Spirit Provinces shown in Map I

Chapter 7

1 Succession of Adepts

2 Recruitment of Junior Adepts

3 Recruitment of Senior Adepts

* Charts

Chapter 7

1 Grades of Shrine

2 Western Regions of the High God Cult

Chapter 8

1 Resume of Origin Myths of Two Principals

2 Mbona Mediums in the Twentieth Century

 Introduction

by Richard P. Werbner

 Beyond Naive Holism

Essential relations with a wider context get stripped away when a small group, little community or tribe is studied as an isolated whole. This idea is virtually a commonplace, and it is now conventional, also, to reject the method as a fault of earlier studies. Yet relatively little advance has been made beyond naive holism — indeed, it may be winning new advocates (Barth 1975; Douglas 1970). The challenge remains one that Max Gluckman raised in his early work (1940, 1942): to analyse change in fields of relations that cross political, economic or ethnic boundaries.

These essays on regional cults, which derive mainly from papers presented at the 1976 A.S.A. Conference in Manchester, take up that challenge.

Regional cults are found in many parts of the world. They are cults of the middle range — more far-reaching than any parochial cult of the little community, yet less inclusive in belief and membership than a world religion in its most universal form. Their central places are shrines in towns and villages, by cross-roads or even in the wild, apart from human habitation, where great populations from various communities or their representatives, come to supplicate, sacrifice, or simply make pilgrimage. They are cults which have a topography of their own, conceptually defined by the people themselves and marked apart from other features of cultural landscapes by ritual activities (on ritual topography see Turner 1974 : 183).

Diverse as the cases in this book are — cults of Islamic marabouts, Christian and non-Christian prophets, local and territorial mediums, High God oracles — they represent much less than the full range of regional cults. Their forms in different parts of the world are far too many to be covered in a single book. Hence this selection is concentrated in two ways. First, along with cases from North Africa, the Middle East and South America, there is a fairly representative coverage in one part of the world, South-Central Africa (see Map 1). Second, besides such ethnographic concentration, there is a theoretical focus: our primary concern is to explain change in the ideology and organization of cults which are based on a central place and its relations with its hinterland or smaller dependent centres. In Carol A. Smith’s terms these cults are ‘nodal forms of organization’ (Smith 1976b : 9), and though our focus is somewhat like hers, the differences in our theoretical interests need to be seen from the outset.

 Level Specific Analysis

The major collection of essays edited by Smith (1976a, 1976b) develops a ‘level-specific regional analysis’, to give the approach a label of its own. Concerned primarily with complex societies, this approach relies on a model of levels — local, regional, national — and focuses specifically on the level (this may be a set, rather than a single level) that is always intermediate between the other levels in the model, namely the regional. Analytically, the limitation to a specific level has considerably force, at least for the comparative purposes which Smith and her contributors have in mind. Their cross-societal generalizations apply to standard units; they avoid the misplaced comparison of unlike orders of relations. But the gain in comparability is costly. Indeed, without radical modification it is too costly for the approach to be applied in order to make sense of change in regional cult organization and ideology.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-1.jpg]]

In empirical terms, the cost arises because the approach makes no room for certain activities and phenomena which are crucial in regional cults. As Smith stresses, regional analysis aims to show how

<quote>

‘flows of goods, services, information, and people through [a] network of centres ... structure and maintain internodal relations’ (Smith 1976b : 8, Smith’s italics).

</quote>

In regional cults such flows run across major political or ethnic boundaries. Hence the characteristic direction of the flows, along with the cult’s distinctive topography, is of specific theoretical interest. However, the level-specific approach ignores activities overriding and not congruent with the boundaries and subdivisions of a nation. Similarly neglected are the phenomena which define international or non-national regions. Theoretically, the approach introduces a bias towards nesting relations and it does not allow for cultural variability, i.e., the variable importance of different conceptions held by the people studied themselves of their fields of relations. To overcome these and other limitations calls for quite a different approach to regional analysis, without the three tiered model or its level-specific assumptions. Hence, our analysis of regional cults takes as problematic and subject to explanation what level-specific regional analysis neglects or takes for granted.

Our theoretical interests lead us to pay most attention to the historical transformation of cult regions. How do the people themselves define and organize their cult regions over time, through radical economic or political change and also in more stable periods? How do religious ideas and practices alter as cult regions become more or less inclusive? What impact do regional and non-regional cults have on each other, and how do they wax and wane in relation to each other? Some of these are problems which Victor Turner, too, considers in a discussion of ‘Pilgrimages as Social Processes’ (1974 : 166–230). Turner’s suggestions differ somewhat from ours, and it is fruitful to clarify some of the differences, particularly because a good part of our work builds on this and other discussions of his (Turner 1957, 1967, 1968, 1975).

 Turner’s Exclusive and Inclusive Domains

Parallel dichotomies are at the heart of Turner’s argument: inclusiveness versus exclusiveness, peripherality versus centrality, generic versus particularistic relationships, egalitarianism or homogeneity versus nonegalitarianism or differentiation. For our purposes, the most crucial is a dichotomy between politico-jural rituals focused on localized subsystems of social groups and structural positions, and rituals concerned with the unity and continuity of wider, more diffuse communities’ (Turner 1974 : 197).

<quote>

</quote>

Only a few of his conclusions need concern us here, although it is through these dichotomies that he arrives at a much larger body of conclusions, along with a general perspective on the very process of pilgrimage itself. Three conclusions are relevant here: first, about opposed types of cult; second, about how far cult ideologies represent or correspond with various politico-jural relations; and finally, about the dialectical way that one type of cult becomes its opposite.

The conclusions have to do with opposed types of cult in two kinds of society, once more a dichotomous division. On the one hand, Turner refers, in ‘certain traditional African societies’, to earth and fertility cults (most of which are regional cults in our terms) versus ancestral and political cults (apparently non-regional). On the other hand, he refers, in ‘complex large-scale societies and historical religions’, to pilgrimages and the organization of pilgrimage centres (again, mainly regional) versus localized religious activities focused on local shrines, ‘which are themselves parts of bounded social fields, and which may constitute units in hierarchical or segmentary politico-ritual structures’ (Turner 1974 : 186) (again, apparently non-regional). This is his suggestion about the African cults:

<quote>

... ancestral and political cults and their local embodiments tend to represent crucial power divisions and classificatory distinctions within and among politically discrete groups, while earth and fertility cults represent ritual bond between those groups, and even, as in the case of the Tallensi tendencies toward still wider bonding. The first type stresses exclusiveness, the second inclusiveness. The first emphasizes selfish and sectional interests and conflict over them; the second, disinterestedness and shared values’ (Turner 1974 : 185).

</quote>

Similarly, he sees a parallel in the contrasting kind of society:

<quote>

‘The networks formed by intersecting pilgrimage routes ... represent at the level of pre-industrial, politically centralized, high-agricultural cultures, the homologues of those reticulating the earth shrines and shrines of non-ancestral spirits and deities found in many stateless societies in sub-Saharan Africa with simple agricultural technology.

Here the peripherality of pilgrimage centers distinguishes them from the centrality of state and provincial capitals and other politico-economic units. It further distinguishes them from centers of ecclesiastical structure such as the sees or diocesan centers of arch-bishops and bishops’ (1974 : 197).

</quote>

The great utility of this contrast is its illumination of extreme cases. Like other ideal typologies, however, it tends to represent as mutually exclusive alternatives — the halves of parallel dichotomies — what are, in fact, aspects which combine in a surprising variety of ways within a range of actual cases. In this book the chapters on Islamic and African cult regions provide such cases not covered by the typology. The point is perhaps best illustrated first by Schoffeleer’s chapter, because he views an earth or territorial cult — the Mbona cult of Malawi and Mozambique — in terms of dichotomies that are comparable to Turner’s Moreover, Schoffeleers resolves a paradox which is important for Turner’s discussion. As Schoffeleers puts it for the Mbona cult:

<quote>

‘The very organization which asserts social difference and privilege becomes the vehicle through which the denial of difference and privilege is affirmed’.

</quote>

Boundedness and political divisions are represented by the Mbona cult’s localized congregations and its principals. As chiefs, the latter come from the autochthonous ethnic group, the Mang’anja, with a legendary, or rather, ‘traditional’ realm, i.e., the current bounds of the cult’s region, and in legendary times, all their chiefdoms were under the centralized rule of a single paramount chief. Not that the cult region merely replicates some political organization which exists apart from the cult’s activities: the political communities which it covers are in different countries, and they do not now exist as one body under any paramount ruler or even a single government. Instead, the cult region has its own nodal organization, and its own centre alone provides the focus for the region, quite distinct from any other political or economic centres. Its spirit medium, usually an immigrant rather than an autochthon, but never a chief or cult principal, makes his pronouncements on the public morality of chiefs and criticizes their relations with their people. But he does so only during seances at the region’s innermost shrine, while he is possessed by the spirit of Mbona. For the whole region and from its centre he speaks with an authority that goes beyond that of any central government and is independent of it; thus, he readily becomes a focus of resistance to unpopular measures imposed by the government.

The centre of this territorial cult is the extra-territorial sanctuary, an area beyond the territorial jurisdiction of any government and thus free of its taxes and rules of land tenure. Within it, and well apart from the seat of any legendary paramount is the cult’s innermost shrine. Within the sanctuary also, the cult hero, Mbona, was murdered, according to myth, at the first paramount’s command, after Mbona became a rival for political influence because of his powers as a rainmaker. It is according to the location of events associated with Mbona’s martyrdom that the sanctuary is centralised and set apart in cult topography. Hence the myth about the sanctuary emphasizes more than separateness, externality or even centralization: it ‘projects an image of a region which is unified on the basis of common concerns and a common morality’, but it also presents a paradigm for power struggles and an opposition between chiefly and non-chiefly ritual authority.

Whereas Turner suggests that types of cult fit a ‘polar distinction between cultural domains of exclusivity and inclusivity’ (1974 : 186), Schoffeleers demonstrates that both such domains are polarised within the Mbona cult. Each donjain is emphasized by different protagonists who oppose each other in the cult. From one viewpoint, the Mbona cult appears as an unstable combination of both of Turner’s types, and it is unstable just as the domains themselves are, in relation to each other. Schoffeleers shows that there is a persistent struggle between the representatives of political hierarchy — the cult principals as chiefs — who assert the legitimacy of social differentiation, and the representative of their people — the medium — who puts forward ‘the conception of a non-differentiated society’ [what Turner might call ‘ideological communitas’ (1974 : 1697]. Furthermore, the dialectic in this struggle is such that the representative of the people comes to appeal increasingly to more inclusive conceptions and idioms:

<quote>

Mbona is now said to be the “Son of God” (Mwana wa Mulungu) and the “black Jesus” (Yesu wakuda), who is the guardian spirit of all ethnic groups, and not just of the Mang’anja.’

</quote>

Here, to carry the argument a step further, we must turn to Colson’s analysis of cults and their publics among Tonga in different ecological zones of Zambia. In some respects the Tonga prophet cult, compared with the Mbona cult, represents an extreme at the very margin of the range of regional cults. Insofar as a region emerges in the prophet cult, it is characterized by diffuseness and ephemeral, weak, even uncertain centralization, instead of clear ritual demarcation, recognised boundedness, and a firmly anchored nodal organization for the whole region. Hence the Tonga case illuminates the grey, marginal area of relations between cult exclusiveness or inclusiveness and continuities or discontinuities in local communities.

Colson concentrates her analysis on the changing interplay between the local and the prophet cult. The local cult always has a well-defined constituency, unlike the prophetic cult. In the local cult there are numerous ’district’ or neighbourhood land shrines which are the centres of small, discrete ritual areas whose shrine custodians are independent of each other. Neither the custodians nor their land shrines form any hierarchy or more inclusive body. Colson establishes that the local cult and its communal ritual give concrete expression to the continuity and exclusiveness that a particular, highly localized agricultural community may have. The cult is stable in its land shrines and ritual — indeed, more stable than Colson herself understood on the basis of her earliest fieldwork (Colson 1948, reprinted in 1962) In the light of her continuing observation from 1946 to 1973, she now considers that ‘local shrines are remarkably viable’: they survive despite resettlement and the relocation of neighbourhoods. Over the years of her research among Plateau and Gwembe Tonga, she heard of no new local shrines. Her long-term evidence points to a great measure of cult autonomy, rather than immediate responsiveness to local fluctuations and the movements of shifting cultivators. Important as the vagaries of local shifts in villages and their populations are, they do not directly bring about the rise and fall of local shrines: land shrines have a life of their own.

The relation between the local and the prophet cults is, in the main, complementary, though not unproblematic or unchanging. The prophet serves a variable clientele and, while possessed by spirits identified with no known social community (spirits of the wild, of long dead prophets, foreign spirits and most recently, angels and God), provides warnings about personal or communal troubles and guidance about ritual for healing or rain. Most are minor prophets and play their part within an immediate vicinity roughly the same as, or little more than their own local shrine community. Colson observes:

<quote>

Though they claim a power that stems from beyond the community, and is independent of it, they are subject to the community controls. They link their messages to the local order ... These prophets are, therefore, among the principal upholders of community, the land shrines and the existing custodianships.’

</quote>

For both prophet and local cults in the narrowest order of relations — the local order — it can be said, in Turner’s terms, that the main emphasis is on the exclusive domain, boundedness and stability.

Beyond the narrowest order, the prophet cult is more flexible. It alters its emphasis, whereas the more rigid local cult does not, and remains virtually contained within the local order. Moreover, the flexibility of the prophet cult threatens to become a danger to the local cult, rather than merely a complement to its rigidity. Recently, prophets have proliferated along with waves of new cults of possession by angels, God, and alien spirits (see chapter six where van Binsbergen explains the importance of this phenomenon in other parts of Zambia, also). Through' its major prophets the prophet cult addresses itself nowadays to 'the expanding universe' of the country at large, and thus more to the changing inclusive domain. These prophets still build shrines where offerings are made for rain and the public good by communal delegations from near and far neighbourhoods. But now clients' personal needs bring them to major prophets as distant healers. Such prophets appeal to a widespread, heterogeneous clientele from diverse ethnic groups and urban as well as rural areas. It is here, in the wider order of relations, that the prophet cult is most strikingly flexible in response to the economic and ethnic diversification in the country at large.

The Tonga case has telling implications for Turner's dichotomous typology. Whether a single cult (such as the Tonga prophet cult) gives greater emphasis, during a period of its history, to one domain or another may depend on the order of relations involved: the narrower the order, the greater the emphasis on the exclusive domain, and conversely. Nowadays, the inclusive domain concerns major prophets perhaps more than ever before, and certainly more than it does the run of minor prophets. Clearly, Turner's typology does not adequately allow for such internal relativity: that is, the variation within a cult according to different orders of relations. Yet, as the Tonga case proves, such internal relativity may be crucially important.

The Tonga case raises a further point about the central places of a cult and the folk conception of regionalism. This point leads aside somewhat from our discussion of Turner's conclusions. But it must be considered here, because it is important for regional analysis in general, and our perspective in the Tonga case in particular. Colson's evidence is that, in one sense, regionalism is still in its infancy as a folk conception among Tonga:

<quote>

‘Even the idea of a social unit of all Tonga is a recent creation and is still likely to be invoked principally in the national political arena though the continued importance of the shrine of Monze may have political overtones of which lam unaware (my italics)’.

</quote>

In the part I stress Colson allows for something problematic about the most famous Tonga shrine, Monze’s. It is a matter of historical record that Monze’s shrine was the central place of a very great, perhaps the greatest, Tonga prophet of the nineteenth century: he received delegations from Tonga, Ila and Sala neighbourhoods as much as 100 miles away. No longer does any prophet reside by Monze’s shrine, yet it continues to serve a very wide vicinity, and not merely a single local community. Delegations seeking rain still come to Monze’s shrine from near and far and, significantly, from distant neighbourhoods in another ecological zone where rain is even more scarce. Why so? Or rather, what does this imply about the central places of a cult among Tonga?

The clues to the answer are in Colson’s data on prophets. Although my interpretation differs somewhat from hers, it also takes account of the apparent tenuousness of formal regional relations. From time to time, prophets of a distinct kind have arisen — regional prophets, in my view — and they have arisen in the same central area, as shown on Map I of chapter five. This central area is on the escarpment edge in the high rainfall zone. In the nineteenth century Monze was one regional prophet, and close by Chibwe was another, from the 1940’s until her death in the 1960’s when her shrine ceased to be a centre for distant delegations. Colson records, ‘By 1950 various less-noted prophets were attempting to share in her prestige by claiming to have received her authorization to serve as local deputies’ (1958 : 34).

Formally, the regional organisation in this cult is rudimentary, without an extensive chain of formal linkages, elaborate devices for control of delegates, or an effective hierarchy of command. Fluctuations in the reach of particular major prophets or shrines are apparently meteoric. Diffuseness, rather than boundedness, is a characteristic of their catchment areas for the visiting communal delegations or minor prophets, and the cult thus lacks any culturally defined regions like the de jure territory of the Mbona cult. Indeed, the differences in culture between Tonga and their Shona neighbours in another higher rainfall zone represent no barrier to Tonga use of Shona spirit-mediums as prophets: some Tonga delegations from the lower rainfall zone supplicate with the Shona mediums for rain.

What the prophet cult has is a region (or regions) of the de facto kind. It is characterized by the flow of cult traffic, along with dependence for ritual services: a vague hinterland relies on the cardinal points in a central area. These cardinal points are represented by the prophets or shrines that become the focus of the widest communal traffic in the cult. Significantly, the delegations go from the lower rainfall zone's communities to the cardinal points in a higher rainfall zone, never downwards to the lower rainfall zone's shrine or prophet. It is a regularity observed in certain other cults also, such as the High God cult which I discuss in chapter seven. The directional cult traffic, flowing along with other trends of migration, carries forward the interdependence between people of different climatic or ecological zones, and a ritual region overlaps or cuts across these zones. Of course, not all cult regions are cross-zonal, as Marx argues for South Sinai in chapter two. However, I must make one further comment first, before I can discuss his argument.

The present sites of major prophets are central places more accessible for a widespread, heterogeneous clientele. Nowadays, Colson reports, 'the most powerful set up their headquarters on the railway and bus routes rather than in the high rainfall zone'. In that zone, for the time being therefore, it is a prophetless shrine, Monze's, which serves the communal traffic as a cardinal focus. I infer that despite the diversification in the country at large, cross-zonal interests do continue to underpin ritual centrality and stabilize the prevailing direction of the communal traffic. Even more, the patterns of cult traffic themselves have a resilience which makes for continuity through change.

 The 'Correspondence' Theory

So far this discussion has explored problems which arise in studies of African cults. Others that Turner would regard as associated with ‘historical religions and complex large-scale societies’ must be considered now. There is a major disagreement in approach to religious organization and ideologies, and some contributors to this book are closer to Turner’s views than others. The disagreement appears most sharply, perhaps, in the studies of Islamic pilgrimage and marabouts’ cults by Marx and Eickelman. Not surprisingly, at the very nub of it lies a classical theory, Robertson Smith’s ‘correspondence theory’, and a long anthropological tradition stemming from him via Durkheim. The theory asserts a correspondence, in Eickelman’s terms, ‘between symbolic representations of the social world and patterns of conduct’. By developing Robertson Smith’s fine insight into the ‘community of the god’, Marx supports the theory. Eickelman rejects it, on the basis of Moroccan data, in order to get a better grasp of the ideology and practice of maraboutism in different historical contexts. Marx concentrates on the interests represented in Bedouin pilgrimages and symbolised by their marabouts and tombs. The issues are critical for the analysis of regional cults elsewhere. Hence Thoden van Velzen, van Binsbergen and I explicitly debate them also. However, here the disagreement is best appreciated against the background of a single historical religion and in two studies which advance our immediate discussion of Turner’s conclusions.

The ‘community of the god’ is a conception of boundedness, within the exclusive domain in Turner’s terms. Membership in the ritual congregation is on a closed basis; its members share rights in resources, recognition of their vital interdependence, or a concern with the maintenance of a group. The correspondence theory suggests that their cult’s spiritual subjects (i.e. marabouts or patron saints) and material objects (tombs, shrine buildings, shrouds and other ‘paraphernalia) stand for something else: there is a symbolic representation — Marx would go so far as to say ‘a very precise image’ — of particular interests (in the case in point, territorial interests). It fits Turner’s understanding of the exclusive domain, also, that the ‘community of the god’ has its own shrines, the foci of segments, in central locations valued for communal control of crucial resources. After all, the contrary — the peripherality of shrines — would express and foster the tendency towards universalism, openness, and emanicipation from the community (Turner 1974 : 193f).

Thus Marx observes the following about the social unit mainly involved in communal pilgrimage among the South Sinai Bedouin: ‘The tribe claims not so much to control a clearly bounded territory, but defined points in it and paths leading through it’. Accordingly, he finds the communal pilgrimage shrines on routes, by water points and at cross-roads that are highly valued for their strategic importance in trade and pastoralism. His evidence is best, and thus he concentrates, on one of two clusters of shrines. It is the one confined to the very heart of South Sinai, with its shrines on or near the main east-west passage through the mountains. These shrines, sited close to the edge of what a tribe claims as its own, are centralized at points where tribes meet or divide, rather than right by the more inaccessible settlements recently built as fastnesses in the mountains. Each shrine, except the peninsula’s most senior one (Nebi Saleh which is near Mount Moses, that worldwide pilgrimage centre for Moslems, Christians and, nowadays, Jews) serves a single tribe and its sections as a central meeting place for communal ritual. Annually, it is a distinct social unit, the section or tribe, that sponsors its own occasion: members share their animal sacrifices in the name of the one, universal God (the marabout is an intercessor, not a lesser god) and create commensal bonds with each other and their guests at the shrine. When the five main tribes of the mountains all make communal pilgrimages to the same shrine, Nebi Saleh, they do so in turn, on separate occasions. For some time, however, even this shrine has had a narrower reach. Communal pilgrimages are now held there only by the largest tribe, the Muzeneh, which of course asserts claims to the peninsula’s most central points and the senior shrine itself. Apparently, the change took place before the Israeli occupation ended smuggling and thus altered the value of passages and intertribal interests.

Marx surmises

<quote>

‘that the location turned this tomb into the central meeting place of the Bedouin of the mountains; it is situated on the cross-roads of the major east-west and north-south mountain passes, and close to water. In view of the great importance of smuggling in those days (pre-1965), each tribe attached major significance to its rights of passage through the mountains, as well as to co-ordination of activities and maintaining peaceful relations with other tribes’.

</quote>

Having gone with Marx on pilgrimage to the top of Mount Moses, I am tempted to pursue a wider concern. Cult regionalism is not tribalism writ large. Marx is himself very frankly puzzled by some aspects of the shrines and their significance for Bedouin — in my view, rightly so, because these aspects challenge him to break the frame of his analysis. Furthermore, they go right to the crux of our discussion of the exclusive and inclusive domains in relation to regional cults.

One shrine with its own marabout, shroud, and tomb is enough, at least for the purposes of a single section or tribe as a ‘community of the god’, and from the viewpoint of a correspondence theory. More than one is too many, and several differentiated ones for a certain tribe alone and none of the others does not fit at all. Admittedly, Marx’s understanding of marabouts and tombs goes beyond Robertson Smith’s insight into the religious representation of boundedness. Marx perceives that an enshrined marabout has an inclusive aspect also, ‘a second face’ so to speak, just as ‘tribesmen reserve certain rights in territory for themselves, but ... other rights are expressly opened up to all Tawara [literally, ‘of the Mount’, i.e. Sinai Bedouin collectively] on a mutual basis, i.e. rights to pasture, drinking water and, without prejudice to the tribe’s interests, passage also. However, while this perception of correspondence reaches the common denominator in the general run of instances, it stops our understanding short. Left more of a puzzle is the overall configuration of these shrines and marabouts, which is not a correlate of the pragmatic interests of Bedouin qua tribesmen. What is the significance of the differentiation of cult centres and their more universalistic aspects? How does this relate to their distribution in space, to cult topography? And what does all this imply about the cult itself?

Marx leads us a good part of the way towards the answer, despite the burden of the correspondence theory. He unpacks the symbolic significance of the three marabouts, including the cult’s senior, whose shrines at the geographical heart of the peninsula, so strategic in its mountains and passages, form an innermost cluster around the worldwide pilgrimage centre on Mount Moses (Jebel Musa) and the Christian monastery of Saint Catherine. His interpretation leads me to suggest that this innermost cluster lays down a central configuration in the cult's topography, and it is defined by the cult's cardinal orientation. Nowadays, with the largest tribe as hosts, communal pilgrims go from Faranja to Nebi Saleh to Nebi Harun (see Map I in chapter two). Each shrine, as a station in the pilgrimage circuit, has a positional significance, but all together convey the configuration's pattern. In space it is a movement towards Mount Moses (the peninsula's holiest place for individual pilgrims, whose holiness the Bedouin compare to Mecca's) and the monastery (by which the shrine of Harun, the priest Aaron, is fittingly sited). Symbolically, there is an increase in inclusiveness, moving from the most particularistic and tribal marabout, the host pilgrims' tribal ancestor Faraj, to the senior marabout of the region, the pre-Islamic Arabian prophet (some say, another tribe's ancestor) Saleh, and last to the most universal figure, Moses's brother the prophet Harun. Nowhere else is there a repetition of this pattern, just as nowhere else is there a focus for the traffic of individual pilgrims that is comparable in its holiness to the region's centrally sited holy place, on top of Mount Moses. To have considered individual pilgrimage at length along with the communal would have taken Marx well beyond the limits set for a single essay. But allowing for this limitation, the point here applies to both kinds of pilgrimage. On the whole the pilgrim shrines are central, rather than being instances of 'sacred peripherality', in Turner's terms (1974 : 195); yet neither in organization nor ideology does the cult replicate the rest of what might be called 'Bedouin society'. The cult has its own cardinal orientation, and this is towards the greatest inclusiveness at its very centre. Moreover, without any permanent staff and for both the individual and communal traffic, a nodal organisation is sustained overall through ritual activities. Here it is 'sacred centrality' which expresses and fosters the tendency towards universalism and openness (cf. Turner loc.cit., on Mecca).

Whereas Marx casts light on enshrined marabouts among Bedouin, with their characteristic egalitarianism or rather, subtle, unformalized differentiation, Eickelman illuminates the enshrined along with the living marabouts based in a Moroccan town, Boujad, where an elite is culturally recognized and, even more, legitimized through maraboutism and the notion of baraka or grace. Like Marx, Eickelman recognizes aspects of maraboutism which, taken in isolation, would support a correspondence theory’s one-to-one correlations. However, Eickelman’s data compel him to take account also of disparities which do not fit a correspondence theory whether it be, as he demonstrates, the version of Robertson Smith, Gellner, or Shils. Eickelman observes:

<quote>

‘Maraboutism is especially linked to two key concepts through which Moroccans make sense of existing social arrangements: obligation (haqq) and closeness (qaraba)’.

</quote>

With these concepts, some’Moroccans draw an analogy, man is to God as man is to man, which makes sense of both relationships in particularistic terms. There is a flow of benefits in each, and it is contingent upon specific bonds: the greater the obligation and the closer the bond, the greater the flow of benefits ’ (and conversely also, of course). Such reasoning, implicit in belief in marabouts (with the benefits of grace or baraka contingent upon closeness to God), is virtually the correspondence theory in a folk version. It is a great strength in such a folk version, and a crippling weakness in analysis, to absorb differences and give them a semblance of similarity, irrespective of varying historical contexts. Eickelman’s analysis grasps the differences and contextualizes transformations recognized by the people along with others they do not, and perhaps cannot, recognize.

As he shows, change takes place at different rates and with more radical consequences in certain parts of the Sherqawi lodge’s region. Away from town and the regional pilgrimage centre, in tribal sections or rural local communities believers in marabouts continue to seek dyadic bonds with members of a town-based elite. Partly through local feasts and commensality, the aim still is to put under obligation the living marabouts or marabouts’ descendants who come on visits to their clients’ communities. Moreover, some tribal sections are still able to insist, despite opposition from townsfolk, that their annual pilgrimage to the town centre must be an occasion for animal sacrifice, public feasting, commensality and all that this implies in the creation of specific bonds of obligation and the maintenance of covenants. Against such continuity runs a counter tendency which is most apparent at the centre in town, though it is of consequence elsewhere also. Offerings are converted into cash by Sherqawi visitors and the caretakers of major Sherqawi shrines. Moreover, whereas in the past marabouts and the economic and polical elite were virtually one and the same, living marabouts are now few, and not of the Sherqawi elite that has contemporary political and economic importance. Furthermore, many of this Sherqawi elite now dissociate themselves from maraboutic enterprises and ‘seek to redefine the activities of some of their kinsmen and ancestors in the light of the formal doctrines of reformist, modernist Islam’. Thus along with a tendency still most evident in the hinterland of the region, Eickelman points to a counter-tendency which is foremost at the centre, though not restricted to it. The counter-tendency is to favour mediation or the relaying of grace through an enshrined marabout, rather than any living person, and even further, to turn away from the personification of grace towards formal Islam which is universalistic and thus ‘requires no direct analogy with the nature of the local social order’.

 Elitist versus Egalitarian Regional Cults

At the risk of being taken to task for a lack of consistency — in the light of my general criticism of dichotomous typologies and Turner’s in particular — lam tempted to make use of one for comparative purposes here: elitist versus egalitarian regional cults. Ralph Waldo Emerson’s homely adage, from his celebrated essay on Self-Reliance, urges me on: ‘A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds’. I find the typology useful to clarify certain patterns and to show how their permutations are regular in the four cases mainly considered so far. The first kind of cult, the elitist, is characterized by processes which bring an elite and its public into dialectical opposition over the relative emphasis given in the cult to the exclusive or inclusive domains. Our examples of the Mbona cult and the Sherqawi maraboutic lodge illustrate this, and together represent an elementary permutation: the pattern in one appears in the other in reverse.

Briefly, to begin once again with the Mbona cult, the public appeals through its representative — so centrally placed in his extra-territorial sanctuary — to a conception of an undifferentiated society. It turns to universalism without ethnic bounds in the image of the black Jesus, whereas the elite of cult principals asserts its tribal authority and is particularistic in its appeal. By contrast in the case of the Sherqawi lodge, it is the public in the rural local community, the tribal section and elsewhere which appeals to greater particularism and continues to seek ‘closeness’ to a living person with grace or baraka as well as commensal bonds through shared sacrifice at an enshrined marabout’s holyplace. The centrally placed Sherqawi elite, on the other hand, now turn to universalism in the form of reformist Islam or they seek to free the offering of donations from commensality and its association with boundedness and the most particularistic oneness.

Underlying these inverse patterns is one or perhaps several regularities. In the elitist cults the emphasis on the inclusive domain is increased from the cult centre, rather than from elsewhere. Who fosters this increase depends on who is in control of the centre. On the one hand, the public or its representative fosters it where the centre is an extra-territorial one, under a religious authority and beyond the elite’s. Here the Mbona cult is the case in point. On the other hand, the increase comes to be fostered by members of the elite where the religious centre is the political one under the elite’s own control. Further studies of elitist regional cults are needed to clarify what are the limiting conditions for this regularity. But the point that must be stressed is that this is a regularity of cult organization and ideology; it is not a mere reflection or replication of some other social order. Religious change from particularism to greater universalism has its own momentum rather than being a mere correlate or after-effect of other transformations.

Constant in both these cases of elitist regional cults is the stability of the centre. In both this remains in a fixed location and is somewhat like a stationary capital, providing an established point of reference around which cult relations refocus. There is an alternative in which the cult centre is still the cardinal point for refocusing but itself shifts in location and is somewhat like the mobile headquarters of an army on the march, ever ready to be pushed forward with each major advance of the cult. This alternative, especially important under certain conditions of cult expansion, still correlates central control or cult centrality with the greater emphasis on the inclusive domain, as shown by Evans-Pritchard (1949: 70 f) in his classic account of the Libyan based Sanusi Order. Emrys Peters is working on a detailed reanalysis of the Order’s development, which will illuminate our discussion further. Here the comparison between elitist and egalitarian cults has to be explored on the basis of our four cases in order to complete a view of these as one whole set.

Our cases of egalitarian regional cults are the Tonga prophet cult and the South Sinai maraboutic cult. Each is characteristically free of any political elite with special ritual roles in the cult. The South Sinai case is a straightforward instance of a familiar regularity in that the cult's stable centre is the focus of an increasing inclusiveness. The difference here is a lack of any dialectical opposition between recognised protagonists of the different domains. Perhaps less straightforward and thus more revealing is the Tonga case. Not only is the location of a given center variable within the more enduring focal area of the higher rainfall zone but cult centrality itself is also intermittent, somewhat ambiguous and problematic. Nowadays formerly peripheral points attract prophets and they scatter away from established shrines. Seen in relation to the other cases, it suggests the hypothesis that the greater the central instability, the more cult peripherality comes into its own for refocusing a greater emphasis on the inclusive domain.

So far all of my comments about this set of cases have been made with a general condition, common to them all, left implicit. It must be made explicit now in order to bring the next, contrasting set of cases into relief. Briefly, none of the first are clearly hierarchical whereas four of the second are; as will be seen, this poses further problems for analysis. Along with the lack of hierarchy goes a variation from cult to cult in the degree to which there is a unified ranking of cult shrines and holyplaces, although none rival the more formalized ordering in some of the second set's cases. The variation is as follows. At one extreme is the Tonga cult which is without overall ranking but whose prophets and shrines are distinguished according to their participation in different orders of relations. Next comes the South Sinai marabout cult with its one acknowledged senior but somewhat ambiguous or unranked standing for other shrines. After these egalitarian regional cults come the two elitist ones, the Mbona cult and the Sherqawi lodge in that order. The regional medium of Mbona alone speaks for the whole of his region, and the lesser territorial mediums are restricted to narrower local constituencies. Finally, apart from the local maraboutic tombs which are points of domestic pilgrimage for women and children, the Sherqawi lodge has two grades of shrine within the pilgrimage center of the town of Boujad. Each quarter has its own shrine for rural and urban pilgrims, and above this grade is the one main shrine for them all, that of the lodge's founder Sidi Mhammed Sherqi.

 Hierarchy and the Waxing and Waning of Cults

To understand the importance of hierarchy and how it develops along with other cult transformations we must now consider our second set of cases. Our analysis of the waxing and waning of cults must be extended to cover a further range of problems, and shifts from non-regional to regional cults have to be explained. Already our discussion has moved towards the third of Turner's conclusions, which is about cult transformations, and it helps to clarify our views for us to examine this conclusion explicitly, at this point, with further light from the rest of our cases.

Turner argues that 'Pilgrimage centers, in fact, generate a "field" ' (1974 : 226). Around pilgrimage centers a process of oscillation takes place or, more forcefully, gets its impetus: shrines, once peripheral and apart from 'politico-economic centers', attract people who make them structurally central; and then, over time, they revert back to peripherality. The model of the perpetual pendulum has no hold here, however, because it is a cumulative process, in Turner's view. He considers that 'pilgrimages sometimes generate cities and consolidate regions' and yet 'they are sometimes also the ritualized vestiges of former sociopolitical systems' (1974 : 227). In other words, "the field" generated by pilgrimage centers is, at once, more and other than any contemporary 'sociopolitical system' with which it is, in fact, in a dialectical relation: increasing boundedness bears within itself the seeds of its own destruction, and conversely. Yet the question which has to be answered here is this. Across which boundaries, and in which respects, can a regional cult extend its hierarchy and yet still assert the kind of boundedness which, by its very nature, the hierarchy requires?

Turner's own classic studies of the Ndembu cults of affliction, as reconsidered by van Binsbergen in a wider context and within an historical perspective, open the way to an answer. The first step that van Binsbergen takes is to free the concept of cults of affliction from any necessary bondage to the unitary social system. It is a radical departure from Turner's view which left in the background crucial continuities in the ritual field:

<quote>

'But, by and large, the function of maintaining the unity of the widest social unit, the Ndembu people, devolves mainly upon the ritual system, although the ritual system spreads even wider than this' (Turner 1957 : 292 my italics).

</quote>

Turner's view is tied not merely to Ndembu but, more fundamentally, to a single tribe or society taken as a ritually integrated whole. Yet successive cults of affliction sweep like waves of fashion across Western Zambia's cultural and tribal boundaries. Hence van Binsbergen suggests that

<quote>

'The non-ancestral cults of affliction represent an attempt to come to terms (both conceptually and interactionally) with the reality of extensive, inter-ethnic, interlocal contacts'.

</quote>

It is no paradox, however, that van Binsbergen's observations, even more than Turner's, illuminate the significance of local factors in the cults. Elsewhere I have argued (1971 : 318f) that Turner's evidence does not sustain his conceptual model of rituals of affliction. According to Turner's model, individuals associate in these rituals on an ad hoc and ephemeral basis; their community is the community of shared suffering, no other; they form a congregation, as van Binsbergen puts it, 'in a pattern that cuts across, rather than reinforces the structure of distinct local communities'. Turner's evidence, on the other hand, shows that a major performance of a ritual of affliction has primarily an invited congregation whose members nearly all have prior ties of one kind or another with the sponsors. The occasion provides an index, in effect a Who's Who, of people and relationships important for the sponsors, but there.is no ritualization of a structure of localized groups, their divisions or boundaries. This kind of indexical occasion mobilizes as a congregation the interpersonal sector which is dispersed around a village, rather than the village itself in ritual isolation. Thus it is not the kind of event which emphasizes virtually random inclusiveness or participation ‘from all over the Ndembu region’ (Turner 1957 : 295). Here van Binsbergen examines the local organization of the cults more closely than Turner does, and thus establishes that, at least among the Nkoya of Western Zambia, cults like those of the Ndembu are fragmented into numerous, small and unstable, localized factions, each with its own leader, distinct songs, and peculiar paraphernalia. Not that van Binsbergen regards merely the politics and economic transactions in the cults; he is careful to bring into perspective also the pull of belief and liturgy in the healing ritual.

The next step van Binsbergen takes follows from his historical approach. He distinguishes types of cult of affliction and examines their development. Already familiar is the non-regional type, which covers the Ndembu examples also: the cult has its pecular emblems, its own highly specific idioms and subjects, and it is widespread, perhaps with many local variations, among a multitude of culturally different people. What it lacks is any central place, hierarchy, or overall organizational focus. Only the regional cult of affliction has these features along with the others and, significantly, even more of a conceptual emphasis on inclusiveness, with a shift towards greater attention to a High God. To explain the transformation, van Binsbergen traces a creative process of religious innovation, with its taproot continuously drawing on (or sloughing away) the transcultural, general idiom of the earlier, but still current, non-regional cults. He rejects an ‘imitation theory’, which reduces the essential dimension of the change, and makes it depend simply on the existence of a Christian church as an organizational model to be copied. Moreover, he shows that innovation itself becomes a proof of spiritual grace: whereas followers of any leader in a non-regional cult regard him as a mere transmitter of a received idiom, the regional cult’s members attribute its basic design to their founder’s prophetic visions and insights. In fact, much of the cult innovation is on a pragmatic, ad hoc basis. It has to be understood as a gradual series of choices in response to growing acceptance or rejection of the cult by a wider public. Furthermore, it is not an evolution in a single direction, and a cult may lapse from the newer type into the older one and become non-regional.

How does one cult — and not another — firmly establish a hierarchy, with secure centralized control of cult assets and services, while expanding the regional catchment area over town and country and the span of cult membership across socio-economic strata and ethnic groups? Detailed historical comparison is necessary for the explanation, and van Binsbergen compares the career of one cult, formerly regional, with another that is now vast, multi-ethnic and still expanding not only in Zambia but in Botswana also: respectively, these are the Bituma and Nzila cults. The relative placement and mobility of the founder's own group counts along, of course, with the founder's capacity to mobilize his fellows in it. Nzila's founder initially appealed to Luvale immigrants like himself and even beyond them to others who also came in a great influx from Angola into an area of Zambia with towns of major economic and political importance. With the increasing penetration of the immigrants went the greater spread of the cult. At first, the diagnosis and final treatment of member's afflictions remained (with the possible exception of the limited autonomy allowed a single deputy and branch in another district) the monopoly of the founder and his designated heir. They moved the cult's main shrine to a central place right by one of the two major towns and thus secured a suitable headquarters for urban as well as rural supplicants. Eventually, other branches were also allowed some autonomy in healing, but central control was stabilized by the careful registration of all members, 'by the Annual Convention at the cult's headquarters, by the [centralised] distribution of essential paraphernalia, and by formal examinations concerning the cult's beliefs and regulations'. Not only did this result in an idiom quite distinct from that of any non-regional cult of affliction — and thus made it harder for the new cult to lapse into the old cultic background — but it also established, van Binsbergen argues, 'clearly recognised principles of legitimation, controlled from headquarters, outside which no cult leader pursuing the Nzila idiom could claim ritual efficacy'.

A more illuminating contrast could hardly be found than the career of the Bituma cult. Having failed from the start to convert many of his fellow Angolans, the founder, himself an Mbunda, concentrated his appeal on rural villagers, mainly Nkoya. His cult became trapped in their relative poverty, their hinterland's local power-blocks, and the limitations of their labour migration to distant towns where they never gained much of a foothold.

Anchorage in their district stultified the further expansion of the cult’s region. The district had only a small township as its administrative centre and was ethnically more homogeneous as well as economically less differentiated than the breeding ground of the Nzila cult. When Bituma’s founder died, the cult fragmented; it became little more than other non-regional cults. Never did it develop, in van Binsbergen’s terms, ‘an adequate structure through which the founder’s charisma could be routinised and channelled without becoming dissipated or usurped’.

In both cases van Binsbergen sees a constant factor as foremost: the structural characteristics of the immediate arena in which the cult arises. His argument is that the viability of the cult is contingent upon these characteristics above all and that the structure of the cult has to be commensurate with them.

It is an argument which Thoden van Velzen takes a stage further in seeking a materialist explanation of the waxing and waning of regional cults in Surinam. Just as waves of cults of affliction sweep across Central Africa, so do High God cults come and go in Surinam among Bush Negroes and, at times, among Creoles also. Like van Binsbergen, Thoden van Velzen considers it essential, therefore, that the cultic background out of which a regional cult emerges and into which it lapses be given its full weight in analysis. But for Thoden van Velzen even more problematic, and thus more central in his argument, is the accumulation by the cult of valuables or assets: How does such accumulation affect the survival and raison d’etre of a cult hierarchy and, even more fundamentally, how does the overall religious transformation relate to change in modes of production and distribution? His argument also contributes to other, perhaps even more general debates, because his main case is about a cult, Gaan Tata, which invites comparison with cargo cults, that favourite concern in dispute about the rationality or irrationality of religious belief and practice. Gaan Tata is, in a sense, a cargo cult in reverse. In it, too, the moral redemption of men, purity, cleansing from sin, all depended on waste, and the waste was on a grand scale: great heaps of European trade goods — household utensils, Victorian bric-a-brac, mantlepiece decorations, gold chains, shoes, plastic ware — were left to rot in dedication to the High God (Gaan Tata). The sudden, unexpected enrichment of the Surinam interior’s boat entrepreneurs, due to the discovery of gold which brought with it a deluge of imported goods quite without precedent, gave the cult its initial opportunity and basic concern. It was not that the cult demanded, as some millenarian movements do (cf. Douglas 1970 : 137), that people reject their own material values or those of Europeans. The wasted goods were quite highly valued imports, as in a cargo cult. For that very reason, they became God's business: like other new interlocal relations, such new riches, to be made in river transport across communal boundaries, were not to be left to look after themselves, but were made sense of, and controlled, religiously.

If, as Douglas suggests, cargo cults are 'cults of revolt against the way the social structure seems to be working' (1970 : 139), then we may say that in reverse what we find is a 'cult of regularization' (cf. also Moore 1975 : 219f). A cult of regularization enhances economic inequalities, rather than levels them; and it legitimizes a new status quo, rather than a restoration of the old. Gaan Tata is such a cult. It hid its waste, from outsiders especially, in a secret bush shrine. It reduced the circulation of European material goods and limited them even more to an elite, rather than providing, after the fashion of a cargo cult, the ritual means to bring the goods flowing in from the outside. Moreover, it redirected the circulation away from the main European centre, Surinam's capital, on the coast and towards the cult's own headquarters in the interior. Fittingly for a cult of regularization, its headquarters was sited at a centre of current and continuing political importance, the capital of the Paramount Chief (Gaanman) of the largest Bush Negro tribe.

Thoden van Velzen points out:

<quote>

'As part of Gaan Tata's commandments, the [boat] entrepreneurs were given a set of standards that proved their usefulness in contacts between Bush Negroes from various areas and with different cultural backgrounds; the cult, for example, gave religious sanction to peacefulness: even the shedding of a single drop of blood could arouse Gaan Tata's wrath ... Significantly, any boatsman who established a good relation with the Gaan Tata oracles through timely presents and acts of deference — soliciting help in case of illness — could rest assured that his reputation would be protected [from accusations of witchcraft]’.

</quote>

He argues further:

<quote>

‘The cult was directed at eradicating an internal evil, witchcraft, that was felt to dog the steps of the nouveaux riches’.

</quote>

Hence the cult introduced an alternative to the customary conciliatory ritual for the dead: one treatment for the witches and sinners, another for the “respectable”. Sinners or witches were believed to die from Gaan Tata’s wrath, so no elaborate death rites for them. Their legacies, polluting to their relatives, were brought as “God’s cargoes” to the cult’s priests, who gave back a small, cleansed share, kept part for themselves, and left great heaps dedicated to Gaan Tata. The relatives and local community made a death the occasion for costly celebration among themselves — the customary death rites — only when someone was declared, after a post mortem inquest, to be “respectable”.

Thoden van Velzen argues that the career of the cult was closely geared to radical economic change introduced from outside the cult region. The boom in river transport entrepreneurship produced along with wealth a qualitative change in interlocal and cross-cultural relations which was essential for the cult’s overall centralization and effective hierarchy. Then came a drastic economic slump when the interior’s extractive industries, gold and Balata, collapsed. Not long afterwards the cult itself fragmented into a number of parochial cults, without any central control or uniform ritual practice and dogma. The cult’s career, until the next radical economic change, took the course of what might be described as a downwards spiral. The more the priests retrenched through short term solutions to their own pressing religious and organizational problems, the less was the cult able to respond to the current concerns of its public. Once a new labour elite emerged with the next radical economic change, a different regional cult began in opposition to the remnants of the old one. The opposition was based in a rival political centre within the old cult's heartland, and the new cult, like the old in its heyday, regularized and legitimized the wax of inequality. Protest and revolt there was, perhaps, but in defense of new privilege: once again a fresh cult gave the newly prosperous members of a rising labour elite protection against witchcraft and also a fresh imprimatur in the form of special certificates to their own innocence of witchcraft.

A key point must be kept in sight, given the stress in Thoden van Velzen's argument on radical economic change. Yesterday's cult of regularization becomes today's anachronism, not merely through external change or radical discontinuities in the milieu of the cult but through cumulative change in the cult itself. Indeed, every regional cult builds up a momentum of its own over time which has to be taken into account in explaining its response to radical economic change or any challenge to the viability of its regional organization. That is why in my own study of a High God cult, southern Africa's cult of Mwali, I pay special attention, as does Thoden van Velzen, to the underlying orientation of the cult's leadership and to endemic instability within its organization. The question is, How far does this orientation alter over time, and what directions does such instability take regularly as well as in sudden, perhaps unprecedented shifts?

Historical evidence and my own observation shows that from precolonial times to the present there has been a continuity in orientation within the cult of Mwali. The central concern of the messages from the cult's oracles was and still is to conserve order in the world and maintain the welfare of the land, its people and their economy. It is not surprising that such conservatism is fostered by a cult with a certain, lasting fixity in its hierarchical centralization. What is surprising is the combination of such fixity with instability in the coverage and definition of regions, impermanence in the sites of oracles, variability in priestly succession and great fluctuations in affiliated congregations and their staff. On the one hand, this High God cult has a small, limited number of regional oracles that are ranked in a stabilized, unified order according to their restricted distribution within a central heartland. Similarly, the ranks of its staff form a hierarchy with relatively exclusive criteria for recruitment: the higher the rank, the narrower and more exclusive are the criteria, and recruitment to the inner circle of priests is on the most exclusive basis. On the other hand, its land shrines lack an overall pecking order; they are widely dispersed and highly variable in standing, a multitude without a known size. Like their congregations, they rise and fall in importance as foci of ritual collaboration (some disappear completely), and pass through what I regard as three grades — local, interlocal, and regional.

Significantly, this cult is one of those to which Turner seems to refer when he suggests that earth cults stress inclusiveness, rather than ‘selfish and sectional interests and conflict over them’ (Turner 1974: 185). Yet the cult fits no polar extreme in Turner’s terms. Admittedly, never does its ritual offer a straightforward representation of the various political divisions within its vast domain (see Map 1). But it does thrive on indexical occasions — on the very stuff of micropolitics — when the relations between competitors are put to the test of ritual collaboration or avoidance, when the scale of local commitment and investment in the cult is proved, when still unresolved territorial and political ambiguities are given a somewhat anticipatory definition, heralding new power divisions. At the same time, its ritual, characteristically rich in symbolism with transcultural meaning, memorializes events that are broadly significant for every congregation, be it mainly Kalanga, Karanga, Venda, Ndau, Khurutse, Ndebele or any other. Moreover, its theology directs attention to the macrocosm, the order beyond that of the congregation or any single community. I show in my essay that the cult’s macrocosmic conceptions ‘are a significant factor in behaviour because they are of such a kind that communities can continue to define their broadest consensus through them irrespective of their differences, hostilities and competition’. With its capacity to override or encompass quite marked cultural differences, the cult continually admits newcomers irrespective of their ethnic origins. Thus highly sensitive and responsive as the cult is to micro-political change, it is no less concerned with ‘wider bonding ... disinterestedness and shared values’ (Turner loc.cit.) Indeed, it is dynamic tension between inclusiveness and exclusiveness which gives the cult much of its momentum and renewed viability from one historical context to another.

It may be, as Turner suggests, that studies of African cults of the earth, most strikingly the Tallensi case, tend to have to say little about ‘factional conflict’

(idem). But the cult of Mwali can hardly be studied adequately without a discussion of politics and policy making in various arenas, from the most petty to one grand enough to embrace the cult's vast domain across southern Africa. Indeed, it has been much debated in the literature on the cult, though mainly from the viewpoints of white settlers, how the cult responded in crises, especially during an early war against white rule in 1896. I suggest that, even during crises or rather then most of all, the cult has been constrained to favour political compromise in its widest policy — its cardinal oracles make pronouncements which do not commit the whole cult to one side only during a struggle — and that this balancing has been in response to the diversity of peoples and interests which the cult must encompass. In no way does this suggestion deny the cult its part in rallying moral sentiment against exploitation and the abuse of power: some of its songs ring with moral outrage against alien rule; its oracles have urged resistance against the inroads of a cash economy; they have also warned about the dangers of party politics. Rather this suggestion takes account of the fact that the cult's ultimate dependence is on voluntary consent; its appeal is to the most general consensus, which it may focus but cannot invent.

A two-way process of politics has taken place. The cult has had its impact on changes in the distribution of power within various arenas and so, too, have nationwide conflicts and factional struggles, both within and between local communities and Christian churches, contributed to political competition within the cult itself. To demonstrate this point in detail part of my discussion concentrates on one region, its development, its leaders' careers, their disputes, managerial problems and tactics. Necessarily, territorial encroachment and the expansion of political communities and churches figure prominently in my analysis, because individual and communal migration, in part due to the appropriation of the central highlands of Botswana and Zimbabwe for European ranches, has been a considerable factor in the region's politics, contributing to a growing shortage of land and increasingly diversifying the region ethnically. Similarly weighted analytically are shifts in the flow of transactions, because these have affected the control of assets and the accumulation of great wealth by the region's leaders, especially its priest and his heirs. Furthermore, I show why it has been critically important to have a secure base in a political community on the wax in order to command a centre for the region as a whole. It would be a gross error to turn the region's sequences of political competition into a series of successful manipulations by Machiavellian masterminds in collusion with each other, or on the other hand, to exaggerate the ad hoc element in decision making in the cult. My argument avoids both these pitfalls by establishing how regularities in the sequences relate to competitors' long and short term objectives as well as to the highly pragmatic, situational adjustments which they make without any grand design in view.

 The Interpenetration of Cults

Through an examination of how different kinds of cult interpenetrate in Zimbabwe, Garbett reaches a closely related argument. Garbett rejects the view that the ritual field formed by the interpenetration of the cults can be understood as extensively controllable or manipulable by a single focus of ritual authority, such as one spirit medium. He argues,

<quote>

'Only within limited local arenas is it meaningful to speak of strategy ... The appearance of strategy, when the total ritual field is viewed over time, arises not from the manipulations of particular mediums, coordinated in terms of some overall plan — the key actors rarely if ever meet and do not collude — but from the emergent properties of the ritual field itself' (Garbett's italics).

</quote>

He is careful to point out, also, that methodological problems arise — problems which come up repeatedly in our studies of regional cults — because the vastness of this ritual field puts it well beyond the practical reach of a single fieldworker. He regards the ritual field, therefore, from the perspective of the Korekore cult which he has studied in depth in Zimbabwe, and relies on historical evidence and anthropological studies of linked cults in order to contextualize his own observations.

The processes he analyses link a regional cult with quite different, noncentralized cults which overlap from one part of the ritual field to another. These cults, so different in organization and ideology, might loosely be categorized as earth cults: they are broadly concerned with general morality and man's dependence on the earth, and they receive supplicants from wider vicinities extending beyond individual political communities. However, only the clearly centralized regional cult has ranked mediums in a recognized hierarchy with jurisdiction over well-defined ritual territories. Its sacred topography, while changeable and flexible like certain other aspects of the cult — and Garbett stresses that some aspects are even more flexible and unstable than these — is regarded by the people themselves as enduring and unchanging from mythic time, not an expression of current political boundaries. The whole landscape, ritually divided and sub-divided into 'spirit provinces', is full of fine boundaries 'established' in mythic time, though they may be actually 'discovered' by spirit mediums quite recently. By contrast, the most widespead of the linked cults, the Zezuru local cult, is more like the Tonga prophet cult, lacking demarcated constituencies and with unranked but graded mediums whose clientele varies accordingly: the minor medium serves the local order, clients from his immediate community or kin, whereas the major medium has a wider clientele, dispersed and more diverse (cf. Fry 1976: 34f, in his terms the Zezuru mediums are 'lower-level' and 'higher-level', respectively). Moreover, like Tonga and other Zambian prophets, the Zezuru ones have recently multiplied in droves, with a striking exaggeration of the familiar pattern of meteoric careers for many. Here the resemblances, like certain crucial differences, are not fortuitous or merely matters of typological comparison: they are evidence of the properties of a wider ritual field, and continuities and discontinuities within it. Taking the Korekore cult as the field's centre, it extends from a centralized regional cult to its periphery in non-centralized or weakly centralized cults, respectively the Zezuru to the south and the Tonga to the north (see Map 1). Similarly, across the field, there is a correlated variation in the conceptual or symbolic elaboration of hierarchy relative to the Korekore cult. At the periphery the elaboration is somewhat less among Tonga than Zezuru, who make a conceptual analogy between their political hierarchy — village headman, subchief, chief — and their pattern of spiritual authority — near ancestors, remote ancestors, heroes — although the mediums possessed by these spirits may be competitors with mutually disputed and ambiguous standing. Among Zezuru yesterday's disciple is often in the process of becoming today's rival and perhaps even tomorrow's master:

<quote>

‘Although the system is thought of in stable hierarchical terms, and although there is a certain stability of authority relations between spirit-mediums, the pattern of relationships between the spirits and their mediums at any one point of time depends more on the abilities of the mediums than on anything else’ (Fry 1976 : 44–45).

</quote>

The relations between the disparate cults are unstable as are the cults themselves, in certain respects. Yet the processes in the wider ritual field cannot be understood as merely changeless oscillations between hierarchy and non-hierarchy or centralization and non-centralization. Garbett rejects the all-too familiar pendulum model in order to comprehend the changing interdependence between the disparate cults. To appreciate the advance he makes it is useful to contrast his approach with that of Fry (1976) who also discusses the Zezuru and Korekore cults but from an alternative vantage-ground, Fry’s own, sensitive observations of the Zuzuru. As Fry sees it, each cult corresponds to its society; one society being the opposite of the other, the cults are opposites, too. The Zezuru are ‘dynamic and radical’ ‘in the front line of “progress” ’ and ‘cultural nationalism’ (Fry 1976 : 66); correspondingly their cult is highly flexible:

<quote>

‘While the Zezuru experience rapid change, and unpredictable future, rapid economic or political success on the basis of personal charisma ... so their religious life features dynamic charismatic spirit-mediums and a highly fluid and little-controlled pantheon of spirits’ (Fry 1976 : 66–67).

</quote>

Fry is aware that the contrast has an element of caricature in it, but he pursues it nevertheless:

<quote>

‘It is perhaps an overstatement to regard the Korekore as a stagnant society, living in the past, but it would nevertheless go some way to explaining the ‘bureaucratisation’ of [their] spirit-medium cult as part of the running down process. The mediums perpetuate the glorious past, which is changeless and as rigid as the cult organisation itself’ (1976 : 66).

</quote>

The trouble with such a picture of ‘bureaucratisation’ and ‘rigidity’ is that it selects features, somewhat arbitrarily, out of context and so gets them out of proportion. Hence the Korekore cult appears to be hierarchical and stable beyond belief. Partly, Fry gets it wrong, because from his grounding in the Zezuru cult (whose mediums have a clientele without an apparent or well-defined constituency), Fry sees as the sole alternative a cult having mediums with constituencies only. In fact, however, the Korekore mediums have both constituency and clientele, and it is essential to recognize the area of indeterminacy in the relations between constituency and clientele. Thus Garbett observes:

<quote>

‘A medium who establishes a reputation for effective cures and for bringing rain may draw supplicants [i.e. a clientele] to him from a wider vicinity that extends far beyond the boundaries of his spirit province [his constituency] or even his region ... Some mediums, by expanding their vicinity of supplicants, come to have reputations which far outweigh their, possibly, humble positions in the formal hierarchy of mediums. Ultimately, this may lead to friction between a junior medium and one more senior about their respective jurisdiction and spheres of ritual authority, and the intervention of the senior medium may be required’.

</quote>

Quite unlike the caricature, the Korekore cult in reality, Garbett shows, emerges through the mediums’ lobbying for consensus, through their competition for backing among themselves, for greater reputation with followers, and through their continuous reconstruction of the mythic past in the light of their understandings of the present and their aspirations for the future. The ‘bureaucratic’ Korekore mediums turn out to be ‘charismatic’, ‘dynamic’, after all; and to demonstrate this point Garbett enables us to follow closely a regional medium’s behavour in the critical context of the seance, because this is the context par excellence for development in the cult. It is where ritual authority is proved or disproved, where displays of ritual knowledge and competence put power and authority at risk. In his analysis Garbet also gives full weight to transactions over material resources and tangible cult assets. Indeed, he evaluates the critical factors in a pattern of expansion through his detailed case material on the regional medium of Mutota’s spirit, George Kupara. Kupara abided by the cult’s doctrines discouraging personal enrichment at the expense of the wealth in trust to the spirit. His aim was not accumulation in the spirit’s name, but rather largesse which enhanced the spirit’s reputation along with his own, of course, and thus contributed to the continuing expansion of his region and its vicinity. Such expansion thrived on the redistribution and recirculation of cult income and the conversion of cult fees into debts or loans subject to interest charges that were ‘quickly forgotten’: i.e., became the halo of good-will needed for wider ritual authority.

So far I have barely touched upon the subject of the interdependence between the disparate cults. Yet it is this part of Garbett’s study which does most to advance our understanding of the wider ritual field. The problems for the people themselves, like the anthropologist, are in good measure conceptual and demand that they, too, make a translation of culture. Seen from a Korekore perspective, non-hierarchical relations among the Zezuru have to be comprehended by and through the hierarchical cult among the Korekore. One of the ways that it is done is through a shared genealogical idiom which allows the establishment of kinship and filiation between the Zezuru local spirits and the Korekore territorial ones and thus relationships between their mediums. Garbett draws our attention to the distinctive configuration that the genealogy of the Korekore ancestor Mutota has: in graphic terms, it can be roughly described as a ‘T’ shape rather than the inverted ‘V’ the shape so familiar in the genealogies of segmentary lineages. The apical ancestor is Mutota, and his ‘children’ (the top of the ‘T’) are not only virtually without issue but also somewhat indeterminate genealogically — or rather, what their number and birth order may be is ignored as a subject of cultural knowledge. Hence there is leeway for the inclusion of more or less spirits and thus mediums, without definition of their rank or seniority vis-a-vis each other: they are all ‘children’, peers alike subordinate to the one ‘father’, Mutota. As for the rest of the genealogy, after a fixed line of names, which a candidate for mediumship has to cite as a proof of competence and legitimacy, the rest does define hierarchy and rank but for the mediums of the Korekore themselves. Thus with one simple conceptual framework Korekore are able to comprehend cultural and transcultural relations, because that \framework includes both areas of ambiguity and areas of apparent definition of the rank and limits to the inclusion of spirits and their mediums.

His discussion of the various ways that the people themselves bridge the disparate cults by making translations from one culture to another leads Garbett to a further question. Under what conditions do mediums or would-be mediums of the non-hierarchical local cult turn for legitimation to the regional medium of the hierarchical cult? And what consequences for stability or instability follow due to the reaction of each cult on the other? It is a measure of the force of his answers that he takes into account both the long-term properties of the wider .ritual field and the most recent transformations in the last phase of colonialism.

 Future Research

These essays begin a new phase in the anthropological study of regional cults. It is the first time that the cults are treated as a major focus of comparative analysis. Hence much of our work is devoted to the tightly argued presentation of a substantial body of evidence on a limited number of main cases, rather than on any broad survey of the subject. We are well aware that some of our generalizations are tentative, as befits the initial stage of enquiry into a vast subject. Our aim is to provide a major body of hypotheses, to raise fresh questions even beyond our immediate reach in answers, and thus to prepare the ground for future research into change in religious organization and ideology.

University of Manchester

January 1977

 References

<biblio>

Barth, F.

1975 Ritual and Knowledge among the Baktaman of New Guinea. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Christian, W. A. Jr.

1972 Person and God in a Spanish Valley. London: Seminar Press.

Colson, E.

1948 Rain Shrines of the Plateau Tonga of Northern Rhodesia. Africa 18: 272–83. Reprinted 1962, Manchester: Manchester University Press for the Rhodes-Livingstone Institute.

1958 Marriage and the Family among the Plateau Tonga. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

Douglas, M.

1970 Natural Symbols, Explorations in Cosmology. London: Barrie and Rockliff, The Cresset Press.

Evans-Pritchard, E. E.

1948 The Sanusi of Cyrenaica. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Fry, P.

1976 Spirits of Protest. Spirit-mediums and the Articulation of Consensus among the Zezuru of Southern Rhodesia (Zimbabwe). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Gluckman, M.

1940 Analysis of a Social Situation in Modern Zululand. Bantu Studies 14 : 1–30, 147–174.

1942 Some Processes of Social Change, Illustrated with Zululand Data. African Studies I : 243–260.

Moore, S. F. and B. G. Myerhoff, eds.

1975 Symbol and Politics in Communal Ideology. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Smith, C. A., ed.

1976a Regional Analysis, Vol. I: Economic Systems. New York: Academic Press.

1976b Regional Analysis, Vol. II: Social Systems. New York: Academic Press.

Turner, V. W.

1957 Schism and Continuity in an African Society, A Study of Ndembu Village Life. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

1967 The Forest of Symbols, Aspects of Ndembu Ritual. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

1968 The Drums of Affliction, A Study of Religious Processes among the Ndembu of Zambia. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

1974 Dramas, Fields, and Metaphors, Symbolic Action in Human Society. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

1975 Revelation and Divination in Ndembu Ritual. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Werbner, R. P.

1971 Symbolic Dialogue and Personal Transactions among Kalanga and Ndembu. Ethnology 10: 311–328.

</biblio>

© Richard P Werbner 1977

 Acknowledgements

Max Gluckman was a creative force in the A.S.A., as a Founder Member, Secretary (1951–57), and Chairman (1962–66). He took a special interest in the A.S.A. Monographs, and began the first series with the introduction which he and Fred Eggan wrote. With characteristic energy, he helped us in our early efforts to plan this conference, shortly before he died in 1975. We dedicate this book to his memory as a tribute to his inspiration.

This book is based on the 1976 A.S.A. Conference which Kingsley Garbett and I convened at Langdale Hall in the University of Manchester. I am grateful to him for sharing the burdens of the Conference. We had planned to edit the book together. However, he took up a Readership in Adelaide after the Conference, and we decided that having two editors so far apart would mean delaying the book beyond the year we had fixed for publication.

The A.S.A. wishes to thank warmly the Warden of Langdale Hall and her staff for providing so perfect a home for the Conference. We are grateful also to the University of Manchester and the Wenner Gren Foundation for financial help.

The chairpersons of the Conference's sessions were: Jean La Fontaine, Mary Douglas, Ernest Gellner, Paul Baxter and David Parkin; the discussants were Malcolm Ruel and Hector Blackhurst along with the conveners. We would like to thank them and others, especially Terence Ranger, Raymond Firth, Peter Fry, Benson Saler and Jaap Van Velsen, for their helpful comments. For much practical help at the Conference we owe a very great debt to Mary Lea, Trudy Armstrong, Nick Mahoney, Beth Goldblatt, Bob Fredericks, and Jay Close.

Our present understanding of regional cults is the product of much joint effort and intellectual cooperation by all the contributors to the book. As editor, I am grateful for the opportunity it has given me to work from the vast darkness of the subject towards the light.

Finally, I wish to acknowledge the creative work of members of the Audio-Visual Service of Manchester University: Paul Bailey designed the book, and Sue Frost carried out the studio production. Summer Harrison, Paul McCartney, and Derek Schofield also gave last-minute assistance.

The royalties on the sales of this monograph go entirely into the Radcliffe-Brown Memorial Fund.

<right>

R.P.W.

</right>

* Part One: Islamic Cult Regions: Historical Interaction or Symbolic Congruence

 1. Ideological Change and Regional Cults: Maraboutism and Ties of “Closeness” in Western Morocco

by Dale F. Eickelman

This study presents an account of the main structure of the ties between the Sherqawi religious lodge (zawya) of western Morocco and its clientele, the idealogical base for the maintenance of these ties, and how both the actual ties and the values on which they are based have altered and, in turn, have been altered by changing historical and political contexts. [1] Through these topics I pursue a more general concern with the classic sociological theme of the interrelation between symbolic representations of the world and patterns of social conduct. In particular, I am concerned with maraboutism, a predominant (although not unique) version of Islam as locally received in Morocco. I argue that like most implicit ideologies (or in a sense that is explained shortly, a part-ideology), maraboutism is closely tied to basic Moroccan conceptions of the social order, notably the notion here translated as “closeness.” I further argue that such ideologies must be understood as socially maintained activities and related to specific historical contexts. I seek to place maraboutism in such a perspective and to indicate how this approach is more satisfactory than alternative ones which treat maraboutism as analytically “timless” or which posit a stable interrelation between the realms of ideology and social action.

 Ideologies and the Social Order

Because the relation between symbolic representations of the social order and patterns of social conduct is such an enduring sociological problem, I think it useful to indicate what I regard as the shortcomings of certain earlier approaches. An older academic tradition asserted a correspondence between the two realms without regarding the exact nature of their interrelation as problematic. Thus Robertson Smith (1919) related successive modifications in the messages of Old Testament prophets to the specific historical circumstances in which they originated. Smith clearly perceived both social changes and inconsistencies in the prophetic ideologies, yet regarded Victorian notions of progress and Christian assumptions about the gradual enlightenment of mankind as sufficient to account for them (Beidelman 1974: 38). Similarly, the “simple” societies that Durkheim and his collaborators chose to investigate allowed them to presume an elegant one-to-one correlation between ideology and social action (Durkheim 1915; Mauss 1966; see also Evans-Pritchard 1940). Edward Shils is a contemporary representative of the “correspondence” tradition to the extent that he regards the core symbols, values, and beliefs of a society as concretely represented by such physical manifestations as capitols, cult centres, and social and political boundaries (Shils 1975: 3).

In some contexts the straightforward postulate of an at least partial reflection between the two realms still possesses analytical utility. In Shils’ case it is applied in an original way to the symbolism which underlies modern nation states. Yet, in general, it is now competent but sterile to reiterate that ideologies sometimes support actual social arrangements and vice versa. Or, in the less hyperbolic language of Sally Falk Moore, one consequence of accepting such a straightforward correspondence between the two realms is to imply that “social arrangements” are “simply imperfect approximations of ideal models” (1969: 400).

The notion of correspondence masks the two-way interaction which occurs between symbolic conceptions of the social order and patterns of social action. The idea of interaction, as opposed to correspondence, necessarily implies a lack of fit between the two analytical levels at any given moment. Relatively few anthropologists have sought to trace out in concrete detail the consequences of such interaction. Those who have tend to be concerned with only one direction of it, the manipulation of ideological principles at the level of social action. Below I briefly analyze one such approach because it places my ensuing discussion in a more meaningful perspective. In an excellent article entitled “Descent and Legal Fiction” (1969), Moore argues that systems of descent, legal systems, and religious ideologies describe and explain the nature of the social universe. At the same time they provide a means for manipulating it. To illustrate her general argument, she argues that any descent system should be seen “as an ideology of identities that can be adapted for use as an organizing principle, rather than as an organizing principle in the first place” (Moore 1969:381). When adapted as an organizing principle, descent ideology or any other system of symbolic representations can vary considerably as it is manipulated for practical ends. Even when jural rights are ideologically claimed to emanate from a single principle such as descent, they usually derive from several and cannot effectively be traced to a single source (Moore 1969: 396).

In anthropological analyses which are concerned primarily with the ramifications of symbol systems as they serve as practical guides to and rationalizations for social action, there is a tendency to simplify the argument by treating symbol systems analytically as “timeless.” Occasionally this is made explicit (e.g., Schneider and Smith 1973: 6). A consequence of this approach is that what might be regarded as the communicative aspects of the relation of symbol systems to social action remain unstressed. After all, ideological systems are social activities that are maintained through various forms of expression, including ritual action. In the course of being expressed, such ideologies become modified and in turn modify the direction of social action. Thus, to be fully comprehended in relation to social action, such ideological systems must be seen in at least some of their successive historical modifications.

There is a closely related issue which it is appropriate to introduce here. Moore (1969: 400) implies that most ideological systems are analogous to the descent systems which directly concern her. As difficult as the analysis of descent systems might appear in some respects, I would argue that from an analytic point of view some ideologies, especially those considered religious, are often less distinctly bounded. Thus in most world religious traditions there is an inherent tension between formal ideological tenets propagated and accepted by an educated, religious elite and, coexisting with them, an implicit ideology of religion as locally practised and understood. The latter substantially overlaps with equally implicit, locally held assumptions about the nature of the social world. From an analytic point of view it is difficult to categorize such beliefs as “religious” and as Runciman has indicated, labelling such beliefs as ideology or simply as beliefs about the conduct of life is just as adequate (1970: 75–76). Indeed, from the viewpoint of the social elite in most religious traditions, the religious practices and attitudes of subordinate groups or persons frequently are considered uncivilized, pathological, or, in the case which concerns this article, un-Islamic. Yet for those who maintain such beliefs, they usually are taken for granted as authentic expressions of the religious tradition in which they participate. North African maraboutism is one such ideology. Precisely because it appears so closely tied to aspects of local society, maraboutism affords a particularly useful means of tracing the interaction between ideology and the social order.

 Maraboutism as a Part-Ideology

Since the terms marabout[2] and maraboutism have been used in a variety of ways, I specify my own usage below and then indicate how marabouts form a part of Islam as locally understood. In the Moroccan context, marabouts are persons living or dead (dead, that is, only from an outside observer’s point of view) thought to have a special relation toward God which makes them particularly well placed to serve as intermediaries with the supernatural and to communicate God’s grace (Baraka) to their clients. Maraboutism is the usually implicit ideology and the ritual activities associated with such beliefs. Like any successful ideology, maraboutism and the ritual comportment associated with it have been flexible enough to accommodate changing historical situations. Marabouts and similar holy men elsewhere in the Muslim world are seen by their supporters as elements in a particularistic hierarchy through whom the supernatural pervades, sustains, and affects the universe.

In a Weberian sense such a conception might be seen as a “magical” accretion to Islam; but from the viewpoint of tribesmen, peasants, and townsmen who hold such beliefs and act upon them, intermediaries with God are an integral part of Islam as they understand it. They regard themselves as Muslims, pure and simple, although they are aware of the disfavour in which such beliefs are held by Muslim scripturalists and reformists. Consequently, clients of marabouts often dissimulate their beliefs in front of such persons, especially in contemporary contexts.

Now and in the past, those who express and accept maraboutism are consciously aware of an alternative, formally articulated vision of Islam antithetical to their own. For this reason, maraboutism can be considered a part-ideology. It is never found in isolation, but co-exists with formal Islamic ideology. Further, it largely overlaps with locally maintained assumptions concerning the social order. Because of its implicit patterning upon (and patterning of) existing social realities, maraboutism can be considered a conservative ideology in Mannheim’s sense of the term (1971: 152–153). It does not have to be consciously articulated and defended in order to be maintained since it takes as its legitimation “the way things are,” to use a popular Moroccan expression to refer to the social present. This implicitness undoubtedly is one of the reasons why there have been relatively few discussions of maraboutic ideology in North African ethnographic literature, as opposed to police-dossier style accounts of the leadership, genealogical claims and mystic ties, and regions of influence of maraboutic orders (e.g., Depont and Coppolani 1897; Drague 1951).

The conjuncture of conflicting patterns of belief can be found in most world religions. Along these lines, Ernst Troeltsch (1960) has argued that Christianity can be seen as constantly in tension with social reality. Consequently its social history is one of shifts at various levels of compromise and noncompromise with the world. I think that a similar argument is critical to comprehending maraboutic beliefs. The Islamic tradition as it has emerged in various societies has generally contained conceptions of man’s relations with God both as comprising and lacking intermediaries. The Qur’an, as scripturalists and Muslim reformists vigorously stress, portrays all men as equal before God with no privileged intermediaries toward him.

In contrast, the strength of maraboutism rests on the implicit assumption that relations between men and God work just like all other social ties. Moroccans who act upon maraboutic beliefs explicitly see the relation of God with his marabouts as nearly analogous to patron-client ties in ordinary society. As one informant related, God, like a minister or the king, is too powerful to be approached directly, so the client works through a marabout who is “close” both to him and to God (Eickelman 1976: 161–162).[3]

Taken together in various syntheses according to historical context, the antithetical notions of formal Islam and maraboutism (or similar partideologies elsewhere in the Muslim world) have enabled Islam, analytically considered as a religious tradition, to encompass many varieties of social experience and to be regarded by its adherents at any given time as a meaningful religious representation of reality.

 The Sherqawi Zawya

Since maraboutism is largely tied to specific social contexts, here I briefly sketch the Sherqawi religious lodge’s social history and the changing scope of its activities before considering the maraboutic ideology and cult associated with it. Asa major regional pilgrimage centre, the Sherqawi zawya of Boujad annually draws tens of thousands of pilgrims, singly and in groups, and currently can claim as clients most of the tribal collectivities of the western plains (see Map 1), many individuals from nearby towns, and scattered ones from elsewhere in Morocco. Approximately one-third of the town’s inhabitants, roughly twenty thousand as of 1970, claim Sherquawi descent; continuing Sherqawi dominance of the town’s economy and administrative offices gives Boujad the flavour of a “company” town. This dominance has levelled off, but the town is still primarily identified with the zawya.

The religious lodge was founded at the end of the sixteenth century by the marabout Sidi Mhammed Sherqi (d. 1601). Within a century it became a leading intellectual centre in Morocco. Through a series of shrewd political moves, the successive lords (Sid-s) of the zawya managed to enhance its influence in a tumultuous political climate. Hagiographies and court histories of this early period give little indication of the relation of the Sherqawa with their clientele or their internal rivalries, but by the end of the 18th century its prestige was such that Sultan Muhammed ben ‘Abdallah (reigned 1757–1790) feared its prominence and destroyed most of the town, including a collective granary used by the region’s client tribes. The Sultan also led the principal Sherqawi marabout of the time, Sid i-Hajj l-‘Arbi (d. 1819), to forced residence with the royal entourage in Marrakesh. The marabout used the occasion to accept as donations extensive agricultural estates (‘azib-s) from tribal collectivities in the south (see Map I) and to extend the Sherqawi sphere of influence (Eickelman 1972–1973: 44). By the early 19th century Sid 1-Hajj l-‘Arbi was considered one of the two most powerful marabouts in Morocco (Ali Bey 1816:1, 176–177).

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-2.jpg]]

A fuller picture of the activities of the zawya emerges by the latter half of the 19th century. Leading Sherqawa were able to influence the sultan and his entourage and in turn were considered significant enough to be watched, accommodated, and carefully manipulated by them. The Sherqawa exercised intermittently a de facto control over Makhzen (central government) appointments in the area, acted as intermediaries to the Makhzen on behalf of clients, secured the safe passage of commerce through the area, mediated tribal disputes, and performed a myriad of other roles. Clients from Rabat, Sale, Fes, Meknes, and the Tafilalt area to the south regularly sent offerings to leading Sherqawi marabouts, as did rural local communities (dawwar-s) and tribal sections (fakhda-s). Most collective client relations with the Sherqawa were in the area indicated on the map, but there were also a few groups as far south as the Sus and in the High Atlas mountains. These links, as with those in the main sphere of Sherqawi influence, depend largely upon the social landscape as perceived by the Sherqawa and their clientele at any given moment, as in the case of the lands acquired by Sid l-‘Arbi (d. 1819). His descendents still possess these lands and maintain ties with clients in the area.[4]

Client allegiances frequently shifted among various internal Sherqawi factions and occasionally away from them entirely. The vicissitudes of Sherqawi agricultural estates and subsidiary religious lodges, especially those located on the Shawya plain (for which documentation is more abundant), indicate how fragile and shifting was the balance of power among competing persons and factions. The sultan, his entourage, and local Makhzen officials often were at odds with each other. Each calculated the possibilities and advantages to themselves of enhancing or detracting from Sherqawi prestige, depending upon their estimation of interests at any given moment. Rival Sherqawa, merchants, rural strongmen, men of learning (‘ulama), and religious lodges elsewhere in Morocco made similar calculations of their own interests, the strength of the Sherqawa (or more accurately, of individual dominant Sherqawa), and the immediate opportunities available to them (Eickelman 1976: 31–64).

Growing French influence in the early 20th century at first added only another component to this multicentered shifting of alliances, but the social and political roles of the Sherqawa abruptly altered with the imposition of the protectorate in 1912. Prominent Sherqawa lost many of their preprotectorate privileges but were given local administrative sinecures, preferential access to French educational facilities, and favourable treatment as notables in administrative matters. The bases for social honour (in Weber’s sense of the term) rapidly shifted. For instance, to the end of the 19th century, leading Sherqawi marabouts maintained reputations as men of religious learning and were acknowledged as such by ‘ulama in Morocco’s leading cities. Yet by the 1920’s only a few isolated Sherqawa held such reputations. Still, given their competitive edge as notables, leading Sherqawa were generally able to shift their social, political and economic roles so as to maintain their social honour and elite status during the protectorate and after independence in 1956. Even as some leading educated Sherqawa deliberately dissociated themselves from maraboutic practices, clients of the Sherqawa continued to regard the success of some Sherqawa in any significant activity as a consequence of their maraboutic status and sought out those Sherqawa willing to maintain maraboutic ties with them.

Although the scope of activities performed by marabouts or kinsmen acting as proxies on their behalf has contracted and the size of offerings and sacrifices to them also has diminished, most rural Moroccans in the sphere of Sherqawi influence and a large number of urban Moroccans continue to maintain ties with the Sherqawa. In a few cases, as I have indicated, new ties have been established. The pattern appears to be the same for at least some religious lodges elsewhere in Morocco (e.g., Hatt 1974). Competition for acquiring a maraboutic reputation is no longer a principal means of maintaining social honour or power in Morocco, so few men actively seek reputations as living marabouts. But enshrined marabouts are another matter, and some persons who claim descent from them continue to “work” (ta-ykhdem) clients and to receive substantial donations of cash and produce for their efforts. Educated Sherqawa prefer to emphasize the piety, scholarship, and illustrious descent of their maraboutic predecessors rather than the popular conception of marabouts as “close” to God an J thus capable of efficaciously conveying his grace. In some contexts the association of the Sherqawa with maraboutism can be a distinct embarrassment. Yet maraboutism is far from residual in Moroccan society, for reasons that are described below.

 Maraboutism and “Closeness”

Any ideological system is influenced by the social order in which it is expressed, and part-ideologies such as maraboutism are so closely tied to existing social arrangements that they cannot be comprehended without reference to them. Maraboutism is especially linked to two key concepts through which Moroccans make sense of existing social arrangements: obligation (haqq) and closeness (qaraba) (Eickelman 1976: 96–99, 141–149). Obligations are contracted and exchanged through —rvices or offers of support. They are the culturally accepted means by which persons bond themselves to each other in Moroccan society and which determine the social honour of persons in relation to each other. Moroccans speak of having obligations “in” or “over” other persons, indicating the asymmetrical nature of the ties so created. All relationships impose obligations of calculable intensity. There is a considerable latitude within which such obligations can be contracted; thus ties of kinship and descent in themselves do not determine the nature and intensity of such ties. In general, persons strive for flexibility in relations where they are under obligation to others, while at the same time fixing as firmly as possible relations in which they hold obligations “over” other persons. Their goal is to preserve autonomy whenever possible and to be free to shift obligations as opportunities arise to enhance their social position.

“Closeness” is a form of relationship which is said to exist between persons bound together by multiple personal obligations and common interests and who regularly can be expected to act on each other’s behalf. Closeness is acting as if ties of obligation exist with another person which are so compelling that they are generally expressed in the idiom of kinship. This is because kinship ties, at least those involving common descent (‘blood’),were considered at the symbolic level to be permanent and unbreakable. Some relations of closeness are based upon kinship, although as stated, closeness based upon kinship is generally not sharply differentiated from closeness based upon other grounds. Closeness also develops out of patronage and clientship, residential propinquity or neighbourliness, membership in rural local communities or other “tribal” entities, and common occupation. Quite frequently these bases for closeness overlap and persons deliberately seek to make them do so. A brother can also be a client and a neighbour may seek to be considered a kinsmen, if it will enhance his status or secure practical advantages.

Ties involving marabouts are a particular instance of the concept of closeness. Below I first discuss the closeness said to exist between marabouts and their clients, then the complementary issue of the maintenance and legitimation of elite status within a maraboutic descent group.

The primary consideration in the client’s eye view of marabouts is that they are close (qrib) to God and therefore capable of influencing him or at least of relaying his grace. Having or acquiring a reputation for grace is sufficient for being a marabout, but the most-influential of them are distinguished by a number of complementary attributes. One of these is the claim of patrilineal descent from long-established marabouts such as Sidi Mhammed Sherqi, who have descendants actively maintaining their shrines and other cultic apparatus and thus indicating closeness to their ancestor.

Marabouts claiming descent from the Prophet Muhammed, or, in the case of the Sherqawa, from Sidi ‘Umar (d. 644), the second caliph in Islam, are especially prominent. Such persons intermarry as equals but do not give their daughters in marriage to “commoners” (fawam), those who cannot claim either type of privileged descent. Second, marabouts are generally attributed with some degree of religious knowledge (‘Urn) and always with mystic insight. Both of these qualities are reputedly transmitted to them through dyadic ties with earlier generations of maraboutic scholars and mystics.[5] Finally, marabouts must be willing to transmit their baraka to their clients or to have someone claiming closeness to them who does so on their behalf.

Despite the formal ideological claim that only God knows who is “close” to him, clients necessarily seek this-wordly signs to determine who marabouts are. Within the limits of their prosperity and other considerations, clients seek ties with those marabouts or their descendants thought most capable of sustaining-or enhancing their interests. A primary contemporary sign of baraka is the ability of marabouts or some of their descendants to maintain a prosperous life-style based at least in part upon their clients’ offerings. In the past another sign of the mystic powers of marabouts was their ability to act politically on behalf of their clients. Sherqawa can still occasionally do so, as I have indicated above. Such political successes are popularly attributed to Sherqawi baraka whether or not the Sherqawi involved actively seeks to be regarded as a marabout or takes material advantage of Boujad’s pilgrim traffic.

Like other social ties, those with marabouts are thought to depend upon continuing exchanges of obligations. The principal problem for believers in marabouts is how to create and maintain such ties with marabouts or those “close” to them (descendants or other persons) in order to ensure a flow of grace to sustain their particular concerns. They seek to contract personal, dyadic bonds of obligation with marabouts in order to compel marabouts to act on their behalf.

 Maraboutic Descent

Marabouts with descendants and with established cults are considered the most prestigious, since the well-being of their descendants and their cult is a concrete indication of the benefits of closeness to them. A maraboutic descent group is one which shares certain rights and prerogatives on the basis of a recognized claim to common maraboutic descent. The concept of closeness is crucial to understanding such claims. Ideologically, Sherqawi status is expressed in the idiom of patrilineal descent from the marabout Sidi Mhammed Sherqi. Yet such formal determination of status is rarely invoked and is frequently impossible on a practical basis. Hence it is possible to acquire Sherqawi status, even in Boujad itself, and not have such claims directly challenged, by “known” Sherqawa. In practice, one is “known” (me‘ruf) asaSherqawi on the basis of a combination of attributes. These include residence in a Sherqawi quarter, marriage patterns, political and economic alliances, and other aspects of comportment. Most Sherqawa are known through face-to-face relations among themselves and to their clients.

The acquiesence of known Sherqawa to such assertions of Sherqawi status can be explained on two levels, the analytical and that of social practice. Analytically, it is useful to employ Scheffler’s distinction between descent categories and descent gfoups (1965: 62). The idiom of descent in itself gives form only to categories of persons which can remain only vaguely bounded. Membership in such a category does not imply an obligation to act in common with other members of that category. However, perceived common interests can encourage the formation of descent groups out of such categories. On the related practical level of actual social arrangements, I already have indicated that Moroccans constantly re-evaluate their ties of closeness in terms of maintaining and whenever possible enhancing their social status. Thus in some instances the attribute of being a Sherqawi is a relatively minor component of social identity; in others it can play a major role.

Sherqawi descent groups show the same flexible patterns of boundary as do other collectivities in Moroccan society. Currently, the Sherqawa are divided into eight descent groups.[6] Six are considered to descend from sons of Sidi Mhammed Sherqi, although no one claims to know the intervening genealogical links. Some persons refer to written records which legitimize such links, but these never are produced and cannot be located. The remaining two groups are the most prominent. They claim descent from another of the marabout's sons, but in addition claim as eponymous ancestors 19th century Sherqawi "lords," so designated because they effectively controlled the zawya or at least a substantial part of its resources. Each of these descent groups has a quarter (derb) in the town where the core of its membership resides, although non-Sherqawi also reside in these quarters. Each descent group possesses a shrine of its common ancestor, although this is not necessarily located in its quarter and many Sherqawi shrines are not directly linked to any specific descent group.

The same concept of closeness underlies claimed relations of kinship among the Sherqawa as among commoners. Substantial material and social benefits are associated with Sherqawi descent for at least some Sherqawa. Hence the genealogies tracing their descent are generally more complex than is the case for commoners. Or so the Sherqawa assert. Yet the only component of their genealogy which the Sherqawa commonly know is the name-chain (silsila)of the "lords" of the zawya. This name-chain stretches in an unbroken line back to Sidi Mhammed Sherqi, with variants occuring only over the "lords" of the last century. Earlier factional disputes are not socially significant and are not reflected in the name-chain.

All Sherqawa point to this name-chain as legitimating their status, but only members of the two most prominent "mainline" descent groups can actually trace agnatic ties with the Sherqawi lords. With few exceptions, the most prominent Sherqawa of the past century come from these two descent groups. For reasons of shared material interests and prestige, members of the two "mainline" groups show a much greater concern over the boundaries of their groups than do other Sherqawa.They generally can trace in detail their genealogical ties over at least three generations and possess a more precise knowledge of the scope of their kinship ties with contemporaries. They sharply distinguish between persons who claim closeness to them solely on such bases as residential propinquity and those related through agnatic and affinal ties. These two mainline groups have substantial common interests and in general have managed to defend them. They have kept largely undivided estates from their prominent ancestors of the last century. Through Islamic inheritance many of them are thus entitled to substantial revenues in addition to their shares in the offerings at the main shrine (shares available in principle to all Sherqawa).

Sherqawa active in the maraboutic “trade” seek to manifest closeness to leading Sherqawa before their clients. This is despite the fact that most prominent Sherqawa of today, even when popularly regarded as marabouts, no longer take an active part in maraboutic enterprises. Identification with the two mainline descent groups gives persons a competitive edge in maintaining status, but participation in the aristocracy or inner elite of the Sherqawa (or esteem in clients’ eyes) is not determined exclusively by descent group membership. For example, a member of one of the non-mainline descent groups, a textile merchant, successfully entered politics shortly after independence. At first he actively dissociated himself from Sherqawi maraboutic activities (because the mainline Sherqawa failed to support him in election campaigns) and in fact became prayer leader (imam) of one of Boujad’s two principal mosques. In recent years he has consolidated his influence by claiming,at least away from Boujad, to be lord of the zawya and of the mainline Sherqawa. He employs his visible hold over a rural clientele as a means of legitimating his political influence.

Until the beginning of this century, Sherqawi descent and maraboutic status were largely coterminous. The principal means for a Sherqawi to acquire social dominance was to seek to be regarded as a marabout and to attract a clientele. The means of acquiring social prominence are now more varied. The immediate descendants of late 19th and early 20th centuries Sherqawi marabouts have often maintained elite status, at least when they have acquired an education or adapted successfully to modern commercial and political activities. Through these activities it is possible to maintain a social position that identity primarily as a marabout no longer allows. Many of the Sherqawi elite dissociate themselves from the maraboutic interests of some of their kinsmen because such activities would open them to attack and ridicule from educated persons. Such Sherqawa seek to redefine the activities of some of their kinsmen and ancestors in light of the formal doctrines of reformist, modernist Islam. By any criteria, some Sherqawa have been prominent in Morocco for centuries. — as marabouts, counselors of sultans, religious scholars, and recently as educators, merchants, ministers of state, doctors, judges, administrators, and in one case, as a sociologist. The very success of these Sherqawa is taken by maraboutic clients as a sign of continuing Sherqawi religious prominence.The elegant Sherqawi shrines are maintained through their donations.

 Ideology and Practice

The analytic distinction has already been made between maraboutism as an ideology and maraboutism as a concrete set of social practices. The contracting economic bases of marabouts, especially living marabouts, has had an impact on the ideology of maraboutism. It is this impact that I now wish to discuss in reference to the Sherqawi maraboutic cult. Ideologically, marabouts and maraboutic cults form a symbolic base for order in society. Maraboutic cults such as that of the Sherqawa are identified with specific towns and regions, although the correlations between maraboutic cults and specific rural or urban local communities are not immutable and some groups may even divide their allegiances among several maraboutic cults. The implicit ideology of such cults also provides a bridge between the divine template for human conduct as revealed in the Qur’an and periodically renewed by reformist movements in Islam, and the realities of “the way things are” in Moroccan society. Maraboutic cults are linked to specific social forms but are more than a reflection of such forms. This is indicated by the analysis of the means through which specific ties with marabouts are maintained.

There are both collective and individual ties with Sherqawi marabouts. Presently, only tribal groups maintain collective ties with the Sherqawa, although in preprotectorate times urban quarters and occupational groups in western Morocco also did so. In certain parts of Morocco, including Marrakesh (Jemma 1971), collective urban ties still exist. Individual ties are maintained by both townsmen and tribesmen.

Personal and collective ties of obligation with marabouts rest on a similar base, so that the form which collective and personal ties take and their distribution are not sharply distinguished. In both cases the fundamental unit of social structure is the person rather than their attributes or statuses as members of groups. Thus, persons participating in collective sacrifices and offerings say that they do so because in that manner they are able to present a more substantial sacrifice or offering to a marabout and thus more forcefully indicate their faith in him. In other words, persons deal with marabouts collectively rather than individually in order to have more “word” with the marabout. Of course, such ties also denote the boundaries of particular social groups at any moment.

The accompanying map indicates a large, contiguous sphere of Sherqawi influence covering the Shawya and Tadla plains. In rural contexts, the Sherqawa are the dominant religious lodge in the area, although to a lesser extent other maraboutic orders also are represented. The urban situation is slightly more complex, but only due to post-1912 developments (with the exception of a few coastal towns including Casablanca). It also should be kept in mind that Boujad was the only town of significance in the interior of the area prior to 1912. An important earlier form of ties with the Sherqawa took the form of urban religious brotherhoods[7] (tariqa-s), whose members met weekly, usually on Friday afternoons, in a local lodge (zawya) maintained for that purpose. There are indications that these lodges may have been related to trading networks based upon Boujad in the late 19th century (Eickelman 1976: 199). They exist alongside non-Sherqawi religious lodges, most of which gained adherents in the early years of the protectorate, when merchants and craftsmen joined them as a means of asserting independence from the Sherqawa. From the early 1930s onward these brotherhoods declined in face of reformist Islam and the emerging nationalist movement.

Personally contracted ties with the Sherqawa are much more widespread than those of brotherhoods in the urban setting. Significant numbers of townsmen occasionally travel to Boujad to visit Sherqawi shrines there, as well as prominent non-Sherqawi shrines elsewhere. Generally, however, only townsmen of rural origin in western Morocco make regular offerings to the Sherqawa over extended periods of time. More substantial in terms of aggregate value are the donations of animals and cash irregularly made by persons who seek the intervention of Sidi Mhammed Sherqi or other principal Sherqawi marabouts in cures of illness and infertility. These offerings occur only at times of personal or household crisis and to a lesser degree are also made to non-Sherqawi marabouts.

The ties between the Sherqawa and specific tribal groups in western Morocco at first appear more stable than the amorphous, discontinuous ones sustained in urban settings. The ritajor sphere of Sherqawi influence has remained relatively constant since at least the 1880s. This is in large part because a succession of sultans in the late 19th century deliberately sought to extend Sherqawi influence in the area at the expense of other maraboutic lodges. In 1901 this policy was formally reversed, but by then the sultanate was unable effectively to impose its will in the area. From 1907 onward the French used Sherqawi influence for their own ends. Once the pax gallica was formally established in 1912, spheres of maraboutic influence were largely frozen in place. This is in contrast with the 19th century and what is known of earlier periods, when the geographical sphere of Sherqawi influence expanded and contracted with political and economic currents. In the 1880s, for instance, the Sherqawa had clients in the Middle Atlas mountains and actively sought to extend their influence in that direction (Eickelman 1976 : 55). The existence of Sherqawi agents, holdings, and clientele in key Moroccan cities outside their main sphere of influence, such as Fes, Meknes, Marrakesh, and Sale can similarly be explained in terms of their seeking to widen the scope of their activities. Of course, the geographical pattern of Sherqawi influence is partially related to ecological constraints. Some geographical features tend effectively to impede communication in certain directions. Consistently more important, however, were the patterns of social and political alignments at any given moment. This explains in part the patterns of Sherqawi influence in an area as far away as the Sus valley. Certain Sherqawa were effectively able to create and maintain ties with groups and individuals there and the development of ties with the Sherqawa was considered more advantageous than the development of ties with local maraboutic descent groups. Such decisions depend upon judgements of the efficacy ot particular marabouts and the availability of particular marabouts or their descendants.

Myths relating the exploits of particular marabouts are a crucial element in maraboutic ideology. Those for the Sherqawa are known throughout western Morocco and resemble in form those associated with marabouts and maraboutic descent groups elsewhere. To the extent that these myths frequently invoke place names and other features peculiar to specific geographic divisions, they are localized. Yet these characteristics are almost incidental to the stress in the myths upon how marabouts become tied to specific groups or persons. For example, one myth relates how the entire area that surrounds Boujad was wilderness when Sidi Mhammed Sherqi first arrived there (Eickelman and Draioui 1973: 201–205). The marabout located water, cleared the forest, and forced wild animals out of the area. Then he called upon various groups to settle there and establish a covenant fahd; bay‘a) with him. So far I have collected roughly sixty myths, including variants, dealing with Sherqawa. Virtually all of them concern the means by which covenants are established and honored between named groups and Sidi Mhammed Sherqi and his sons. Such covenants are represented as being maintained through such means as sacrifice, the giving of women to the Sherqawa, the claim of a common, distant ancestor between the marabout and his clients, and the claim of mere physical propinquity in the distant past.

In exchange for sacrifices and the renewal of the covenant, Sherqawi marabouts appear as guarantors of the moral order insofar as it affects their clients; in some cases the clients are made Muslim at the same time a covenant is established. One common theme in the myths is that of Sherqawi marabouts defending covenanted groups from unjust tyrants. The ties of the Sherqawa with other maraboutic centres and with Mecca are also frequently stressed. Although in real life Sherqawi marabouts and other Sherqawa have made the pilgrimage to Mecca, there are few sustained ties with other maraboutic descent groups. The social order depicted in the myths is constructed out of particularistic bonds of obligations, but the myths also depict the submission of both marabouts and clients to an Islamic code of conduct.

Covenants with the Sherqawa are particularistic but far from being primordial. Most client tribal groups in western Morocco claim that their covenant with the Sherqawa was sealed in “early” times (Bekri). “Early” is that range of time, internally atemporal, which forms a backdrop to the ordinary, fully known social horizon (see Eickelman 1977). Events that occurred in early times are thought to have a significant impact upon current social alignments but the full social context of such early events is considered unknown and unknowable. Significantly, the tribal groups mentioned in the covenants of the myths are not “real life” collectivities in the sense of being effective units of social action either now or in the historically known past. Tribal names mentioned in the myths are generally those from which many existing groups claim to have derived, but even this is not always the case. It is useful to think of the names mentioned in these myths as together forming a conceptual grid through which covenants can be legitimated as well as shifted as occasion warrants through the “discovery” of alternate formulations of the grid.

The notions of obligation and closeness underlie the dyadic bonds through which marabouts and their clients remain “connected” (mtesslin). A “connection” can be accomplished in three complementary ways. The first is through offerings and communal meals with those living descendants of Sidi Mhammed Sherqi, not themselves considered marabouts, who claim specific ties with certain tribal sections and rural local communities. These descendants are called “visitors” (zewwar-s)[8] because they literally visit clients’ households and tents twice each year — in spring when herds are traditionally divided and in early summer just after harvesting — to collect the offerings (zyara) considered the due of the marabout. When they make donations or offer communal meals, clients specifically remind the visitor that he is to accept them on behalf of his ancestor. In return, visitors offer an invocation (da‘wa) to their maraboutic ancestor in front of their clients. Visitors know each individual involved and carefully specify the particular concerns of each household: the desire for male offspring, good harvests, the wellbeing of persons and animals. In the past, visitors also mediated tribal disputes and brought major matters to the attention of more influential Sherqawa. When clients are in town, their Sherqawi visitors occasionally assist them in various matters, but in general the visitors no longer can serve as efficacious intermediaries in practical matters. An interesting consequence is that clients now explain their offerings to visitors as alms to the poor (sadaqa) and treat the visitors in an offhand way. Still, contact with visitors is considered necessary in order to maintain ties with their maraboutic ancestors.

The second way of remaining connected is through annual sacrifices at the shrine of Sidi Mhammed Sherqi and those of certain of his descendants. These are made in the presence of living Sherqawa, as well as the visitors associated with particular pilgrims and pilgrim groups who again act on behalf of the marabout. Such sacrifices can be made by individuals who seek specific favours from marabouts and are made regularly throughout the year. Here I discuss primarily the collective offerings that are made. Most collective sacrifices are made each fall during the festival of Sidi Mhammed Sherqi. This is not a single event, but a period of roughly two weeks during which client groups make a pilgrimage to Boujad. For transhumant groups, the festival generally coincides with the move from summer to winter pastures. Especially over the last two decades, the Sherqawa have discouraged actual sacrifices, although many still occur. One reason for their discouragement is pressure from other townsmen, including Sherqawa, who are embarrassed by what they consider the more “primitive” forms of maraboutism (although a similar argument is never made concerning the sacrifice of an animal for feast days recognized by “formal” Islam). Another reason is the desire on the part of the Sherqawa involved in the pilgrim “trade,” as they refer to it, to live from the proceeds of the pilgrim traffic. To this end, they persuade pilgrims whenever possible that the offer of a sacrificial animal or the equivalent in cash has the same benefit as a sacrifice.

In some cases, sacrificial animals are slaughtered but immediately sold at regular prices at a butcher’s shop; in most cases, however, Sherqawa dispose of the animal (or offerings in kind) through regular market channels.

An unanticipated consequence of the gradual abandonment of actual sacrifices and the greater demand for marketable offerings is the rapid attrition of client donations. Traditional offerings of cereals and of animals to a lesser extent were considered largely outside of the domain of the cash economy prior to the severe economic dislocations of the Second World War. It is true that to a certain extent obligations to marabouts were always thought of in terms analogous to the market situation. In all forms of “remaining connected,” acrimonious bargaining often occurs over the size of an offering or sacrifice. Nineteenth century correspondence attests to the fact that such bargaining is not recent. I stress analogous because informants emphasize that a cash value cannot be placed on any bond of closeness or obligation, including those with marabouts.

Yet under current conditions the scope of maraboutic powers is much more circumscribed than it was in the past and virtually inexistent in the realms of politics and economics. Clients get less out of maintaining such obligations than they did in the past. In addition, when Sherqawi visitors and the caretakers of major Sherqawi shrines convert offerings into cash at the market, often before the eyes of their clients, the latter are encouraged to consider their ties with marabouts as identical with those of the marketplace. Doubt in the prevalence of marabouts has always been present (cf. Firth 1974), but under present conditions this doubt becomes systematic and encourages consideration of the tenets of formal Islam as the only valid religious expression.

The final means of remaining connected with the Sherqawa is through offerings and communal meals with living marabouts. I have already mentioned why this practice is rapidly disappearing. Living marabouts have difficulty in maintaining their reputation due to decreasing influence and revenues and are stigmatized by educated Muslims. Unlike enshrined marabouts, living ones are not insulated from direct calculations of their efficacy and comments upon the lavishness, or baraka, shown by their hospitality. Once again, as the benefits of maintaining obligations with marabouts become more vague and indistinct, not only do pilgrims place less value in maintaining such obligations, but maraboutism as an implicit ideology ceases to make sense in terms of the concepts of obligation and closeness.

 Sacrifices and Social Groups

Another dimension of maraboutic ties is the means by which groups are formed that collectively sacrifice and make offerings. As an example I use the Sma’la of the upper Tadla plain, located about twenty kilometers to the north of Boujad. They are one of the most “traditional” tribes of the area in that they remain largely transhumant (as were virtually all the tribes of the area prior to the 1920s) and vigorously maintain their covenants with the Sherqawa. Therefore their current practices (and those documented for the protectorate and the pre-1912 period) provide more insight into precolonial practices than is the case for groups that have been more radically affected by subsequent political and economic transformations. The nature of tribal society in this early period is significant because maraboutism has been primarily linked in Morocco to “segmentary” tribal societies. Here I present an alternate account of traditional rural society as it existed in some parts of Morocco and which does not necessitate postulating a radical dichotomy between past and present social forms.

The pasture lands of the Sma'la are still collectively owned; only recently has legislation been passed which, when eventually implemented, will convert all "tribal" lands into private ownership. Agricultural lands are owned by individuals, as was also the case in the region during the preprotectorate period. Herds are also individually owned, although in practice the head of each tent (household) or herding unit exercises effective control over the disposition of animals owned by individuals residing with him. Agreements over grazing rights were made with neighbouring groups both on a person-to-person basis and on the basis of larger collectivities. Even among the "traditional" Sma'la, therefore, individuals had a considerable area of latitude in which they could manipulate their social identities. Such latitude is administratively inconvenient, so the colonial administration and its post-1956 Moroccan successor discouraged small-scale, informal pastoral agreements, sometimes using the pretext that only agreements binding on the larger, administratively recognized tribal subdivisions were really "traditional." Neat administrative organigrams of tribal organization and administrative jurisdictions would be damaged by acknowledging a continuous flux in social alignments.

Tribesmen employ the idiom of agnation to describe relations among themselves, but political relations are conceptualized in other idioms as well. Nor was the idiom of agnation more pervasive in the historically known past, which in this case means since the late 19th century. Tribesmen often use the analogies of the tree and the human body to describe their interrelationships. To follow through the first analogy, as one tribesman said: "We are like the branches of a tree, but each branch is on its own." Similarly, in some contexts tribesmen assert that they are all linked through ties of blood, but explicitly deny that the claim of such ties obliges them now or obliged them in the past to act in specified ways. In other words, social and political action flows along numerous lines: kinship, patron-client relations, and other bonds of necessity or mutual interest. The area of latitude in which rural Moroccans can shift their social ties is more circumscribed than in an urban milieu, but it is still fairly considerable.

When tribesmen are asked to describe their relations with the Sherqawa, they frequently begin by discussing the nature of the rural local community (dawwar). The term literally means “circle.” In the era of preprotectorate insecurity, household heads of local communities pitched their tents in a circle during transhumance. They collectively agreed upon pastoral movements and upon the tenor of their relations with other groups. Members of local communities claim to be linked through agnatic ties but are unable to demonstrate specifically that such ties encompass all members of their group. When asked to trace such relations in detail, tribal informants invariably responded that only someone older could do so. In turn, elderly informants vaguely referred to “earlier times” as the period when the local community was entirely linked through traceable agnatic relations. In actuality, local communities commonly consist of several agnatic cores linked by complex affinal and contractual ties.

There are two significant criteria for the existence of a rural local community. First is the general willingness of its members to support each other in mutual interests. Second is the capacity to act collectively on certain ritual and political occasions. The comparison with the earlier discussion of maraboutic descent groups (or for that matter any other such groups in Morocco) should be clear. Each local community has a council (jma’a), although this is not a formal body as has frequently been assumed by protectorate administrators or their Moroccan successors. Any adult male household head who has an interest in the issues at hand participates, although the opinions of those who are economically or politically weak tend to be discounted or ignored in favour of those with more substantial material interests and persuasive skills. When necessary or convenient, such councils informally agree upon a spokesman (mqaddem) to represent them to outsiders. Each local community also has its own mosque, burial ground, and maraboutic tomb. The latter is usually a derelict structure to which no offerings are made except for candles and small coins left by the local community’s women and children. At any time, each household or tent belongs to only one local community. Membership is demonstrated by sustained ties of “closeness,” a concept which I earlier illustrated in relation to the urban Sherqawa.

The refusal or inability of a tent to contribute to certain collective obligations does not in itself indicate dissociation from a local community, but it affects the capacity of a household head to have a say in the community's affairs. When a definitive break occurs a household shifts its allegiance to another local community, although its rights in agricultural land remain unchanged. When a group of tents or households breaks away and forms a separate local community, it is distinguished by its own mosque, burial ground, and maraboutic tomb. One of the numerous unused structures usually is appropriated for the purpose, although new tombs occasionally are built.[9]

When Sherqawi visitors arrive in local communities, they usually deal with a spokesman agreed upon for that purpose. He sees that the offerings of grain and animals are forthcoming from the households of his group and cajoles recalcitrant members. A similar informal arrangement is made at the level of tribal sections (fakhda-s) in jointly contributing sheep or bulls for sacrifice (for all Sma'la tribal sections refuse substitutes for sacrifices) at the main Sherqawi shrine in Boujad. No such sacrifices are made at the level of the Sma'la acting as a "tribal" collectivity, nor were they in the known past.

Existing social alignments can be discerned through the clusters of persons that contribute to various maraboutic obligations. More specifically, the conduct of individuals and groups at the annual festival of Sidi Mhammed Sherqi constitutes a publication of new social alignments. These are revealed in the arrangement of tents, patterns of offering and sacrifice, and the part taken by local communities and tribal sections in "powder plays" (tehrak-s)' tom pct it i vc displays of horsemanship. Such "powder plays" among the Sma'la, as with groups participating in similar activities elsewhere in Morocco, are always accompanied by heavy, serious betting between the groups involved. In part these competitions reflect the lack of formal rules inherent in the Moroccan concept of closeness. I he judgment of their outcome is left to the competitors themselves and to any support they can muster among onlookers. Differences that develop during the annual festival often themselves engender new lines of social demarcation.

Once such shills in the composition of groups are effected, appropriate realignments are made in how these groups conceive of their relations with one another. Similar adjustments occur when groups or individuals decide that their link to a specific Sherqawi “visitor” can or should be replaced by one more efficacious.

Available evidence for the preprotectorate past suggests that the rural social order and its relation to maraboutism was basically similar in pattern to what I have described above. Of course, it can be argued that the political and economic transformations of the last sixty years have been so substantial that tribal organization described primarily from contemporary ethnographic evidence or the contemporary remembrance of things past differs fundamentally from that of the preprotectorate era. Some basic shifts have occurred. Since the protectorate, for instance, administrative intervention has greatly restricted the possibilities of intergroup hostilities. Matters previously settled among the tribes themselves or through maraboutic mediation now almost inevitably involve government intervention.

Two sets of events involving the Sma’la and other groups in western Morocco during the preprotectorate era are known in sufficient detail to suggest an essential continuity in local conceptions of the social order. One was the manner in which resistance was organized against the French for three years beginning with 1910. Rapid shifts of alignment occurred that indicate a flexible, opportunistic perception of the mechanics of alliance formation. A similar flexibility is evident in examining the repercussions of the struggle for the sultanate between the brothers Mulay Abd l-‘Aziz and Mulay Hafed which began in 1907. Protracted local disputes over water rights and other matters, maraboutic allegiances both to Sherqawi factions and other maraboutic centers, the attitudes of local communities and tribal sections about the legitimacy of the two rival sultans, and assessments of the wisdom of resistance to the French all entered into consideration. The alignments of the various collectivities involved bore minimal relation to asserted agnatic relationships.

My concern with extending my argument to at least the known precolonial past is to indicate that there is no need for a “special” explanation of the relation of maraboutism to the tribal social order. The most widely known discussion of this issue in English is contained in the writings of Ernest Gellner. He is primarily concerned with the role of marabouts in social structures which qualify as “segmentary” and which no longer prevail in Morocco. Thus Gellner’s argument is necessarily relegated to the precolonial past when he considers it reasonable to assume that the society in the High Atlas region which he studied was in a stable “kind of Social Contract situation” over an indefinite period (1963: 146; 1969: 158–159). Insofar as present-day institutions can be assumed to have been in “a kind of sociological ice-box” (Gellner 1973: 59), he argues that they can be taken as reliable indicators of past situations.

A principal drawback to this set of assumptions is that it offers no explanation for the role of marabouts and the ideology of maraboutism in non-segmentary situations in the past or for the continuing, albeit modified, significance of both the ideology of maraboutism and the activities of maraboutic cults in the present. Prior to the appearance of the Islamic reform movement in Algeria in the early decades of this century, maraboutism was so persuasive that most urban and rural Algerians took it for Islam pure and simple (Merad 1967: 58). Merad’s statement can be applied even more firmly to Morocco. As for the present, as indicated earlier, rituals associated with marabouts have held their own in many urban and rural milieux (Hatt 1974: 25; Pacques 1971; Jemma 1971; Eickelman 1974a: 229). Contrary to the fervent desires of some Muslim reformists and other educated Moroccans, the ideology and practice of maraboutism has not just melted away in the face of recent social and economic transformations. At least with respect to religious belief and practice, these facts argue against assuming a radical discontinuity between past and present in Morocco’s social history, and especially against any one-to-one relation of ideology with the social order at any historical moment.[10]

 Conclusion

The Moroccan concept of closeness relates to maraboutism on two levels. As an organizing principle for social arrangements, it underlies such diverse social forms as descent groups (including maraboutic ones), urban quarters, tribal sections and rural local communities, and ties between marabouts and their clients. Closeness as an organizing principle is essential for comprehending the particular implicit ideology and social relations described in this paper. I have indicated the diversity of historical and social-contexts in which closeness operates to suggest its variable relation to maraboutism taken as social ideology and practice. Any one set of “social arrangements” considered in isolation with maraboutism as an ideology would lead to an analytically unjustified assumption of a one-to-one link between them.

Maraboutism like any other ideology is socially maintained. It is based partially upon an implicit analogy between ordinary social relations and those which prevail between men and the supernatural. In fact, for those who accept maraboutism, there has traditionally been no sharp division between the two realms. Persons considered “close” to marabouts, especially members ot their descent groups associated with cult activities, are thought to have a special influence over them. The notions of obligation and closeness make these ties comprehensible.

This paper has been concerned with two sorts of transformations which occur in relations between marabouts and their clients. First is the continuous revaluing ot the utility of specific social ties, including those which exist between marabouts and their clients. These can lead to the rise or fall in the fortunes of specific marabouts, maraboutic descent groups, or regional pilgrimage centres such as Boujad. In themselves, this form of realignment does not substantially modify the content of maraboutism as an implicit ideology.

The second form of transformation directly modifes the form of maraboutic ideology and analytically is the more interesting (and neglected) form. It concerns shifts in social action which engender ideological change. Put succinctly, my position is that to be understood sociologically, maraboutism has to be considered in a range of historical contexts. In the preprotectorate past, now only a lived experience for the most elderly of Moroccans, marabouts had a much greater range of social action than they have had in later periods. Living marabouts complemented enshrined ones and directly or through proxies could choose to affect the circumstances of their clients. More recently, the political and economic activities of marabouts became markedly circumscribed, until what remains to them is primarily a “religious” sphere of influence distinct from practical concerns. In earlier periods such an explicit distinction did not exist. With marabouts in the past, the intercession of the supernatural in such concerns was a daily occurrence. Now the benefits which derive from sustaining ties with marabouts and their descendants are vague and ill-defined.

The form in which ties between marabouts and clients are established and reaffirmed has also shifted and this has had more radical consequences for maraboutism as an ideology. Few persons can sustain reputations as living marabouts, and clients in any case have less to do with them. Both living marabouts and maraboutic “visitors” have encouraged the substitution of sacrifices for other forms of offering, and when offered goods in kind have directly converted them for cash through regular market channels. A consequence of this shift has been to encourage clients to consider their transactions with marabouts just as they would all other transactions. When viewed in this fashion, there is no perceptible benefit in maintaining ties with marabouts. Maraboutism ceases to make sense as part of “the way things are.”

Finally, the strength of maraboutism is precisely in its being taken as an implicit ideology. Those who support marabouts are aware in outline of the tenets of “formal” Islam and indicate their support for it through building mosques — most rural local communities have one — and hiring Qur’anic teachers. Although formal Islam also claims to be related to all aspects of life, there is no direct, personified means by which the supernatural can pervade the social order as is the case with maraboutism. Formal Islam thus requires no direct analogy with the nature of the local social order. In contemporary Moroccan society this disjuncture allows it increasingly to be taken as a religious representation of the world more meaningful than maraboutism.

 References

<biblio>

Ali Bey (Domingo Badia y Leblich)

1816 The Travels of Ali Bey. 2vols. Philadelphia. M. Carey

Beidelman, T. O.

1974 W. Robertson Smith and the Sociological Study of Religion. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press.

Berque, Jacques

1949 Ville et universite: Aper?u sur I’histoire de l’ecole de Fes. Revue Historique de Droit Francais et etranger (4th series) 27: 64–117.

1953 Qu’est-ce qu’une “tribu” nord-africaine? In Eventail de l’histoire vivante: Homage a Lucien Febvre. Vol. I. pp. 261–271. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France.

1955 Structures sociales du Haut-Atlas. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France.

1957 Quelques problemes de I’Islam maghrebin. Archives de Sociologie des Religions 2: 3–20.

Boissevain, Jeremy

1966 Patronage in Sicily. Man (n.s.) 1: 18–33.

Christian, Jr., William A.

1972 Person and God in a Spanish Valley. New York and London: Seminar Press.

Depont, Xavier and Octave Coppolani

1897 Les confreries religieuses musulmanes. Algiers: A. Jourdan.

Drague, Georges (Georges Spillman)

1951 Esquisse d’histoire religieuse du Maroc. Paris: J. Peyronnet.

Durkheim, Emile

1915 The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life. London: Allen and Unwin.

Eickelman, Dale F.

1972–1973 Quelques aspects de l’organisation politique et economique d’une zawya marocaine au XIXe siecle. Bulletin de la Societe d’Histoire du Maroc 4–5: 37–54.

1974a Islam and the Impact of the French Colonial System in Morocco. Humaniora Islamica 2: 215–235.

1974b Is There an Islamic City? The Making of a Quarter in a Moroccan Town. International Journal of Middle East Studies 5: 274–294.

1976 Moroccan Islam: Tradition and Society in a Pilgrimage Center. Austin and London: University of Texas Press.

1977 Time in a Complex Society: A Moroccan Example. Ethnology (in press)
Dale F. Eickelman and Bouzekri Draioui

1973 Islamic Myths from Western Morocco: Three Texts. Hesperis-Tamuda 14: 1925–225.

Evans-Pritchard, E.E.

1940 The Nuer. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Firth, Raymond

1974 Faith and Scepticism in Kelantan Village Magic. In Kelantan: Religion, Society and Politics in a Malay State. William R. Roff, ed. pp. 190–224. Kuala Lumpur: Oxford

Gellner, Ernest

1963 Saints of the Atlas. In Mediterranean Countrymen. Julian Pitt-Rivers, ed. pp. 145–157. Paris and The Hague: Moulton.

1969 Saints of the Atlas. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson.

1973 Political and Religious Organization of the Berbers of the Central High Atlas. In Arabs and Berbers. Ernest Gellner and Charles Micaud, eds. Pp. 59–66. London: Duckworth.

Hatt, Doyle

1974 Skullcaps and Turbans: Domestic Authority and Political Leadership among the Idaw Tanan of the Western High Atlas, Morocco. Ph.D. dissertation, Anthropology Department, University of California at Los Angeles.

Jemma, D.

1971 Les tanneurs de Marrakech. Algiers: Centre de Recherches Anthropologiques, Prehistoriques, et Ethnographiques.

Mannheim, Karl

1971 From Karl Mannheim. Kurt H. Wolff, ed. New York: Oxford University Press.

Mauss, Marcel

1966 Essai sur les variations saisonnieres de societes Eskimos: Etude de morphologic sociale. In Sociologie et anthropologic. Marcel Mauss, ed. pp. 389–477. Paris* Presses Universitaires de France.

Merad, Ali

1967 Le reformisme musulman en Algerie de 1925 a 1940. Paris and The Hague: Mouton.

Moore, Sally Falk

1969 Descent and Legal Position. In Law in Culture and Society. Laura Nader, ed. pp. 374–400. Chicago: Aldine.

Pacques, Viviana

1971 Les fetes du Mwulud dans la region de Marrakech. Journal de la Societe des Africanistes41: 133–143.

Renan, Ernest

1887 Discours et conferences. 5th ed. Paris: Calmann-Levy.

Runciman, W.G.

1970 Sociology in its Place and Other Essays. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Scheffler, Harold W.

1965 Choiseul Island Social Structure. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Schneider, David M., and Raymond T. Smith

1973 Class Differences and Sex Roles in American Kinship and Family Structure. Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall.

Shils, Edward

1975 Center and Periphery: Essays in Macrosociology. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press.

Smith, W. Robertson

1919 The Prophets of Israel and Their Place in History to the Close of the Eighth Century A.D. London: A. and C. Black.

Troeltsch, Ernst

1960 The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches. New York: Harper and Row.

Turner, Bryan S.

1974 Weber and Islam: A Critical Study. London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul.

</biblio>

© Dale F Eickelman 1977

 2. Communal and Individual Pilgrimage: The Region of Saints' Tombs in South Sinai[11]

by Emanuel Marx

 Introduction: The Region and the Wider Universe in the Cult

Regionalism among the Bedouin tribes of South Sinai is more or less confined to their area's geographical boundaries. It has one main concern: the sharing of certain of the area's resources for the benefit of all the tribes who inhabit it. This is clearly represented by the Bedouin themselves in their cult of saints and holy tombs. But their cult refers to an even wider entity also: the Bedouin's insistence that the saint is only a mediator between man and God indicates that they refer to a wider universe. In their experience this is the world in which they work and from where they obtain most of their food and other supplies. This world is located chiefly outside the borders of South Sinai and, even more importantly, the Bedouins do not exert influence on its activities. A distant government and other external organizations determine much of their lives, but contact with, not to mention influence over, these forces is minimal. For the bureaucratic chain does not fully extend to the Bedouin; and their own appointed representatives, the sheikhs, do not greatly influence officials at the centre. So the Bedouin place their reliance on a 'spiritual' representative, the saint, who is at least close to God and able to influence him.

The cult of saints has been reported from many parts of Islam (Levy 1962: 258). The majority of Islamic leaders do not object to this practice. Linant de Bellefonds (1974: 355) claims that "The permissibility of visiting tombs was admitted very early on by idjma' [consensual canonical law]; all the [law] schools....even went so far as to recommend the practice". Some authors claim that it "represents a striking deviation from the genuine prophetic tradition" (Grunebaum 1951: 67), perhaps because, by western standards, it is logically inconsistent with a strict monotheism. It is practised not only in regions where "official, genuine literate Islam....is present only in a minimal form" (Gellner 1972: 59); it is found also in cities, villages, and even in association with mosques (Canaan 1927: 2; Eickelman 1976: 112). Nor is it an "expression of that necessity....for a world religion to come to terms with....a multiplicity of local forms of faith and yet maintain the essence of its own identity" (Geertz 1968: 48). For centre and periphery are united in the same faith, and its various orthodox and heterodox forms are spread almost uniformly throughout its realm.

The cult of saints is, then, neither a parochial phenomenon, a series of quaint local traditions, nor a deviation from official Islam. Its very ubiquity should preclude such conclusions. It should be viewed as a link between local societies and the “wider society", as conceptualized by the locals. Much of the essay is devoted to a demonstration of this thesis.

However widespread the cult of saint is, it appears to be less common among nomadic pastoralists. Musil (1928: 417) states categorically:

<quote>

“The Bedouins know of no communion with the saints. In the whole inner desert there is not a single holy grave or shrine erected in honour of a saint....When they make short sojourns in the settled territory, where by every village the dome of a shrine rises above the real or imaginary grave of some man or woman whom public opinion considers to be a saint, they never pay any attention to these domes."

</quote>

But among the Bedouin of South Sinai and, incidentally, among those of Cyrenaica (Evans-Pritchard 1949: 66–7: on recent changes see Peters 1976),the visiting of shrines and pilgrimages is an important feature of social life. If we gain some insights into the sociology of the cult of saints in Sinai, we might improve our understanding of such cults elsewhere, and interpret their absence among some nomadic pastoralists. I suggest that tribal pilgrimages elsewhere, too, develop, in response to similar situations: in tribal or other economically undifferentiated hinterlands that depend on external forces (natural forces, or an external state and economy) over which they exert little influence. A society that controls its affairs to a considerable extent, will not resort to communal pilgrimages.

A further basic point must be made. To understand the importance of the cult in South Sinai it is essential to appreciate variations in communal pilgrimage. In this essay such questions as why tribes should celebrate an annual reunion, why the reunions of each tribe follow a different pattern, and why the attendance at them fluctuates from year to year will be asked. Lastly, the significance of the holy tombs will be examined. Why do they mark the sites of the gatherings of one or several tribes? This touches on some of the problems discussed by Robertson Smith nearly a century ago in his Lectures on the Religion of the Semites (1889). It will become evident that some of his views have stood the test of time.

 Three Tribes and their Setting in the Peninsula

Every year towards the end of summer members of the Bedouin tribes in South Sinai congregate at certain Saints' tombs in their area. There are about twenty well-known tombs in the southern half of the peninsula, and they are all located at major cross-roads and not far from water sources. Some are found close to centres of population, while others are far from them. Throughout the year individual Bedouin visit tombs whose resident saint, they think, can help them with their problems. Only at some of these tombs do annual tribal gatherings take place. I intend to look closely at the annual pilgrimages of three tribes, the Muzeneh, the Awlad Sa'id, and the Jebaliyeh. The Muzeneh meet for three consecutive days and make the round of three holy tombs located within a range of 20 kilometres; from the tomb of their founding ancestor Faraj, they move to that of the prophet (nebi) Saleh, and thence to that of Aron, the brother of Moses. The Awlad Sa'id gather once a year at the tomb of 'Ali Abu Taleb, the third Khalif. As for the Jebaliyeh, their sections gather on separate occasions at the tomb of Sheikh 'Awad, a holy man whose antecedents are unclear.

Other saints' tombs at which tribal gatherings take place are: Sheikh Qra'i for the 'Aleqat, Sheikh Suliman Nfe'i for the Qaragha, al-Hashash for the small Hamada, and the female saint Sheikha Swerha for the Sawalha. All these major shrines are classified by Bedouin as maqam (literally "place") a term widely used in the Islamic world to denote an important holy place, mostly, but not always, associated with a saint's tomb. Here, in Sinai, maqam means a shrine whose patron saint is buried elsewhere.

Tribesmen attend these gatherings in order to meet their friends, relatives and visitors from other tribes, and to reaffirm their membership of the tribe and the right to use its resources. For the greater part of the year tribesmen are dispersed in small groups and many men work most of the time outside their tribal land and even outside South Sinai. The tribal reunions are the culmination of their efforts to maintain the ties with other Bedouin. The variations in the tribal reunions are connected to the different habitat and economies of the three tribes, as shown, among other things, in their annual migrations.

South Sinai is the mountainous southern part of the Sinai peninsula up to the Tih Plateau. It covers an area of about 17,000 square kilometres. Most of its interior is bare and rugged; high plateaus interspersed with mountains, build up to the Mount Sinai massif at the centre. The highest peak in the peninsula is Jebel Katarina, 2642 meters and other mountains are nearly as high. Asphalted roads run close to the sea shore round the tip of the peninsula. In the interior of the country there are only mud tracks, mostly running on an east to. west axis. Some of these are suitable for trucks and other rugged vehicles. There is no regular public transportation of any kind, but the Bedouin car fleet, of over a hundred vehicles, mostly American and Russian jeeps, pickups and a few trucks, mostly in a bad state of repair, is up for hire. Parts of the peninsula are inaccessible to motor cars, and can be reached by camel, often only by circuitous routes.

The peninsula is arid, with small amounts of rain-fall in the cool winter months, between November and March. In the coastal sector, the annual average precipitation is about 10 milimetres and in the high mountains—about 60 milimetres (Gdnor 1973: 35). Rain-fall is also very irregular, and in all parts but the high mountains there are often two to three consecutive years without rain-fall. The spatial distribution of rains is also very changeable, and in consequence there are few reliable pastures. Any sizable rain causes floods in the lower reaches of wadis and often results in serious damage to Bedouin property. Sometimes most of a year’s rain-fall comes in a single downpour. Some of these torrential rains may occur in early summer. A flood that occurred in May 1968 destroyed hundreds of palm trees, houses and gardens, and ruined several major motor tracks. Another occurred in February 1975, with results almost as disastrous.

The winter months are usually cool. In the mountains there are each year cold spells, with temperatures occasionally falling as low as —10° (14°F).

Summer temperatures are uniformly high, and in the low-lying areas often climb up to 40° (105°F) during the day, and in the mountains to around 30°.

The vegetation is adapted to the harsh climate, and relies largely on ground water. During the long dry summer, most plants wither, and only the ubiquitous ba’tharan, (arthemisia), ajram (anabasis) and some other shrubs seem to withstand the heat successfully. But after rains colourful annuals appear. Some plants come to life even in the absence of rain; milder weather after a cold spell entices them out of the ground. There are few sources of surface water in the region, except immediately after rains. Water is mostly obtained from wells dug by enterprising Bedouin. In recent years government sunk several deep wells to which all Bedouin have equal access.

There is reason to believe that a small and highly mobile population of nomadic pastoralists could maintain themselves in South Sinai, provided they had access to all parts of the peninsula. It appears that a few Muzeneh and Awlad Sa’id households subsist exclusively on their flocks.

No grain is grown in South Sinai, and the fruit and vegetables grown labouriously in small plots suffice for the needs of a household during a few weeks in summer. Practically all the food consumed in Sinai is imported from outside the peninsuja. In the past, when employment was scarce and communications slow and laborious, Bedouin devoted more attention to their gardens. Some households, especially among the Jebaliyeh, relied on them for their livelihood. Since the early 70’s, wage labour became easily available and the incomes of Bedouin rose rapidly. As a result Bedouin spend less time in their gardens, but still maintain them in reasonable condition.

South Sinai is inhabited by over 6,000 Bedouin, giving a population density of less than one person per 2 square kilometres. A considerable part of this population lives close to the main east-west passage through the mountainous interior, Wadi Firan—Saint Catherine—Wadi Nash. Although every Bedouin has a place or at least an area, that he considers his home ground, there are few permanent settlements of Bedouin and these have stabilised in recent years as local employment opportunities improved, and new wells were put in operation. The trend began in the mid-fifties when smuggling of narcotics accelerated and Bedouin invested some of the profits in wells and orchards. Some of these settlements, such as Bir Zrer and Bir ‘Oqda, were established in relatively inaccessible places, for understandable reasons. The copious ground water supply in Wadi Firan allowed Bedouin to remain for many months in one place and to cultivate fruit and vegetables. The permanent employment found in Saint Catherine’s monastery in the mountains gave rise to a Bedouin village in its vicinity. These trends were intensified after the Israelis took over in 1967. Though smuggling became almost extinct, more jobs became available locally, and new wells were dug. As a result, Bedouin households now tend to spend much longer periods in their home grounds.

Permanent settlements were few until the 50’s. There was the little port of al-Tur on the Red Sea with a population of about 500 souls, mostly sailors and fishermen. Some of these men were Bedouin. Near al-Tur there was a quarantine station for Egyptians returning from the annual pilgrimage to the holy places of Islam in Mecca, which provided seasonal work for many Bedouin. The other permanent settlement, Saint Catherine’s monastery on Mount Sinai, is inhabited by 10—12 Greek monks. Founded in the sixth century and continuously occupied since, it is rightly viewed by Bedouin as the only stable institution in the peninsula, more permanent and reliable than ephemeral governments. In the 50’s, the Egyptians began to develop the peninsula. They set up civilian headquarters in Abu Znema, north of al-Tur, built army camps and an air field, constructed roads along the Red Sea coast, and began to exploit on a commercial scale the oil fields, and the gypsum and manganese deposits found near the Red Sea coast.

 ‘Tribal Organization’ as Ideology

The Bedouin of South Sinai consider themselves to be tribesmen, in two senses: first, they belong to an administrative unit at the head of which stands a chief (sheikh) chosen by the members, whose appointment is confirmed by government. Second, membership of the tribe confers various territorial rights: to “build a house" anywhere in their roughly defined territory, which in practice means settling in an oasis; to have preferential access to pastures and to employment in it; and to participate in smuggling activities passing through it. This last is a recent transformation of the former monopoly on conducting travellers through the territory (Neibuhr 1799, 1: 141,153). The tribe claims not so much to control a clearly bounded territory, but defined points in it and paths leading through it. When asked to describe their tribal territory, Bedouin present one with a list of salient points, such as oases, wells and pastures, but there is much disagreement between their statements about boundaries and considerable overlap between tribes. This is to be expected in a country whose practical value to the Bedouin is located in particular tracts. At any moment a considerable proportion of the men may be working outside the territory, and their flocks herding in the grounds of other tribes. This did not deter administrators and travellers from sketching tribal maps which neatly apportion all of South Sinai between the tribes (Murray 1935: 247; Israel Army 1962: map 3; Glassner 1974: 35).

The Bedouin conceptualize.their social organization in two ideologies: the tribe and the annual pilgrimages. Each ideology refers to different aspects of social life, and is invoked in different contexts. And yet they seem to complement each other in important ways, which will be discussed later.

The so-called “tribal organization” is, on one level of discourse, a device through which people conceptualize their belonging to the tribe and their rights of access to the resources of the tribe, and to the pastures of South Sinai. The individual becomes a tribesman through belonging to two groups. First, he belongs to a small group of agnates, some of whose members reside in the tribal area, while others may be outside it. Second, through this group he connects up with a more inclusive descent group which is associated with a vaguely defined part of the tribal territory; and third, he views this group as a sub-division of the tribe, the group that owns the territory. The transition from the agnatic group to a territorial one is accomplished in several steps, because each group serves a different function. Yet the conception of the tribe as a homologous series of ever-widening groups is valuable to them, for it allows them to visualise the tribe as a combination of small forces capable of defending territory, in a country where the central government is far away and rights are maintained by might. The tribal chief does not necessarily figure in this conception of the tribe. Bedouin usually describe the chiefs as “government chiefs, who really represent only thier personal interest”. They do, however, admit that the chiefs act as liaison officers between the government authorities—and in the case of the Jebaliyeh also between the monks of Saint Catherine’s—and the tribesmen.

In more detail, the tribe is made up in this manner: each Bedouin is born into an agnatic descent group. The group called a family (’eleh), is named after an ancestor who lived two to four generations ago and bears either his real or his nickname (naqbah or nabadh). Some people cannot trace the details of their connection to this patronym. Bearers of the patronym do not necessarily camp together or own joint property, and there is no formal leader. Some of the bearers of the patronym, often close agnates, may, in company with cognates or even non-relatives, engage in joint economic ventures, for instance in smuggling. Others, and even the members of the economic partnership themselves, may then consider this as an activity of the agnatic descent group, oblivious to the fact that not all members participate in the joint activity and that some non-members are involved.

Several patronymic groups are affiliated to a large unit, which is, at one and the same time, considered a large descent group and a sub-unit of the tribe and which, supposedly, is associated with a not too clearly defined part of the tribal territory. This unit is called a quarter (ruba’, pl. rubu’), or branch (fara , pl. furu’), indicating that it is a sub-division of a larger unit, the tribe. Tribesmen freely admit that their patronyms are not necessarily descendants of the ancestors of the ruba ’ and that some tribesmen originated outside the tribe and joined the ruba’ within living memory. The members of the ruba’do not all reside in the territory associated with their ancestor. A respected member ot one of the constituent groups—not necessarily of a large or wealthy one—is elected elder, and his home becomes a meetingplace for members of the group. This man distributes resources allocated to the group by external agencies, such as work supplied by the government, and in this context acts as representative of the tribal chief. He also makes the arrangements for periodical reunions of the group. The tribe is conceptualized as a group founded by a single eponym, whose sons—and as the term ruba’ implies, there are often four—are the ancestors of the ruba’. This tribe, as distinct from the administrative tribe headed by the chief, exists exclusively as an organisation for the control of territory and initiates few joint political or economic activities. Bedouin often argue that the tribe as a whole pays blood-compensation (diyah), but no instance has come to my knowledge. The tribesmen are united by joint ownership of territorial resources, and some of them combine forces to prevent encroachments of outsiders. Thus I was told that some years ago an Awlad Sa’id man had constructed a stone house near a route which the Jebaliyeh claimed as their own. One of the Jebaliyeh elders warned him that he was welcome to set up a tent in that place, but not a house. The Awlad Sa’id man moved away, and the house was then torn down. The tribesmen do get together only at the annual pilgrimage.

The genealogies of the tribes and the rubu ’ may remain unchanged for many generations. They may, however, alter because of territorial realignments. Patronymics change in accordance with demographic processes. Individuals and patronymic groups move from ruba’ to ruba’, but do not usually shift from their tribe to another.

Bedouin often migrate relatively short distances in their tribal territory. But they claim that “membership of the tribe also gives them access to all the pastures of South Sinai". They consider their tribes to belong to an alliance, which “in the past elected a common leader and moderator”, and together they are called the people of Mount Sinai (Tawarah, s. Turi). The confederation is not represented in the genealogies by an apical ancestor. Government occasionally appointed one of the tribal chiefs as paramount chief, but this appointment was mainly ceremonial, and the chief never exercised control over the population. Pastures are frequently shared by members of several tribes; whenever this happens, the herdsmen may camp together, irrespective of their tribal affiliation.

Six tribes are usually considered members of the alliance of Tawara: the Muzeneh and Alequat who together constitute one moiety, the Sawalha, Qarasha and Awlad Sa’id—the other; and the Jebaliyeh, who are slightly inferior members of the alliance. Two other small tribes, the Hamada and the Beni Wasel, are viewed as remnants of the ancient inhabitants of the country who lost their land, but are tacitly accepted as belonging to the Tawara. Only the Huwetat tribesmen are thought to be intruders without right to land; and indeed most of them appear to have entered the area as late as after the First World War. They only do not perform the annual tribal pilgrimage.

Here is a list of tribes arranged by size. The figures are based on Ben-David (1972: 113), taken from a census carried out by the Israeli authorities in 1968. Later information largely confirms these figures, and I made only-slight corrections.

* Bedouin Tribes of South Sinai

The Muzeneh are the largest tribe and also occupy the largest territory. Murray (1935: 265) describes them as camel and sheep breeders many of whom “have lately taken to fishing". Their control of the east coast put them in an ideal position for receiving narcotics from Saudi Arabia, and passing them on to other middlemen in Sinai. The final destination was usually Egypt. Smuggling thrived until about 1970, when it was stopped almost completely by the Israeli authorities. Some of the best known organizers of smuggling bands stem from this tribe, and Bedouin estimate that about 30 per cent of its income was derived from smuggling. There are some fishermen and sailors among the Muzeneh, but only few tribesmen own flocks of goats and sheep large enough for subsistence. Bedouin claim that 50 to 60 animals are the minimum needed. One of the few men I met who owned a flock of that size claimed that he obtained an average monthly revenue of IL 400, in addition to which he obtained IL 200 from National Insurance. Altogether he had a monthly income of IL 600 (approximately £40). Most households live on the wage labour of one or more males, who earn IL 40 a day or more (nearly £3). While almost every household raises five to six goats or sheep, most people claim that they do not expect to make a profit on animals. For part of the dry season the animals are fed millet or corn, imported from outside Sinai. The small flocks are herded by women and girls. This seems to have been the situation for a long time, since H.S. Palmer (1906; 69–72) found in 1869 that flocks were tended exclusively by girls, that men earned their living away from home (though not as wage labourers but as caravaneers), and that they bought corn with the money earned (similarly E.H. Palmer 1871: 81–82; Keller 1900: 26).

While their movements are influenced by the needs of their animals, Bedouin must also take into account other requirements. Women and girls are expected to return home in the evening and perform household chores. Therefore, theyxio not venture too far afield with their flock. Camps must remain close, but not too close, to water, usually at a distance of 2—3 kilometres from it, and near sources of firewood, such as broom (ratam), acacias (seyal), or tamarisks (tarfa), and amenities, such as shops and roads. Therefore, they cannot provide the most favourable herding conditions for the animals, and cannot make their flocks pay.

The Awlad Sa’id live in the mountains west of Saint Catherine’s. They straddle all the roads along the east-west axis, and control some of the best pasture areas. Only a small area of high mountains has been left to Jebaliyeh tribesmen. The Awlad Sa’id, too, used to engage in smuggling. They rely to a somewhat greater extent than the Muzeneh on flocks, and not a few of them possess small and relatively neglected orchards in the mountains. In the past their camels carried pilgrims from Egypt and supplies from al-Tur to the monastery. Now they, too, depend largely on wage labour.

The habitat of the Jebaliyeh is the high mountain. Their flocks are even smaller than those of the other two tribes, and there are households without animals. As their small territory includes no major mountain pass, they are more or less excluded from smuggling activities. They specialise in horticulture. Every tribesman owns an orchard in the high mountains, which is regularly watered and cultivated, even when its owners live elsewhere. Tribesmen claim that in the past they used to market their fruit in al-Tur, and with the money they just managed to buy a year’s supply of grain, but could not afford other items such as tea, sugar and clothing. So the tribesmen sought employment in the area and outside it. Saint Catherine’s monastery traditionally employs between 20 to 30 Jebaliyeh tribesmen and also a few Awlad Sa’id. While its workers are paid much lower wages than those in the labour market, it can offer them two advantages:— work near home and work that is relatively secure. The monastery’s employees often remain in their jobs throughout their working life, and even after retirement the monastery gives these men small but regular food rations. Tribesmen complain about the meagre pay, but remain in their jobs, for no-one knows what the future has in store. The Jebaliyeh also used to supply guides for pilgrims who wished to visit the many sites in the vicinity of the monastery associated with the works of Moses.

Jebaliyeh “explain” that their close ties with the monastery go back into history. Their ancestor was a Greek slave, named Constantine. When the monastery was established, he was one of a number of slaves sent out to serve the monks. This story both establishes the link to the monastery and the tribe’s claim to a territory “for it is owned by the monastery”. While individual tribesmen admit to various origins, their attachment to one of the tribe’s four branches gives them a right to enjoy the advantages of their links.

As their territory is too small for herding and as the monastery could employ only a few men, the Jebaliyeh were among the first wage labourers. As a result some of them acquired skills, and as builders and well-diggers worked all over the peninsula. They still rely on wage labour for most of their income, and the men regularly work in the towns or the Abu Rudes oil installations. Between 30 to 50 men are usually employed by the Israeli administration.

Jebaliyeh households move as a rule between two locations: for most of the year, and especially during the cooler months, they stay in the “low-lying” areas at a height of about 1,600 metres; during the hot summer months they move into the mountains to enjoy the fresh air and the fruits of their orchards. A similar transhumance is observed by the Awlad Sa’id but it takes place at a lower altitude. Their cool summer sites are at about the same height as the “sheltered” winter sites of the Jebaliyeh.

All three tribes, then, depend on wage labour for their living, and men spend long periods working away from home. At the same time, they behave as if they were pastoralists or gardeners, although many people admit that they either make little money out of their flocks and gardens, or even lose it on them. Why do Bedouin then resist moving their families nearer to the places of work? The answer is twofold. Some Bedouin who established themselves in secure jobs settle in the towns and cities of Egypt, and are often followed by kinsmen. But these people are generally out of the view of the other tribesmen, who maintain the fiction that they are always drawn back to their homeland. A Jebaliyeh man put it thus:—

<quote>

“Our country is arid, nothing grows in it. Last night the dew froze and burnt (sic) my tomato plants. The same happens to the almond and apple blossoms. Nor is it a good country for goats, you always have to supplement their food and lose on them. Only its landscapes are beautiful and in summer the climate is good, but our livelihood (rizq) is obtained outside. I always return to it though, because my family lives here. And I do not leave because my country is dear to me. I am tied to it by my navel-string. For when a child is born, the father buries the navel-string and the placenta deep in the ground”.

</quote>

The sentimental attachment of this man and others to the land conveys its importance as a secure base. When compared to the income obtained by wage labour its resources are of little value. The gardens and flocks are maintained although they do not pay. For work is insecure, and the political future uncertain. If anything should go wrong Bedouin could always fall back on the resources of their country and by some serious effort they could increase their garden produce, and they could migrate with their flocks so as to make the best out of the available pasture. Men leave their homes in the tribal area, and allow their gardens and flocks to “tick over”, because these are their economic base. Should the need arise, these could be built up, and provide a small income. This became evident late in 1975, during the negotiations between Egypt and Israel over an “interim agreement” in Sinai. Suddenly there was a flourish of activity in the basic economy. Bedouin stopped the sale of animals and there was great interest in gardens. Some people acquired gardens, others dug wells and planted new gardens. Thus they prepared for the possibility of losing their work.

Smuggling is to be viewed as a secondary accommodation to prevailing conditions. As people must stay in this wild and inhospitable country, they are available for any work that presents itself there. In spite of high risks, and the not extravagant wages, numerous people were engaged in the business and viewed it as an accepted and respectable way of making a living. Only a handful of men made fortunes out of smuggling. Smuggling reinforces tribal allegiance as the control over routes is a precondition for entering the game.

 Annual Migration and Pilgrimage

Uncertainty about the political and economic future, then, ties these people to their country and to the tribe, and makes them behave as if they were pastoralists and gardeners in the accepted sense. As a result, not only do many men spend a great deal of time away from their families and kin, but families are also widely distributed in small camps. While individuals move about a great deal, for much of the year they meet only some of the people on whom they depend for mutual assistance and reassurance. Relationships require maintenance. When persons do not interact regularly, they lose confidence in their relationship. Would it stand the test of a critical situation? Therefore, each Bedouin strives to visit his relatives and friends, and the opportunity to see many of them at one time presents itself in late summer. At that time the dates ripen, and the Bedouin congregate in the oases until the harvest is over. These large concentrations, in turn, form the basis for the organization of tribal gatherings.

Both the Muzeneh and the Awlad Sa’id go through annual migrations. Their pastoral year begins in spring (rabi’), the time when the weather becomes a little warmer and verdure springs up. This usually happens around February. In the mountains spring comes round every year, but in the lower areas only if there has been some rain in winter. Then the tribesmen leave their winter quarters, relatively large stationary tent camps, and some of them divide up into small camps of two—three tents in order to exploit the pasture wherever it is available. Even hquseholds with few animals may join in these movements, which are largely determined by the requirements of the larger flocks, because they wish to be close to relatives. Other catnps may be larger and remain almost immobile. They are made up of households whose income depends on wage labour, and who put little emphasis on herding.

Spring pasture does not last long and the owners of flocks move into the few reliable early summer pastures, such as Wadi Rahaba and Wadi Slaf. The stationary camps move a short distance from the sheltered winter camping site to one that allows in the refreshing breezes.

The annual migratory cycle reaches the point of maximum concentration in summer. The pasture is exhausted and water sources dry up. People converge on the remaining wells in the oases or on the sea-shore and harvest their dates or, in the case of the Jebaliyeh, repair to their gardens in the mountains. Here tribesmen gather in large groups, there is much visiting and among the Muzeneh young men organize dances nearly every night. After the fruit have been picked and the time comes to move, the elders of the tribe call for a tribal gathering. The gathering not only fits into the seasonal pattern of maximum concentration of tribesmen, it also enhances it. This is the only occasion when the ‘tribe’ visibly becomes a group. At other times it does not operate as one political unit, though members are frequently aware that they act as tribesmen, for instance when they plant gardens, build houses or engage in smuggling.

The tribal gatherings, like the individual pilgrimages to saints’ tombs, are called “visits” (ziyara, locally pronounced zuwara). This is the term used elsewhere, too, for pilgrimages to holy places, with the exception of that to Mecca, for which the distinctive term hajj is employed. While the pilgrimage to the summit of Jebel Musa is often compared with that to Mecca, it is nevertheless a zuwara. Each year a number of men and women make the still arduous and costly journey to Mecca.

What is it that makes a considerable number of tribesmen participate in the communal or individual pilgrimages? There is very little persuasion involved; the organizers of a communal pilgrimage are respected members of their communities, but few of them are tribal chiefs or leaders with a strong hold on people. Their main preparations are to collect from the people in the neighbourhood contributions for the tribal sacrifice, which are eventually returned to the donors in the form of boiled meat, and jointly to set the date of the pilgrimage. An attraction of the pilgrimage is that the individual considers it as beneficial. The reputations of the major shrines have spread widely. Not only the tribesmen on whose territory they are situated believe in their powers, but also many others. Some shrines are known to Bedouin from central Sinai. All these places attract individual pilgrims from all over the peninsula; The eves'of Monday and Friday are considered as propitious for pilgrimage. On these days, throughout most of the year, individual households make their way to a shrine of their choice. In many instances this will be one of the holy tombs, but there are also a few other sites, among which the summit of Jebel Musa (where Moses is said to have received the Tablets of the Law) is the most venerated. In these pilgrimages people either redeem vows made when in danger or make requests. As the saint only mediates requests to almighty God, a visit to any holy tomb, perhaps the closest one, should do. Yet, people are slightly sceptical, and trust their own experience and that of their relatives, which shows that some saints intercede more efficiently in some matters than in others. As individual experience varies widely, no real specialization has developed among the saints. But one result has been that people from all parts of South Sinai visit all the holy tombs, and that they often range far afield. Thus members of one patronymic group of the Jebaliyeh visited at various times during the last four —five years the following sites: A women who had not conceived for two years ascended Jebel Musa with her family; a man sought to protect the wellbeing of his family by taking them on an outing to Sheikh 'Awad; two men took their flocks by car to Sheikh Habus in order to safeguard their health; one man carried his family by camel to Nebi Saleh, on recovering from an illness; and an old lady regularly expressed her wish to make the expensive pilgrimage to Mecca "next year". Similarly, people all over South Sinai visit nearby and distant shrines, and all the saints are respected throughout this part of the peninsula.

This situation affects tribal gatherings in two ways. First, the commonly shared belief in saints' tombs, and in saints as intercessors with God, is one of the foundations of the tribal pilgrimage. Each of the individuals who participates in the gathering believes that he obtains a spiritual benefit. It must be added, however, that he may also expect material advantages, perhaps meet debtors or offer a car or a camel for sale. Bedouin see nothing incongruous in the seeking of spiritual and material benefits at the same time. They do not conceive of purely spiritual or purely material occasions, as found in specialised industrial societies.

Second, all the participants in the gathering, whether belonging to the celebrating tribe or not, respect the saint's tomb, and consider it the equal of the saints' tombs of other tribes. Even Nebi Saleh, whose tomb is the recognised centre of the tribal gatherings, is not considered superior to the others. Individual pilgrims do not prefer him in any way to the others, and often many weeks pass between one pilgrim and the next. This equality of saints expresses an important facet of the gatherings: that they are not held exclusively for the members of one tribe, but that people from other tribes can also attend. Indeed, people say explicitly that the gatherings are expected to attract visitors from other tribes. Thus, the meeting-place of the Bedouin of South Sinai shifts periodically from one site to another. At each gathering one tribe slightly dominates because of its numerical preponderance, but never becomes superior to the others. Not so long ago, people say up to 1965, at least five tribes, the Sawalha, Awlad Sa'id, Qararsha, Muzeneh and Jebaliyeh, held separate annual tribal gatherings at Nebi Saleh. I can only surmise that the location turned this tomb into the central meeting place of the Bedouin of the mountains; it is situated on the cross-roads of the major east—west and north—south mountain passes, and close to water. In view of the great importance of smuggling in those days, each tribe attached major significance to its rights of passage through the mountains, as well as to co-ordination of activities and maintaining peaceful relations with other tribes.

Today each tribe has its own meeting-place, in the areas it customarily frequents. There are two clusters of such sites. In the west, not far from the sea are the pilgrimage centres of the 'Aleqat, Qararsha and Hamada tribes. They are located close to the main concentrations of the population, whose employment is found in the towns in and around Sinai. Before the Israelis took over, some people worked in the mines and industries of the area, but the majority worked all year round as migrant labourers, and approximately half of them eventually settled in Egypt proper. For these mobile people, the saint's tomb is close to home, as it points out their claims to the territory. The other cluster of pilgrimage ventres, which will be examined in greater detail, are those of the Muzeneh, Awlad Sa'id and Jebaliyeh. They are located in the mountains, at the edges of each tribe's territory, and here pilgrimage requires most people to leave their homes and to move elsewhere. They go through a rite of passage, "beginning in a Familiar Place, going to a Far Place, and returning, ideally, 'changed', to a Familiar Place" (Turner 1973: 213). These tribesmen are already tied to the land, for here their basic economy lies. Here, where the attachment to the land is given, Bedouin seek in their pilgrimages to forge or maintain relationships in the tribe and outside it. The individual is drawn away from his round of daily life and its circumscribed field of relationships, and brought to another place where he meets people from a wide area.

The date of the tribal gathering is set by a few elders, who take into account all the relevant factors. A Bedouin explained these;

<quote>

“The date of the gathering is fixed perhaps two months in advance, so that the news will get to all tribesfhen. Conditions of work are taken into account as well as the end of the date harvest (masif) in Wadi Firan (the dates there ripen later), and the position of the stars. Only after canopus (thraiah) and other stars rise, the mutton becomes suitable for eating, before that the goats are too lean and their meat is hard to digest”.

</quote>

To complicate matters further, the feasts are held on Thursday afternoons, the eve of the Muslim day of rest, and during the full moon.

The dales of the tribal gatherings vary but little over the years. I he earliest reported date gives the end of July (Burckhardt 1822: 489). ‘I he gatherings I attended, or on which I possess details, all took place between the end of June and the beginning of September. In this respect there was no difference between the Muzeneh, the Awlad Sa’id and the Jebaliyeh.

My data on attendance are incomplete, but they do show that in recent years it varied considerably. Ihus for the Muzeneh gathering at Nebi Saleh in 1970, 100–150 men are reported (Mcshel 1971: 95). In following years the numbers declined sharply, until in 1973 only 50 men were reported to be present. In 1975 the figure climbed up to nearly 200 men.

The Awlad Sa’id attended their tribal meet at Abu Taleb more regularly. At the gathering in July 1973 that I attended about 70 men gathered in the rectangular open-sided hut opposite the saint’s tomb, l or the following year Kapara (1975: 193) reports 40–50 men in the big hut, while others were still arriving. In contrast to the Muzeneh, whose attendance declined up to 1973, and went up again in the following year, the Awlad Sa’id pattern was stable. Most of the men attended each year.

I he Jebaliyeh were different again. I ribesmen claimed that in the past they had had annual tribal gatherings which started at Nebi Saleh, who in the eyes of all tribes is the senior saint, and at whose tomb several tribes gathered, on separate occasions, f rom there they used to move on to Nebi Harun (the reputed tomb of Aron, the high priest), near Saint Catherine’s monastery. This gathering was held for the last time in 1965. After that there were no more gatherings of the whole tribe, but in August 1973 I attended a gathering of about 65 to 70 men of the Awlad Jindi sub-tribe at Shekh ‘Awad, and in August 1975 another one at the same place at which nearly all the Awlad Jindi men were present. A month later another sub-tribe, the Wuhebat, held a gathering of their own at Sheikh ‘Awad. I was told that previously they had not had such gatherings.

A clear pattern emerges here: though the gatherings never ceased, attendance declined when more work was available and it was expected that the favourable conditions would continue. This was particularly true for the Muzeneh and Jebaliyeh, who largely depended on wage labour. People who regularly turned up at the gatherings were those who had a predominant interest in herding, and also the former smugglers, who presented themselves as keepers of tradition. When I asked why others did not turn up I was often told that they were away working and would not jeopardize their jobs. So the men who had an interest in maintaining the tribe showed up at all meetings and those whose employment was secure did not. After 1973, the employed people also took part in the gatherings. This was the result of a new kind of uncertainty. At the time work was plentiful, and well paid, but the political future of Sinai was uncertain. The Egyptians and Israelis were negotiating under the aegis of Dr. Kissinger, the Israelis were giving up territory in Sinai, and no one could know where this was going to end. The extended negotiations for peacemaking only brought doubts and insecurity for the Bedouin. An Awlad Jindi man employed by the government as driver had often told me that he never attended tribal gatherings. These were for the old people he thought. In 1975 he attended for the first time and explained that his wife had begged him to go and that he could not refuse her wish. He did not admit, perhaps not even to himself, that the future was uncertain and that he might have to rely to a larger extent than hitherto on the help of agnates and tribesmen. At the time he was toying with the idea of setting up a repair shop for motor-cars. Tribesmen could thus I become more important even as customers.

The two levels of the individual's involvement in the pilgrimage are shown in the eating arrangements. At each gathering there is a communal meal. Several sheep or a young camel are slaughtered and all the men who contributed to the price attend the meal. The animals are bought and cooking arrangements made by an elder of the group. In the late afternoon or evening all the men gather for a festive meal. They pray together and then sit down in a large circle for a meal. Each man's name is announced for all to hear, then his portion of meat, wrapped in a flap of flat bread, is passed along a chain of servers up to the announcer who hands it to the man. There is no visible leader at these functions, no speeches and announcements are made. Visitors from other tribes are welcome and also given portions of meat. Chiefs and notables mingle with other men and no special area is reserved for them. At one of the Muzeneh gatherings the paramount chief of the tribe put in a short appearance, to pay respect to a gathering at which he did not preside. At the Awlad Sa'id gatherings the two tribal chiefs were present all the time and moved among the people. The Jebaliyeh chief did not attend the Awlad Jindi meetings at all.

This was the formal part of the gathering of the tribe as a territorial unit. But men did not stay all the time in the circle of tribesmen. All around the saint's tomb related families set up small circles of their own. Here men, women and children shared in a joint meal. Each group slaughtered a goat or a sheep and in addition to meat other dishes were prepared. The women in particular wore their finest dresses, embroidered with silver and gold thread. The atmosphere was relaxed and women spoke up freely, even making jokes with sexual innuendos. There was much mutual visiting. The men, most of the time, made the rounds of friends, now and again returning for a few minutes with their families. At these gatherings people reaffirmed their friendly relations and, incidentally, settled debts and disputes and initiated commercial dealings such as the sale of animals and cars, and other joint activities. Shopkeepers, too, had arrived and made brisk sales of cola bottles and sweets.

Leadership there was, but it was muted. The tribe as an administrative organisation was not brought into play, so that the appointed chiefs either did not attend or came as visitors. The Awlad Sa’id chiefs, the Awlad Jindi headman and the other elders acted as organisers, they provided a service for members of their group and, just as in daily life, they facilitated communication among them. But at the gathering itself they did not stand out. Thus Kapara (1975: 192–194) spent a day at an Awlad Sa’id gathering and did not notice the chiefs.

 The Symbolism of Saints’ Tombs

The significance of the tribal gatherings has gradully emerged. There remains the question why the meeting-places should be saints’ tombs. I shall examine the symbolism of these holy places, in the hope of obtaining an answer, even be it an incomplete one. I take a ‘symbol’ to be a sign replete with many interrelated meanings. In this working definition, which bears resemblance to Sapir’s (1934: 493) characterisation of the ‘condensation symbol’, I wish to stress the richness of meaning as an identifying mark of the symbol, as opposed to the mechanical multiplication of mental associations that may attach to a particular sign. The meanings of the condensation symbol express, as Sapir (1934: 493) pointed out, “a condensation of energy, its actual significance being out of all proportion to the apparent triviality of meaning suggested by its mere form”. To this I would add that much of the emotional impact of ‘condensation symbols’ derives from the fact that they evoke numerous meanings simultaneously. The secret of this immediate impact probably lies in the symbol’s full integration in the daily routine of its users. Because of this, many students of society today agree that an external observer can tap the multiple meanings of symbols only through intimate knowledge of both native conceptions of their society and of the social contexts in which the symbols are invoked. The whole gamut of a symbol’s contextual uses, as well as the associated symbols and contexts, must be explored, before it is properly understood.

But once this is done one may find that each segment of the meaning of a symbol has a degree of precision that is often unsuspected.

I shall attempt to unravel three of the major strands in the mesh of meanings attached to the saint's tomb, which have until now remained in the background: the significance of the building erected over the tomb, the tomb itself, and details of the saint's person.

I would argue that the building is a very precise image of the Bedouin's conception that territorial rights are vested in the tribe, and that their essence is the tribesman's exclusive right to build a house on tribal land. Geertz's (1968: 49) concise description of the Moroccan shrine fits that of South Sinai too: "[It] is a squat, white, usually domed, block-like stone building set under a tree, on a hilltop, or isolated, like an abandoned pillbox, in the middle of an open plain." (See also Canaan 1927: 11). One might add that each shrine has a door, and usually also a small window. Only the dome, often crowned with a crescent, and in a few shrines a prayer niche facing in the direction of Mecca, distinguish the shrine from an ordinary house, and indicate that it serves a religious purpose. We already know that Bedouin consider the building of a house as the essential territorial right, and do not permit outsiders to build houses in areas controlled by the tribe. The shrine signifies, among other things, the territorial claims of the tribe whose pilgrimage centre it is. As other tribes may also visit the shrine, the owning tribe's rights obviously must be limited, while others obtain rights to pass through the tribe's land and to pasture their animals on it. On another level, the use of the saint's tomb as a symbol of tribal ownership indicates that territorial rights are protected by supernatural sanctions, but not by the might of the whole tribe. Bedouin store property, such as tents and farming implements, inside or near the holy tomb, secure in the belief that it is protected by the saint. They recount stories about misfortunes that befell would-be thieves, until they returned the stolen property to the tomb. Construction of a saint's tomb or repairs to one, are acts intended to claim rights in land. When Ghanem Jum'a, a wealthy Muzeneh, built the shrine of Faraj, the tribe's ancestor, in the 1960s, he reasserted 'the tribe's sovereignty over the area which was at the time becoming the main supply centre in South Sinai, and the major sales depot of the mobile merchants from al-'Arish who control nearly all the commerce in the peninsula. Similarly, Jebaliyeh elders every few years invite their tribesmen to subscribe money for repairs to the shrine of Sheikh ’Awad. This building activity reasserts a tribe’s rights to the holy tomb, and through it—to territory; and incidentally, in this way all the shrines are kept in a good state of repair.

The saint’s tomb occupies the centre of the building, to allow visitors to circumambulate. The tomb rises to a height of about three feet. It is covered by a shroud made of white or green cloth, on which sometimes the Islamic creed and the saint’s name are embroidered. There are usually several layers of shrouds, for each time a shroud is worn and torn it remains in place and a new one is placed on top of it. It is always doubtful whether the holy tomb actually contains a human body. While the tomb of Nebi Saleh is solidly built and one cannot therefore know whether anyone is buried in it, the tomb of Ali Abu Taleb consists of a flimsy wooden frame, just sufficient to carry the layers of embroidered shrouds. Canaan (1927: 22) remarks, with regard to Palestinian sanctuaries, that “the tomb is often not in the shrine, but outside of it ... it is not at all necessary that there should be a tomb ... connected with the place to make it a shrine." In South Sinai the Bedouin have gone a step further: they insist that no-one is buried in a maqam. As proof they cite the

<quote>

“well-known fact that Nebi Saleh is buried in Ramla, in Israel, and that even the Sheikhs Habus and Abu Shabib have each two holy tombs. Only one of these holds a grave (turba), while the other is a place for gatherings of men (maq’ad).”

</quote>

All the shrines with tribal gatherings are, in Bedouin eyes, maqams, irrespective of whether anyone is buried there or not. This attitude releases the tomb of an association with a tribal ancestor. The saint himself is disembodied and, shed of his earthly vestiges, he moves into closer communion with God.

Most people cannot say anything definite about the saint’s person, except that he was a holy man during his lifetime, as proven by instances in which he rescued individuals from various tribes in miraculous ways. Occasionally people hazard guesses about the antecedents of a saint. While some say that Nebi Saleh was a pre-Islamic Arabian prophet, others think that perhaps he was the ancestor of the Sawalha. The same uncertainty seems to have prevailed over a century ago, when Robinson (1841: I 215) reported: “The history of the Saint is uncertain; but our Arabs held him to be a progenitor of their tribe, the Sawaliha.” Sheikh ’Awad is also said by some Jebaliyeh to belong to their tribe, while the Muzeneh consider Sheikh Abu Zaid to have been a Sawark Bedouin (from North Sinai). The only saint who appears to be an acknowledged tribal ancestor is Faraj of the Muzeneh. But his tomb is not reckoned among the maqams it is named after a group, the Faranja, and not after the ancestor Faraj; and only in recent years was a shrine built over the tomb. Yet the fact remains that Faranja is one of the Muzeneh’s three pilgrimage sites, and one has to conclude that, in a sense, the saint is an emblem of the tribe.

The three holy tombs visited by the Muzeneh allow us to define more clearly the symbolic significance of the saint, for the person of each of the three saints gives special emphasis to one aspect: Faranja symbolizes the unity of the tribe, as well as its descent from the North Arabian Muzeneh (Doughty 1937: Il 381). Nebi Saleh represents both the unity of the Tawara, of South Sinai as one region to which all its inhabitants have access, and the inclusion of South Sinai in the Islamic world and, by extension, in the state that control Sinai. Nebi Harun again stands for the connection with the monastery of Saint Catherine’s and the privileges associated with it on one hand, and on the other—for the Islamic community. For Moses and Aron are included in Islamic hagiography. I cannot explain this specialization of the three Muzeneh saints, for in other tribes all the symbolic aspects merge in a single saint.

On a higher level of abstraction, the three Muzeneh saints stand for ideologies that are deeply engrained in Bedouin thought and concern areas of their social life: agnation and tribal organization, the saints’ cult and the regionalism of South Sinai, and the universalism of Islam and, by extension, all the external world impinging on the Bedouin and not controlled by them. These are not, of course, the only ideologies employed by Bedouin. Even in the saints’ cult another ideology, namely kinship, plays an important part: it underlies the belief in the efficacy of the saints’ intercession with God, and it is expressed in the family sacrifices that are made parallel to the tribal ones.

The ideology of agnation informs “bounded” activities, such as the control over rights in land, protecting property and the setting up of groups. To this kind of activity applies Robertson Smith’s (1894: 150) dictum that holiness is “a restriction on the licence of man in the free use of natural things”. In the Arabian context, he believes that "at most sanctuaries embracing a stretch of pasture ground, the right of grazing was free to the community of the god, but not to outsiders” (Smith 1894: 144). In South Sinai the rights thus reserved are those over oases and their fruit-trees, irrigation from wells and the tribal smuggling routes, and they are compressed in the right to build a house on tribal land.

For each restriction on the use of resources there must be a corresponding opening up of resources, as exemplified in this statement, also taken from Robertson Smith (1894: 111):

<quote>

“The Arabs regard rain as depending on the ... seasons, which affect all tribes alike within a wide range; and so when the showers of heaven are ascribed to a god, that god is Allah, the supreme and non-tribal deity.”

</quote>

Evidently these tribesmen reserve certain rights in territory for themselves, but also grant rights to pasture on it to others, on a basis of mutuality. Robertson Smith cannot admit that the “tribal deity” also stands for Allah; to imply that the same people believe in two gods, one tribal and one supreme, at the same time, is as far as he dare go. In South Sinai the saint is clearly associated with God. While he intercedes with God on behalf of his tribe, he also works on behalf of individuals from any tribe, and is thus never an exclusive patron of his own people. He represents both restrictions on the use of the country’s resources in favour of some people, and access to the remaining resources to others. There is no paradox in this, for rights are always specific, so that every prohibition has its complementary permission. Thus in South Sinai certain rights in land, wells and roads are reserved for tribesmen, and other rights are expressly opened up to all

Tawara: land everywhere is available to anyone for pasture, drinking water for men and animals may be drawn from any well, even when surrounded by a fence, and every Bedouin can travel freely anywhere in the peninsula, as long as he does not infringe local privileges of employment or uses another tribe’s smuggling route.

The ideologies of agnation and of the saints’ cult not only complement each other; they are also linked up, through the person of the saint. The ambiguous position of the saint, who is sometimes thought of as a tribal patron, perhaps even an ancestor and at others just a holy man about whom little is known, or maybe even a Bedouin from a distant tribe, is evidence of his two faces. One pulls him toward the tribe, the other towards the world.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-3.jpg]]

 References

<biblio>

Ben-David J.

1972. Shivte ha-beduim bi-drom Sinai (The Bedouin Tribes of South Sinai). Jerusalem: Hebrew University, Department of Geography, M A dissertation.

Burckhardt J.L.

1882 Travels in Syria and the Holy Land. London: Murray.

Canaan T.

1927. Mohammedan Saints and Sanctuaries in Palestine. London: Luzac.

Doughty C.M.

1937. Travels in Arabia Deserts. New York: Random House (first published 1888).

Eickelman D.E

1976. Moroccan Islam; Tradition and Society in a Pilgrimage Center. Austin, Texas: University of Texas Press.

Ganor A et al.

1972. Aklim Sinai (The Climate of Sinai). Beth Dagan: Israel Metorological Service.

Geertz C.

1968. Islam Observed; Religious Development in Morocco and Indonesia. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Gellner E.

1972. Political and Religious Organization of the Berbers of the Central High Atlas. In Arabs and Berbers; From Tribe to Nation in North Africa, E Gellner and C. Micaud (eds.) London: Duckworth.

Glassner M.I.

1973. The Bedouin of Southern Sinai under Israeli Administration. The Geographical Review 64: 31–60.

Grunebaum G.E.von

1951. Muhammadan Festivals. New York: Schuman. Israel Army

1962. Beduei Sinai (The Bedouin of Sinai). Israel: Army, Southern Command.

Kapara Y.

1975. Ziarat Sheikh Abu Taleb (The Pilgrimage to the Abu Taleb Shrine). Teva’ wa-Aretz 17: 192–4.

Keller A.

1900. Eine Sinai-Fahrt. Frauenfeld: Huber.

Levy R.

1962. The Social Structure of Islam. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Linant de Bellefonds Y.

1974. Kabr. Encyclopaedia of Islam, New Edition. Leiden: Brill.

Meshel Z.

1971. Drom Sinai (South Sinai). Jerusalem: Sh. H.L.Y.

Murray G.W.

1935. Sons of Ishmael; A Study of the Egyptian Bedouin. London: Routledge.

Musil A.

1928. The Manners and Customs of the Rwala Bedouins. New York: American Geographical Society.

Niebuhr C.

1779. Travels Through Arabia and Other Countries in the East. Perth: Morison.

Palmer E H.

1871. The Desert of the Exodus. Cambridge: Deighton, Bell.

Palmer H.S.

1906. Sinai from the Fourth Egyptian Dynasty to the Present Day. London: SPCK.

Peters, E. L.

1976 From Particularism to Universalism in the Religion of the Cyrenaica Bedouin. Bulletin of the British Society for Middle Eastern Studies 3: Sapir E.

1934. Symbolism. Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences. New York: Macmillan. Smith W Robertson

1894. Lectures on the Religion of the Semites. London: Black.

Turner V.

1973. The Center Out There: Pilgrim’s Goal. History of Religions 12: 191–230.

</biblio>

© Emanuel Marx 1977

* Part Two: Regional and Non-Regional Alternatives: The Waxing and Waning of Cults

 3. Disparate Regional Cults and a Unitary Ritual Field in Zimbabwe[12]

*by Kingsley Garbett

<quote>

“I am a well-built house in which the little spirits shelter ... Nyabapa, Gweera, Chingoo, Goronga and Chaminhuka are the poles and fibres which built me, the Outspread One, who stretches out over all the earth. The lesser spirits are the fibres, but my children are the poles.”

George Kupara, speaking as Mutota.

</quote>

 Introduction: The Interpenetration of Cults

Perhaps the greatest temptation in a discussion of regional cults is to treat each one as a separate entity. This arises because, what strikes an observer immediately is the presence of sharp cultural and organisational differences. Often, regional cults that are closest in location are quite distinct in kind. But to yield to this temptation easily leads to a wrong reading of the dynamics of the cults. Here the fundamental problem is how one cult or region waxes and wanes in relation to others. Not that this necessarily requires observation of a series of cults. Admittedly, to cover in depth as much as one cult or even a single region is, often enough, beyond the reach of a lone fieldworker. But the need is to bring one cult or region into focus within the context of its relations with others. It is essential to take account of the interpenetration of cults within a wider field of ritual relations. Only thus can analysis reach a right explanation of transformations in a single cult along with changes in the connections between and across the cult’s regions.

In this paper I centre my analysis on the expansion of one region in Zimbabwe, that of the Korekore ancestor Mutota. I take into account ritual relations among people who are ethnically distinct neighbours, the Korekore, Tavara, and Zezuru, but who speak dialects of the same language and take part in the same wider field of political and economic relations. In its spatial extent this field extends over an area of about 30,000 square miles and includes several million people. My analysis shows how two quite unlike cults interpenetrate and connect with each other within this wider field. In some respects the two kinds of cults do resemble each other. Both are broadly concerned with regulating man’s relation to the earth and with matters of general morality. Both involve beliefs in spirit possession and are organised through spirit mediums. Given these similarities, however, the cognitive and organisational differences appear all the more striking.

To take the cult of territorial spirits first, this includes Mutota's region along with those of at least two others, Chingoo and Nyabapa. The cult's domain among the Korekore extends throughout the Zambezi valley between the Angwa and Mukumvura rivers, northwards into Mozambique,[13] and into part of the adjacent southern escarpment (see Map 2). Here all land, whether now occupied or not, is divided into ritual areas which are regions and parts of regions, 'spirit provinces' in my terms. These spirit provinces vary considerably in size from a few hundred acres to several hundred square miles in extent. Each is associated with a territorial spirit who is believed to be the remote ancestor in control of the territory from ancient times to the present. The boundaries which demarcate each spirit province are well known. Moreover, they have an autonomy of their own. They are not adjusted to fit other divisions, such as current political ones. They do not necessarily coincide with the boundaries of chiefdoms or with modern administrative and international boundaries.

As for the territorial spirits themselves, some are said to be mhondoro ('lions'). Among Korekore speakers this designation is-reserved specifically for those remote ancestors who, according to belief, ate special medicines (mbanda) when alive, and thus ensured that their spirits would return to inhabit animal hosts, usually lions, but occasionally pythons and birds, and speak, from time to time, through human mediums (svikiro). Each of these remote ancestoral spirits has a place in a genealogy and thus in a conceptual hierarchy. Similarly, the spirits' mediums are hierarchically ranked and allocated to the defined territories over which their possessing spirits are thought to have particular control. Mediums are usually installed as young men and remain in office until they die. Very occasionally, one hears accounts of mediums being ousted from office because of some gross misdemeanour but, in general, a medium's position is secure. Each medium is assisted by an acolyte (mutape or nechombo). This is an hereditary position and, when a medium dies, it is the duty of the acolyte first to announce the death to the senior medium of the region, then to repair and maintain the spirit house (zumba) in which possession occurs, until a new medium appears.

In ritual contexts one never hears the term for the High God, Mwari, and a region's apical ancestor, such as Mutota, is regarded as a creator being. The objects of the cult are, thus, the remote ancestors who, according to myth, established each region and its spirit provinces. Significantly, they did so through conquest, according to the origin myth of Mutota's region. In myth, too, expansion must be explained, but it is made out to be a matter of the remote ancestor's ancient history, rather than a current process, as I shall show it to be.

The second and contrasting cult is that of local spirits, such as Nehanda and Chaminhuka to name only the most prominent. Its domain among Zezuru extends broadly through Central and Western Mashonaland to include the administrative districts of Hartley, Marandellas and Mrewa, and the southern parts of the districts of Lomagundi and Mazoe (see Map 2). Some of the most important of the local spirits, such as Chaminhuka and perhaps Nehanda, are held never to have been mortal and are believed to mediate between man, lesser spirits and the High God, Mwari.[14] Other local spirits are chthonic beings of the underground and pools or ancestors without known genealogical links to the living; and still others are important ancestors of chiefly lineages whose influence extends beyond their original chiefdoms and descendants. Moreover, some of the spirits are considered to be more powerful or more pervasive in their influence, and to this extent there appears to be a conceptual hierarchy, albeit an ambiguous one, in the cult of local spirits. However, there are no clearly defined and regulated hierarchies of mediums associated with particular centres. Nor is there always a single medium for one spirit. A number of mediums, often in widely separated areas, may be accepted as subject to possession by the same spirit and yet not clearly linked with each other. Finally, and perhaps most critically, for purposes of an initial comparison with the cult of territorial spirits, there is the difference in ritual jurisdiction over blocks of land and particular parts of the earth. In the cult of local spirits, specific mediums may be communal ones closely associated with certain sets of chiefdoms, but the local spirits themselves are not, in general, figures of territorial authority. Conceptually, these spirits, quite unlike the territorial ones, lack distinct territories of their own. In terms of cult organisation, their mediums lack jurisdiction over clearly defined ritual areas, other than those which correspond to current political divisions. In brief, the two cults are like opposite sides of the same coin. Viewed in the abstract, as kinds of cult, one appears hierarchical and territorially defined, and the other virtually the contrary, non-hierarchical and territorially undefined, though sometimes communally or locally defined. However, to go beyond this appearance in order to understand how the cults interpenetrate and how one transforms into the other is the main aim of this paper.

Lest my argument be taken to be merely another analysis of an oscillation between ideal types, I must stress from the outset that I am concerned both with the regional expansion and the interpenetration of cults. Briefly in advance of my argument, and perhaps too briefly, three of the ways in which the cults interpenetrate each other's organisation need to be highlighted. First, there is a tendency towards connection through at least one shared inner circle of leaders: at least one set of close patrikin gains key or senior mediumships in regions of both cults. Second, there is cross-cult affiliation: mediums in one cult may enter into a formal relationship and attach themselves to those in another. Thirdly, cross-cult confirmation occurs: mediums of one may validate the authority or legitimacy of some of the other's mediums. It would take me well beyond the limits of this paper to consider fully the cognitive management of such organizational interpenetration. Clearly, there must be to some degree a translation of one set of beliefs into another, given the cultural differences in belief in local and territorial spirits. To show how this and other cross-cult problems of cognition are managed along with organisational problems, I shall examine the situation of a medium's seance. My account will document in particular one such translation of beliefs and the way that Zezuru spirits are presented as, and transposed into, the remote ancestor spirits of Korekore. At various points, I deliberately extend my analysis to the limits of the data. Occasionally, I go beyond the data to indulge in informed speculation. This is particularly so when I use data from secondary sources. I am dealing with a large and complex field seen mainly from the perspective of one cult. Many of the leaders and important mediums of other cults I did not meet: they lived and operated many miles away from me. Yet to ignore them, and the connections between them, leads to a failure to comprehend significant issues concerning the interpenetration of Korekore and Zezuru cults.

 The Region of Mutota

The Korekore region of Mutota is but one of the cult regions which exist in and near the Zambezi Valley. The various regions are formally connected to each other by perpetual kinship (see Genealogy 1); each region's senior medium, and occasionally lesser mediums, take on relationships held to have existed in the past between prominent ancestors in the regions. In Mutota's case, perpetual kinship links his region to those of Chingoo and Nyabapa: he is held to have had these two 'brothers'. The relative seniority of these 'brothers' is not known or recognised and they are presented as equals. Chingoo was recently represented by a senior medium operating with a small hierarchy of mediums under him in the administrative area known as Sipolilo Tribal Trust Land. Similarly, the medium of Nybapa heads a hierarchy of mediums in the Kandeya Tribal Trust Land near to Mt. Darwin.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-4.jpg][Genealogy 1: Perpetual Relations among Korekore, Chthonic and Chikunda Regional Cults]]

Once or twice a year messengers travel between the senior mediums. This maintains formal relations between the three 'brothers' through a symbolic procedure: they never meet face-to-face. The messengers carry small containers of snuff (nhekwe) into which a senior medium has 'breathed' a message. In a seance, the container is unstoppered, the message 'listened to', and a similar 'message' is breathed into the container. The messenger is then sent on his way. The same procedure is used within a regional hierarchy: similar messages are regularly exchanged between mediums in Mutota's hierarchy, for example. However, within a region such 'messages' when initiated by a junior medium are transmitted to the regional medium more often through a chain of mediums more senior in the hierarchy, and often the messenger carries a brief verbal message about ritual matters in addition. Between regions the symbolic exchange of 'messages' expresses formal equality among regional mediums: within a region it expresses and emphasizes hierarchical relations.

Messengers, who receive a small fee, are chosen from a medium's staff or from among trusted associates. Significantly, a messenger bearing a snuff container should be allowed to pass through any territory without hindrance:

it should be sufficient for him to show the snuff container and to state that he is a messenger of a mhondoro for him to be given safe passage. Nor should he be questioned as to his mission as an ordinary traveller might: it is considered secret.

The need for the formal exchange of messages among mediums arises, as Korekore view it, from the belief that it is mystically dangerous for two or more spirits active as mhondoro to occupy simultaneously the same ritual space. By extension, it is believed to be mortally dangerous for an established medium to come into Ihe presence of, or enter the territory of, another medium without both having taken extensive ritual precautions. Thus, a medium may not cross the boundary of his spirit province without taking such precautions; in some cases he may even have to be blindfolded and carried over the boundary. When established mediums visit the senior medium of the region, they stay outside his hamlet at a special place until, protected by medicines, they are called into his presence at a seance.

In addition to expressing the formal relations among mediums, the regular transmission of symbolic messages also serves to convey to a senior medium which mediums within his region still form part of it and which are still functioning. The repeated failure of a medium to send a messenger to the senior medium over a period of two or three years may be a cause for concern and, unless the senior medium meanwhile receives formal notification of the medium’s death, he may well send his own messenger to establish exactly what has happened..

In general, Korekore conceptualize regions as autonomous ritual territories internally subdivided into areas of various sizes: both the region’s boundaries and those of the sub-divisions are held to be ancient and immutable. If pressed, Korekore acknowledge that when an ancestor becomes a mhondoro and speaks through a human medium for the first time, then an adjustment of ritual areas may be necessary, for each mhondoro and its medium must have a territory; there are no itinerant mediums in Korekore regional cults. However, they argue that it is not that a new ritual territory has to be demarcated but rather that an ancient one, long forgotten, has now been rediscovered. When the medium of the recent ancestor Mzarabani (Genealogy 2: Nl) appeared for final testing in 1963, he was told by Mutota's medium to seek out the land centred on Mzarabani's grave. This was held to be located on the west bank of the Msengezi river, adjacent to Chuzu's spirit province (Map 1: VI,k), in what until then had been accepted as the spirit province of Chivere and Chikuyo.

Cognitively and organizationally, there is sufficient flexibility to accommodate a variety of contingencies without the basic conceptions of the antiquity and immutability of ritual boundaries appearing to be challenged. For example, some territorial spirits, such as Negomo, are credited with more than one territory. A medium of such a spirit, therefore, may have the option of living in either of the territories. In fact, there is a general belief that all territorial spirits have additional, small, ritual territories scattered through the region but few of these are known. Korekore argue that the mhondoro will make them known should the occasion warrant it. This belief, and the fact that it is accepted that a medium may operate in a spirit province other than that of his possessing spirit, enables mediums who have been displaced from their own spirit provinces to operate from a legitimate territorial base. For example, the medium of the Korekore Nehanda, whose spirit-province (Map 1: II, 1, m) extends into Mozambique, fled in the twenties from her village there to escape the attention of the Portuguese authorities and took up residence in the land of her 'brother' Kagoro. A more complex case concerns the relations between the senior medium of Mutota and Chihwahwa's medium. In 1958, the senior medium was displaced by the colonial administration from Gota, on the plateau, in terms of the Land Apportionment Act. He chose to settle as near to his spirit province as possible on the southern boundary of the spirit province of Kasekete and Chihwahwa (Map 1: VI,g). Chihwahwa, however, was represented by a medium with a considerable reputation and a large vicinity. He argued that Mutota's medium had now placed him in mortal danger. The senior medium countered this by arguing that since the whole of the region was Mutota's, he could settle wherever he chose. Eventually, after a protracted dispute, Chihwahwa's medium moved in 1962 to take up residence at a site said to be sacred to Chihwahwa within the small spirit province of Chuzu (Map 1: VI,k).

Table 1: Index of Spirit Provinces Shown in Map 1[15][16][17]

| Spirit | A | B | Boundaries of Spirit Provinces |

| Mutota | A1 | VII,d-f | N: Escarpment; W: Nyahoko; S: Chimuwere; E: Kadzi |

| Chiobvu | B1 | VI-VII,h-k | N & W: Utete; S: Beyond Escarpment (?) E: Slope break |

| Sundo | B2 | VII,o-p | Unmapped. N: Escarpment |

| Kagoro | B3 | III-VII,k-n | N: Edge of Forest; W: Kadziruve & Msengezi; S: Escarpment; E: Nzou-Mvunda |

| Nyajore | B5 | IV-V,a | Unmapped, Approximate location shown |

| Nehanda | B7 | I-II,k-m | N: Into Mozambique (?); W: Nyatwao & Karo; S: Hwatonda; W: Msengezi |

| Nebedza | B8 | I-III,j-m | N: Kadzi & into Mozambique (?); W: Katsawa; S: Kafungura & Msengezi; E: Nyakutitatu, Karo & Nyatwao |

| Madzomba | B15 | I,g-h | a knoll ringed by baobabs; N: Mututa & Chamukura; E & S: headwaters of Kusuka & Karemwe |

| Kadembo | C2 | II-IV,h-j | N: Kada & Kadzi; E: Katsawa, Kafungura & Msengezi; S: Sapa; W: Kada & Pote |

| Nyahuma | C4 | II-V,d-g | N: Bwase; W: Hunyani; S: Ambi; E: Mahuwi |

| Kachenje | D1 | II-III;g-h | N: Headwaters of tributaries of Kadzi & a Musiga tree, Mujinga. W: Watershed between Kadzi & Bwase; S & E: Kada and headwaters of Bwase |

| Karambera | D2 | IV-VI,d-f | N: Gwira & Kautyora; W: Karoi; S: Escarpment; E: Ambi |

| Chikuyo | D3 | III-V,a-d | N & E: Dande; S: Escarpment; W: Hunyani |

| Svembere | E1 | III,d | N & W: Ambi & Dande; S: Kautyora; E: Gwira |

| Marumba | E2 | IV-VI,c-d | N & E: Karoi; W: Dande; S: Escarpment |

| Chivere | E4 | IV-VI,h-j | N: Sapa & Nyanzou; W: Kadzi, Mahuwi, Karo & Katonha; S: Escarpment; E: Msengezi & Utete |

| Seremwe | F1 | III-IV,b | Unmapped. Approximate location shown |

| Negomo | F2 | II,m | N: Msengezi; W & S: Msingwa-Dande; E: Hoya & Stream (?) |

| Negomo | F2 | II,c | Unmapped. Approximate location shown |

| Katuu | G1 | III,b-c | Unmapped. Approximate location shown |

| Siti | H1 | III-V,k | N & W: Msengezi; S: Moyo; E: Kadziruve |

| Mukombwe | H2 | V,p | Unmapped. Approximate location shown. Extends into Mozambique |

| Chiurinyanga | | II-III,l-m | N: Karo; W: Kariramombe & Mutaure; S: Forest edge; E: Msengezi & Msingwa Dande |

| Zezi | J1 | III,k-l | N: Hwatonda; E: Nyakutitatu; S & W: Msengezi |

| Kasekete | J2 | V-VII,g-h | N: Headwaters of Mahuwi & Kadzi tributaries; W: Mahuwi; S: Escarpment; EfKatonho |

| Chipute | K1 | V-VI,f-g | N & E: Sakonde; S: Escarpment; W: Ambi |

| Chihwahwa | K2 | V-VII,g-h | See Kasekete |

| Chitsungo | M1 | V-VI,a | N & W: Hunyani; S: Escarpment; E: Nyakakutu |

| Chuzu | M2 | VI,k | Ox-bow Meander, Msengezi |

| Kasindi | M4 | III-VII,n-p | N & E: Hoya; S: Escarpment; W: Nzou-Mvunda |

| Chiruka | M5 | II-III,n | N & E: Hoya; W: Msingwa Dande; S: Forest edge |

| Bamwomwe | T | I-II.i-j | N & W: Karemwe; E: Headwaters of Kusuka; S: Kadzi & Kada |

| Musuma | Ch. | VI,c | The Nyagwikwi Depression |

| Pfunze | Ch. | III,l | N: Msengezi; W: Kadziruve; S: Forest edge; W: Mutaure |

| Madzivamhako | S | III-V,k | See Siti |

| Mukarazi | ? | I-IV,d-g | N: Mozambique!?); W: Hunyani; S: Bwase, E: Watershead of Bwase and Kada |

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-5.jpg][Genealogy 2: Mutota’s Descendants
Starred descendants were represented by mediums in 1963
Those in italics are also Zezuru local spirits
Roman numerals refer to Map 1.]]

Whilst anomalies arise, I stress that I recorded very few and that many appeared to have resulted from the intrusion of the colonial powers into the domains of the cults. Those which did occur were accommodated in such a way as to maintain the basic elements of cult organization and belief, the hierarchical relations among mediums and the close relation between the medium, his possessing spirit and a particular, bounded, ritual Territory. Thus, the Korekore regions and their constituent parts appear as ancient in origin and part of an enduring and unchanging reality.

Lengthy origin myths supported by complex genealogies validate the present-day distribution of regions and the relation between ritual territories within regions. The myths describe how Mutota's sons and their descendants swept down upon the Tavara people over-running them and dividing the land among themselves.[18] In myth the Zambezi valley at this time is depicted as being under the secular control of Tavara chiefs and under the ritual authority of powerful chthonic beings, among them Dzivaguru and his sons Karuva and Musuma Nyamukokoko and the latter's guardian, Chimombe.[19] The Tavara chiefs are said to have been defeated by superior physical force and the chthonic beings, who are usually held to have disappeared into the earth, by trickery and the use of superior mystical powers. In some versions of the myth, the chthonic beings, as ultimate 'owners of the earth', are associated with a territorial cult and are held to have provided rain for the Korekore invaders who supplicated them and offered tribute at a number of shrines. In other versions of the myth, particularly those related by the regional medium of Mutota and other mediums senior in his hierarchy, the over-riding ritual supremacy of the chthonic beings and their role in providing rain is minimized, and they are either reduced, as in the case of Musuma, to spirits of purely local influence, or designated as the objects of veneration of separate, circumscribed, regional cults such as those of Dzivaguru and his son Karuva, and of Chimombe.

Evidence from the ethnography of the Zambezi Valley east of Kariba, strongly suggests that the way in which the mediums of the Mutota cult relate the origin myth so as to circumscribe and minimize the influence of the chthonic cults is of relatively recent origin and can be related to the decline of the Dzivaguru cult and the concomitant rise of the Mututa cult which began in the twenties. I shall argue that this resulted from the need of the Mutota cult to appear manifestly autonomous particularly in its relations with Zezuru local cults.

The extent of the region of the Dzivaguru cult in the late nineteenth century is reasonably well documented and it covered a wide territory including at least part of what is now held to be the autonomous region of the Mutota cult. Tribute offered to the mediums of Dzivaguru and his son Karuva are reported to have come from many different Korekore groups both east and west of the cult's centre at Choma (Map 2). Old men living in the east of Mutota's region recalled how, in their youth, tribute was sent to Dzivaguru at Choma. Bourdillon (1972a, 1972b) has reported that among the easternmost Korekore in the Valley, a number of local cults of chiefly ancestors occur in conjunction with a territorial cult of Dzivaguru. In the east, beyond the Angwa river, there is a territorial cult centred on Chimombe, a chthonic being (Campbell 1957; Nicolle 1937), which also exists alongside local cults of Korekore ancestors. I am tempted to speculate that the decline of the Dzivaguru cult and the rise of the Mutota cult accelerated processes which had begun earlier with the collapse of the Mwene Mutapa dynasty in the eighteenth century (cf. Abraham 1959; 1964; 1966; Beach 1972) whereby what had been a Korekore cult of royal ancestors, possible centred on royal graves, operating alongside a separately organized chthonic earth cult was transformed into a regional territorial cult. Chiefly ancestors came to be accorded the powers of chthonic beings, and the mediums who represented them became associated with fixed territories. Such an interpretation would go some way to explaining the general form of the Mutota cult and also account for some of its unique features.

However, whatever be one's reading of the meagre documentary and oral evidence concerning the remote past, I would strongly maintain that the variations presently observed in the regional cults of the Zambezi Valley are not to be interpreted simply or mainly as the ossified residues of a remote history as, for example, the historian Abraham (1966) has argued.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-6.jpg]]

They result from on-going secular and ritual processes which continue to affect both inter- and intra-regional relations among the cults. Contrary to Korekore belief which, as I have stated, stresses the antiquity of the cults and the immutability of their ritual territories, the evidence indicates that ritual territories are adjusted both inter- and intra-regionally in response to secular and ritual processes and that concomitant changes occur in the validating myths. Intra-regional adjustment occurs in response to largely secular processes which affect the frequency with which spirit provinces are created and new mediums appear, whilst inter-regional adjustments occur in relation to secular and ritual processes, set in a much wider field, which affect the waxing and waning of cults in relation to one another. The two processes of adjustment, which I consider in more detail later, though ultimately connected are of different orders and have different durations.

Nevertheless, whilst I have emphasised that there is adjustment in ritual territories both inter- and intra-regionally, let me not convey the impression that this occurs rapidly. The process is relatively slow and occurs over several generations so that for any one generation of Korekore, the appearance of continuity in the organization of the cult and the lack of change in the number and size of ritual territories accords reasonably well with their belief. Korekore, however, are a highly mobile people. A period of uxorilocal residence and bride-service, coupled with the operation of exogamic rules, complicated nowadays by a high rate of male circulatory labour migration, scatters men and women over wide areas. These processes, together with competition among senior men within hamlets and neighbourhoods for followings, and the need to seek out, periodically, new areas of forest suitable for swidden agriculture, make hamlets unstable units which are periodically shifting and proliferating. It is not surprising, therefore, that the smallest unit of cult organization at the local level, the land-shrine community, is itself ephemeral, often persisting for only a generation or two.

 The Land-Shrine Community

Within a spirit province, hamlets tend to cluster in relation to a source of water and a stretch of alluvial soil with a high water table suitable for almost continuous cultivation. Often, each cluster contains a small core of patrilineal relatives who may claim to have all once lived together in one hamlet. Each cluster usually constitutes a separate community with its own land shrine, and as the cluster waxes and wanes with the movement of people so does the land shrine community alter. In small spirit provinces there may be only one such community but frequently there are several. Each year when the rains are due (December) and, less commonly nowadays at harvest time (April/May), members of a land shrine community meet at a tree shrine, often a prominent Baobab tree, to make offerings to the territorial spirits. (While first fruits are still offered to the territorial spirit, this is now more commonly done on a separate and individual basis by heads of households in their own fields.) All households within the community are expected to contribute grain for the beer and flour to be offered at the shrine. This is prepared ritually by pre-pubertal girls and post-menopahsal women chosen from all the hamlets which constitute the community.

Those who offer together at a land shrine constitute a moral community (see Garbett 1969). They act together to deal with such polluting offences as murder, suicide, incest, witchcraft and sorcery, or to resolve disputes which may lead to such offences. It is believed that these offences pollute the earth, incur the wrath of the territorial spirit and render the land shrine ritual inefficacious. The territorial spirit shows his wrath principally by withholding rain, by sending birds, locusts and insects to attack crops, by inflicting cattle or humans with sterility and by killing with thunderbolts. Thus when people living within a spirit province speak with the spirit through his medium, they may seek advice on such matters as rainfall, offences against the earth and the fertility of humans, cattle and crops. But they may do this as individuals or as representatives of a particular land shrine community. Elsewhere (Garbett 1969) I have described how spirit mediums stress the dangers of mystical retribution flowing from an unresolved secular issue and thus come to play a prominent role in the resolution of local or communal disputes. However, whilst offences which are the particular concern of territorial spirits may involve a secular chief, he usually participates at a shrine as an ordinary elder. A chief does not organize or coordinate the ritual at the various land shrines within his chiefdom. In this respect, ritual and secular spheres are organizationally distinct.

 Lineal and Territorial Aspects of a Regional Cult

Lest this point be misunderstood, I must summarize an argument which I have put more fully elsewhere (Garbett 1966). Korekore who claim patrilineal descent from Mutota form chiefly descent groups in a number of chiefdoms in Mutota's region. Invariably, one finds that the founder of a chiefdom, an ancestor two or three generations removed from the oldest living, is recognized as a mhondoro ('lion') spirit and is represented by a medium. An especially important duty of a medium of this type is, after a chief's death, to select from a number of candidates the next chief and to install him in office. Generally, the chief's patrikin first raise such a matter with the medium who represents the most junior lineal ancestor speaking as a mhondoro. If he is unable to resolve it satisfactorily, it will be taken to the next medium senior in the hierarchy and so forth, until the senior and regional medium is reached. I have described in some detail (Garbett 1966) the kind of politicking which occurs nowadays over chiefly succession and which comes to involve not only various factions and several mediums of the hierarchy but also officers of the district and provincial administrations. I stressed in that account the delaying tactics which mediums employ as they attempt to assess the balance of support in favour of one candidate or another and wait for some consensus to emerge.

From this summary, and my discussion above, it can be seen that there are two aspects of the Korekore cult which relate to the crucial position of the regional medium. The first or lineal aspect derives from the fact that patrilineal descendants may come from wherever they live to consult a medium representing the ancestor.. Consultations usually relate to illness and misfortune due to the affliction of ancestral spirits and to matters of inheritance and succession. The second or territorial aspect derives from the fact that people living within a spirit province may consult its medium and seek to placate its territorial spirit's wrath. The regional medium's position is crucial, because it is held at a level that is maximal for the intersection of the two aspects. He alone can be consulted by any person living anywhere in the region's provinces and also by a patrilineal descendant of the region's apical ancestor coming from wherever he may live.

There is a further aspect which relates to the regional medium's position but which entails relations that are personal primarily, rather than hierarchical and lineal or territorial. A medium who establishes a reputation for wisdom in settling disputes, for exorcising malevolent spirits, for effective cures and for bringing rain may draw supplicants to him from a wider vicinity that extends far beyond the boundaries of his spirit province or even his region. For example, the vicinity of Mutota's regional medium extended south as far as Hartley District (130 miles), south east as far as Bikita (300 miles) and as far west as Urungwe (95 miles) (See Map 2). The supplicants from the wider vicinity, unless they are lineal descendants of the territorial spirit, use the medium very much as they would use an ordinary diviner (ng'anga). Some mediums, by expanding their vicinity of supplicants, come to have reputations which far outweigh their, possibly, humble positions in the formal hierarchy of mediums. Ultimately, this may lead to friction between a junior medium and one more senior about their respective jurisdiction and spheres of ritual authority, and the intervention of the senior medium may be required.

 Change in Ritual Territories

I stressed earlier that Korekore maintain that the present distribution of ritual territories between and within regions is ancient and immutable. I now consider the processes by which intra-regional adjustments in ritual territories occur before turning to consider the wider field of inter-regional relations.

Evidence indicates and logic suggests that spirit provinces must be adjusted in response to secular processes which affect the frequency with which new mediums appear and new spirit provinces are created. These processes have their origin in the competition among royals for chiefly titles which, in the past, often led to fission and the establishment of new chiefdoms and chiefships. I have indicated that invariably within two or three generations of the foundation of a new chiefdom a medium appeared to represent its founding ancestor and to regulate the succession to the new chiefship. Each new medium was installed in a 'new' spirit province which was often within or near the territory of the chiefdom, centred on what was said to be the first chief's grave, but was always defined within some previously existing spirit province. Mediums who had responsibility for regulating succession to the parent chiefdoms relinquished their direct responsibility for this to new mediums who became their subordinates in the hierarchy. However, they were available for appeals against the decisions of their subordinates and appear to have continued to have had an important role in mediating relations between the new chiefdoms. Hence, the evidence indicates that the secular processes which gave rise to the establishment of new chiefdoms also led to the proliferation of spirit provinces and the appearance of new mediums. However, there were contrary processes operating. Chiefdoms were established through conquest and thus formed at the expense of existing ones. As the mediums linked with former chiefdoms became less directly involved in secular issues and matters of succession, there was a tendency for their positions not to be succeeded to after their deaths, though their spirit provinces remained and the names of their possessing spirits were retained as ancestors in the genealogy. It is noticeable in Mutota's genealogy (Genealogy 2) how none of his descendants from Generations D to J is represented by a medium. Thus, the factors which led to the demise of some chiefdoms also led to the eventual loss of significance of the mediumships associated with them.

Whilst it is clear that certain mediumships junior in the hierarchy have been terminated, certain senior mediumships, by contrast, appear to have been filled by a succession of mediums over long periods of time. At this level, where mediums are remote from direct involvement in day-to-day secular issues and in chiefly succession, different processes operate. Spirit provinces associated with ancestors at higher genealogical levels tend to be large and'new' spirit provinces are established as sub-divisions of them. In the west of the Dande, for example, Nyahuma's spirit province is held to have once extended from the Bwase stream (Map 1: II,e) in the north to the escarpment in the south but became sub-divided among his sons, grandsons and other descendants. Similarly, Kagoro's spirit province to the east (Map 1: IV-VI;K—N) is hqld to have once extended from the Msengezi in the west to the Hoya river and then later became sub-divided. Where such sub-divisions are said to have occurred, the medium representing the ancestor of the original, now divided territory, is held to have some degree of control over the mediums and spirit provinces within it, irrespective of those mediums' formal ranking in the genealogically derived hierarchy. Nyahuma's medium in the past, for example, is said to have received tribute from Chitsungo's medium despite the fact that in the formal hierarchy the medium of Chihwahwa was his immediate superior. There is therefore, some tendency for the hierarchical affiliations of junior mediums to be cross-cut by their territorial affiliation.

One can therefore reconstrue Map I as a set of large ritual territories associated with remote ancestors such as Kagoro, Nyahuma, Nebedza and Nehanda who, significantly, have all been represented by mediums over long spans of time. These large ritual territories, therefore, appear to provide an enduring territorial and organizational basis for the cult and persist despite sub-division within them. The mediums allocated to them are above the level of adjustment and change which affects the positions of junior mediums and are thus crucial for the on-going organisation of the cult. Furthermore, such mediums have important additional duties within the cult and in relation to other cults. As I indicated earlier, perpetual kinship links the Mutota region to a number of others (see Genealogy 1). Mediums of one cult enter into relationship with mediums of other cults in terms of these perpetual relations. Nebedza's medium in addition to acting as head of the Mutota region during inter-regna also maintains relations with the Chikunda regional cult through his "son-in-law" the medium of Kanyemba, brother of the founder of the Chapoto dynasty. In the past Kagoro's medium maintained formal relations with the Dzivaguru cult region as a "son-in-law" of Dzivaguru's medium and all transactions with the cult were conducted through him. Similarly Nyahuina's medium maintained relations with the chthonic cult region of Musuma.

Mediums occupying these key positions in a cult are ranked immediately below the regional medium and, with the exception of Nyahuma, are presented as his 'children'. It is critical for the cult's organisation that the regional medium maintains regular contact with them and exercises control over them. He does this by the regular transmission of symbolic messages, by receiving tribute from them and by issuing directives through them to be transmitted to local populations either through sub-ordinate mediums where these exist or, in their absence, directly to the elders of the land sh*rine communities. Such directives may include matters ranging from those of purely ritual concern such as the conduct of land shrine rituals or the behaviour of subordinate mediums, to those which, whilst of ritual significance, may impinge directly on the economic life of communities, such as the enforcement of rest days (chisi), restrictions on the use of fish poisons and prohibitions affecting diet and modes of cultivation. In addition, should one of these senior mediums commit some misdemeanour, he may be summoned to appear before the regional medium to account for his behaviour and he may even be fined.

 Expansion and the Regional Medium

Since the twenties, there is no doubt that the influence of the cult of Mutota has increased considerably. Since that time, the subordination of the cult to that of Dzivaguru has ended, at least two ritual territories have been incorporated directly into Mutota’s region and its overall influence has been expanded and extended far beyond the domain of Korekore cults into the Zezuru cult of local spirits.

The region of Mutota, and indeed the cult to which it belongs, has been much influenced in its current form and extent by the most recent medium of Mutota, the late George Kupara. The three factors which have been most important for his influence are first, his personal qualities; second, the condition of linked cults and regions at his installation and during his period of office; and third, his connections with and recruitment from an inner circle of kin who are an elite in both local and territorial cults. I will consider each factor in turn. In 1963 when I lived with him, Kupara was about 65 and had been in office since his possession as a young man in 1919. He died in 1973. Physically, he had a striking appearance: he was tall, lean, with bright piercing eyes and an expressive face. Like other mediums, he dressed simply, but distinctively, in a black cloth worn, toga fashion, around his waist and drawn over his left shoulder. Around his neck he wore a thick, elaborate, plait of fine black beads and on his wrists, black bangles of horn. He had a sharp mind, an extensive knowledge of herbal remedies and a phenomenal ability to retain genealogical detail and the minutiae of diverse myths of origin. His obvious charismatic qualities were revealed particularly through the drama of the seance.

Seances were held in a spirit house (zumba; great house) situated in the bush about a hundred yards from the regional medium’s hamlet. Its only openings were two doors, one facing south which the medium used, the other facing north which the acolyte and supplicants used. Seances were conducted in total darkness beginning around midnight and continuing until dawn. After some preliminaries, supplicants were guided by the acolyte into the darkness of the spirit house and seated along its west wall facing the medium who lay stretched out on his stomach covered completely by a black cloth and a fur blanket. With no visual cues whatsoever, the drama of the seance depended entirely upon the medium's vocal control and oratorical skills. Kupara was a supreme master of mamhuko, a rythmical, free-verse, speech form used by mediums. He would be fierce and terrifying with the sceptical or recalcitrant; gentle, playful, grandfatherly, with the awed and the afraid.

About half the matters raised with the medium at seances concerned personal and familial misfortune. ^XA supplicant might enquire about his illness, or why he could not keep a job, or a woman might ask why she had not borne children. Generally, the regional medium would deal with such matters routinely without a great deal of discussion, quickly identifying a witch, an ancestor or some other spirit as the cause of the misfortune. He would dispense herbs to deal with symptoms, charms to protect against witchcraft and prescribe standard rituals to placate ancestors or exorcise afflicting spirits. Frequently, after hearing a supplicant's name, origin and praise names, Kupara was able to give a genealogy of the supplicant's ancestors, a feat which, if the supplicant was from a distant area, appeared particularly impressive.

Supplicants who came to consult the senior medium paid a small fee (chitekwe) to call the spirit and were expected to make further gifts of black cloth and money during the course of the seance according to their means and the nature of their problem. At the end of the seance, Kupara would apportion a small amount of money to himself, to his acolyte, and to any other officer of the cult in attendance. Any remaining money was regarded as belonging to the spirit and was given into the care of the acolyte. This money was used to buy grain to feed the many supplicants and their companions who came to Kupara's hamlet through the course of the year. Significantly, it is also used to make relatively substantial loans and gifts which seldom appear to be repaid even though a nominal interest may be charged. I recorded loans varying from £5 to £20. These appear to have been given to enhance the reputation of 'Mutota' for generosity and for not amassing wealth at the expense of ordinary people. Loans, however, do not create any kind of debt dependency and most appear to be quickly forgotten. What the senior medium retained as personal income was just enough to enable him not to work extensively in his gardens and to keep his family modestly clothed.[20] Over the year, taking into account receipts and payments, he more or less broke even. In this region, therefore, the principal officers do not acquire a great deal of personal wealth through the operation of the cult.

Whilst in seance the senior medium's performances were consistently impressive, he reserved his most spectacular displays for visiting mediums and candidates for mediumship. With visiting mediums, clad in a black and white costume, with fur headress and false beard, he would participate in a competitive dancing display in which he would scoff at their dancing abilities, to the amusement of onlookers. With candidates for mediumship, he was much more serious. Such candidates were expected to become possessed during the seance, to identify their possessing spirit and to give genealogical and biographical information about it to validate their mediumship. Kupara reacted particularly sharply if he considered a candidate to be making a false claim to mediumship. This happened when two candidates, referred to him by the medium of the Zezuru Nehanda, claimed to represent Chaminhuka. They failed to become properly possessed and he burst out angrily, "Do you want to be delighted by being told that you have a mhondoro? I am not like an ngozi (adept) who rubs and shakes people's heads to bring out the ngozi.[21] I really want a candidate to speak out everything I ask him. You come from very far away saying, 'We have spirits', but you do not speak. What am I to make of that?" He then directed criticism at Nehanda's medium, through her acolyte who was present, saying that he wanted to know why she had sent him 'eggs' (ie, 'speechless mediums').[22] Was she trying to test Mutota's ability to discover whht was in the 'eggs'? Conversely, when candidates for mediumships gave particularly striking performances (such as were given by the child medium Gutsa and the female medium of Chikare, cases which will be considered again later) the medium would continue for weeks afterwards to uphold them to other candidates as examples of how a person truly possessed by a mhondoro should behave.

I have dwelt on Kupara's behaviour in the context of the seance because it must be stressed that it is only in this context that a medium can establish his reputation, create relationships with supplicants and other mediums and so expand his vicinity and increase his influence. A medium who becomes old and fails to sustain his performance in seances rapidly loses his vicinity whilst a young medium, who succeeds to an established prestigious mediumship, may find that he has not the ability to sustain the vicinity of his predecessor (cf. Bourdillon 1972). The ritual authority associated with a medium's office and the prestige which may come from an expanded vicinity are conceptualized as not attaching to the medium but to his possessing spirit. Outside of the context of the seance a medium is, in a real sense, powerless. Kupara, himself, like many mediums I observed, was a lonely man. He had few close friends or local kin. Of course, the disruptive move from Gota had detached him from local support within his spirit province but, even there, whilst he appears to have had a strong connection with a local headman, Mushoshoma, who acted on occasions as a ritual assistant, Kupara did not have connections which could be construed as providing him with any kind of local secular power base. Indeed, a medium must appear to be detached and avoid an obviously close association with one faction or another otherwise he runs the risk of being accused of faking possession and giving partial decisions. Kupara's loneliness also stemmed from his ambiguous identity: was he to be treated as an ordinary mortal or as the ancestor, Mutota, personified? This uncertainty, which tended to pervade all his interactions with neighbours and locals, created a continuous tension. In addition, neighbours and locals would comment on the quality of his performances at seances and, in gossip — even occasionally to his face — would allege that he faked possession on certain occasions. It was difficult for Kupara to distance himself from those with whom he was in daily contact, and the tension in his relationship with locals was manifested in a formal joking relationship: he was addressed as aSekuru (Honoured Grandfather) which is a joking category. Visiting supplicants, by contrast, would address him very respectfully as aMvura (Lord Rain).

This tension also extended to Kupara's relations with his staff, the acolyte (mutape), the ritual assistant (dunzvi) and, to a lesser degree, with 'the wife of the spirit' (mukaranga) who, as a young girl has been offered into the service of the spirit, but who had later become his wife. In 1963, Kupara's acolyte was a man of about fifty. He was third in the present line of acolytes, established during the mediumship of Gavanga, Kupara's predecessor (see Genealogy 3). He had succeeded his father some twenty years previously. He was head of the hamlet in which the senior medium lived and was a popular man with a reputation for uprightness and fair dealing. He was responsible for the day-to-day management of the seances and local affairs of the cult. Significantly, he addressed Kupara, even when they were alone, as ’aMvura and never as ’aSekuru. The two did not spend a great deal of time together, and all formal business pertaining to the cult was only discussed at seances. Like other mediums, Kupara, unpossessed, would not discuss matters of the spirit, claiming to have no knowledge of what had occurred during seances. In the context of the seance, whilst acting in a supportive role to Kupara, the acolyte was very much subservient to him and addressed the ‘spirit’ humbly and respectfully. This was true also of the ritual assistant, a very old man, who performed ad hoc rituals for the spirit of Mutota, and of the ‘wife of the spirit’ who attended the medium when he first becomes possessed and assisted in the treatment of women with reproductive disorders. Kupara’s staff, therefore, were very much under his control. They did not exercise any influence over his behaviour during seances nor did they meet or collude with him before a seance. It would appear, therefore, that what the mediumship of Mutota became during Kupara’s lifetime stemmed very much from the personal initiatives which he took in response to issues arising in the context of the seances. Of course, in many matters, particularly those with secular consequences, his actions were constrained by a watchful public and by the opinions of other mediums. In the cult’s external relations and in the expansion of his own vicinity, he had more freedom of action since the consequences of his actions had no immediate local effect. But even here, whilst there were certain policies which it seems clear he wished to pursue — such as the attachment of a medium of Chaminhuka to the cult — the opinion of other mediums and the public acted as a constraint. However, I do not consider that one can determine any overall long-term strategy underlying the whole of Kupara’s actions. As revealed through the forty seances which I observed, Kupara’s behaviour can best be understood in terms of four separate but related objectives: to uphold mediumship as a general value in a situation in which it was being assailed by the colonial administration, by missionary activity and by separatist sects (cf. Ranger 1970: 220); to maintain and increase the prestige of Mutota as a spirit in comparison with the spirits of other chthonic and Korekore cults; to expand his vicinity and hence increase his own prestige as a medium; to protect himself from the scepticism of neighbours and locals. Thus, overall, his actions can be interpreted in terms of a series of tactics in which one or more of these objectives was paramount. I shall return to a discussion of these crucial issues later.

 The Decline of Chthonic Cults

Kupara came to office just before the chthonic Tavara cults of Dzivaguru and Karuva went into sharp decline. In 1922, after a ritual murder, the administration arrested and imprisoned all the officers of the Dzivaguru and Karuva cult. With the exception of the acolyte of Karuva and a junior medium of the Dzivaguru cult operating from Mozambique, they were never replaced (Bourdillon 1972a; 1972b). Whilst the sacred grove of Karuva at Nhenhene, near Choma (Map 2) is still tended and offerings are made there, this chthonic cult has never again attained the prominence which it clearly had at an earlier period when Korekore, through their mediums, would supplicate for rain.

At the end of nineteenth century, there appear to have been four cults of chthonic beings, mostly associated with the Tavara, of ritual significance to Korekore living in the Zambezi Valley and immediately adjacent areas of the plateau: those of Dzivaguru and his son Karuva, of Musuma and of Chimombe. Korekore in the region of Mutota tend to speak of them nowadays as if they were all part of one cult and, in myth, make Chimombe the guardian of Musuma who, in turn, is made a brother of Karuva (see Genealogy 1). They also replace Dzivaguru with Karuva and do not now distinguish their separate cults. Further east, near Choma, these connections are not made and all the chthonic cults are held to be quite distinct. It is difficult now to reconstruct how the cults operated in the past: there has been no medium of Dzivaguru for over fifty years whilst Musuma’s shrine has decayed and its ritual officers have died or dispersed. Chimombe’s cult virtually collapsed in the late fifties when its principal officers were among people moved by the colonial administration and resettled on the plateau.

From what can be gathered from early reports (see Bourdillon 1972b), legends, and accounts of elders, Korekore acknowledged the chthonic beings as “owners of the earth” and would supplicate them, through their mediums, for rain. Each cult, with the possible exception of that of Dzivaguru, had a centre, with a shrine, a medium and a staff. Wheiher each cult constituted a region with a bounded territory cannot now be established. Broadly, the region of the Chimombe cult appears to have extended west from the Angwa river, that of Musuma, east, from the Angwa to the Kadzi river, and that of Dzivaguru from the Kadzi eastwards, with intrusions to the north into Mozambique and south, well-beyond the Zambezi escarpment. Karuva's region appears to have extended to include the chiefdom of Choma, at which his famous shrine is located, and the neighbouring Tavara chiefdoms of Chiswiti and Gosa (now in Mozambique) as well as the immediately adjacent region, to the south, of the Korekore ancestor, Nyabapa. In myth, Nyabapa is said to have overcome Karuva by a trick. He then disappeared into a pool in the sacred grove at Nhenhene, from where he is held to control the rainfall and the fertility of the earth over the whole of his region. Periodically, when the virgin (Nechiswa) who tended Karuva's shrine at Nhenhene was held to have been defiled, her supposed defiler was burnt alive as a sacrifice to Karuva. It was such a sacrifice which caused the intervention of the colonial authorities in 1922. The Dzivaguru cult, to which the Karuva cult and all Korekore cults within its domain were, in some sense, subordinate, was clearly the most extensive and important of all the chthonic cults. However, at least in the late nineteenth century, it appears to have operated without a central shrine and headquarters. In the remote past, the medium of Dzivaguru was the "leading religious figure" at the court of the Mwene Mutapa(cf. Ranger 1963; 1970).

Outside of the region of the Mutota cult, the cults of Dzivaguru and Karuva have a continuing, if diminished significance. Both Bourdillon (1972b) and Gelfand (1962) have reported that despite the absence of mediums and a full staff of ritual officers, the chief of Choma, acting as acolyte, receives regular delegations, once or twice a year, from neighbouring and some more distant, easterly areas, who bring gifts of cloth to be offered to Karuva in the sacred grove. Whilst the officers of the Korekore cult of Nyabapa are ambivalent about the superordinate or subordinate status of the cults of Karuva and Dzivaguru (Bourdillon 1972b), the medium of Nyabapa still sends tribute to the sacred grove. This is quite unlike the position within the Mutota cult where all mediums and especially the regional medium, completely repudiate any notions of the cult's subordination to that of Dzivaguru and, pointedly, do not send tribute. They treat the Dzivaguru cult as an equivalent, autonomous, regional cult, denying the efficacy of Dzivaguru's power over rainfall and fertility within the boundaries of Mutota's region. This appears to have been the position since at least the thirties when, as far as I could establish, the last tribute was sent from Mutota's region, via Kagoro's medium, to Choma.

The evidence concerning the relations between the Dzivaguru cult and Korekore regional cults would appear to indicate that, with the exception of the Mutota cult, the ritual significance of the Dzivaguru cult has continued despite its very weak organizational significance. By contrast, the mediums of the Mutota cult, deny the ritual and organizational significance of any of the chthonic cults. I suggest that this may be related to the rise in influence of the Mutota cult in a wider field of ritual relations in which it became important that its autonomy and supremacy were fully manifested.

 Kupara's Recruitment

As for the third factor in Kupara's influence on the Mutota's cult, his connection to, and recruitment from an elite: his family and lineage had a long association with important mediumships in both the local and territorial cults. By descent he was not Korekore. He claimed to be a Zezuru descended from Shayachimwe, the founder of Hwata, a chiefdom supposedly once powerful and still of some influence. (See Genealogy 3, for this and the following relationships). His predecessor as medium, who died before Kupara was born, was his own grandfather, Gavanga. Another close kinsman was also crucial. The man who tended him during the years of his possession and who helped install him in office was his father's brother, Nhamuyebonde. Nhamuyebonde was himself a medium of an important Korekore ancestor (Chiurinyanga; Genealogy 2: I, 1) and because this close kinsman was involved with the succession to a number of Korekore chiefdoms at the time of Kupara's installation and later, it appears likely that Kupara was able to gain information and learn how to deal with the tangles of mediumship. Kin in the local cult of Zezuru were in some respects even more important for Kupara's part in regional expansion. The first medium of the Zezuru Nehanda to become attached to the Hwata dynasty was Chapo. She is said to have become the wife of Shayachimwe, the first Hwata. After her death, Charwe, a classificatory sister of Kupara's grandfather, succeeded to the Nehandaship. She was the famous medium who was hanged for her prominent role in the uprising of 1896 and its aftermath (Ranger, 1970, 10). Some time after her death, probably in 1906 (see Ranger, 1970: 10), a classificatory sister of Kupara, Matiirira became possessed by Nehanda. She died sometime in the fifties. Thus, at various times the descendants of the once powerful chief Hwata held important mediumships in both cults and for a considerable part of his life Kupara had a close relative, Matiirira, in control of the Zezuru mediumship of Nehanda at Mrewa. This provided Kupara with an established and fruitful link for referrals from the local cult: the medium of the Zezuru Nehanda at Mrewa continued to be responsible for referring local mediums of the Zezuru cult to Mutota's medium in order for them to be tested and for the most prominent of them to become formally attached to the territorial cult and Mutota's region. Such formal attachment is achieved through what amounts to a cross-cult translation of belief: i.e., the mediums' local spirits are transposed into Korekore ancestral spirits which are then accepted as children of Mutota.

To clarify this further in order to demonstrate how relationships are extended from one cult into the other, it is essential to consider the conceptual framework which Korekore themselves use to comprehend this situation. I refer to the genealogy of remote ancestors (Genealogy 2). Mutota's genealogy has a distinctive pattern which calls for explanation. It is shaped like a "T" rather than, say, the inverted "V" so common in lineages. The first generation of descendants is a great band, somehow largely without issue. Generally, Mutota is credited with some 16 to 20 children, almost all of whom are not said to have had descendants.[23] Indeed, usually only one is credited with his own line, but even this extends in the manner of a king list, for ten generations, before there is any significant segmentation. The identity of many in the list of Mutota's children is not surprising and only calls for brief comment. They are members of the Korekore pantheon of remote ancestors; their spirit provinces are in and around the Zambezi valley. As I indicated earlier, many of the ancestors at this genealogical level are credited with having had large spirit provinces which later were sub-divided. Some of the mediums representing them, I have argued, are significant in maintaining the enduring territorial and organizational basis of the cult and its external relations with other cults. Placed in the hierarchy at this level, these senior mediums are above the secular processes which affect the emergence of new mediums, the delineation of new spirit provinces and the segmentary processes which affect its lower levels. What does call for fuller comment, however, is that these Korekore ancestors are named in relationship with others quite unlike them. Two of these have spirit provinces but appear to have been added to the genealogy in recent times whilst others have no spirit provinces, and I infer from external evidence that they are part of the Zezuru cult and are local spirits.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-7.jpg][Genealogy 3: Succession to Mediumships]]

The two ancestors with spirit provinces who appear to have been added to the genealogy are Madzomba (Genealogy 2: Bl5) and Chiobvu (B,l). I consider only Madzomba's case since I have strong evidence on it and also because I consider it provides insight into the general cognitive model which is used to attach Zezuru local spirits to the Mutota cult. My evidence on Chiobvu's attachment is weaker but is similar in its essentials.

Madzomba's spirit province (Map 1: I,h) lies some 20 miles due north of the hamlet in which the medium of Mutota was living in 1963. I was told by the acolyte of Mutota's medium and others that they had all been aware of the medium of Madzomba for many years. Indeed, five previous mediums are recalled and the mediumship appears to have been regularly occupied and long-established. In the past, the mediumship was firmly associated with the Tavara ancestral cult of Bamwomwe and Madzomba was held to have been his 'sister's son' (muzukuru). In 1957 or 1958, shortly after the death of Bamwomwe's medium, the medium of Madzomba suddenly appeared and asked to consult Mutota. At a seance he is said to have elaborated a myth in which Madzomba's mother, supposedly a wife of Mutota, had been driven away by Mutota's son, Nebedza, after having failed a withcraft ordeal (muteyo). Eventually, she was taken as a slave by Chief Dotito in the northeast. Later she and Madzomba escaped and sought sanctuary with Bamwomwe. Madzomba's medium concluded by offering himself as a "long-lost son" of Mutota. This account was accepted by the regional medium and by other senior mediums. Madzomba's name is now regularly included by all of them in their recitations of Mutota's genealogy and Madzomba's medium is firmly established within the region of the Mutota cult. As we shall observe, this device of establishing in myth that a spirit is a long-lost child of Mutota appears to be one which is cognitively acceptable and one which is used to attach Zezuru local spirits to the cult of Mutota. It is delightfully simple and yet it is reversible. A slight alteration to the story, making the woman pregnant after she leaves or runs away, makes the child illegitimate without any necessity to deny the whole myth. I have not heard this reversal used in the context of denying the claims of mediums, but it is frequently used to exclude descent groups from participating in the succession to a chiefship.

Examples of those cited as children of Mutota who are clearly identifiable as local spirits of Zezuru cults are Goronga, a well known local spirit (see Ranger 1967: 211) associated with the Lomagundi District, Nyamuswa (Gelfand 1959: 18); Chifwanya, who features early in the Korekore origin myth as leaving Mutota at the escarpment and returning to Mrewa; Chikare, whose case I consider later, and probably, Beperere. Somewhat in a conceptual category by herself is Nehanda, as befits the spirit of a medium with perhaps the most important role in cross-cult relations. She is what might be called a “transcult spirit” in that she is now both a local and a territorial spirit, rather than merely a local spirit assimilated through kinship into the genealogy of remote ancestors. Thus she has mediums both as the renowned local spirit among the Zezuru and as a daughter of Mutota and ‘mother’ of all Korekore. Korekore accept the existence of two mediums of Nehanda: the one operating in the Mrewa area, the other operating in the Zambezi Valley and temporarily living in the spirit province of her ‘brother’, as I have noted. Nevertheless, Korekore argue that there is only one Nehanda and that her spirit possesses mediums, at different times, in two places. In fact, in the sixties, three mediums of the Zezuru Nehanda were operating, one at Mrewa, one in the Mhondoro Tribal Trust Land and the other at Rwizi. As we shall observe, considerable rivalry existed between the mediums from Mrewa and Mhondoro. Already, in the late nineteenth century both a Korekore and a Zezuru medium were operating. This indicates the continuing importance not merely of the transcult spirit and her medium but even more of the extension of relationships across the cults.

 The Linking of Local and Territorial Cults

Now we can appreciate more of the significance of the pattern of Mutota’s genealogy with its inclusion of unlike spirits together in relationships with the apical ancestor. I shall comment on the features that are most illuminating for my discussion of the linking of cults. These features allow for expansion along with the inclusion of non-hierarchical and hierarchical relations, in accord with the situation which the genealogy comprehends. Having numerous ‘children’ without issue (ie, the top of the ‘T’ and upper part of the genealogy) allows the assimilation of local spirits, and thus the incorporation of their riiediums to occur in an ambiguous way that fits their lack of hierarchy. So long as the birth order is not specified and the total number of children unknown or not fixed, more and more relationships can be extended to local mediums without them having to constitute a hierarchy among themselves. Another feature is the long line prior to segmentation in the genealogy. The long line provides a fixed set of reference points, which a candidate medium can cite for legitimacy. Moreover, the rest of the genealogy with its segmentation defines the hierarchical relations.

As I shall document through case material later, the senior medium plays a key role in the revision of the genealogy which is necessary for the formal attachment of additional mediums. I would stress here that a senior medium such as Mutota’s cannot simply alter the genealogy at his whim. There are a number of prominent mediums well versed in the ‘orthodox’ Korekore genealogy. Nevertheless, there is uncertainty among all of them as to exactly how many children Mutota was supposed to have had and what their birth order was and so forth. Adding a child or two, particularly when they have no descent line associated with them is not difficult but, and it is an important qualification, such amendments to be meaningful must receive wider acceptance and more validation. More complex revisions of the genealogy, which imply further relationships and perhaps special standing for some mediums, may be more difficult and less readily validated. To illustrate briefly from the case I discuss more fully later, Mutota’s senior medium acknowledged the claim of a visitor, a medium of the local spirit Chikare, that her spirit was the daughter of Mutota. The new relationship was established and the genealogy amended at a seance in my presence. Within a few months other prominent mediums in the Zambezi valley began to recount the tale of how Motota had found his long lost daughter, Chikare. The truth of her medium’s claim was accepted. However, the senior medium tried to elaborate the relationship and make a more complex amendment of the genealogy, unsuccessfully. He was fond of adding the name of that other prominent local spirit Chaminhuka to the genealogy as a son of Mutota. He went further and, at a public seance after the visit of the medium of Chikare, made her out to be a uterine sister of Chaminhuka; both were said to be children of one mother, Marumbi, a further genealogical amendment. This was not accepted by other mediums. Their unwillingness to accept Chaminhuka as a son of Mutota may well have stemmed from the fact that the Zezuru myths concerning Chaminhuka's miraculous powers, his adventures and encounters with the Ndebele, were widely known not only by them but by ordinary Korekore. Indeed, they are often told, along with others of Korekore heroes, as "bed-time" stories to children. Korekore conceptualize Chaminhuka as a creator being, equivalent in power to Mutota. It would have taken a particularly convincing medium of Chaminhuka to have altered this well-established view. Whilst two candidates for the mediumship were referred to Mutota's medium by the Zezuru Nehanda in 1964, both gave abysmal performances in seance. One, as I noted earlier, failed to speak; the other, although he attempted to speak, was confused and ill at ease. He was advised by Mutota's medium that an alien spirit was intervening to prevent his full possession by Chaminhuka's spirit and he was told to return to Nehanda's medium for treatment and instruction. The senior medium once again expressed his anger at Nehanda's medium for sending him someone whom she had not tested adequately herself. Significantly, however, the candidate, who came from a village, Mushake, in which I lived in 1958, told me that he was convinced that he was possessed by Chaminhuka but that the alien spirit and Mutota's anger at Nehanda had prevented him from becoming properly possessed. He then said, "Truly, Chaminhuka is the son of Mutota, as Mutota says. I believe that he is because when I was sent here, Nehanda told me that I was to go to my father to be tested". This statement strongly suggests that not only had Nehanda's medium a similar interest to Mutota's medium in wanting to incorporate Chaminhuka directly into the Mutota cult but also that she was suggesting the idiom in which candidates for certain important mediumships should present themselves when they were tested. This further suggests, that Nehanda's medium had some special knowledge of Korekore mythology and of the Mutota cult and the case of the Chikare medium adds weight to this. It is possible that she acquired some of this knowledge from her husband who is Korekore, a descendant of Chuzu (Genealogy 2: Ml), and who also acts as her acolyte. I should stress that she and Mutota's medium had only met once, in 1962, when she presented herself for testing by him and was accepted as a genuine successor to the former medium, his classificatory sister, Matiirira.

Of the fourteen mediums who came to be tested by Mutota's medium during the seven months from October 1963 when I lived with him, all save one came from the Zezuru cult of local spirits.[24] Ten of them were referred to Mutota's medium by the medium of Nehanda. Most were sent simply to establish that they were genuinely possessed: neither they nor Mutota's medium made any attempt to translate their spirits into Korekore ancestors. Only in the case of prestigious mediumships such as those of Chikare and Chaminhuka was this attempted. But it is more than the prestige of the mediumship which is significant: all the Zezuru spirits accepted as children of Mutota are those whose influence is held to span a number of local groups and none are ancestral spirits with specific genealogical connection with the living. In the Zezuru cult of local spirits, mediurris possessed by spirits of this order, are those who validate the possession of lesser mediums and thus have a significant coordinating and organizational role. Thus, they are in some respects the equivalents of such senior mediums in the Korekore territorial cult as those who represent Nebedza, Kagoro, Nehanda and Nyahuma. Hence, the appropriateness of inserting the spirits they represent into the higher levels of the Mutota genealogy.

The connection between the territorial cult of Mutota and the Zezuru cult of local spirits has existed at least since the mediumship of Mutota was held by Gavanga, Kupara's grandfather, at the end of the nineteenth century. This connection, was expanded and developed under the mediumship of Kupara, first through his classificatory sister, Matiirira, and then through her succesor to the Nehandaship. Nevertheless, there seems to have been a break in referrals to the Mutota cult of perhaps ten years after Matiirjra's death inthe fifties before her successor made a successful bid to re-establish the link in 1962. Why this should have occurred I cannot fully determine. I never met any of the Zezuru mediums of Nehanda: they all lived and operated over a hundred miles from my field area. However, from my own knowledge of the Mrewa area in 1958, from Fry's (1976) study in an adjacent area and from Chavanduka's (1970) study of a Zezuru succession dispute, certain matter are clear. In the late fifties, the Mrewa and Mhondoro mediums of Nehanda came into competition over the succession of the Zezuru chiefship of Hwata. Briefly, two factions became involved in a lengthy succession dispute after the death of Chief Hwata XI in 1952, one supporting his son, the Acting Chief Henry, the other supporting another candidate, Samuel. The medium of the ancestor Gutsa, responsible for nominating a new chief was dead. Henry and his faction eventually brought forward a man whom they claimed was possessed by Gutsa. After divination had confirmed this, the medium nominated Henry as chief and the administration duly installed him as Chief Hwata XII. Meanwhile, Samuel and his faction went to inform the Mrewa medium of Nehanda that they were convinced that the Gutsa medium supporting Henry was false and that they had a youth who seemed to be possessed by Gutsa's spirit. The Mrewa medium ordered all the parties to the dispute to assemble at the burial place of Hwata chiefs, at Mazoe, where she would establish which of the two mediums of Gutsa was genuine. Henry and his faction, alarmed, went off to consult the Mhondoro medium of Nehanda. She assured them that their medium of Gutsa was genuinely possessed and that Henry was rightfully chief. After this the two factions became bitterly opposed and eventually Henry, Chief Hwata XII, led his own following away from the Chiweshe Tribal Trust Land to settle in the Zambezi Valley in an area recently offered to him by the administration. I consider it extremely significant, in the light of this succession dispute and the rivalry between the Nehanda mediums, that within a year of the failure of the faction she supported to get the decision to appoint Henry as chief, reversed, the Mrewa medium of Nehanda should have presented herself for testing and acceptance by Mutota's medium. In October, 1963, she then sent the child medium of Gutsa to have his possession validated by the senior medium.

The Mrewa medium's rival at Mhondoro was a famous medium, extremely well-connected through her marriage to Chief Mashayamombe whose dynasty has long been associated with anti-colonial risings and political movements (see Ranger 1966). I suggest that the Mrewa Nehanda's moves to re-activate the "dormant" link with the Mutota cult and also to refer to the senior medium candidates for key mediumships such as those of Chaminhuka and Chikare, were tactics in the competition with her formidable rival whose position, possibly, was so well established that she did not consider it necessary to seek any external connection or validation.

It is also clear, that through the late fifties and early sixties, there was a general recrudescence of the cult of local spirits among the Zezuru. I observed it partially in 1958 in the Mrewa District, and Fry (1976) has considered it at length. He has argued that the recrudescence was associated with a general cultural and political movement away from institutions associated with colonialism in a situation in which overt political action was severely restricted. Many new mediums appeared during this time, some claiming to represent spirits long forgotten or which had not 'spoken' for many years. There were many cases also in which there were multiple claims to the same mediumship. As a consequence of this flood of new mediums, 'it seems highly likely that mediums occupying the key mediumships, which had on the whole endured, had begun to sort out rival claims and to impose some order, albeit only partial, on an extremely fluid situation. Without some order, their own positions would become uncertain and threatened. One way of doing this, I suggest, was to turn to the Mutota cult which, with its high prestige and hierarchical order, could fix the positions of at least some of the key Zezuru mediumships in relation to each other and then validate the claims of lesser mediums referred by their incumbents.

To substantiate this argument and develop it further, I now consider the case of a woman, aged about 40 who came from Nyamweda in the Hartley District (about 130 miles to the south). She claimed to be possessed by the spirit of Chikare and to have been operating as a medium for some years. She said that she had been sent by the medium of the Zezuru Nehanda from Mrewa. Chikare is a famous local spirit in the Zezuru cult and, in 1896, her then medium, together with the medium of Goronga, was prominent in the uprising (Ranger 1967: 211; Gelfand 1959: 17).

The medium of Chikare arrived in February 1964 with a retinue of 17 people including drummers, mbira players and ritual officers. At a public seance held at the small dancing arena outside the spirit house the senior medium of Mutota asked the women, now possessed, who she was. “I am your daughter, Chikare”, she replied. “I was lost for many years but now I have found you. I come to greet you, father.” This response clearly staggered the senior medium. He became silent for a while, growled, then hummed a Korekore war song, he took snuff, gargled with water,[25] sang another song, then broke into mamhuko which occupied him for another half-hour: all devices which I had noted that he used when he wished to delay making a response. He then said abruptly, “I have only one daughter, Nehanda”. Chikare’s medium replied, “I am your daughter, Chikare. I am the elder sister of Nehanda. I was born after Nyajore. My elder brothers were Chiobvu, Sundo ...” And here she began to recite part of Mutota’s genealogy. She ended, “I was lost in the war. I was reared in another place. My younger sister Nehanda found me and she has sent me to greet you. I greet you, father”. Again, the senior medium hestitated. Suddenly, he said, “Yes! Yes! You are my daughter! Truly, you are my daughter! He then went on to describe how Korekore had fought many wars and how during the fighting some of his wives and children had been captured or fled. In fact, what emerged was a very similar story to the one which Madzomba’s medium was said to have presented when he was tested and formally incorporated into the Mutota cult. Thus, Chikare’s medium was accepted. Some months after she had departed a steady stream of supplicants and candidates for mediumship began to come from the Hartley District where she lived, directed by her to Mutota’s medium.

The evidence of this seance and the external evidence relating to the names given in the genealogy of Mutota demonstrate how certain spirits of the Zezuru cult become added to the Korekore pantheon of remote ancestors and how their mediums become formally incorporated into the cult of Mutota. Chikare’s mediumship was long established, of high prestige and was associated with a set of lesser mediumships I have indicated that all the mediumships incorporated into the Mutota cult were of this type. I have suggested that in periods of flux or when there is competition among rival claimants to a key mediumship, one of the ways in which some order may be imposed, albeit partial, within the Zezuru cult, is by reference to the Mutota cult.

 Conclusion

In general terms, two processes appear to have been occurring in the cult of Zezuru local spirits in relation to the Mutota cult: one in which mediums were simply seeking external validation and the other in which certain key mediumships were fully incorporated into the Mutota cult. The first process can be related to the tendency within the Zezuru cult for a number to appear all claiming to be possessed by the same spirit. In part, as the Hwata succession dispute illustrates, this tendency can be related to secular processes occurring within chiefdoms. Factions seek validation for their actions from an ancestral spirit through a medium: each faction has, or produces, its own medium. This in turn necessitates factions seeking further validation for such mediums from other, more prestigious mediums. Here again, however, the same pattern appears to be repeated. Each faction seeks out from a number claiming to be possessed by the same spirit, one who will validate its own medium. In such situations, therefore, it seems that further validation is sought completely external to the Zezuru cult. No doubt, this tendency was exacerbated during the recrudescence of the Zezuru cult.

The second process, however, is much more complex for it is not simply a matter of the external validation of a medium but involves his or her actual incorporation into the Mutota cult. The Mutota cult, with its high prestige and hierarchical order, validates and fixes at least some of the key Zezuru mediumships in relation to one another. But, for the Mutota cult, the actual incorporation of such mediumships within it is an aspect of its expansion into the domain of the Zezuru cult. The medium of Nehanda, in referring Chikare's medium for testing and incorporation was, in part, using the Mutota cult in her competition with her rival. She appeared to be attempting to establish a set of senior mediums, with their subordinates, all acknowledging her as the one, true medium of the Zezuru Nehanda. But validation and incorporation are not simply cognitive phenomena, they have far reaching organizational implications. The act of incorporation brings mediums of both cults into one ritual field. Within this field, through the network of relationships among mediums, people, tribute and communications flow.

The ritual field has cognitive and organizational aspects or sub-fields: the first is relatively stable through time, the second, inherently unstable. Cognitively, the Zezuru and Korekore cults become partially interlocked by the translation of one set of spirits into the other: Zezuru local spirits become Korekore ancestors. Once this has been accomplished and buttressed by supporting myths, the cognitive field, as the prime example of the translation of the Nehanda spirit illustrates, appears to be stable and relatively enduring. It provides a model and an idiom which certain Zezuru mediums can use, from time to time, to attach themselves to the Mutota cult. But it must be clearly understood that the fact that a Zezuru spirit is translated into a Korekore ancestor does not mean that one Zezuru mediumship is permanently incorporated into the Korekore cult even if the Korekore mediums and particularly the senior medium of Mutota conceptualize it thus. Mediumship among Zezuru is radically different from mediumship among Korekore. Organizationally, there is no one fixed set of offices in the Zezuru cult arranged in an enduring hierarchy. There may be several mediums, each with considerable local support, claiming to represent the same spirit. The fact that one of these is recognized and incorporated into the Mutota cult does not permanently resolve the question of who is genuine and who is not. What it does do, I suggest, is to bring certain mediums into a common organizational frame, for limited spans of time. Nevertheless, much of significance within the Zezuru cult continues to occur outside of this frame.

Inherently, in its organizational aspect, the ritual field is unstable. This instability arises within the Zezuru cult because of the charismatic nature of mediumship, the related phenomenon of multiple possession and the resulting lack of a clearly defined organisational hierarchy. There is always a striving for coherence and stability within this field by certain mediums who attempt to bring other mediumships under their control but this very striving, since it involves competition and the denial of the claims of others, produces further instability. Incorporation within the Korekore territorial cult cannot permanently fix the relations of Zezuru mediums to one another. It can only impose a temporary, fragile, stability. This is because the mediumships incorporated into the Korekore cult are not offices in the strict sense with a single incumbent and regular succession: they depend greatly on the charismatic qualities of particular mediums and the extent to which they can expand their vicinities. By contrast, mediumship is an office within the Mutota cult with rules regulating its incumbency. Nevertheless, here, too, there is a charismatic element and I have stressed how the cult's expansion depended upon the personal qualities of its senior medium, George Kupara.

I have examined the ritual field created by the interpenetration of the two cults largely from the perspective of Kupara. It is clear that under his leadership, the Mutota cult has grown to prominence since the twenties and now greatly overshadows the formerly powerful chthonic Tavara cults and other neighbouring Korekore cults. Uniquely placed, through family connection and having personal qualities which enhanced his formal role, Kupara maintained and expanded the connection between the Korekore and Zezuru cults. Nevertheless, it would be an error to view the ritual field formed by the interpenetration of the two cults as extensively controllable or manipulable by him. He was but one of a number of foci of ritual authority. The interpenetration of the two cults cannot be understood in terms of a grand strategy formulated by him or by Zezuru mediums, either acting separately, or in collusion. Only within limited local arenas is it meaningful to speak of strategy. I have touched on the Zezuru Nehanda's rivalry with the Mhondoro Nehanda in relation to the Hwata succession and suggested that her desire to have herself accepted by the Mutota cult, together with other rqediums supporting her, was an aspect of this. Similarly, the senior medium of Mutota can be shown to have acted strategically in relation to the chthonic cults, certain Korekore succession disputes (see Garbett, 1966) and in his relations with other Korekore mediums. The appearance of strategy, when the total ritual field is viewed over time, arises not from the manipulations of particular mediums, coordinated in terms of some overall plan — the key actors rarely if ever meet and do not collude — but from the emergent properties of the ritual field itself. These arise from the dialectical relationship existing between the two cults. The order and relative stability of the region of the Mutota cult attracts Zezuru mediums as offering some solution to the indeterminancy of their positions within the Zezuru cult, this in turn leads to an increase in the prestige of both the Mutota cult and its leader. Thereby, its leader is able to establish the ascendancy of the cult, expand his own vicinity, and increase his ritual authority over his subordinates within the cult which further increases the cult's order and stability. However, the order which attachment to the Mutota cult imposes on Zezuru mediums is only partial and transient. Of itself, it creates further instability, basically because order and hierarchy are fundamentally incompatible with the charismatic, non-hierarchical nature of Zezuru mediumship. Finally, the charismatic element in Korekore mediumship itself suggests that with the death of the senior medium of Mutota and the collapse of his vast vicinity, many of the organizational linkages between the Zezuru and Korekore cults will be ruptured. Only at the cognitive level will the links endure, carried forward and elaborated in myth, to form the basis for the dialectical generation of new patterns of organizational inter-connections between the two cults during the next incumbency.

 References

<biblio>

Abraham, D. P.

1959 The Monomatapa Dynasty, NADA 8:59–84

1964 Ethno-history of the Empire of Mutapa. Problems and Methods. In The Historian in Tropical Africa. J. Vansina, R. Mauny and L. V. Thomas, Eds. London: Oxford University Press for International African Institute, pp. 104–126.

1966 The Roles of Chaminhuka and the Mhondoro Cult in Shona Political History. In The Zambezian Past. E. Stokes and R. Brown, Eds. Manchester: Manchester University Press, pp. 28–46.

Beach, D. N.

1972 Historians and the Shona Empires. Henderson Seminar Papers 19 and 20. Salisbury: University of Rhodesia. Manuscript.

Bourdillon, M. F. C.

1972a The Manipulation of Myth in a Tavara Chiefdom. Africa. 42: 112–121.

1972b The Cults of Dzivaguru and Karuva amongst the North-Eastern Shona Peoples. Salisbury: University of Rhodesia. Manuscript.

Campbell, A. C.

1957 Chimombe. NADA 34:31–37.

Chavanduka, G. L.

1970 The Political Role of Spirit Mediums in Chiefly Succession Disputes among the Shona of Rhodesia. A Case Study. Research Paper 126. Salisbury: University of Rhodesia. Manuscript.

Fry, Peter

1976 Spirits of Protest: Spirit-Mediums and the Articulation of Consensus amongst the Zezuru of Southern Rhodesia (Zimbabwe). Cambridge Studies in Social Anthropology 14. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Garbett, G. K.

1966 Religious Aspects of Political Succession among the Valley Korekore. In The Zambezian Past. E. Stokes and R. Brown, Eds. Manchester: Manchester University Press, pp. 137–170.

1969 Spirit Mediums as Mediators in Korekore Society. In Spirit Mediumship in Africa. J. Beattie and J. Middleton, Eds. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, pp. 104–127.

Gelfand, M.

1959 Shona Ritual. Cape Town: Juta.

1962 Shona Religion. Cape Town: Juta.

Nicolle, W. H. H.

1937 A Few Notes on Baka Chimombe. NADA 14:26–33.

Ranger, T. O.

1963 The Last Days of the Empire of Mwene Mutapa. In Conference of the History of the Central African Peoples. Lusaka: Rhodes-Livingstone Institute.

1966 The Role of Ndebele and Shona Religious Authorities in? the Rebellions of 1896 and 1897. In The Zambezian Past. E. Stokes and R. Brown, Eds. Manchester: Manchester University Press, pp. 94–136.

1967 Revolt in Southern Rhodesia, 1896–7. London: Heinemann.

1970 The African Voice in Southern Rhodesia. London: Heinemann.

Stokes, E. and Brown R. (Eds.)

1966 The Zambezian Fast. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

</biblio>

© Kingsley Garbett 1977

 4. Bush Negro Regional Cults: A Materialist Explanation[26]

by Bonno Thoden van Velzen

 Introduction: Radical Economic Change and Cults

In the 188O’s, a centralised, hierarchical cult appealing to a High God— Gaan Tata[27] arose among a group of Bush Negroes in Surinam’s interior. Around 1890, the cult spread rapidly throughout the six Bush Negro tribes and across most of their numerous rivers, and became the established cult of the whole region. Covering great distances, the Bush Negroes made their pilgrimages to the cult’s central shrines on the Tapanahoni River, in the south east of the country (Spalburg 1896–1900). A subsidiary shrine established by Gaan Tata’s priests at Santigron, only fifteen kilometres from Surinam’s capital Paramaribo, was visited by an impressive number of Creoles from the coast (De Ziel 1973: 40). Thus for a period the cult's clientele came from various ethnic groups, with widely different backgrounds. Then the cult declined. In some valleys of its former region it ceased to have any adherents at all. Elsewhere it became fractionized and fell apart into a number of local congregations. While the central oracle's priests continued to wield considerable power in Gaan Tata's heartland on the Tapanahoni, their authority over other Bush Negro areas was only nominal. First and foremost, it had been a regional cult of entrepreneurs, of successful boat owners who controlled river traffic when gold was discovered in the interior of Surinam and French Guiana. They brought fortunes back home, until the transport market went from boom to bust with the collapse of the gold and balata industries in the 1920's. The flow of tribute towards the cult's central shrines became a trickle, the regional authority of the Gaan Tata priests had vanished. On the Tapanahoni, a parochial Gaan Tata cult continued to dominate religious and political life until 1972. Then a new prophetic movement swept this parochial cult away.

This paper will explain the rise and fall of the Gaan Tata cult. The explanation suggests that the emergence of the cult and its later decline is a dependent variable of radical economic change. The alteration of a mode of production is responsible for the birth of the Gaan Tata cult and its first flourishing decades; later reduction in income and resources without any great changes in the mode of production caused the fractonization of the cult. In the 1960's, a new pattern of resource distribution within a new political context invited reactions from a new type of religious leadership. Intervening variables, such as the expenditure of resources within the cult on death rites and the destruction of the property of witches, influenced the cult's career also, as riches and regional surplus turned into scarcity and poverty. But these variables are secondary. What is primary is the economic change, coming from outside the cult region, which introduced and later destroyed its basis. With the economic impoverishment of the region, Gaan Tata as a regional cult ceased to be viable. Prophets with aspirations for regional leadership had to await the introduction of new resources into the area; they came at the end of the 1960's. A new cult is now attempting to establish itself on a regional basis.

As for the Bush Negroes or Maroons themselves, they are descendents of slaves, brought to Surinam from West Africa. Their ancestors, escaped from the plantations, fought a successful guerilla war against the Dutch planters and their mercenaries, and managed to establish semi-independent tribes in the interior. The most populous of the six Bush Negro tribes are the Djuka (about 4,000 in 1900 and 15,000 in 1970). They have their villages both in the interior, to the south, along the Tapanahoni, Maroni and Lawa rivers, and in the coastal plain, to the north east, along the Cottica, Commewijne and lower Saramacca rivers (see Map 1). The other groups, in rough order of size from the next largest, are located as follows:

1. the Saramaka in the centre of the country, along the Suriname River and its tributaries;

1. the Matawai, a much smaller group, to the west along the upper reaches of the Saramacca River;

1. the Aluku or Boni to the east on the banks of the Lawa River;

1. the Paramaka, also in the east, along the Maroni River; and

1. the Kwinti, an offshoot of the Matawai, to the far west along the Tibiti and Coppename rivers.

In 1970, there were approximately 40,000 Bush Negroes in Surinam.

 Heydays

It was in the second half of the nineteenth century that the hinterland of the Guianas became a focus of international economic interest with the discovery of gold. Although deposits were scattered widely over Surinam and French Guiana, they were mainly to be found in the interior which is covered by the dense South American rain forest. So transport for the gold-diggers had to follow the rivers flowing to the Atlantic from the mountaineous region on the border with Brazil. This form of traffic posed serious problems: about 40 to 70 kilometres from the ocean all rivers are blocked by natural barriers of rapids and falls: and worse still, these obstacles repeat themselves every 5 or 10 kilometres. On each trip, a boat crew had to look for a path through the rapids which was different from the one taken in preceding months: water levels were different from one month to the next as a result of variations in rainfall. There was only one group that could unlock the interior for the thousands of gold-diggers that came from all places of the earth in search of El Dorado: the Bush Negroes. They had the means of conveyance adapted to these shallow and treacherous waters: the dug-out canoe. Only they knew where to go in the continuously shifting meanders of rapids, and they had the nerve and the skill to do so. Their only competitors were the Amerindians, but their numbers were too small to influence conditions on the transport market. Quickly, the Bush Negroes gained a monopoly over river transport. They used it to exact high wages and high freight prices. The best way to bring out their strong economic position is to compare it with that of the elite among the Creole workers in Paramaribo, the capital. Creoles under contract with gold companies or balata bleeders considered themselves fortunate if they earned two florins (approximately $0.80) a day, well above what other labourers in Paramaribo could hope to get. Around 1900, it was impossible to employ a Bush Negro for such wages; employers were tucky if they could hire him for double that amount. The income of the Bush Negro boat owner was truly astonishing, in contemporary terms. Between 1880 and 1920, the average income of these entrepreneurs seldom fell below 2,500 florins ($1000) per annum, and for many years was well above 3,000 florins ($1200) (De Beet and Thoden van Velzen 1977).

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-8.jpg][Map 1: Gaan Tata Cult and Christian Mission Posts (c.1900), Surinam]]

An appreciation of the fortunes these entrepreneurs earned is one important step in the argument. But to understand the rise of the Gaan Tata movement, it is even more important to consider the radical changes that had taken place in the mode of production. Formerly, before 1880, Bush Negroes were predominantly lumber workers. In large numbers, they had left their villages on the Tapanahoni to settle in permanent villages or temporary bush camps along the banks of the Commewijne, Cottica and Courmotibo rivers. They either had fixed places of residence, or stayed long enough at one place, to be accompanied by their wives and children. Often, a number of matrilineal relatives made the move of residence to the Cottica region together. The lumber workers clung together because they regularly needed help for hauling tree trunks to the river banks. This was an ideal economic underpinning for the ideology of the corporate matrilineal group with its stress on mutual sharing and responsibility; it also meant a boost for the distributive mechanisms for the levelling of income differences which had been part of Bush Negro culture for more than 200 years.

River transport altered the organization of work considerably. Between Albina and St. Laurent at the mouth of the Maroni River on the one hand, and the main gold fields of the Lawa on the other, lie 270 kilometres of river; to the rich gold fields of the Inini the distance was even greater: 350 kilometres. A Bush Negro who set out to work as a river carrier did not need the help of many relatives: the services of one or two sons or sister's sons would be quite enough. He could also team up with one adult kinsman or a friend and the boat crew would be completed. He did not any longer depend on the assistance of his matrilineal kin; quite the contrary, they had become a liability. Thus, the entrepreneurs could amass small fortunes, while there was hunger and deprivation in many villages of the Tapanahoni River.

The Gaan Tata cult was sparked off almost simultaneously with the first gold rush in the Lawa-Maroni basin (1885–1888). As we have seen, the thousands of gold-diggers that came from all over the world, were willing to pay incredibly high prices for transport to the Dorado.[28] Elders, who were no longer strong enough to carry heavy equipment through the rapids, and some spirit mediums, could siphon off some of this new wealth through the Gaan Tata oracles (Morssink 1934). As part of Gaan Tata's commandments, the entrepreneurs were given a set of standards that proved their usefulness in contacts between Bush Negroes from various areas and with different cultural backgrounds; the cult, for example, gave religious sanction to peacefulness: even the shedding of a single drop of blood could arouse Gaan Tata's wrath. The priests also guaranteed the moral stature of its believers by subjecting them to an ordeal. Thus, the residents of villages and bush camps along the 'traffic lanes' could invite the boatsmen to spend the night with them without any risk. But larger than the threat from the external enemy, loomed that from within the once close-knit kin group, the matrilineage. Gaan Tata priests assured the entrepreneurs that their God would take care of any envious relative who had turned his eyes on them. Significantly, any boatsman who established a good relation with the Gaan Tata oracles through timely presents and acts of deference—soliciting help in case of illness—could rest assured that his reputation would be protected. Any accusation of witchcraft or other malevolent acts directed at these ‘friends of the oracle’ would be declared null and void at these centres of communication, the only ones in the Bush Negro society.

Other clues for our understanding of the Gaan Tata cult come from looking at the wider political scene of which these Bush Negro communities formed part. The land to the southeast between the Lawa and Tapanahoni rivers had been contested by France and The Netherlands, until it was allocated by arbitration to the Dutch in 1891. Yet relationships between the two colonial administrations were to remain uneasy for a long time, both after all shared the Maroni-Lawa basin, rich with gold. The Dutch considered it vital that there be cooperation between them and the Djuka in particular, for control of areas where colonial officials seldom penetrated. Harmonious relations were dented somewhat by too obvious Djuka sabotage of mission schools and by their resistance to Dutch exploration of the borderland with Brazil in 1904 and 1907 (Franssen Herderschee 1905; De Goeje 1908). But before the great strike of the Bush Negro boatmen in 1921, the overall picture remained one of calculated but usually satisfactory partnership.[29] Founders and early leaders of the Gaan Tata cult, such as the Djuka tribal chief Oseisie, and to a lesser extent also Agumasakka, felt entitled to remuneration and sought, first of all, to secure favours from the colonial administration: they were taking care of Dutch interests in the interior. Indeed, on several occasions, cult leaders and headmen of the Djuka Bush Negroes had cooperated with the Dutch in attempts to curb the price rises of the freight carriers, which the gold companies considered excessive. Moreover, against the missions, the Gaan Tata priests were usually on the defensive, preferring a modus vivendi to open war.[30] Thus an external enemy, the colonial administration or the missions, was not the prime target of the cult. The cult was directed at eradicating an internal evil, witchcraft, that was felt to dog the steps of the nouveaux riches. Society should be purged of its hidden enemies, the witches or ‘traitors within the gates’ (Mayer 1970: 60). This was the matrix of economic and political conditions in which the Gaan Tata cult arose. We shall later see how deeply the theology and basic ethics of the cult were influenced by these conditions. But first we will present a brief account of the spread of the cult and its centralization.

 The spread of a regional cult and its centralization

The new cult orginated around 1885 to the southeast in the interior among the Djuka in the valley of the Tapanahoni River, had its first successes in Djuka settlements in the coastal plain in 1891, but soon made inroads into the territory of other tribal groups as well. There was at least one western village of Saramaka which had accepted Gaan Tata worship before 1892 (Albitrouw 1892–1896; Albitrouw + 1915), but it seems likely that other Saramaka villages had also gone over to Gaan Tata at a very early stage.[31] The Gaan Tata priests had even more dramatic successes in 1892 and 1893 in the far west in the villages of the Matawai, who had earlier been the first to be converted to Christianity; and in 1895 also in the far west, even the small and remote group of Kwinti came under the spell of Gaan Tata (Kraag 1894–1896). Right from the beginning, a stronghold of Gaan Tata in the northwest was the village of Santigron, which had a mixed population of Djuka, Saramaka and a few Matawai. It was from here that Gaan Tata's advocates travelled south to Matawai villages in 1892 and 1893. Its location near the coast and less than fifteen kilometres from the capital of Surinam, Paramaribo, made Santigron a place of pilgrimage for many Creoles in the city who heard about the new powerful god (De Ziel 1973: 40). Special expeditions were organized by Christian missions to preach against the 'false God' and undo the impact of Gaan Tata's message on their Matawi following (BHW 1895: 12–42). But despite their efforts to wipe out the cult, they were only partly successful; a quarter of a century later Gaan Tata was still worshipped in secret in a few Matawai villages.[32]

In its heyday the cult had a regional organization which kept its leaders in contact with one another. In the 189O's the leading priests at the regional centres on the Tapanahoni river kept in touch with believers on the Surinam River and its tributaries (NB 1904: 255) and sent messages to their junors, priests such as Brokohamaka, at the northeast's main centre on the Cottica River. In their turn, these northeastern priests were in communication with others in the northwest at Santigron (NB 1892: 574) and in the west at Kriki-Pandasi on the Sara Creek (MBB 1893: 181). Even in the 1920's, there were still lines of communication with Sara Creek villagers and with a Saramaka village on the Pikin Rio tributary of the Suriname (Junker 1923).

The organization of the cult was centralized and hierarchical. Bush Negroes from other rivers came to the centre on the Tapanahoni, not the other way round. The hierarchy was also asserted through the constant flow of tribute towards the Tapanahoni shrines. In 1894, every settlement on the Cottica and Commewijne rivers, which boasted of a village headman, had to pay a special tax of 128 florins ($51) to the Gaan Tata priests of the Tapanahoni (MBB 1895: 53). In 1917, a small Saramaka village paid 320 florins for the right to open a Gaan Tata shrine, an enormous sum of money at that time, more than what most labourers in Paramaribo would earn in a whole year (Junker 1925: 154). That money was sent directly to the Tapanahoni River and the Djuka village of Dritabiki, then the main place of worship for Gaan Tata. Significantly, not all that was owed Gaan Tata was paid, at least not immediately. It was reported to the colonial administration (Junker 1923) that at least 19 Djuka from Sara Creek villages were heavily in debt to Gaan Tata priests at Dritabiki. Even some Christians in the area were helping to collect the money so that the curse of Gaan Tata, then threatening their matrilineal group, might be bought off. Many of the debtors were living in poverty with not enough food to eat. In 1923, the most prestigious of the village headmen in the Sara Creek area was held responsible for the collection of these debts. The threat was: If payment did not arrive, Gaan Tata would kill him! (Ibid.). Even more important for our understanding of the dominant position of the centre, was the obligation to bring the legacies of witches to the Tapanahoni shrines (MITT. 1896: 76). Leerdam, writing in 1957, but probably referring to a much earlier period, noted that the effects of the dead who had been found guilty of witchcraft were with great difficulty transported from the Sara valley to Dritabiki. Instead of crossing the watershed between the Sara and Tapanahoni, which was too arduous with fully loaded boats, they followed the Sara and Suriname rivers downstream, then east along the Cottica, crossing the watershed to eastern Surinam, and finally upstream again along the Maroni and Tapanahoni rivers. And all the time they had to be on their guard not to lose or break a single object on their long journey, while hauling their boats through the rapids and’carrying the goods over slippery stones at difficult spots.

Although there were many Gaan Tata shrines and oracles left in the 1960’s, worship was on the wane among the Saramaka and had disappeared almost completely from the Matawai villages. Moreover, there was hardly any communication between the centre (Tapanahoni) and remaining outposts (Santigron and Totikampu on the Saramacca, Agiti-Ondro on the Cottica, Dangogo on the Pikin Rio and a few other places). The authority of the tribal chief who was also high priest of the Gaan Tata oracle, was recognized in theory but not in practice (cf. Kbbben 1976). The cult’s decline and fractionization was fundamental: no longer did the Djuka from the Sara Creek, Commewijne or Cottica rivers (i.e. from the central, north, and northeast areas) take pains to bring the possessions of the witches across numerous rapids and falls to lower these in front of the Gaan Tata priests at Dritabiki on the Tapanahoni River. In the central and northern sectors, around villages such as Santigron, Agiti-Ondro and probably also Dangogo, vigorous but parochial cults survived. Nowadays, among the Kwinti of the Coppename River, the process of fractionization has reached the point where the small group of Gaan Tata adherents even deny the Djuka origin of their parochial cult (Personal Communication, Chris de Beet). On the Tapanahoni religious life had all the appearances of normalcy with the Gaan Tata oracles at Dritibiki and Granbori unchallenged. That was the situation in the 1960’s to which I shall return at the end of this paper.

 Theology

The corner stones of Bush Negro religion are four, five or sometimes six pantheons, each independent of the other. A supreme deity is recognized whose role is seen as so restricted that we may safely speak of a deus otiosus. at regular intervals throughout the history of the Bush Negroes, this ‘traditional’ cosmology is challenged by a Great Deity or High God cult. Central to this alternative world view is a supreme deity who is active in the world and does interfere in human affairs. Man’s aim in life, first and foremost, is to find favour in the eyes of this new deity, who will protect his faithful followers from other supernatural powers and dangers. His commands are rather specific, and when his demands are met, such as refraining from witchcraft, man can count on divine grace.

This view of man’s destiny is radically different from the traditional conception, which makes success and harmony hinge on a proper compromise that man has to find between the claims of diverse supernatural agencies. In various ways, this Great Deity (Gaan Gadu) cult suppresses or contravenes traditional forms of religious behaviour, such as spirit possession. The cult strikes against the vested interests of ‘traditional’ religion. Each wave of Great Deity fervour is accompanied by a radicalization of attitudes; feelings of inadequacy and remorse over past failures express themselves in acts of iconoclasm and neglect of daily economic and social routines.

The Gaan Tata cult is one of many Great Deity of Gaan Gadu movements in Bush Negro history. Gaan Tata, also known as Gaan Gadu, Bigi Gadu, Massa Jehovah, Gwang wella or Bakaa (European or Outsider)[33] Mitt 1895: 52), is the God that led the Djuka out of slavery and guided them in their battles with the colonial mercenaries. In the 188O’s, with the fears of witchcraft steadily rising, he was called upon to safeguard his people. But it was believed that he would only protect those who were pure in heart. They had to enter into a covenant with him by drinking a potion (Swell). This was the religion’s main sacrament and ordeal: those who survived proved themselves to be the faithful worthy of God’s protection; those who died were the witches. There was a marked preoccupation with the danger of witchcraft and most ritual was concerned with it.

However, the vindictiveness of this new deity was a familiar phenomenon in Bush Negro religion, and a characteristic he shared with many deities of ‘traditional’ cosmology such as avenging spirits (Hurault 1961: 221–235; Price 1973; Thoden van Velzen 1966b). More unfamiliar was the fact that this High God, like Jehovah, not only scrutinized their deeds but followed their thinking and feeling as well. He was the God “that looked down into their hearts" and from whom no evil thoughts could be hidden. Punishment would be meted out to those who nourished feelings of envy, hatred and resentment: these states of mind seduce the individual to employ witchcraft. Along with the commandment “Thou shalt not commit witchcraft”, there were other moral injunctions, prohibiting suicide, physical aggression and upholding the integrity of cultural institutions that markedly set off Bush Negro culture from those of other ethnic groups in Surinam. The emphasis the Gaan Tata priests placed on the rules of menstrual seclusion, is a case in point. At the same time, it should be stressed that the Gaan Tata cult acquired surprisingly few anti-white or even anti-missionary features. With great success, Gaan Tata's priests succeeded in hiding.rites and holy places from the eyes of the outsiders, but they never preached militancy against the whites. This was a corollary to the exigencies of common interests between Djuka Bush Negroes and colonial administration, as indicated above.

These moral demands also aimed at underpinning peace and cooperation ii. a wide region and among larger groups than lineage and village. The good man no longer was merely a good kinsman or neighbour perhaps, a man who fulfilled all obligations and was loyal to his kith and kin. Virtue could now be defined according to a universally valid standard: the good individual is not corrupted by the evil powers of witchcraft. Successful submission to a poison ordeal, a drink from the sacred potion, proved his purity and he could now move freely in wider circles.

Theology and ethics remained basically unchanged in the central sector of the cult along the Tapanahoni river before the new parochial cult arose (see Thoden van Velzen and Van Wetering 1975) and even after the Gaan Tata cult declines and became fractionized into a number of local congregations. However, the edge of iconoclasm had worn off. The major moral norms, those prohibiting witchcraft, suicide and the infliction of serious physical harm, were upheld as vigorously as in the early years. But some transgressions no longer were counted as sins against Gaan Tata: adultery, for example, came to be treated as a purely secular offence. Apart from the mild disdain shown by Gaan Tata priests to other manifestations of religiosity, such as fits of spirit possession, Gaan Tata lore was welded into perfect unity with traditional beliefs. Nevertheless, to a high priest from the cult's central sector, the Gaan Tata ritual that others performed elsewhere seemed to be a lapse into error. After one of the last of the high priests had occasion to visit the Cottica River and one of the cult's few remaining outposts, he publicly complained about the many ways his colleagues had strayed from the true path of Gaan Tata worship. He mentioned some examples: offerings were made at the wrong shrines; liquor was used for libations at the most holy places while it should have been beer ("that biting, burning stuff at such a holy place!"). At the same time, he confessed that there was very little he could do about it: “People from the Cottica are headstrong, they don’t listen to me, later they will agree that I was right, but then it may be too late!” The process of fractionization had gone too far to reverse.

 Allocation of resources and internal distribution

The boatmen brought about an enormous influx of resources into Djuka society. However, there were very few possibilities for investment open to these entrepreneurs. To acquire more land made little sense: land was an open resource, readily available, but the labour force that could be hired was small and, above all, the costs of exporting agricultural products over hundreds of miles, over rapids and falls, would be prohibitive. The only investment that made sense was the replacement, every few years, of the big dug-out canoe; however, the 200 guilders required for the purchase were but a small percentage of what could be earned within that period of time. To marry more women was another possible investment, but it was a risky policy because it meant incurring cumbersome obligations towards each wife’s matrilineage. This may have been an important inducement for many Bush Negro entrepreneurs to marry Creole women from the coast. What usually happened was that the entrepreneur saved his money by burying it in bottles in the ground, spent his money on luxury goods for ostentatious display or— less important in quantitative terms—bought presents for elders in positions of power and influence.

Given this evidence that the possibilities for entrepreneurial investments were extremely limited, we should now devote our attention to the societal mechanisms of resource distribution, to levelling practices and to groups that controlled the internal flow of resources. Two of these groups need to be discussed: the traditional association of the gravediggers and the priests of Gaan Tata. The questions posed are: to what extent and in what ways did these groups profit from the new affluence and what did this signify for the position of Gaan Tata as a regional cult?

One of the most important institutions of the Gaan Tata cult was the confiscation of the legacies of all those who had died at the behest of this wrathful deity. The traditional inquest into death was the basis on which the decision was taken whether or not the goods of the dead had to be cleansed and then confiscated as God’s cargoes. The core of the inquest was the ancient West African tradition of ‘carrying the corpse’ (Rattray 1927: 167–174), kept alive by Surinam’s Bush Negroes. The corpse was tied to a litter and carried on the heads of two bearers through the village. Questions were put to the deceased’s spirit by elders following the bier. The spirit replied through the bearers’ movements. The new element was that the Gaan Tata priests were not satisfied with answering the question of cause—which supernatural agency or what person killed the deceased; they also insisted on receiving a verdict on his moral character: each death was then classified as either a witch’s death (wist dede), a sinner’s death (misi dede) or a respectable death (jooka dede). It was only the property of the ‘respectable’ dead that did not have to become a God’s cargo. In 1962, as a result of these inquiries, seven out of every ten dead were stigmatized as witches (wisiman); of the remaining three, two were posthumously condemned as sinners against the laws of Gaan Tata, and only one allowed a ‘respectable death’.

The inquest that diagnosed the cause of death and determined the moral character of the deceased, was supervised by the association of gravediggers (oloman). As these posthumous verdicts were of obvious economic and social importance, we need to discuss the position of the gravediggers and their relation to the Gaan Tata priests in some detail.

During adolescence Djuka men have a choice between two associations: they can join the gravediggers or the coffin-makers (kisiman). The task of the last association was limited to what the name suggests. The coffinmakers had little work to do because ‘sinners’ and ‘witches’ were not entitled to a coffin; their corpses were left unburied at reserved spots in the jungle (witches) or put in a shallow grave (sinners). Thus, the coffin-makers convened only after the demise of a ‘respectable’ person. While making a coffin, gravediggers and coffin-makers indulged in horseplay at each other’s expense, and in sham attacks; and they attempted to get as large as possible a share from the communal meal at the end of a day’s work.

The gravediggers had many more responsibilities: they attended to the internment of the deceased and took charge of the ritual for the dead. From their ranks, they selected the bearers of the corpse and the interrogators of the deceased’s spirit. Immediately after a demise, gravediggers from the village where it occurred, and from neighbouring villages, would meet. Even gravediggers from far-away places who happened to be visiting or passing through were expected to participate. Within a couple of«hours after the demise, work would start. Usually, there would be two stints of carrying the corpse. Relatives of the deceased were invited to share in the tasks of carrying and interrogating. In this way, later charges of fraud were preempted by letting the relatives share in the responsibility of the verdict.

On the surface, relationships within the association of gravediggers appear strongly egalitarian, but a closer inspection shows that some held key positions. These leaders or bosses (basi), as they were called, assisted by a few elders selected from the relatives of the deceased, formed the committee that supervised the interrogation. This same body was also responsible for the decisive communique issued after the carrying of the corpse.

Within the arena of power, the bosses of the gravediggers were in no way competitors with the Gaan Tata priests. The committees could only convene for specific reasons — burial and death rites — often at unexpected moments, and on each occasion these bodies were differently constituted. Thus, although the decisions taken were important, the bosses could not develop strategies or even policies and therefore did not form a power group that could stand up to the Gaan Tata priests. Moreover, their political position was far from enviable. To prevent charges of fraud from the bereaved relatives, who could and often did accuse them of playing into the hands of the Gaan Tata priests, was one of their concerns. To prevent being blamed by the Gaan Tata oracle was equally pressing. In many cases, there was a chance that one or more ot the bosses would either be a Gaan Tata priest or an elder sufficiently associated with Gaan Tata’s oracle to be partisan. The latter were apt to remember dubious statements, signs of hesitancy on the part of the bearers at certain questions, many months after the inquest had taken place. In order to escape the dilemma, the bosses of the gravediggers often clouded their statements with oblique phrasing, or, by clever wording, presented verdicts that allowed for later refutation by the Gaan Tata oracle (Thoden van Velzen 1975). For all these reasons, the association of gravediggers could not develop into a power group that would grow in importance as more and more resources flowed into Djuka society, nor were they to gain considerable emoluments from this position. Before turning to the only other group that controlled the internal flow of resources, the Gaan Tata priests, we first need to discuss some levelling practices that have been part of Bush Negro religion for centuries, i.e. the costly death rites. This is necessary, because they affected the life chances of the regional cult considerably.

There is a sequence of death rites, which are held at fixed stages after the death of any adult. The burial ritual which often lasts for five or six days, or even longer, is only a first stage. Then the gravediggers and coffin-makers have to be offered meals and gifts; and the dancers at nightly ceremonial occasions are regaled with refreshments. Moreover, the deceased should be honoured with clothes that are pushed into the roomy coffin. Three days after the burial there is another ritual, which again is repeated three months later. Both are accompanied by libations, and the ceremonial distribution of drink and food for the community. The relatives of the bereaved carry the brunt of it. Most expensive is the celebration closing the mourning period at some twelve or eighteen months after death. At this anniversary the feasts may last for more than a week and include a banquet for the ghosts of the ancestors, a large-scale distribution of food and daily libations. Anniversary expenditures run into hundreds of guilders. At the turn of the century, Spalburg (1899: 41) estimated the expenses as ‘usually above 300 florins’ ($120). Furthermore, there are always reasons for performing an extra ritual to mollify the spirit of the deceased: perhaps a lack of piety shown by the surviving spouse or a remarriage without proper ritual care. Whatever the case may be, the conclusion is easily arrived at that a great wrong had been done to the deceased during his lifetime so that a conciliatory ritual to placate the ghost is now called for. All told, enormous amounts of resources, in time and in money, are spent on these death rites.

The Gaan Tata cult introduced additions and changes to these rites which had.far-reaching consequences. Not only were the death rites for ‘witches’ and ‘sinners’ made less elaborate and less costly. Their deaths ceased to be occasions for economic transactions exclusively within local and kinship relations. Their deaths provided occasions for the removal of goods from these relations, rather than for the consumption of food and the redistribution of durables primarily among relatives. The goods became regional in their significance. The relatives of a witch or sinner were obliged to bring his effects as God’s cargoes to the cult’s regional shrines situated in the village of Dritabiki on the Tapanahoni River. During one year in the later period of the cult, in 1962, 35 of such cargoes were received by the Gaan Tata priests. At first sight, this series of rites appears to be a levelling institution par excellence. The obvious course for the priests would be to try and lay their hands on the effects of the wealthiest among the deceased, thereby levelling most economic differences but creating another rift within Djuka society— the priesthood versus the laymen. But is this what actually happened; were these the consequences for Djuka society? An examination of the daily routines of the Gaan Tata priesthood shows that the answer should be a qualified ‘no’.

First, part of the God’s cargo was returned to the relatives, approximately 30 to 40%. Of the remainder, many valuables and all cash were kept by the priests. But an astounding amount of goods, part of it valuable, was left to rot at Santi Goon, Gaan Tata’s secret shrine in the bush. This clearly demonstrates that they had not taken the God’s cargoes solely for personal enrichment or an income for themselves, their favourites or the rest of the cult’s staff. They clearly had set aside a large portion for Gaan Tata. Purchased goods—household utensils, Victorian bric-a-brac bought by the early entrepreneurs, mantlepiece decorations, gold chains, shoes, plastic wares—were abandoned. Great heaps of goods in varying states of decay remained from the beginning till the last days of the cult. In 1972, adherents of the new prophetic cult salvaged some of the durables and brought them back in boat loads for redistribution.

Secondly, we should not ignore the fact that the relatives of the bereaved and the gravediggers often surrendered the effects voluntarily, even thrust them upon the Gaan Tata priests so that these would discharge them of the dangerous legacy of ‘the traitor within the gate’ and its polluting effects. Admittedly the evidence for the priests’ greed is unequivocal. In many instances I know of, they brought pressure to bear upon both gravediggers and elders of the village concerned to change the verdict of the inquest away from ‘a respectable death’. But many villages were too far away to be effectively controlled; political opposition to the religious establishment was strong at times; and the priests of Gaan Tata also had a reputation to protect. In brief, not all God's cargoes that arrived at Dritabiki came as a result of applied political pressure or even in anticipation of it.

Thirdly, and perhaps most significantly, is the information on the social categories of persons that the cargoes came from. Van Wetering (1973): 59) provides some quantitative facts. Of the 116 deaths (59 men, 57 women) that occurred between 1960 and 1970, and on which information is available, only 39 posthumously obtained the verdict of respectability. And of these, only 13 were women, which makes the relation between 'woman' and 'witch' statistically significant (Van Wetering 1973: 59, 286). As women are generally much poorer than men, these data should caution against any quick conclusion of 'levelling'. Moreover, it has been my impression that village headmen and wealthy elders usually did not meet with divine disgrace upon their deaths. But to predict at the death of an old woman what the verdict would be was not a hard task: a witch.

Thus, the priests by not being able to touch some of the bigger legacies, had no prominent levelling role. In fact, they sustained the entrepreneurs by protecting their reputation at the oracles and condemning poorer relatives for any gossip or slander aimed at these boatmen. In this way, they shielded them effectively from levelling coalitions within the village. Later, the new prophetic cult of Akalali would render the same services to the labour elite in pfesent-day Surinam. In conclusion, we can say that Gaan Tata religion did little to bridge the gap between rich and poor; it preserved and sustained divisions within their society.

 Gaan Tata's Bulwark on the Tapanahoni

In the 1960's the parochial Gaan Tata cult of the Tapanahoni seemed little affected by the great changes that had taken place in Surinam's interior after 1925. There were many oracles in the 30 villages of the Tapanahoni with their 6,000 inhabitants, but the Gaan Tata oracles of Granbori and Dritabiki held sway. Certainly in Dritabiki at least, things did appear 'as of old'.[34] A group of about ten priests gave direction to the operation of the Gaan Tata oracle and they regularly convened for that purpose. During 1962, the oracle was consulted on approximately 125 days regarding a total of 424 cases. The clientele of the Dritabiki oracle flocked from most Tapanahoni villages, a sprinkling came from other Djuka areas and some were Saramaka or Boni. Most were ill, and wished to learn the reasons for their misfortune and what could be done about it. Although usually an illness was attributed to supernatural causes, the priests often managed to link these causes to lack of responsibility or even complicity of living persons. Sometimes, this sequence was reversed in that a person was ordered to appear before the oracle, where soon the priests proclaimed that their client's life was threatened by evil forces almost impossible to ward off at this late moment. The client concerned could do little but beg the priests to help him survive. This assistance was never withheld and the honorarium demanded seemed trifling in comparison to the dangers averted, or at least such was the official view. But let us first examine the workings of the oracle.

In the Gaan Tata cult as in other Bush Negro cults, the deity made his wishes known through oracles. Just as a deceased's spirit replied to questions at an inquest through the movements of bearers carrying his corpse tied to a litter, so too Gaan Tata replied to questions through the movements of the bearers of his oracle. This was a small bundle tied to a plank which two Gaan Tata priests carried. The bundle presumably contained sacred objects such as hair and nail parings of famous ancestors, and it was revered as the tabernacle of Gaan Tata. It was hidden from view by long draperies which touched the ground when the ends of the plank rested on the heads of two bearers. Other priests standing in front of the bearers put questions to the oracle. Gaan Tata replied through the movements of the bearers in this way, a forward move signified an affirmative, a backward or sideways one a negative answer. Wild, chaotic movements indicated the High God's vivid displeasure. This 'dialogue' between god and priests always took place at some distance from the laymen so that they could not overhear what was being discussed. A high priest was in charge of the oracle: after receiving a whispered report from his subordinate priests, he issued a final communique to the meeting of elders. As a rule, the oracle sessions were held in public in front of the temple, an ordinary but bigger hut where sacred objects were stored. At the main oracle of Dritabiki, the elders of that village, and those of a few surrounding villages, were expected to attend these sessions.

Although an oracular session usually started with a patient soliciting for assistance, opportunities for political manoeuvres often presented themselves. Take, for instance, the case of a village headman disliked by the chief for his independent stance in many political confrontations. His wife had fallen ill, and although the case did not look very serious, he had consented to escort her to the oracle at Dritabiki. There the priests had a surprise in store for him. Those charged with interpreting the movements of the bearers, reported that the illness of the headman's wife was of the gravest nature; a diagnosis that had to be taken seriously although all present at the oracle could see the woman walking cheerfully through the village. Subsequently, the village headman was blamed for being the source of all suffering: his irresponsible neglect of his wife's ancestors had caused their wrath, after which the ghosts in retaliation had visited sickness upon the woman. The priest .charged the headman a stiff fee for treatment. The position of the village headman was undermined and he was punished for not being sufficiently compliant.

Roles of critical importance at the oracle, such as front bearer of the holy bundle, were often given to a high priest's personal dependents or fugitive clients. Every high priest was surrounded by such people who had left their native villages in order to settle with a protector. Some stayed a few years, others prolonged their stay indefinitely. In some cases elders forced to flee their villages as witches were, a few years later, in a position to judge the actions of their former prosecutors: they, the fugitives, were carrying the tabernacle of Gaan Tata. But most of the clients had a much more humble task to perform. The female clients kept the high priest's official residence clean, emptied chamber pots and did other household chores. Most other clients prepared and cultivated his gardens. If the high priest needed volunteers for a corvee at short notice, he usually recruited them from among his clients. The high priest kept this small, but loyal labour force till the middle of 1972, when the new cult had taken over. Fugitives then fled to Njoen Konde, the centre of the new movement and Akalali's village.

Besides their share in the God's cargoes, priests enjoyed other forms of income, such as fees. These were seldom exorbitant and for religious and medical treatment amounted to one bottle of rum, four pieces of cloth and twelve bottles of beer. The retail price of these goods in the Taponahoni region was about 25 Surinam florins (approximately $13). Occasionally, instead of payment in kind, money was demanded; sometimes as much as 32 Surinam guilders (approximately $17). In 1962, 62 fees were imposed but only 30 actually collected. There was no pressure to pay straightaway: a debt paid two or three years later was just as welcome. But if some one returned to the oracle after a couple of years with an unpaid debt for previous treatment, it was virtually certain that the outstanding debt would be indicated as the cause of this new affliction. In serious cases, the priests usually demanded an extra payment along with the usual fee for a consultation. Four litres of rum was the normal fee which had to be paid before a consultation could be held. But it did happen that the priests settled for less or even waived the session costs altogether.

One may wonder what the priests did with the large quantities of rum they received. Some of it went to the storage room in Gaan Tata's temple. A part was consumed immediately: the priests gave one glass of rum to each of those present at the oracular sessions, but only when the last case for that day had been dealt with. The elders regarded this as a small compensation for the time spent at the meetings. Moreover, the high priest regularly presented his collaborators with a few litres of rum to enable them to entertain in a proper manner the numerous elders and patients who called on them. Additionally, a great quantity of rum was earmarked for the corvees organized for dignitaries such as the tribal chief and a few of the prominent priests.

Special taxes were sometimes imposed. In 1962, for example, the priests informed the faithful that they felt Gaan Tata punished his people too severely. The priests were quick to add that they would not object to a harsh and merciless treatment of witches. Their concern was with the respectable citizen who had suffered an occasional lapse and was likely to have his life taken away by their vindictive God. The high priest intended to mollify the Great Deity. Therefore, he proposed to the village headmen that each of the thirteen matrilineal clans of the Djuka on the Tapanahoni should donate 32 Surinam guilders ($18) for this purpose. The money was collected at the end of 1962 and handed over to the high priest who pocketed it and, I suspect, used it for his own convenience.

 Gaan Tata's Decline

Some of the forces that had destroyed the fabric of the Gaan Tata movement as a regional cult, were also at work undermining the parochial cult of the 1960’s. Let us examine these more closely.

First, the resource basis of the Djuka and other Bush Negroes, the total of all forms of income taken together, rapidly melted away in the 1920’s. The gold rush was over at the beginning and the balata boom at the end of that decade. As a consequence, there was less money to be tapped by medicinemen, spirit mediums or the priesthood of Gaan Tata. All who had lived off these entrepreneurs were then in trouble. Fewer patients came to the oracle-, they brought less money; gone also were the rich friends of the oracle who had bought them such handsome presents. As a consequence, the priests no longer had the wherewithal to add force to their arguments or even to send delegations and messengers to the Gaan Tata outposts.

As the impoverishment of the region grew, centrifugal tendencies became stronger. The question “why pay tribute to the far-away Tapanahoni, what can we expect to gain from them?” had been asked before, but was now posed with more force. Sometime in the early 193O’s, the Djuka of the northeastern area, the Cottica, stopped bringing God’s cargoes to the Tapanahoni. Other areas rapidly followed suit and soon developed their own organisation for the cleansing, redistribution and dumping of the God’s cargoes.

Although many Djuka and other Bush Negroes continued to work as freight carriers, the decline of river transport had set in around 1925. In 1921 (Koloniaal Verslag), it was mentioned for the first time that Bush Negroes were willing again to resume their old occupation of lumber work. This trend must have accelerated during the late 1920’s and the 1930’s with the consequence that the numbers of those who relied on the norms and ethics of the Gaan Tata cult for free movement among other Bush Negroes, were dwindling. General impoverishment tended to have the same influence. As the rift between rich and poor grew less significant, witchcraft fears allayed. With poverty spreading, the number of Bush Negroes who lived in terror of the malevolence of the envious kinsman or neighbour, declined. Now, there was less need for an anti-witchcraft movement.

After 1930, only a trickle of money and goods reached the main Gaan Tata oracles. Throughout the cult's old region there was a drastic reduction in income. Moreover, where there was heavy expenditure on ritual costs, this went for a community's death rites rather than for the specialized services of the Gaan Tata priests.

The priests adjusted to this unknown austerity by lowering their sights, for example, by demanding smaller fees. But-they also had recourse to measures that were profitable in the short run but detrimental when seen over a longer time period. The priests began reducing the number of their staff and they also paid less to those who stayed on. This new generation of priests proved to be less tractable than their well-paid predecessors had been. For example, it happened occasionally that a front bearer of the holy bundle refused to perform his duties. This put the high priest in a difficult position because front bearers were considered specialists. In 1962, there were only two of them and refusal to work occurred when one of them had left for a short period, with the high priest's permission. More common but equally costly, were the repeated absences of periods of leave that a high priest could not refuse to grant. This created a vicious circle. Not being able to pay the priests fully meant fewer working days, this led to fewer patients and thus less income for the priests.

In order to secure higher incomes, the Gaan Tata priests had recourse to an even more hazardous strategy. As we have seen, the gravediggers were responsible for the inquest into the cause of death and for the verdict on the moral character of the deceased. In the 1960's, the priests put pressure on the gravediggers to give as many verdicts of a sinner's or witch's death as they could, and to resist demands of the relatives that the deceased be recognized as a respectable citizen. In the cluster of villages around the main shrine at Dritabiki it was not particularly difficult to do this. One or more of the gravediggers at the death ritual would either be a Gaan Tata priest or a close associate as an elder at Dritabiki. It was often suspected that these notables acted as spies. Any uncertainty about the reputation of the deceased would be reported back to Dritabiki and this could then lead to a change of verdict. After the gravediggers had arrived at a judgement, the verdict had to be communicated to Dritabiki. For Dritabiki and neighbouring villages the priests of the oracle knew the proposed verdict even before the relatives were informed and could—and often did—alter it. In 1962, 21 out of 30 deceased were considered witches, 6 were condemned as ‘sinners’ and only three qualified as ‘respectable citizens’. In this way, 27 out of 30 legacies fell to the Dritabiki oracle (Van Wetering 1973: 56). For the whole decade from 1961 to 1970, the number of ‘respectable deaths’ was much higher: 34% against only 10% in 1962. The longer period, however, includes the years aftgr 1964, when the positions of high priest and tribal chief (gaanman) were not held by one man; considerable confusion and rivalry then disrupted the workings of the oracle. Yet, the percentage of legacies confiscated remained amazingly high.

 A new regional cult?

During the last days of the Gaan Tata cult discontent had spread. Whereas during the early 1960’s it came to the surface in private conversations, malpractices were openly debated in the early 1970’s. In 1972, a prophet, Akalali, launched a new cult. It should not have come as a surprise that he took the institution of the God’s cargoes as his prime target: he pointed this out as the signal abuse of the Gaan Tata priests, the epitomy of corruption. With a few daring manoeuvres, and supported by a considerable following, Akalali put an end to the work of the Gaan Tata priests; he then invited the people of the Tapanahoni to rescue whatever they could from Santi Goon, the cult’s storage place in the bush. The history of this take-over, the reasons for its stunning success, need not detain us here (cf. Thoden van Velzen and Van Wetering 1975). What is pertinent to our theme is not the fact that the parochial cult of Gaan Tata was replaced,[35] but that it was supplanted by a parochial cult with regional ambitions and even some degree of regional success. What prompted the new religious leadership to reach out for the whole of Surinam’s interior, instead of resting on the laurels of its Tapanahoni victories? The reasons, I would submit, are essentially the same as those that caused the rise of the Gaan Tata cult: a massive injection of new resources and new sharp divisions within Bush Negro society which generate anxiety.

Two developments seem relevant. Around 1955, the government of Surinam launched an ambitious programme for the exploration of the interior: air strips were constructed; roads were laid out far into the rain forest to pry it open for lumbering companies; geologists embarked on a systematic survey of the hinterland; a hydro-electric dam was built on the Suriname River. With support of the World Health Organization, a campaign to eradicate malaria in Surinam's interior was launched. Like the gold-diggers of old, the medical doctors of the anti-malaria campaign, the geologists, the engineers all were dependent on the Bush Negroes for transport. Top officials of the departments concerned employed the tribal chiefs as brokers. In this way, many jobs fell to the young relatives of the chief and the Gaan Tata priests at Dritabiki.

Then, in 1963, an even more important development set in; for the first time in Surinam's history the Bush Negroes were given the right to vote in a national election. It soon appeared that the few seats Bush Negroes held in the Staten, Surinam's parliament, were of strategic importance. Their representatives could virtually decide who would rule Surinam: the Hindostani, descendents of contract labourers brought over from India, or the Creoles. Skin colour, or a common cultural heritage, were not enough for the Bush Negroes to decide whom they would choose. More was needed, and it was delivered. New jobs were created; many an elder was promoted to village headman or village assistant, both pf these paid positions. In 1973, the one village of Dritabiki, which has less than 500 inhabitants, had a tribal chief and no fewer than 14 headmen and assistants to guard over its welfare. For many of the younger men at Dritabiki, jobs, had been furnished. On top of this, during the months preceding the elections, representatives from both main parties came to deliver boat loads full of food, liquor and corrugated iron at the landing stages of many Tapanahoni villages.

These goods were not evenly spread over the Bush Negro population. Much of it was pumped through old channels, the political middlemen at Dritabiki: the tribal chief and the priests of Gaan Tata. The flag of the main Creole political party was hoisted over Gaan Tata's oracle. Obesity, cases of high blood pressure, began to take their toll among the well-to-do at Dritabiki. For the people of neighbouring villages, the privileged position of the tribal chief, priests and their relatives was a stone of offence, an open invitation for a take-over bid. Akalali came from a neighbouring village that had taken a leading part in opposition to Dritabiki before. After the take-over, Surinamese officials, quick to accommodate to the political realities, promoted the prophet to village headman. After the 1973 elections, when the Tapanahoni seat in parliament was lost by the Hindostani coalition, the new Creole government made Akalali a village headman of the first rank (Hoofdkapitein).

We should try to get the wider perspective in view: the new demand for Bush Negro river transport and the massive political patronage were a Surinam-wide phenomenon. Paradoxically, the opening up of the interior had started off its depopulation. The men left for the labour-recruiting centres, in particular to Paramaribo. As a result, a village such as Dritabiki had lost two-thirds of its population. A'change in attitude, a readiness to adjust to coastal ways of life, became notable (Thoden van Velzen 1966: 21). However, a new period of full employment, like that of the gold-rush days, was not to come. The majority of Bush Negro migrants had swelled the ranks of the unemployed proletariat. A new division arose among the Bush Negroes: the employed versus the unemployed and those who went from one part-time job to another. In many ways, the employed occupied the position of a labour aristocracy. This would even hold on a national level; in the 1960's Djuka boatmen working for government services earned twice as much as the Javanese sugar-cane cutters of the coast. The privileged workers jealously guarded their position and were apprehensive about the possible consequences of this new economic rift. It should therefore not come as a surprise that the Akalali cult of the 1970's was again an anti-witchcraft movement. Equally, in line with the earlier position of the Gaan Tata priests, the young employed men who came to the Tapanahoni for the New Year celebrations of 1974, had business to do with Akalali, sporting colourful woollen sweaters, they came in boats driven by outboard motors, a few even in chartered planes, to obtain a certificate that they themselves were not witches and also for protection against witches. Both wishes were satisfied. In the first days of 1974, Akalali screened approximately 200 persons for any signs of witchcraft: none of the afluent young labour migrants who deposited such substantial cash gifts in his coffers, was pointed out as a witch. From the 200, about 15 were set apart as witches, and most of these were old women; none of the male witches had a job, they were destitute people and often ill as well.

Akalali had to cater for the demands of a ‘national’ clientele, Bush Negroes from all tribes in Surinam who were anxious to prove that they were ‘clean’ and who were in want of emotional security and protection against their envious brothers. The traditional social building blocks of society, the matrilineages, were again breaking up. Many Bush Negroes in Paramaribo had shaken off the obligations imposed by these groups, but were still in need of protection and security; Akalali appeared to take care of this and thus the privileged flocked to the new shrines of the Tapanahoni in such great numbers. The great majority of these were Djuka, but invitations soon reached Akalali from other areas in Surinam. In 1973, he spent a number of weeks in Paramaribo’ where hundreds of migrants visited him. In 1974, he travelled to the Djuka of the Cottica area and to the Paramaka to conduct large-scale witch cleansing rites. Early in 1975, he was invited by some Matawai to cleanse the village of their tribal chief, a Christian bulwark, from witchcraft. In 1975, he performed anti-witchcraft rites in some Saramaka villages in the central part of the country. Although these travels outside his Tapanahoni stronghold were not consolidated by the setting up of local branches, the recurring demand for Akalali’s services from various areas made his cult more than a parochial one.

 Summary

The first stage in the history of the Gaan Tata cult (1885–1925) can be directly linked with the alteration in the mode of production. The Djuka, as most other Bush Negroes, left lumber work for more profitable employment in river transport. This entailed a loss of functional utility for the corporate matrilineal kin group which had proved to be so instrumental in the organisation of work in the lumber camp. As the proximity and assistance of relatives no longer were necessary, kinship obligations became a burden. The new unit of production, the boat crew, consisted of only three men; there were no phases in the production process when larger numbers of workmen were required: smaller work units thus, but not isolated atoms. As the crews moved over vast areas in the river basin, their common interests were peaceful relations with other residents, easy movement among strangers and unstrained relations with the District Commissioner and his assistants. The Gaan Tata movement honoured these instrumental needs by stressing the values of peacefulness, honesty towards employers and rejection of any parochial ideology stressing family, lineage or even tribal interests.

Equally significant, the Gaan Tata priests showed themselves partial to the privileged socio-economic group of that time, the freight carriers. While the gap between wealthy and poor was widening, Gaan Tata's priests saw to the emotional needs of the boatmen by affording them protection against witches. As the Gaan Tata priests controlled the only centres of information on a supra-village level, they could intervene on behalf of their wealthy clientele by upholding their reputation.

For the second phase (1925–1955), the argument gets much more complex. The period began with a steep decline in freight prices, from fl.25 per barrel for the Albina-Lawa trip in 1909 to fl.7 in 1930. More gradually, a diversification in the mode of production took place: many Bush Negroes returned to lumber work, others worked off and on as freight carriers, depending on the sluggish demand. The impoverishment of the freight carriers is the main independent variable for our explanations of developments during the second phase. The diversification,came to reinforce the first factor, but in order to gain a clear view of the main lines of cause and effect, I will ignore it.

The impoverishment of the boatmen had two consequences: (1) the gap between wealthy and poor narrowed as the entrepreneurs saw their income reduced to a fraction of what it had been before; there was now less to fear from the witches as they possessed fewer things people could be envious about. Hence the demand for an anti-witchcraft cult became less pressing. (2) As an immediate result of the dwindling fortunes of the entrepreneurs, the priests saw their income sharply reduced. The high cost of the death rites further squeezed the available resources. The massive dumping of property at the secret bush shrine of Santi Goon, was only the most spectacular way of taking resources out of circulation. The cycle of death rites with the many libations and the huge communal meals also tended to dissipate reserves.

The dependent variable then is the breaking up of the regional cult of Gaan Tata in a number of local congregations. There was less demand for an anti-witchcraft cult, less 'push' from the various areas. There was also less 'pull' as the centre on the Tapanahoni no longer had the power assets to steer taxes, tribute and clients towards its oracles. As we have seen, they had been forced to abdicate the right to collect and redistribute the God’s cargoes from other Djuka areas, meaning a lower level of income. Very few normal lines of contact between centre and periphery could be maintained. The Gaan Tata priests in the centre were painfully aware of the many deviations from what were considered the standard ritual proceedings in the Tapanahoni area. They did not condone these, but there was nothing they could do to redress the situation. The process of disintegration had gone too far; the economic basis for a healthy regional cult no longer existed.

The third phase (195 5-present) began with a new demand for the specialized services of Djuka boatmen. But full employment, as in the days of the gold rushes, was out of the question; a few hundred Bush Negroes could man all the boats of the various government services working in the interior. The labour demand of the lumbering and bauxite companies of Surinam could only absorb some of the Bush Negroes. The result was the emergence of an unemployed Bush Negro proletariat in Paramaribo; men who settled in the same neighbourhoods as their more fortunate kinsmen, waiting for a job.

The cleavage between wealthy and poor grew wider when the main national parties began vying for the favour of the Bush Negro electorate: new patronage jobs, new village headmen, boat loads full of gifts arrived, but the glut tended to concentrate at certain points in society.

The two basic conditions that gave rise to the Gaan Tata cult are also evident in the new cult of Akalali. The massive migration of Bush Negroes from their old tribal areas to Paramaribo blurred cultural differences: again Bush Negroes had to work and live among strangers. The ethos of the cult had to bridge cultural differences instead of stressing them. But it is partial to one segment in the new socio-economic division that emerged among Bush Negroes: just like the Gaan Tata cult, the Akalali cult supports the successful. The vitality of both cults derived from a clear choice in favour of the privileged.

 References

abbreviations of the names of missionary journals

BHW: Berichten uit de Heiden-Wereld uitgegeven door het Zendingsgenootschap der Broedergemeente te Zeist

MBB: Missions-Blatt aus der Briidergemeine

MITT: Mitteilungen aus der Brudergemeine

NB: Nachrichten aus der Brudergemeine

<biblio>

Albitrouw, Izaak

1892–1896 Vo da Missionswroko na Goejaba ofoe Aurora; A bigin baka na 1891 en te moro na hoposei. Archives of the Moravian Brethren; National Archives of The Netherlands at Utrecht. Hpt. Abt. I A IX.

+ 1915 Tori vo dem bigin vo Anakee en moro fara (Story of the beginning of Anake and what followed). MS Archives of the Moravian Brethren at Paramaribo, Suriname. *

Beet De, Chris and Bonno Thoden Van Velzen

1977 Bush Negro Prophetic Movements: Religions of Despair? Bijdragen tot de Taal-, Laneen Volkenkunde 133:

Franssen Herdersche, A.

1905 Verslag van de Tapanahoni-expeditie. Tijdschrift van het Koninklijk Nederlandsch Aardrijkskundig Genootschap 22: 1–174.

Goeje De, CH.H.

1908 Versleg der Toemoekhoemak-bxpeditie. Tijdschrift van het Koninklijk Nederlandsch Aardrijskundig Genootschap 25: 995–1169.

Hurault, Jean

1961 Les Noirs Refugies Boni de la Guyane Francaise. Memoires de L’Institut Francais d’Afrique Noire 63. Dakar.

Junker, L

1923 Letter to Fr. Morssink dated April 16, 1923. Archives of the Bisdom of Surinam at Paramaribo.

1925 De Godsdienst der Boschnegers III. De West-Indische Gids 7: 153–164.

Kobben, A.J:F.

1976 The Periphery of a Political System: The Cottica Djuka of Surinam. Political Anthropology 1: 122–131.

Koloniaal Verslag

Annual Report of the Colonial Administration.

Kraag, Christiaan

1894–1896 Diarium Copenkrissi. MS Archives of the Moravian Brethren; National Archives of The Netherlands at Utrecht.

Leerdam, H.

1957 Onze Boslandbewoners: het godsdienstig leven, XXVII (April 23, 1957) De West. Paramaribo.

Mayer, Philip

1970 Witches In Witchcraft and Sorcery. Max Marwick, Ed. pp. 45–64. Harmondsworth; Penguin Modern Sociology Readings.

Morssink, F.

1934 Boschnegeriana 3: Djoeka’s of Aukaners. Manuscript.

Price, Richard

1973 Avenging Spirits and the Structure of Saramaka Lineages. Bijdragen tot de Taal-, Land-en Volkenkunde 129: 86–107.

Rattray, R.S.

1927 Religion and Art in Ashanti. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Spalburg, J.G.

1896–1900 Diarium Drietabbetje 1896-April 1900; De laatste reis, 1908. Archives of the Moravian Brethern; National Archives of The Netherlands at Utrecht. Hpt. Abt. IIBCII 1,2.

1899 Schets van de Marowijne en hare bewoners. Paramaribi: H.B. Heyde.

Thoden van Velzen, H.U.E.

1966a Politieke beheersing in de Djuka maatschappij: een studie van een onvolledig machtso verwicht.

Ph.D. dissertation, Antropologisch-Sociologisch Centrum, Amsterdam University.

1966b Het geloof in wraakgeesten: bindmiddel en splijtzwan van de Djuka matrilineage. Nieuwe West-Indische Gids 45: 45–51.

1975 Why disorder? In Rule and Reality. Peter Kloos and Klaas W. van der Veen, eds. pp. 134–154. Amsterdam: Antropologisch-Sociologisch Centrum.

Thoden van Velzen, H.U.E. and W. van Wetering

1975 On the Political Impact of a Prophetic Movement in Surinam. In Explorations in the Anthropology of Religion. W.E.A. van Beek and J.H. Scherer, eds.

pp. 215–233. Verhandelingen van het Koninklijk Instituut voor Taal-, Landen Volkenkunde, vol 74. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff.

van Wetering, Wilhelmina

1973 Hekserij bij de Djuka: een sociologische benadering.

Ph.D. dissertation, Antropologisch-Sociologisch Centrum, University of Amsterdam.

Zielde, H.F.

1973 Hohannis King: Life at Maripaston. Verhandelingen van het Koninklijk Instituut voor Taal-, Landen Volkenkunde, vol. 64. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff.

</biblio>

© Bonno Thoden van Velzen 1977

 5. A Continuing Dialogue: Prophets and Local Shrines among the Tonga of Zambia by Elizabeth Colson

Acknowledgements: This paper is based on field research among Plateau Tonga of Mazabuka District (now divided among Mazabuka, Monze and Choma Districts) and Gwembe or Valley Tonga of Gwembe District. I worked in Mazabuka District, August 1946—September 1947, June 1948—August 1950, and September 1968, and have paid brief visits to friends there over the years. My last visit was in August 1973. My field work among Gwembe Tonga was carried out July 1949, September 1956—September 1957, January 1960, September 1962—September 1963, July—August 1965, 3 days September 1968, July—December 1972, and June—August 1973. I have drawn on the field notes of Thayer Scudder, my colleague in a long-term study of Gwembe District. His notes date from September 1956—September 1957, September 1962—September 1963, 1967, 1970, May-October 1972, and June—September 1973. Over the years we have discussed the Gwembe data many times until it is now impossible to be sure which of us is responsible for orginating any particular interpretation. Paul Syanemba recorded a diary for us in 1972—73 on which I have drawn. Scudder and Richard Werbner commented on early drafts of this paper.

The research has been supported by various agencies: the Rhodes-Livingstone Institute (now the Institute for African Studies in the University of Zambia), the Joint Committee on Africa of the Social Science Research Council and the American Council of Learned Societies, National Science Foundation Grant No. GS—3295, the Small Grants Committee of the National Institute of Mental Health, the Kafue Basin Committee, the African Committee of the University of California, the Research Committee of the University of California (Berkeley), and the California Institute of Technology. The California Institute of Technology gave me the rare privilege of serving as a Fairchild Fellow during 1975—76 and so gave the leisure to return to old field notes and to write this paper. The map is at the end, page 136.

 Cults and their publics

No cult which primarily functions to serve the particular interests of a territorial community on a regular basis can serve a general public unless it radically alters its practice and its constituency: a cult serving a wider constituency on an ad hoc non-exclusive basis may well serve the special purposes of local communities. The two can co-exist and reinforce each other. The cult with universal claims then serves as a further court of appeals when a local cult does not satisfy its adherents. An appeal to such higher authority is subject to public review or at the behest of local officials, which implies that delegations go for consultation with an oracle or other universalistic cult as messengers of a local community and representatives of its power structure. The oracle will be asked to confirm the continuities upon which the local community depends in regulating its life rather than requested to provide guidance in some radical departure from accepted practice. This was true in ancient Greece where each small city state had its own cult, associated with its fate as a human community, but delegations went to consult the Oracle of Delphi, or perhaps Dodona, which served the entire classical world for many centuries.

The same interplay between local cult and oracle or prophet cult appears today among the Tonga of Zambia. The two cults appeal to the same basic human desires for health and prosperity. They incorporate comparable beliefs about how humans, the natural world, and divinity are interrelated. They share a common vocabulary and much symbolism. By and large they deal in the same kinds of messages. Both reflect the nature of the land the Tonga occupy and their concepts of social order. Yet the two cults remain distinct because they are seen as serving different purposes: each local cult under its custodian is a symbol of the continuity of a particular community, while the oracles and their prophets provide reassurance and guidance in emergency or dilemma to a fluctuating public. Today the economy of central Africa is diversifying, even in rural areas. The prophet cult is responsive to the new interests and many prophets are redefining their role so that their primary mission is to serve individuals rather than communities. The local cult is less able to respond to such diversification. Many local communities no longer have a local shrine or rally to support community rituals linked to agriculture or any other common interest. But in some communities local shrines still exist and elders still gather around them to invoke the associated spirits and assure them of continued respect and support in return for their care of the common interest.

 The Setting and the Cults

Plateau and Gwembe Tonga occupy much of Zambia’s Southern Province, while Gwembe Tonga also live beyond the Zambezi River and man-made Lake Kariba in northwestern Zimbabwe (Colson 1958, 1960, 1962, 1971; Scudder 1962, 1971). Their terrain varies from the undulating reasonably well-watered plains of the Zambian plateau, through the rugged hills of the Zambezi escarpment, and drops to what was once the floodplain of the Zambezi River and is now Lake Kariba, before rising again through the Zimbabwe escarpment. Altitude varies from between 4,500 and 1,300 feet. Rainfall is highly variable, both locally and from year to year. The highest average rainfall is recorded at the edge of the escarpments which receive something like 38 inches annually: this drops to 31 inches on the Zambian plateau and to 25 inches in the Zambezi floodplain. As one goes east or west from the escarpment edge, rainfall declines and also becomes more uncertain. In the Zambezi floodplain an annual variation of from less than 15 to more than 30 inches has been recorded. But this was before Lake Kariba altered the microclimate and probably raised rainfall about its shores (Scudder, 1962, p.9).

Language links the Tonga with other communities in Southern and Central Provinces. In the Zimbabwe escarpment, on the other hand, they meet with Shona-speakers. The archaeological record indicates that iron-age settlers arrived in the first millenium with .their crops and livestock (Fagan, 1967). The Tonga may be descended from them although they have also incorporated more recent comers including Shona-speaking migrants from Zimbabwe. Old trade routes which crossed their country once linked them to the Rozwi, Karanga and Korekore states of the Zimbabwe highlands and lower Zambezi.

Whatever the earlier political relationships of Tonga communities with these kingdoms or with the Lozi kingdom of the upper Zambezi, by late nineteenth century they lived in independent polities, most of these no larger than a single neighbourhood inhabited by from 400 to 1,000 people. Each small polity was usually under the aegis of a shrine or shrines (malende or kokalia), whose custodian, usually called a sikatongo (‘person of the old settlement place’), represented the matrilineal descent group of the founder of the shrine and the founder himself. Henceforth I shall refer to such a shrine as a local shrine although elsewhere I have sometimes termed them “earth shrines” because they relate people to the earth they occupy, or “rain shrines” because Tonga emphasize their importance in appeals for rain. I shall call the sikatongo associated with such a shrine a custodian, though again sometimes I have used the term “earth priest” in earlier publications. Frequently the shrine was conceived of as the embodiment of the dwelling of the first couple who by settling in the neighborhood had transformed it from a wilderness and introduced the human routines associated with the building of homesteads and the cultivation of the soil. The shades of the couple then were held to continue to watch over the community they had founded, and in this case the matrilineal descent group of the wife also had responsibilities in the rituals. Less commonly a local shrine was said to have been initiated by a prophet, but that at his or her death custodianship passed to a matrilineal kinsman or kinswoman rather than to another prophet. In either case the spirit associated with a local shrine usually was called basangu, used also for spirits which speak through a prophet and sometimes also for any spirit. Unlike other such spirits, however, those regarded as originating from first settlers were held to have power only in the specific locality known to them as living men and women. There they were said to “know the country” and to be effective in dealing with it. Otherwise they were merely mizimu, ancestral shades, with power over their own descendants and members of their descent groups.

Local shrine communities were small, reflecting the highly localized nature of the rainfall pattern. Those living only a few miles apart can have very different weather and regulate their planting, weeding, and harvesting by different schedules; and their harvests differ accordingly from year to year. Prophets, on the other hand, are not so confined. Some received delegations from communities as much as a hundred miles from their own location. Prophets were involved in the unbounded social network which linked all parts of Tonga-country and ultimately those in Tonga-country with other parts of Central Africa. Political boundaries provided no convenient grid for organizing social relationships and the spirits associated with prophets did not represent any regional alliances or association with a defined geographical space. People traded, visited, and once raided over many miles, but movement in general was from the Zambezi to the plateaux along an east-west axis since this associated those in different ecological zones, brought access to different resources, and gave the greatest possibility of supplementing local food shortages. By the end of the nineteenth century, men were also going out to work along the same routes which continued to channel the flow of traffic from the Zambezi to the plateaux. That all known territory was subject to some of the same forces was evident from the fact that in some years drought or good rains were general. But if rain fell anywhere it was in the escarpment edges where rose most of the rivers and streams flowing across both the plateau and the Gwembe Valley. Significantly enough, the most important prophets seem to have lived in the high rainfall zones of the escarpments, either in Zambia or Zimbabwe, though minor prophets were scattered everywhere and probably most neighbourhoods contained a prophet or two. The vast majority had purely neighbourhood reputations and therefore served the same population as the local shrine of the neighbourhood whatever their claims to a wider mission.

 Shrine Custodians

Custodians had official duties associated with the annual cycle. When officiating in the ritual, they were addressed as basangu although they were not expected to be subject to possession. This distinguished them from prophets who spoke from basangu and sometimes as basangu.

Custodians were expected only to continue routines which had proved effective in dealing with the earth and its forces. They did not exercise political rule or represent their neighbourhoods to other communities. In only a few places was anything comparable to the office of chief in existence. More commonly someone known as ulanyika (“warden of the country“), who might also be a custodian had some relationship to hunting and might claim rights in animals killed in the neighbourhood (Scudder, 1962 (pp. 111–129, 196–197). The de facto political leaders were usually vigorous men who could mobilize a following to dominate a neighbourhood or a number of neighbourhoods, but they created no office and held no ritual role in the community. If no one succeeded in dominating, the political community was a republic of independent homestead heads who acknowledged the ritual guidance of the local shrine custodian and the discipline of knowing that they were all vulnerable from actions that angered the shrine spirits. The Tonga stress the independence of each adult—or at least each adult male—and the autonomy of individual homesteads rather than a hierarchy of authority.

The matrilineal descent groups which regulated marriage, inheritance and succession, and which also provided for self-help, were usually egalitarian in organization. They rarely numbered over forty adults and these were dispersed among a number of neighbourhoods and dependent upon those with whom they intermarried and associated. Each descent group made offerings to its own ancestral shades, but this cult of the shades was distinct from the local shrine cult.

 Prophets and the Greater Community

Prophets spoke as the vehicles of basangu and could be addressed as basangu or baami ba imvula (“lords of the rain”) in identification with their possessing spirits. Henceforth I shall use basangu specifically for the spirits that “visit” or “enter” prophets. These, unlike the local shrine spirits, were identified as spirits of the wild, or as shades of long dead prophets, or as foreign spirits — thus they were identified with no known social community and could affect any. Indeed, they were spoken of as “visitors,” emphasizing their transitory connection with their prophets and their prophets’ locale. Some prophets say that their basangu manifests itself as a snake which crawls into the body through the mouth and they forbid the killing of a snake within their homestead. Others visualize their basangu as tiny lions or buffaloes. To the best of my knowledge Gwembe prophets do not claim possession by spirits associated with local shrines though they may contact such spirits through the intermediation of their own basangu and so learn their grievances and how to pacify their anger: I am less certain that this is true on the plateau.

Especially in Gwembe District, people identify basangu as a class, or a particular basangu, with the mhondoro spirits of the Shona (Garbett 1966: Gelfand 1956; 11–34; Daneel 1970; Ranger 1966). Thus the spirit of Chibwe Handabo, claimed by various prophets on the Zambian Pleateau and in Gwembe Valley, is said to come from Shona country and to be the same as mundolo, the Tonga pronunciation of mhondoro. But the Tonga do not seem to personalize the basangu or to be interested in their histories. The basangu have names, sometimes places of origin, but that is about all. For that matter, most Tonga do not seem to be concerned with which basangu is present and many do not know the names even of basangu associated with prophets in their neighbourhood. The various known basangu are not ranked in terms of spiritual power or linked into a system by using a genealogy or other method of stating relationship. Here the Tonga differ markedly from the Shona who try to draw the various oracle spirits into a common system reflecting the hierarchical relationships of Shona society. The Tonga think of their basangu as free to behave in the same independent egalitarian fashion in which they themselves behave.

Anyone may become a prophet. It is assumed that basangu choose their vehicles at their own pleasure from any descent group or locality, and there is no reason why a basangu should continue to visit a locality where it has had a vehicle. Basangu enter, men, women, and children, but children become active prophets only on maturity. Significantly, prophets need not be married; it is the shrine custodian who represents ordered society who must have a spouse. In recent years more women than men have become prophets, but there is no good evidence on how long this has been true and some reason to think the situation may be changing. Any number of prophets may be active at the same time; indeed, several basangu may announce themselves within the same neighbourhood in the same brief time span. Various prophets also claim possession by the same basangu. The names of a few basangu are widely known,* and prophets all over Tonga country claim to be their vehicle. Such claimants work independently of each other and do not form a cultic corporation to advance the influence of their common basangu. But basangu are thought to be in contact with one another. They are thought to spend much time in the bush, in hollow trees, standing pools, springs, rock outcrops; but they also visit each other. They are said to withhold the rain or send epidemics or other troubles to alert communities to their demands or as a punishment on all those in the countryside for an infringement of the respect due their prophets and their chosen sites. But they are not all powerful, and in the last analysis it is God who sends the rains and orders the world.

Basangu cannot be invoked as agents of individual ends. They are not appealed to for vengeance against some other community-or faction within a community or personal enemy. They are thus neutral in human disputes. Presumably they symbolize the general relationships between the forces of nature and human society rather than the division of that society into particular communities, whether these be based on neighbourhoods or descent groups.

If prophets have no formal organization, they ought to be in harmony and all basangu are assumed to have common interests. Quarrels between their vehicles anger the basangu, and drought may be attributed to antagonism between prophets. In fact, however, prophets vie with each other for recognition and their influence fluctuates enormously even within a short period of time. Each neighbourhood, and indeed each homestead, appears to have the option of choosing which prophet it will patronize on any particular occasion, although I have heard a prophet chide consultants for coming in small groups rather than in full strength. Only prophets who are also diviners receive individual clients, i.e., those asking about a concern such as illness specific to an individual or household. Basangu concern themselves only about public matters.

Most prophets have local reputations and are consulted by delegations only from their own neighbourhood or at most from within their immediate vicinity, a radius of no more than five or six miles. The reality of their claim to possession is also treated with scepticism. The few famous prophets who have inspired great respect draw occasional delegations from many parts of the country, but are probably consulted regularly only by their own neighbourhood or by other neighbourhoods in their immediate vicinity. When an appeal is made to such a prophet for rain, the rain is expected to accompany the delegation back to its home territory. These prophets also warn of trouble coming unless people throughout the countryside heed their message, receive and wear a particular charm, or comply with some new or half-forgotten ruling. They are therefore able to introduce innovations in ritual, including local ritual. In southern Gwembe in the 195O’s, Thursday was observed as a rest day on the orders of such a prophet: Sunday was the chosen day of another.

In the late nineteenth century the prophet now called Monze, the name of his basangu, received delegations from many Tonga, Ila, and Sala communities, some coming from Zambezi neighbourhoods as much as 100 miles away. Monze lived on the Zambian plateau not far from the escarpment edge in the high rainfall zone (Livingstone 1857: 554–555; Syaamusonde and Shilling 1947: 47–56). His successor was recognised as a major chief during the colonial period. Rain rituals were carried out at the shrine associated with the two men at least as late as 1972 and the shrine served more than a single local community. The basangu Monze is still claimed as a possessing spirit by contemporary • prophets. In the midtwentieth century the most powerful prophet among Zambian Tonga was Chibwe, who lived not far from where Livingstone first met Monze. Her basangu was Chibwe Handabo. She was occasionally consulted by delegations from Mazabuka, Gwembe and Namwala districts. Lesser prophets of midcentury usually visited Chibwe soon after first announcing themselves and cited her recognition of them as fellow prophets as proof of their own calling. Two I talked with, one on the plateau in the 1940's and one in Gwembe in the 1970's, claimed that Chibwe had said the people who lived near them should come to them rather than make the long journey to her homestead. After her death in the 1960's, her shrine appears to have become dormant, but new prophets are still claiming possession by Chibwe Handabo.

In the 1950's some Gwembe neighbourhoods sent delegations to the shrine of Monze even though it no longer had a resident prophet, others sent to the prophet Chibwe, and still others sent to mhondoro prophets in the Zimbabwe escarpment. Of these last, the prophet near Gokwe seemed the most popular. Adjacent communities might send their delegations in different directions. The delegations were sent only in a year of drought and after consultations with prophets of the vicinity had brought no rain. »Some communities had no memory of having consulted prophets outside their immediate ken. Scudder and I have never been able to determine what influenced the choice, though we note that if Gwembe neighbourhoods consult distant prophets, then these live in the'highlands where the rainfall is greatest and where the storm clouds can be seen to gather. We have no record of any Plateau Tonga delegations visiting Gwembe or Shona highlands in search of rain or other assistance or of Zimbabwe highland delegations coming to Zambezi prophets. The choice of prophets certainly is not affected by considerations of ethnic identification, and basangu are not thought to have ethnic or territorial loyalties. Thus people are free to consult whichever prophets they regard as most likely to be effective and other than this probably follow their own convenience and familiarity with the intervening country.

Freedom of choice is also encouraged by the fact that all prophets seem to use a modicum of symbolism common to central Africa. They wear wristlets of black or dark blue beads, colours associated with rain clouds. Those who approach them for rain take black or blue beads. Those who wish an end to continuous rain take white beads because white is associated with clouds which carry no rain. Red beads or anything red in colour is taboo during consultation because red symbolizes blood. An appropriate gift is a hoe blade, symbol of cultivation (and of femaleness). Spears and axes, symbols of maleness and the hunt and war, do not appear to be used as gifts to either prophets or local shrines, though we have one instance of a novice prophet receiving a hoe and a spear from an established prophet. Often petitioners take seed to a prophet and receive in turn blessed seed to mix with their own seed for planting. If a prophet announces that the basangu want an offering carried out at a local shrine, this usually involves slaughter of a black chicken, goat, or ox—any trace of white being forbidden since this would bring lightning with the rain. The animal should be held so that it cannot struggle, since the struggle symbolizes wind which blows grain about. The meat should be roasted without salt. Informants have not been able, or willing, to make the symbolism here involved explicit, but salt is “hot” and the spirits are asked to be cool “as water is cool.” Delegations appealing to a prophet proceed in much the same fashion throughout Tonga contry, adopting the same posture (sitting with legs straight before them on the ground), clapping with the same rhythm, and using a common repertoire of rain songs. This is also the way they present themselves when appealing for rain at a local shrine or in the homestead of a shrine custodian.

Neither Scudder nor I have beem present when a Tonga delegation has approached a Shona mhondoro, nor have we visited a mhondoro, but we are told that at Gokwe and elsewhere they are coached in a more formal ceremonial and must deal with subordinates instead of going directly to the prophet as they do in Tonga country. No Tonga prophet of the old styles seems to have an entourage or maintain an establishment. Both Livingstone and Selous (1893: 211–212) commented on the lack of such an entourage for Monze, then the most famous Tonga prophet. Today at most one helper, usually a spouse or resident kinsman or kinswoman, assists in seances and interprets pronouncements. A prophet’s homestead is usually no more elaborate than any other and sometimes is poorer than most. It is marked, if it is marked, only by the presence of a small hut shrine standing near the dwelling of the prophet. The prophet except during consultation is addressed and treated as an ordinary mortal although each prophet has special rules with respect to sleeping, food, or other behavior which he or she observes at all times. It is only in possession, or when a delegation requests a prophet to seek possession, that the prophet is treated with respect and regarded as having authority.

 The Diversification of Society

Before the mid twentieth century, Tonga prophets were primarily consulted about agricultural hazards, pestilence, and cattle plagues. Until the last decade of the nineteenth century the Tonga were subsistence farmers, though hunting, fishing, and gathering provided a good deal of the diet and much of the zest of living. Thereafter, the need for a cash income drew them.into other activities. They turned first to labour migration.The Plateau Tonga were able to shift to cash crop maize farming in the 1920s and 1930s and raise cattle for the market,but Gwembe Tonga continued as labour migrants until the late 1950s and even in the 1970s many are away at work intermittently. In recent years the economy of both plateau and valley has been diversified and both have shared in the advances made by Zambia since independence in 1964. Most villages are now accessible by road. Some Tonga have cars and tractors. People move easily from rural areas to the towns and cities to visit kin, seek work, shop, or consult government agencies. Townspeople in turn visit rural kin and invest savings in rural areas. Many children are in secondary school and look forward to professional jobs and to associating with fellow professionals. They take their beliefs and values in part from alien sources (Colson and Scudder 1976).

Work opportunities, and increasingly the policy of the Zambian Government, bring immigrants from other parts of Zambia and central Africa to live in Tonga neighbourhoods. Administrative and technical personnel associate with educated Tonga men and women who are similarly employed or occupied in large-scale farming. Others, who come as labourers, fishermen, or small traders, associate with the mass of villagers. If they stay, they learn ciTonga, as did earlier immigrants, most of whom ultimately merged into the Tonga population where diversity of origin is quickly forgotton (Colson 1966).

Present day Southern Province communities, even rural ones, are heterogeneous. Their populations differ in education, experience, occupation, and in the demands they make on life. Many, including the most prosperous farmers, business men and civil servants, dislike the system of matrilineal inheritance and wish to emphasize the nuclear family rather than the matrilineal descent group. Many think of themselves primarily as citizens of Zambia rather than as citizens of a neighbourhood. Those regularly employed are less concerned with rain and local harvests. Missions have been active since early in the twentieth century and by the 1970's churches had been built in many neighbourhoods. Any who went to school before the mid 1960's spent some years under Christian teaching. Some Tonga are Christians. Some are agnostics. Some fear witches and medicines but deny that ancestral shades or such spirits as basangu can affect the living. Still others firmly believe in what they regard as the tested wisdom left to them by their ancestors. In communities where the majority support these beliefs, as is true particularly in many neighbourhoods in Gwembe, even the agnostic may find it expedient to make offerings and take part in other rituals. Conformity then encourages belief.

In our study of Gwembe District, Scudder and I have observed a progressive change among many who as young men and school boys in 1956 proclaimed themselves opponents of the ancestral cult and local shrines and held that prophets and diviners only cheated the people. They have become increasingly involved in all three cults as the years pass and they have become the responsible householders of the 1960's and 1970's with children, stock, and crops at risk.

Everywhere the cults have been affected by the increasing mobility and diversified interests of the population. In the 1970's, the various cults received little official support. Officials and other rural elite do not seem to take part in offerings to the shades or appeals to basangu or rituals at local shrines unless they are chiefs who belong to custodial lineages. The latter continue to sponsor rituals associated with their local shrine since it is the link with the past which, forms the nexus of their continuing position and the reason for their recognition by government. In general, however, we have been impressed by the tenacity with which both local shrines and the prophet cult maintain themselves.

 Continuity and Change in the Cults

On the plateau, people were shifting cultivators. Until land shortage finally stabilized the fields, homesteads moved gradually across the land. Local shrine communities seemed tenuously linked to particular localities and the social units risked dispersal and the outmoding of their local cults as homesteads entered into new combinations or responded to different expectations of rain. The flexibility of the cult of the basangu and the prophets' right to make pronouncements calling for the institution of new local rituals seemed to cater to this situation. An overlap in terminology, symbolism, and ritual behaviour between the local shrine cult and the prophet cult meant that the line between them was easily blurred.Theoretically, these circumstances should make it easy for people to turn to prophets who moved with them or were encountered in the shift to provide them with a new shrine and a new line of shrine custodians to serve the emerging community. Originally I thought this must have happened frequently in the past and I attributed the short histories and abbreviated genealogies of Plateau Tonga shrines and shrine custodians to the brevity of life of shrines associated with communities of shifting cultivators (Colson 1948). Longer experience now makes me doubt this interpretation since it does not take into account the general disinterest in the past which has been characteristic of so many Tonga. Among egalitarian people such as the Tonga of the nineteenth and early twentieth century, history is unlikely to be a major preoccupation; genealogies will be truncated; time usually is telescoped into a span that covers perhaps two or three generations beyond senior people. This span is enough to root institutions in the past and justify them to the future.

On the Zambezi River, Gwembe Tonga lived in communities stabilized by access to alluvial soils and good water. In the mid 1950's they were no more able than Plateau Tonga in the late 1940's of providing lengthy histories for their local shrines or lengthy genealogies covering several generations of shrine custodians. Like the shifting cultivators of the plateau, they began the histories towards the end of the nineteenth century, in the time of their grandparents and great grandparents. Some, indeed, said that they themselves remembered the first shrine custodian though they placed the founding of the local shrine itself before their memory began. They also spoke only of recent prophets. None of those they mentioned seemed to predate the prophet Monze who was visited by Livingstone in 1854 and by Selous in 1888.

To my knowledge no archaeological work has been done at any shrine sites and so there is no independent check on age. However, Tonga informants say that local shrines may be abandoned if they are perceived to be ineffective or if their communities die out or disperse, though they also say some member of the custodial descent group ought to stay in the old locality. If the spirits want the shrines reestablished, they will let their wishes be known soon enough. Some neighbourhoods have two or more shrines, each under a custodian of a different descent group. The shrines are then said to serve different functions or one is said to have been largely superseded when a basangu speaking through a prophet directed people to institute a new shrine.

Nevertheless, increasing data, mostly from Gwembe District, indicate that local shrines are remarkably viable and that prophets rarely institute shrines which outlast their own lifetime or effective period as prophet. In the nineteen years we have followed events in Gwembe District, we have heard of no new local shrines. I have heard of none being initiated among Plateau Tonga since 1946. In these same years prophets have proliferated and with them their personal shrines. The more important cater for more than a local clientele and are multifunctional. If they are associated with rain, as some are, they are also associated with curing. Their owners deal in medicines for success in business and other enterprises and provide protection against witches and other dangers. Their very eclecticism and appeal to wide-ranging interests of a mobile population stand in the way of their coming to represent the continuities of small agricultural communities. But even those prophets who have stayed closer to the traditional role of basangu prophets have not initiated a local shrine cult or inserted themselves or their successors into the office of sikatongo associated with such a shrine.

This failure is particularly marked given the fact that the period of our observation coincides with the massive resettlement of Gwembe Tonga which wiped out the familiar territory of most Gwembe neighbourhoods and any claim to legitimacy based on first settlement. %

 The Gwembe Resettlement: A Test Case

In 1958 some 60,000 Gwembe Tonga were forced to move when 2,000 square miles was given to Lake Kariba. In preparation for the filling of the lake and the establishment of fishing grounds, their old terrain was cleared. Bulldozers which smashed through villages also razed local shrines and their associated trees. People said they were being thrown away into the bush where they would become like animals since neither their local shrine spirits nor their shrine custodians knew the controlling forces. In fact they were moved either to uninhabited bush with which no one had ritual associations or they were given part of the territory of settled neighbourhoods which had their own shrines and custodians. The majority of those within Zambia were resettled on higher land above the lake shore along the tributary rivers whose deltas they had cutlivated. Several thousand were shifted to the plateau. Another six thousand from Chipepo Chieftaincy in central Gwembe were moved one hundred miles downstream to Lusitu, below the dam site. Here they were settled in the territory of Chief Sigongo, many of whose people were descendents of Korekore immigrants from Rhodesia or of Chikunda from further down the Zambezi (Lancaster 1974).

Immediately following resettlement it appeared only too evident that shrine custodians of resettled communities had lost their office along with their shrines. Immigrants either joined the established community rituals of their new neighbours, or they tried to cope without ritual protection other than that provided by their own ancestral shades. Or they invested in protective medicine. In Lusitu the incoming settlers were told both by Chief Sigongo and by the custodian of the major shrine in Lusitu that they were strangers and must not build either local shrines or spirit gate shrines (cilyango). The latter are associated with descent group rituals. They were warned that spirits already in the area would be angry at a challenge to their authority. They gave more credence to this warning when many died during their first years in Lusitu. They attributed the death to ingozi, a medicine said to have been left in the ground by ancient inhabitants to destroy those who settled where they themselves had died. People also said the land did not know them or the spirits associated with their communities and it was pointless to build local shrines.

Elsewhere neither established custodians nor political officials seem to have actually forbidden immigrants to build their shrines, but the immigrants usually did not build. We heard of a few instances where they did. In one case, in 1961, the shrine was struck by lightning. This confirmed the belief that local shrine spirits already entrenched in the area claimed exclusive jurisdiction, and even those who had moved into previously uninhabited bush did not try to build.

The prophets moved into the vacuum left by the loss of local shrines and the custodial office. Prophets active before resettlement indeed at first denied being subject to possession after the move saying their basangu had abandoned them. This may reflect their dependence on local cues in predicting rainfall, but we think it also indicates a temporary loss of faith in basangu which had shown themselves powerless in preventing the loss of the homeland. We have no evidence that any Gwembe neighbourhood sent out a delegation to any prophet in the escarpment during these years of stress though the escarpment remained unchanged. Nevertheless, within two years of resettlement, prophets again became active. First new prophets announced themselves. These usually claimed possession by some new kind of spirit or by some widely known basangu or at least by a basangu previously known in their new locale. Sometimes the new prophet emerged under tutelage of a prophet already working in the region. In Lusitu, the first prophets became active early in 1960. They called themselves mangelo (‘angels’) rather than basangu and seem to have been influenced by contact with one of the separatist sects of Zimbabwe or Zambia since they adpoted a white gown, used invocations including the name of Jesus, and might display the bible during consultations. Moreover they could be consulted at any time of the year whereas basangu prophets usually are active only during the season associated with the rains crop. The new prophets made their major impact in dealing with the immigrants’ fear of the strange land which they believed was hostile to them (Scudder 1968). Not all Tonga, however, were prepared to give respect to mangelo. Rather they equated mangelo with the spirits associated with the possession dances which sweep central Africa (Colson 1969). By 1965, some of the old basangu prophets resettled in Lusitu were again intimating that they were subject to possession and others were claiming possession by basangu. People were coming to clap before them for rain. By 1972, several had built shrines in their own door-yards and even Chief Sigongo’s people had begun to clap before them and ask for seed for use in planting, protection from insects, and adequate rain.

In central Gwembe, where most Chipepo people were resettled, new prophets began to make pronouncements in late 1960, though here they called themselves basangu and concerned themselves primarily with rain rather than illness. When mangelo possession arrived in 1963, it was treated as a possession dance or equated with doctoring. But in central Gwembe, people were resettled in their old hinterland and had no such fear of their new locale as had the Lusitu settlers. By 1962 some who had been prophets before resettlement again claimed the presence of their basangu and were being consulted. Our records for southern Gwembe, in Mwemba chieftaincy, are more ambiguous, but we think the first new prophets began to function in late 1960 or early 1961. Even so many of those resettled preferred to consult prophets they found already established in the hills.

For some years, prophets made different demands from those we heard in 1956 when we attended consultations with prophets in Chipepo. Then they typically attributed drought to a failure of shrine custodians to follow rules left by shrine founders, or to people ignoring the custodian’s precedence in initiating agricultural routines, or to encroachment on territory associated with a shrine. To appease the angry spirits and bring rain, people were told to repair the shrine and carry out the appropriate rituals in conjunction with the custodian. Prophets active in the early 1960’s in resettled communities attributed drought to sorcery or to a lack of respect for their basangu. We have instances of prophets sending messengers to call people from surrounding neighbourhoods to greet a visitor (i.e., a basangu) and receive blessed seed for planting. Thereby, of course, they gave assurance from the spirits that the soils could produce and so alleviated one of the major fears of the resettled. In any event, the prophets ignored the former custodians and made no suggestion that their behavior or the absence of their shrines affected the general welfare. Former custodians continued to make offerings to ancestral shades, who had once also been local shrine spirits, but they did so only in kinship offerings, either in the house doorway or at a spirit gate, the sites associated with ancestral shades.

In 1962 and 1965, resettled custodians and members of their descent groups sometimes said they expected to rebuild the shrines and claimed still to be guardians of their communities. Others laughed at this. The spirits of the shrines were sometimes said to have remained behind in flooded country, although ancestral shades and the basangu of the prophets were regarded as able to follow people in their migrations. Even the death of a former custodian in 1963 was attributed to witchcraft and not to his neglect of ritual duty. His grave site did not become a new local shrine. By 1965 divination on the death of members of custodial descent groups had begun to point to the anger of shrine spirits at being given no home, but the general public regarded such divinations with scepticism. When we asked if by living and dying in the resettlement area, a former shrine custodian might re-establish katongo (‘right of old settlement’), most informants maintained that katongo came only from long ago and could not be established now in this generation. Or, they said, if it could be established, it was probable that it would be attached to the descent group of sofne prophet whose grave or homestead site might become the focus of a new local shrine and whose successor would become sikatongo, shrine custodian. There were those, however, who said that one good thing given them by resettlement was the demise of the old agricultural rituals and the freeing of each cultivator to proceed at his or her own pace (Colson 1971: 226–232).

We predicted that if local shrines were reestablished this would be through the prophets, who certainly saw themselves as free to innovate. So far this has not happened. Since 1962 various prophets have died and been buried in the new localities and they have begun to merge with the ancient dead. Their own shades are invoked in the ancestral cults of their descent groups and their children, but their shrines have disintegrated and their basangu said to have gone to other vehicles or be tarrying for a while in the bush. But local shrines are being reestablished in a few neighbourhoods and these are the shrines known at the Zambezi. Those custodians who are still alive are being held to acocunt again and where custodians have died, successors are being recognized.

Our best information comes from CHEZIA neighbourhood, in Chipepo Chieftaincy in central Gwembe. This is one of the four Gwembe neighbourhoods we have been following intensively since 1956. It then had two local shrines, each under a custodian of a different descent group. Three villages were resettled in their old hinterland. Those who built close to homesteads in KOMA neighbourhood began to associate themselves with the KOMA shrine, while the rest who built homesteads and cleared fields in an area not known to have ever been previously cultivated no longer associated themselves with a shrine. One of the two former local shrine custodians stayed in the resettled community, still known as CHEZIA, but was not active as a custodian from 1958 until about 1971 when he built a spirit-gate in anticipation of a sign that he should build the local shrine associated with his line. The other custodian left CHEZIA and then died. His shade was inherited by a member of his descent group. In 1966 the inheritor responded to various divinations on family and lineage illnesses by building a shrine. Apparently resident prophets had not called for any such building. The inheritor dies in turn and again a successor was chosen. The shrine was rebuilt in 1970, this time with various members of the CHEZIA community contributing their labour in the old fashion. In 1972–73 the rains failed. Members of the community first consulted two women prophets resident in the neighbourhood. One had practised at the Zambezi but not for some years after the move; the other was first possessed in 1960. They reported that the basangu and the local shrine spirits wished the community to join in rituals, some of which had last been performed in 1957 before resettlement. In the following days this was done, the two custodians playing their appropriate roles. The ritual, as recorded in the diary kept for us by a member of the CHEZIA community who had been only a boy in 1957, is very comparable to what we recorded in 1957 although over fifteen years had elapsed and there had been drastic changes in the personnel carrying out the rites. Belief in the efficacy of shrines and ritual was reinforced when heavy rains fell. But some weeks later when again the rains had stopped, the CHEZIA people consulted a third prophet living in the neighbourhood. He had been possessed sometime after 1965. Most people considered him subject to mangelo or some other spirit associated with a possession dance and denied that he was a basangu prophet. Now he extorted a general acknowledgement that he was indeed a basangu prophet, though he faced the delegation with a bible open upon his knees. He demanded and received a hoe of ancient manufacture, the gift appropriate to a basangu. He then announced that the basangu was angry because one of the custodians had disrespectfully called it a mangelo and the same custodian had improperly performed his share of the ritual. The prophet ordered the custodian to make recompense both to his own spirit-gate and to the local shrine of the other custodian.

I In Lusitu, at least one local shrine was re-established under its old custodian prior to 1971–72. But in 1973 most Lusitu informants said that they still depended either on the local shrines of Sigongo people or on their own basangu prophets. In southern Gwembe, people of the Mwemba neighbourhood we are following also continue to rely upon prophets. The grave of a basangu prophet who died in 1971 has not become a shrine. Instead people consult a woman of another descent group who first claimed possession in 1971 and confirmed her status by a visit to an established prophet in the escarpment in 1972.

 Prophets and Custodians

The nature of the prophet’s role and the political realities of the neighbourhood life work against the usurping of the custodianship by the prophet.

Prophets are affected by the general egalitarian character of Tonga social organization. If they had a corps of helpers there would be those with a vested interest in the perpetuation of a prophet’s own cult after the prophet’s death, but they do not build a bureaucratic order that could institutionalize their charisma. The basangu, for which the prophet is only a vehicle, is thought to be free to move t.o new vehicles unassociated with the old. It is only loosely associated with the shrine built for it by the prophet even during the prophet’s life. The shrine is but a temporary abode in which the spirit is only occasionally resident. Local shrines, and their immediate environs, are always in some sense sacred and should not be disturbed. The prophet’s shrine, in contrast, stands in the dooryard where children play about it. It does not inspire respect in itself. The very multiplicity of prophets also works against any one acquiring a following with exclusive allegiance.

The demise of the prophet then usually means the demise of the associated shrine and the dispersal of such clientele as the prophet has. No surviving staff exists with an interest in reminding people of the dead prophet's power, and people are unlikely to associate any new difficulties they face with neglect of the prophet's grave or shrine given that they never had any obligation to respect one prophet over another. They would first consult a living prophet. Even one from the same lineage as the dead prophet must speak as the vehicle of a basangu to receive a hearing and this means stressing his or her own relationship with the spirits. There is no reason to invoke the now dead prophet.

Pronouncements almost invariably involve some failure in the relationship between humans and divinity, but those who consult prophets evaluate the message transmitted to them in terms of probabilities. If a message is too alien to their experience or calls for something outside their power to comply, they are likely to reject it. There is a sameness about the pronouncements of prophets, perhaps because the questioning directed to them by representatives of the consulting community more or less dictate the acceptable answers.

Prophets who have a largely local clientele have an incentive to attribute misfortune to behaviour about which local people are uneasy but need to direct attention from possible delinquencies in their own behaviour as basangu vehicles. In Gwembe failure to rebuild the old shrines must have been a source of concern since people accepted this diagnosis of current troubles once the resettlement had receded into the past and was no longer the focus of all grievances. Continuing divinations put pressure on the prophets to revise their messages to conform to the growing consensus. When they did so, they also assured people of the continuing viability of their social unit. The explanation, however, also absolved the prophets of any responsibility as prophets for drought or other trouble—it was the community as a community which had done wrong and its own representative, the custodian, who was most flagrantly at fault. In some instances, personal rivalries were also in issue. Tension does exist between resident prophets and shrine custodians who base their claims to office on different sources of legitimacy. A prophet can humiliate a custodian but only by accusing him of negligence in office and this means giving him legitimacy. To invoke other explanations of community distress is to miss a golden opportunity to pay off old scores. The community is relieved to accept the explanation because it can put pressure on the custodian and check compliance by its own knowledge of appropriate routine.

Distant prophets who are not involved in local rivalries still look to the community order in framing their messages, since they can assume the organisation of a neighbourhood. It should be remembered that prophets speak to communities and the only community with the power to exact atonement from a culprit or general cooperation in ritual or observance of taboo is the neighbourhood community. A delegation also wants to receive an answer to its problem which lies within the area of its own competence. Even the most influential prophets cannot improvise the machinery which would coordinate the populations of larger regions for regular observance of complex intermeshed ceremonial. The more universal the message, the more likely it is that people will be asked to observe some single easily performed ritual, such as the wearing of a charm or the observance of a day of rest. Formerly, political divisions did not exist above the neighbourhood to provide a framework of authority to which prophets could attach themselves and so compliance with any message was left to general consensus or the power structure of a neighbourhood. The chieftaincies and districts instituted by the colonial government extended political boundaries, but few chiefs were able to make good their claim to ritual primacy within their own districts. People for the most part regarded their chiefs as administrative officers of government rather than their own hereditary representatives. Even the idea of a social unit of all Tonga is a recent creation and is still likely to be invoked principally in the national political arena, though the continued importance of the shrine of Monze may have political overtones of which I am aware.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-9.jpg]]

At the present time the most ambitious prophets largely ignore the underpinning of community and treat more commonly with individual than with communal affairs. They continue to claim association with universal powers and hope to attract clients from anywhere in Zambia. They also receive clients throughout the year which means that their role is filled more than intermittently and periodically. They expect to receive payment in cash or livestock in return for service and so receive far more than the customary offerings of grain, beads, cloth and hoes which are appropriate for basangu. Most claim possession by a number of different kinds of spirits, of which basangu is only one. Some claim to be vehicles of God or angels, forces seen as more in keeping with the expanding universe in which people now live. They build shrines where appeal may be made for rain, but they see themselves as primarily healers who treat spiritual and physical ailments or as providers of protection against the dangers of contemporary life. They appeal to the diversified population of contemporary Zambia which consults them about the problems encountered as people move between town and country, shift their occupations, encounter new associates, cope with new uncertainties. Significantly, the most powerful set up their headquarters on the railway and bus routes rather than in the high rainfall zone of the escarpment edge, and their clients come from both cities and countryside.

Concern for the affairs of the land is left largely to lesser prophets who serve communities of which they themselves are members. Though they claim a power that stems from beyond the community, and is independent of it, they are subject to the community controls. They link their messages to the local order. That needs at best only one or two shrines to cater to its sense of harmony with the land it occupies. These prophets are therefore among the principal upholders of community, the land shrines, and the existing custodianships.

 References

<biblio>

Abrahams DP.

1966 The Roles of ‘Chaminuka’ and the Mhondoro Cults in Shona Political History. In The Zambesian Past. E Stokes and R. Brown, Eds. pp. 28–46. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

Colson E.

1948 Rain-Shrines of the Plateau Tonga of Northern Rhodesia. Africa 18: 21–68.

1954 Ancestral Spirits and Social Structure among the Plateau Tonga of Northern Rhodesia. International Archives of Ethnography 47:21–68.

1958 Marriage and the Family among the Plateau Tonga. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

1960 Social Organization of the Gwembe Tonga. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

1962 The Plateau Tonga of Northern Rhodesia: Social and Religious Studies. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

1969 Spirit Possession among the Tonga of Zambia. In Spirit Mediumship and Society in Africa. J. Beattie and J. Middleton, Eds. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.

1970 The Assimilation of Aliens among Zambian Tonga. In From Tribe to Nation in Africa. R. Cohen and J. Middleton, Eds. San Francisco: Chandler Press, pp.35–54.

1971 The Social Consequences of Resettlement. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

Colson E,and T. Scudder

1976 New Economic Relationships between the Gwembe Valley and the Line of Rail. In Town and Country in East and Central Africa. D. Parkin, Ed. London: Oxford University Press for the International African Institute.

Fagan B.

1967 The Iron Age Cultures in Zambia (Kalomo and Kangila). London* Chatto and Windus.

Garbett GK.

1966 Religious Aspects of Political Succession among the Valley Korekore (N.Shona).In The Zambesian Past. E. Stokes and R.Brown, Eds. Manchester: Manchester University Press, pp. 137–170.

Gelfand M.

1956 Medicine and Magic of the Mashona. Capetown: Juta & Co.

Lancaster CS.

1971 The Economics of Social Organization in an Ethnic Border Zone: The Goba (Northern Shona) of the Zambezi Valley. Ethnology 10: 445–465.

Livingstone D.

1857 Missionary Travels and Research in South Africa. London: John Murray.

Ranger T.

1966 The Role of Ndebele and Shoqa Religious Authorities in the Rebellions of 1896 and 1897. In The Zambesian Past. E. Stokes and R. Brown, Eds. Manchester: Manchester University Press, pp. 94–136.

Scudder T.

1962 The Ecology of the Gwembe Tonga. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

1968 Social Anthropology, Man-made Lakes and Population Relocation in Africa. Anthropological Quarterly (USA) 41: 168–176.

1971 Gathering among African Woodland Savannah Cultivators: A Case Study: The Gwembe Tonga. Zambian Papers, No. 5. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

Selous F.C.

1893 Travels and Adventures in South-East Africa. London: Rowland Ward and Co.

Syaamusonde J. and Paul Schilling

1947 Naakoya Waamba Caano Cakwe and Monze Mukulu. Lovedale- The Lovedale Press.

</biblio>

© Elizabeth Colson 1977

 6. Regional and Non-regional Cults of Affliction in Western Zambia[36]

by Wim M.J. Van Binsbergen

 1. Introduction

A generic relation holds between two types of cult of affliction in Zambia's Western Province (formerly Barotseland). Cults of one type, the non-regional, form a substratum out of which cults of the other type, the regional, may spring forth under certain conditions, and into which they submerge again under different conditions. To understand this process and the conditions that govern it, I shall first describe the non-regional cults of affliction and then define the general characteristics by which the others set themselves apart from the substratum. Finally, I shall compare in some detail the development of two regional cults in order to make clear the importance of two series of variables: each distinct cult's characteristics of idiom and internal organizational structure, and the structural characteristics of the geographical area which the cult transforms into a cultic region.

Several working definitions are useful in order to establish the contrast, briefly, between the types of cult within the general class of cults of affliction. The first type covers a few regional cults which have three main characteristics. Each of these regional cults has a specific idiom of its own. This idiom is pursued by a number of local congregations spread over an area of thousands of square kilometres. Thirdly, and most importantly, an interlocal formal organization binds these dispersed congregations through the interactions of the cult's officials. In this way the geographical area over which the cult spreads is transformed into a region. What structures a cult's region is thus the processes of interlocal communication, interaction and distribution which the cult gives rise to. By contrast, the second type covers cults which I shall call non-regional. A cult of this type, too, has a specific cult idiom which is pursued by a number of congregations. However, although it may have spread over a vast area, it has not yet transformed the area into a region of its own, or it has ceased to do so and a former region has become merely a non-regional area.

As for the general class of cults of affliction, in terms of cult idiom individual affliction invariably stands out as a major concern. This is central in Turner's classic studies (1957; 1962; 1968) and in the earlier works (Kuntz 1932; White 1949; Gluckman 1943, 1951; McCulloch 1951: 72f; Turner 1952) which he developed. Turner coined the phrase, 'cult of affliction', to denote a cult (religious subsystem) characterised by two elements: (a) the cultural interpretation of misfortune (bodily disorders, bad luck) in terms of exceptionally strong domination by a specific non-human agent; (b) the attempt to remove the misfortune by having the afflicted join the cult venerating that specific agent. The major ritual forms of this class of cults consist of divinatory ritual in order to identify the agent, and initiation ritual through which the agent's domination of the afflicted is Emphatically recognised before an audience. In the standard local interpretation, the invisible agent inflicts misfortune as a manifest sign of his hitherto hidden relationship with the afflicted. The purpose of the ritual is to acknowledge the agent's presence and to pay him formal respect (by such conventional means as drumming, singing, clapping of hands, offering of beer, beads, white cloth and money). After this the misfortune is supposed to cease. The afflicted lives on as a member of that agent's specific cult; he participates in cult sessions to reinforce his good relations with the agent and to assist others, similarly afflicted, to be initiated into the same cult.

Cults of affliction represent a domihant class of cults in present-day Western Zambia. However, in addition there are ancestral cults, individual specialists' cults, chiefly cults and various types of Christian cults.[37] Of these, Christian cults and the major chiefly cults are regional (Van Binsbergen 1976d, 1977a).

 2. Non-Regional Cults of Affliction

* 2.1. Main Characteristics

Non-regional cults of affliction occur in scores of versions throughout Western Zambia and surrounding areas (Carter 1972; Van Binsbergen 1972b, 1976d). These various cults have much in common. They differ from each other mainly in the following respects: the associated paraphernalia (e.g. type of adept's shrine, musical instruments, vegetal medicine, ritual objects and bodily adornment used); the specific misfortunes for which each cult caters; and the name and alleged nature of the invisible agent venerated in each cult. Each cult is locally known by the name of this specific agent. Some particularly successful cults are encountered over large areas and are mentioned repeatedly in the literature; these include such cults as mayimbwe, muba, songo, viyaya, liyala and bindele.

We are indebted to Turner for his masterly description and analysis of some cults of affliction among the Ndembu. He shows the role of these cults in the succession of "social dramas" that make up the micro-history of villages over a time-span of several decades. However, he does not analyse the historical dimension of these cults themselves (cf. Shorter 1972: 141). In Turner's work these cults are viewed as given institutions that are manipulated within the local social process, rather than as the dynamic outcomes of a process of religious change that in itself needs elucidation.

White (1949, 1961) was the first to explore the cults' historical dimension. He pointed to a major conceptual shift that has affected cults of affliction in Luvale country, since the 1930's. The shift was away from cults that claimed local ancestors (particularly diviners and hunters) as their afflicting agents. It was towards new cults that attributed affliction to abstract, scarcely personalized agents whose names were reminiscent of contacts with distant alien groups, African and European. Some of these new cults were songo (after the Songo people of Angola), ndeke (airplane), bindele (white people or people clad in white: either Europeans or alien African traders). Turner's (1957: 296f) and my own fieldwork suggest, moreover, that the conceptual shift was accompanied by a shift in the recruitment pattern of the cults' congregations. This structural shift was from a ritual congregation that was rather coterminous with the local community and that focussed on communal symbols (village shrine, ancestors), to a congregation whose members, individually drawn from a series of adjacent local communities, would associate for ad hoc ritual purposes in a pattern that cuts across, rather than reinforces the structure of distinct local communities. However, as I shall show, in contrast to Turner's observations, my data point to the significance of local factors in the cults (see below, 2.4).

White suggested that the conceptual shift may be attributed to a complex of interrelated changes. These included increased interlocal contacts (through 19th century long-distance trade and 20th century labour migration), the breakdown of the village community, and the emergence of new causal models for the interpretation of misfortune. White interpreted these new models (featuring new, impersonal, non-ancestral affliction agents) as the conceptual response to the widening of the social horizon beyond the area where the ancestors could be thought to hold sway.

Elsewhere I have developed White's stimulating ideas in the light of more comprehensive data on religious change in this part of Central Africa (Van Binsbergen 1976d). There I argue that the emergence of these non-regional cults of affliction represents just one specific outcome in an overall process of religious transformation. This process has extended over centuries and, as other outcomes, has produced such religious forms as chiefly cults, prophetism concentrating on "ecological" concern for the land and its produce, eschatological prophetism, and sorcery eradication movements. Throughout a succession of emerging religious forms, the overall process produced systematic changes in religious idiom. These changes can be conveniently mapped along five dimensions: the perception of time; the degree of "ecological" concern; conceptions concerning the nature of supernatural beings; the degree of individual-centredness; and the interpretation of evil. Ultimately, major political and economic changes can be seen as the motor behind the overall religious transformation. In this context I am thinking primarily of the increase of interlocal structures of political and economic power, distribution, and movement of people due to precolonial and colonial state-formation, raiding, long distance trade, and labour migration. These extra-religious changes called for new religious forms (including non-regional cults of affliction) that were capable of legitimating the new structures and that could meet the existential and interpretative needs of the people involved.

My field data mainly derive from the Nkoya, an ethnic group inhabiting the wooded plateau of central Western Zambia (Clay 1945; McCulloch 1951; Symon 1959; Van Binsbergen 1975, 1976a, 1976b, 1976c). Among the Nkoya, ancestral cults of affliction have continued to exist until today, but the great majority of affliction cases is now treated within the more recent, non-ancestral cults, particularly those of the non-regional type to which the present section is devoted. People recognize the recent nature of these cults, and can state the period in which a particular cult first reached their area. The non-ancestral, non-regional cults of affliction spread like fashions or epidemics. For many cults occurring in an area it is known from which direction they arrived; they became locally associated with ethnic groups living in that direction, and are sometimes held, incorrectly, to represent those groups' ancestral ritual.[38] Intervals of a few years would pass between a new cult's arrival and its being forced out of fashion by the arrival of yet another one. As an area is hit by a succession of cult fashions, many people come to be initiated into more than one cult. As a fashion wears out, the ritual for that cult will be staged less frequently and fresh cases of affliction will be attributed mainly to more recently arrived cults.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-10.jpg]]

However, cult leaders keep staging the rituals of non-ancestral cults of somewhat older vintage. In this way they revive their ritual links with adepts whom they initiated some years before and who may since have taken not only to other cults but also to other leaders.

The spread and contemporary distribution of non-ancestral non-regional cults of affliction show that Central African ethnic groups ("tribes") are not rigidly bounded, either geographically or culturally (cf. Van Binsbergen) 1975). The cults spread easily from one ethnic group to another, despite such great language differences as between Luvale and Lenje, Tonga and Lozi. Moreover, immigrant adepts from a distant ethnic group often proved acceptable as local cult leaders (a point emphasized by Symon 1959). Cult songs have sometimes been translated into a local language, but have often been retained in the original language of the ethnic group from which this cult was borrowed locally. Sometimes the original ethnic group even gave its name to the cult (songo, chimbandu). All this bears out the fact that, among other aspects, the non-ancestral cults of affliction represent an attempt to come to terms (both conceptually and interactionally) with the reality of extensive, inter-ethnic, interlocal contacts.

* 2.2 Ritual

Usually the differences between the non-regional, non-ancestral cults of affliction which occur in one area, are slight. There is somewhat of a tendency—it is not invariable—to associate certain paraphernalia (a peculiar type of headdress or scapular, miniature axes and hoes, fly-switches etc.) and certain bodily movements with particular cults. The main way, however, to tell one cult from another is from the contents of the songs that are chanted during the sessions. Below are some typical song texts:

| 1
 Bakeshabe iyale yomana
yowelile mama bamikupe iyale yomama iyale yomama
lyiyo mama yowelile
(text used alternatively for kasheba, bamikupe and mushelu)
2
Tu ba kombele
biyaya bi neza tu ba kombele
biyaya mama
(text for biyaya)

3
Ba ka lenda mawulu mu pange mu ni yoyise lelo moyo mu pange mu ni yoyise bi nakunisisayela lelo moyo ba nganga na ba nganga kumpanga bafako
(text for kalenda-mawulu) |
From kasheba,really, mother,
I am ill, mother
from bamikupe, really mother,
I am ill, mother
o mother, I am ill

We pray for biyaya has come we pray
for biyaya, mother

For this foot disease, treat me to make me alive today the life treat me to make me alive they don’t restore my life today these cult leaders or those cult leaders
they don’t treat me |

These songs are sung by a small chorus of adepts, instructed and led by a cult's local leader, usually a woman. The adepts (usually women) stand in a semi-circle which is closed by a row of (male) musicians. Within this enclosure the cult leader and one or more novices dance, and enter into a trance. Before the session starts the leader has undertaken to treat the novices. She exhorts the latter, the chorus and the musicians so that the novices' movements may catch up and gradually harmonize with the music. Thus the novices may reach ecstasy. In the course of most sessions vegetal medicine is prepared from a selection of plant species which varies with each cult. Although each session tends to be dominated by the songs and ritual for one particular cult (the one in which the leader excels), often elements of other cults are used in abundance. This is particularly the case when a patient cannot be brought to respond properly to a session's main cult. Then one cult after another has to be tried in order to arrive at the correct diagnosis and treatment. Sessions last through the night and end at dawn with the final distribution of medicine to novices and adepts and occasionally to non-participant onlookers. For in contrast with the situation in the extreme north-west of Zambia, as described by Turner, in this area a small audience of non-adepts is present at every session, to share in the beer, to help out with the music, and to witness the patients' struggle for healing.

* 2.3 Morality

Part of the night's proceedings is, however, private: the therapeutic conversations which the leader and some senior adepts have with each novice. Their aim is to ascertain the specific personal conditions under which the affliction, dormant until then, has become manifest. Such conditions include a recent death, ill-will and suspected sorcery in the patient's environment, or the occurrence of a major healer, diviner or hunter among the patient's deceased kin.

The information obtained in the "anamnesis"[39], however, is not fed into the patient's social environment. The information only serves to identify, to the officiants' satisfaction, the occasion at which the affliction agent chose to manifest itself. Even if this occasion highlights interpersonal conflict and illicit aggression (in the way of sorcery), moral redress, rehabilitation or prosecution never become the cult's concern. Once the diagnosis in terms of the cult's etiology has been pronounced, the cult tries to curb the invisible agent's harmful effects, but does not try to take away any group-dynamical causes of the misfortune. The non-ancestral, non-regional cults of affliction aim at individual readjustment. They fight symptoms of maladjustment but do not try to expose or resolve any underlying social tension. Nor are they meant to do so. These cults are concerned with suffering, and not with morality. Their frame of reference features patients afflicted by essentially unpredictable, non-human agents—and not victims injured by human evil-doers or by the effects (through ancestral revenge) of their own sins.

The non-ancestral non-regional cults, however, exist side by side with rival and alternative approaches to misfortune, which do emphasize morality and guilt, reparation and retaliation. Among the contemporary Nkoya, these rival approaches are frequently applied. They include: divinatory and redressive ritual in the idiom of ancestral intervention; similar ritual in the idiom of sorcery and counter-sorcery; litigation in more or less formal courts of law (Van Binsbergen 1976c); and finally regional cults of affliction, whose relation to non-regional cults with regard to morality I shall discuss below in section 3. A number of venues for redress are thus open to an individual facing misfortune. The choice is largely his own. He may apply to a diviner/healer known for diagnosis in terms of a cult of affliction, rather than to one who habitually propounds interpretations in terms of ancestors or sorcery; or he may apply to a court. The actor's underlying decision model is complex and can only be analysed on the basis of detailed description of the various institutions involved, and of specific extended cases. However, if one pursues the option of cults of affliction, this can be safely said to indicate one's reluctance to publicly present one's misfortune as caused by human conflict (sorcery, court) or guilty neglect in one's dealings with kin (ancestors). Such reluctance usually reflects lack of power, material resources and social support; the victim can neither answer a challenge through counter-sorcery and litigation, nor face such public disapproval as offences punished by ancestors inspire. Non-ancestral cults of affliction, however, interpret misfortune as an entirely individual condition which (in contrast with sorcery, ancestral intervention, or litigation) is not primarily determined by the victim's interaction with other people—although such interaction may form the occasion for the hidden affliction to manifest itself for the first time. Amongst the institutions dealing with misfortune, these cults have, therefore, a marked competitive advantage among certain people: those who are dependent, relatively powerless, and short of social credit. Little wonder, then, that most of the patients in the non-ancestral cults of affliction are women and youths. Mature and elderly men, as a rule, pursue other venues for redress. And if they involve themselves at all in such cults of affliction, it is not as patients, but (occasionally) as cult leaders, as musicians, and particularly as sponsors for their womenfolk.

This implies that at least for women, as patients, the cults of affliction do not provide an idiom of internalized powerlessness, but rather an alternative way to demand, and receive., male support—albeit outside the arenas where mature men compete with each other. This, of course, does not preclude such competition between leaders and sponsors (see Werbner, 1971–1972: 235).

* 2.4 Roles, Personnel and Organization

For a successful session all the following conditions have to be met. The cult leader must be generally recognized and accomplished. The chorus (of a minimal size of four or five adepts) must know the basic song texts and must be prepared to assist in the proceedings. Musicians are needed who know or can quickly pick up the music peculiar to the various cults, and who are prepared to follow the directions of the leader. Musical instruments, beer and firewood are required. And finally, somebody has to organize and meet its expenses.

In a rural society where firewood is becoming less abundant, where beer has become a marketable commodity,and where drums and other instruments are scarce and privately owned, the logistics of the sessions often turn out to be quite complicated and problematic. Each session necessarily involves the sponsor, and the other participants in the session, in a network of transactions and obligations that both reflect, and bear upon, the extrareligious social process in the community. Good musicians cannot always be recruited from amongst a sponsor’s close kin, and even if they can, they often demand a payment roughly equivalent to a day’s wages. The adepts who constitute the chorus, do not receive any remuneration beyond a share in the beer that the sponsor furnishes for the cult leader. Besides this beer, and occasional gifts of white cloth, bottled fizzy drinks, bottled beer and other luxuries, the leader receives a small sum of money for the diagnosis and treatment during the session. This sum is again equivalent to a day’s wages. Even more important, the leader establishes a firm claim (actionable in court) against a much larger sum, easily a month’s wages. This large fee is payable any time after the patient has made significant improvement—no matter what additional treatments are pursued elsewhere.

From the sponsor’s side, therefore, the session involves immediate costs that are considerable, both in social and financial terms and, if the treatment is successful, heavy debts in the future. For the leader, the session means a significant gain immediately, and very likely a large financial claim in the future. At the same time, it also means a public test both of ritual skill and of such management power as is required for the mobilization of the chorus in the first place (it is the sponsor’s responsibility to recruit the musicians), and for the leader’s control over adepts and musicians during the many hours of the session. The adepts in the chorus clearly hold a key position. They are indispensible to the leader’s success but hardly share in the latter’s ‘ benefits.

The basic organizational form of non-regional cults of affliction is a smdll faction of loyal adepts around a leader, all living within walking or cycling distance from each other: within a radius not exceeding 10 kilometres, and usually much less. The leader can control the chorus’ adepts in two cases, which often coincide: when the adepts are themselves still under a course of treatment with the same leader (and treatment may, partly for this reason, be extended over a period of years); and when the adepts are very close kin of the leader. Kinship ties among the Nkoya are, however, not automatically effective in bringing about and maintaining solidary social relationships. In order to be effective they need to be backed up by frequent interaction, e.g. through co-residence. Attachments between kin are readily disrupted as people change their residence in order to seek their economic and local-political fortune elsewhere, among a different set of real or putative kin. Such individual intra-rural geographical mobility is extremely frequent and, in fact, constitutes a major structural theme in Nkoya society. Likewise, the curative link between leader and adept is often threatened, both by rival leaders who compete for adepts (as well as for new patients), and by the senior adept's own aspiration to set up as a leader herself. Therefore, within (and between) the cultic factions tensions and conflicts are rife; and these tend to come to the fore during sessions, when the leader is most dependent upon the adepts. I have never attended a session that was not repeatedly interrupted by heated argument between the officiants. After a session there tend to be shifts in the faction's internal structure of relationships, and even in its membership.

The leader's status is rather insecure. Non-regional cults of affliction define the roles of leader, adept and novice, but they do not stipulate in detail the requirements by which one gets access to these statuses. These cults do not have a formal organization with fixed rules of eligibiity to office. Instead, recognized ritual leadership is a matter of public opinion. Whoever can persuade others to let themselves be treated by her, and can mobilize the necessary assistance, is a cult leader. On the other hand, a leader whose curative effectiveness begins to be doubted by many (partly as a result of her being forced out of competition by rivals) loses her patients and adepts.

How does one get launched as a leader? Long-term apprenticeship as an adept of an established leader is one way. In the take-off period as a leader, other standard methods to woo public opinion include self-appointed curative capabilities which are claimed to derive from dreams, from accession to the name of a deceased relative who was a well-known healer, or from a serious psycho-physical disturbance now overcome by a recovery— so that one is now acquainted, better than most people, with the experience of illness and death. Gradually, new*songs (often featuring the name of the leader herself), an original choice of paraphernalia, a notebook in which the names of treated patients may be recorded, fake or real licenses issued by local authorities, can all help to lend credibility and identity to the new leader. In this search for a personal "trade-mark", considerable expense and creativity is invested; even though the result is usually a permutation of the same limited set of elements used by all leaders and all non-regional cults of affliction.

The main condition, however, to make the grade as a cult leader is the construction of a local network of loyal adepts who can assist in the treatment of new patients.

My use of the term “faction” for the basic local unit of officiants, has suggested the problematic internal dynamics, the shifting membership of these units, and (as a major cause of this) the intense competition between units. In the immediate social environment of each afflicted individual, a number of leaders with their temporarily loyal adepts are active. Leaders are in competition with each other both for the senior adepts on whom their practice is dependent, and for new novices who will boost the leader’s public status and bring in large fees.

The fees enhance a leader’s power in two ways. Once received, this wealth is largely redistributed in non-ritual transactions with kin and neighbours. But since most fees cannot be paid immediately, they also tie the patients to the leader with heavy debts. Both ways, the leader’s power must have considerable effect on the extra-religious social process. Moreover, the fees are so high and cash is so scarce in the villages, that the modern cults can be properly said to constitute a major redistributive economic institution. This holds true not only between villages, but also between village and town. Rural-based leaders treat afflicted urban migrants either by receiving them on short visits in the rural area, or by travelling to town at irregular intervals.

Both within and outside the religious domain, leaders hold enviable positions which they are constantly defending against the encroachment of others. As adepts and leaders have usually been initiated into more than one non-regional cult of affliction, and as the basic idiom of these cults is constant and well-known, an adept’s shift from one leader to another (which often means: from one cult to another) presents no great difficulties in terms of knowledge and skills. Leaders greatly resent it when such a shift diminishes their effective following. For this reason, leaders tend to avoid each other and, when they operate within the same social field, are often at daggers drawn because of having snatched each other’s followers in the past. Sometimes, however, leaders combine locally, stage sessions together and visit each other’s sessions as guests of honour. On such occasions, emphasis is on manifestations of mutual professional respect, symbolized by the ostentatious furnishing of a chair for each leader[40]. But even then each leader is on her guard lest her colleagues make too favourable an impression on the audience, or attempt to lure adepts and patients away. Only when such professional contacts are backed up by residence in each other’s proximity along with close kinship ties and good extra-religious relations in general, can they be seen to develop into stable, prolonged co-operation. In such a case leaders are no longer afraid of mutual poaching; they share patients and adepts.

These local ritual factions with their occasional co-operation between leaders, constitute all the rudimentary organizational structure that the non-regional cults of affliction possess. Leaders are predominantly ritual entrepreneurs, who exploit a local market on the basis of the population s general adherence to the cult of affliction model. Even between leaders in different localities who profess that they specialise in the same named cult (e.g. Viyaya), there is normally no contact—and often downright avoidance. Each may have learned this cult’s ritual in a different place, may have added her own innovations, and would have her own local clientele to consider. The differences between the ritual performances of two such leaders of the same cult may be greater than those between leaders who avowedly specialize in different cults. Each elaborates on the general idiom of the cults of affliction in her own personal way, without any interlocal formal organization binding local leaders or dictating any orthodoxy. Public opinion is prepared to accept a leader’s reputation and following as proofs of expertise, and it favours any innovation that does not greatly run counter to local canons of decency. But such public opinion concerning the cults is in itself mainly a response to the actions and pronouncements of the cult leaders. Thus it is by virtue of a widespread cultural model that each non-regional cult of affliction exists: each cult has its unstructured series of small factions which are disconnected, local and rather ephemeral. The widespread cultural model is continuously reinforced, at the grass-roots level, by the uncoordinated activities of hundreds of leaders in search of wealth, power, ritual prestige, and self-expression.

* 2.5 Ritual Leadership as a Callin

While exploring the political and economic dimensions of the non-regional cults of affliction, we should avoid reducing them to these and nothing more. Leaders, adepts, patients and outsiders are keenly aware of the economic and local-political aspects of the cults. Yet all of them Consider the cults' healing efficacy their overriding justification.

The leaders, mainly elderly women, are not cynical operators and no more. They are gifted and passionate manipulators of symbols: song texts, paraphernalia, dramatic effects—and cash. Through an existential crisis earlier in life they have often paid the price (not just financially) towards becoming specialists in human suffering and some of its remedies. Their life-histories tell of prolonged illness, periods of insanity, ridicule by fellowvillagers confronted with the aspiring leader's first, clumsy attempts at being a healer, and more recently the treachery of once loyal patients who have at last set up as leaders themselves and no longer pay respects to one who, in her own view, fought for their very lives. A leader's strikingly intense and agile performance during the long nocturnal sessions may be partly motivated by a drive for money and power. But it has as much to do with art, while the prime concern is to heal a fellowman. If the ritual does not appear to succeed, it is not only a threat to professional prestige, but also compassion that forces the leader to exert herself for hours at a stretch, finally to bring the patient to join in the rhythm—thus making recovery possible.

Better than anyone else, the leader understands and believes in the idiom of the cults of affliction. She is the mediator of a conceptual system which is commensurate with the changing social order in which she and her patients find themselves. Offering deliverance from suffering is a professional calling for which the easy life, food, marriage, all have to be sacrificed. The leader Kashikashika vividly describes how her calling affects her life:

<quote>

"At home I have no time to eat. I eat with one hand, keeping one hand on the head of a patient. (Laying-on of hands is a minor form of treatment in the cults in which she specialises.) I have no time to dress, but instead walk about in my short petticoats. I have no time to sleep. In the middle of the night people come and knock at my door for treatment.

“Years ago, a man fell in love with me and wanted marriage. I told him: ‘Before I go and live with you, realize how my calling affects my life. I shall often have to go out in the night. Sometime I shall have to stay away from you for three months at a stretch, to attend to my patients!’ But he did not want to listen and went ahead with the marriage. After a month he started complaining, and we soon divorced. Now I am married again, with one of my patients. He says: ‘Look, she has cured me. Should I complain when she goes out and stays away to cure others like me?...’.”

</quote>

The husband is present and amply confirms that this is indeed his view of the matter.

Underneath this testimony of professional sacrifice there is, unmistakably, a note of pride and female power quite characteristic of elderly Nkoya women, and of cult leaders a fortiori. But at any rate, calling obliges; and many leaders have strict personal standards as to the size of fees, the requirements for proper diagnosis, and the ethics of dealing with uncooperative debtors amongst their patients.[41] Without exception, leaders have themselves suffered, in the past, from the afflictions they treat, and usually they are still in frequent silent communication with their own affliction agent, inside. Allegedly, the agent advises on the leader’s wellbeing, but he does not take mockery and is sure to punish a cheating leader of his cult. Adepts and patients are aware of this security device, too, and as a rule expect fair play from the cult leaders they deal with.

The high revenues and other benefits in terms of power and prestige associated with cult leadership, can hardly fail to appeal to the ambitious and calculating sides of the incumbents’ character. Yet I would maintain that the requirements in terms of artistic and emotional dedication, and in terms of self-confidence vis-a-vis the symbols manipulated in the cults, are such as to make the sham leader, who stages for money’s sake a ritual whose efficacy she secretly denies, a rare occurrence.

 3. Regional Cults of Affliction in Western Zambia: General Characteristics

Due to a succession of non-regional cults of affliction that had been spreading over Western Zambia for several decades, the general idiom of such cults had become established by the 193O’s. By this time the new type of regional cult of affliction emerged. So far, three cults of this type have been studied: Nzila (also known as the Twelve Society), Bituma, and Moya. It is likely, however, that Western Zambia has witnessed the rise of several more, which subsequent research may throw light upon. The first description of Nzila is by Reynolds (1963: 133f), on the basis of an administrative report by I.H. Whethey in 1957.[42] In 1972, Miss M. Muntemba carried out research into this cult, mainly in the Livingstone area (Muntemba 1972); I am greatly indebted to her for the lengthy conversations we have had on the subject. The Bituma cult played a major role in my Nkoya fieldwork (cf. Van Binsbergen 1972a for a preliminary account of the cult). Ranger (1972) gives lengthy excerpts from both Muntemba’s and my own descriptions. The Moya cult is briefly discussed by Ikacana (1971: 33); although this author mentions the healer Liminanganga as this cult’s main leader in Kaoma (then Mankoya) district, thus suggesting a certain centralization that is characteristic of a regional cult, his further discussion gives the impression that by the 1940’s Moya was a non-regional cult. During my fieldwork in the early 1970’s, however, a regional cult of the same name was active in the eastern part of the district, where, headed by a prophet called Moya after his cult, it had penetrated only a few years previously—but perhaps not for the first time. My limited data on this cult do not enable me to decide whether it became a regional cult only recently, or was already one in Ikacana’s time.

Like the factional, non-regional cults described above, these three regional cults are cults of affliction. They interpret disease and misfortune by reference to a non-human agent, and attempt to redress the disorder through divination and subsequent initiation into the cult. As cults of affliction deriving from the same cultural area, the regional and non-regional cults have on the surface much in common. However, there are very significant differences between the two types.

The most striking aspect of Nzila, Bituma and Moya is their regional organization. These cults each have a central place, which is the seat of the cult’s supreme leader. Cult officers appointed by the leader are responsible for sections of the total area over which the cult has spread. They communicate regularly between local cult congregations and headquarters. In close cooperation with the supreme leader, they recruit new local adepts and leaders, enforce observance of the cult’s regulations (e.g. concerning the size of fees for treatment, and the forwarding of a portion of the fees to headquarters), supervise the ritual locally, and guard against undue autonomy and ritual deviation of local leaders. In contrast with the non-regional cults, effective leadership of a local congregation depends not so much on the manipulation of public opinion and the control of a loyal local ritual following, but primarily on admission and promotion within the cult’s hierarchy, subject to approval from headquarters. Literacy, in its simplest forms, plays a role; one may keep a record of the number of patients healed, of their names, and of the fixed fees for each type of treatment. The regional cults are more or less formal organizations that enforce, among local cult leaders, ritual conformity, compliance with the cult’s authority structure, and the forwarding of funds, over areas of many thousand square kilometres.

We have seen how leaders in non-regional cults of affliction tend to make considerable innovations upon the cultic material they use. Also, these leaders have usually gone through deep personal crises before establishing themselves as cult leaders. In these respects they have much in common with the founders of Nzila, Bituma and Moya. However, in the case of the non-regional cults a leader’s specific innovations and personal history are played down as irrelevant. The leader is viewed not as the inventor but as the mere transmitter of cultic forms which, allegedly, have already existed elsewhere and which could have been made available locally by any other leader. The regional cults, by contrast, are quite sharply considered to be founded by a particular prophet, whose name, visions, life history, the process in the course of which he shaped his cult, are all held to be very important and are often known even among non-adepts. In contrast with the leaders of non-regional cults of affliction, Chana (founder of Nzila), Simbinga (founder of Bituma), and Moya (founder of the Moya cult) all started out as charismatic leaders in the Weberian sense (Weber 1969: 358f). Each displayed what I have elsewhere (Van Binsbergen 1976d: 71) called the “standard biographical pattern for Central-African religious innovators”. Each reached prophethood through the same stages. Falling victim to a chronic disease or defect is a first stage. Chana was a leper and suffered from the bindele affliction which, however, the non-regional bindele cult proved unable to cure. (Later the difference between Chana's affliction and bindele was acknowledged by renaming the former nzila: "path".) Simbinga and Moya likewise suffered from afflictions of a nature until then unknown. In the next stage the affliction would develop to a crisis (which in the cases of Simbinga and Moya allegedly involved temporary death, in Simbinga's case even burial). In this crisis the prophet allegedly received very specific messages and directions from the supernatural agent claiming responsibility for the affliction. Following the indications received in the messages, the prophet would be able to recover. He would then have the power and the calling to apply his new insights to those in his social environment who were similarly afflicted. These first patients (twelve in Chana's case, seven in Simbinga's) would form the original core of the cult, soon to be augmented through the combined efforts of prophet and initial followers.

The regional cults do not merely share the affliction-cult idiom with the non-regional cults. The former actually emerged upon the substratum of these earlier, non-regional cults. All three started as an individual's response to an affliction that could have been cured within the established non-regional cults of affliction. Instead, the three patients devised their own cults.

Now why did these three prospective prophets fail to get healed within the existing non-regional cults of affliction? For all three, contemporary informants claim that they had tried such treatment; in Chana's and Moya's case, modern medical services were consulted as well. The standard course of their crises suggests that, in addition to any bodily disorders, a profound mental struggle was involved, bearing on existential problems such as the meaning of suffering and the interpretation of the universe. The then current, non-regional cults revolved around affliction-causing agents of an abstract and hardly personalized nature, mainly conveying associations with alienness and neighbouring ethnic groups. The solutions the three prospective prophets were seeking were to be—to judge from what they came up with—of a less particularistic and human scope. In the accounts of the founders' original visions and in their current interpretations of affliction cases and their treatment, the three regional cults propound strikingly similar, new conceptions concerning the nature of the supernatural agents involved in affliction. Chana, Simbinga and Moya attributed .their visions, their miraculous recovery and their subsequent healing power to entities-closely associated with or, identical to, the High God. In Chana’s case this was a spirit who in dreams and visions manifested itself as a white being, exhorting him to acknowledge God, invoke God’s help, and preach about God to his patients. Simbinga had similar visions, which he interpreted in terms of an Angel (Angero) from God. Moya’s interpretations concentrate on the Life-Spirit (Moya), source of life and capable of dispensing health and illness at will. These are concepts of a much greater universality and with much more specifically theistic connotations than the affliction-causing principles of the non-regional cults.

But while this conceptual shift may have primarily sprung from the specific existential problems of the three prophets, the latter were at the same time yielding to a general tendency which since the beginning of this century has been encountered in quite a number of religious innovations in Western Zambian. Most of these movements had no specific concern with healing. They include a number of Ila prophets, amongst whom is the great prophet Mupumani (1913) whose movement had an impact throughout Western Zambia and the surrounding countries; minor eschatological prophets in Mamwala, Kalabo and Mwinilunga; the numerous Watchtower preachers and dippers moving through the area in the late 1920’s and the 1930’s; and even the Christian missionaries. All these religious innovators displayed the same conceptual shift towards ever greater prominence of the High God (Van Binsbergen 1976d).

A final major difference between the regional and the non-regional cults of affliction is that the former do display a moral element which, as we have seen, is lacking in the latter. Chana was instructed by the Spirit:

<quote>

“to teach the people what to do and what not" (Muntemba 1972: 2).

</quote>

He was given

<quote>

“rules and instructions he was to teach his people at the Sunday afternoon gatherings.(...) the rules centre around purity of mind and spirit as the key to a healthy body. At the Livingstone branch service about one hour and thirty minutes are given to instructing the people, in the form of question and answer, in how to attain purity. (...) Members are exhorted to keep clean thoughts and clean minds by not bearing malice against their husband or wife, their brothers, sisters, in-laws and neighbours but instead to love. They are warned against bearing false witness, to avoid quarrelling and drink, drink which often leads to quarrels and other irresponsible acts. They are admonished against eating certain foods (...) which are considered unclean and which would therefore foul the body and soul of man” (Muntemba 1972: 5f).

</quote>

Reynolds gives a similar picture and emphasizes the patients’ surrender of sorcery apparatus in this context (1963: 135, 138).

In the teachings of Simbinga and Moya the same emphasis on purity versus pollution is encountered. For them, the whole range of local medicine represents evil and pollution in its fundamental form. When Simbinga was called to prophethood in the early 1930’s, he immediately launched a fierce attack on local herbalists, diviners, and leaders of non-regional cults of affliction. He wanted them to give up their manipulations of material apparatuses, paraphernalia and medicine, and instead accept his own interpretation of misfortune (which by this time, however, was still blurred and inconsistent), and his treatment by means of laying-on of hands, prayer and dancing.

This is a moral issue for various reasons. First, much local medicine was (and is) locally applied for purposes which, however common in the local society, were considered immoral acts of sorcery: to attain excessive power and success; to harm or kill rivals and enemies. Moreover, especially the most powerful medicine derived from sinful manipulations of human bodies that were killed or desecrated for the purpose. And finally, on the basis of his visions Simbinga, like the two other prophets, presented an alternative theory of causation of affliction, whose universalist and theistic overtones implied a moral rejection of previous, medicine-centred interpretations.

Simbinga was at first unsuccessful in his attack. The local practitioners proved disinclined to accept his views. They mobilized public opinion against Simbinga and after a relapse of his affliction he had to leave his area. He travelled to the north-west (to the Balovale—now Zambezi—area). After a few years he returned with a revised version of his cult. This time material paraphernalia, divining apparatus, and vegetal medicine had been given a prominent place in the Bituma idiom. However, the cult has retained its abhorrence of all other forms of medicine and material apparatus, and still considers envy, rivalry and sorcery the main occasions upsetting the harmony between a man and his Angel—interpreting the Bituma affliction as the manifestation of such disruption.

The Moya cult has adopted a rather similar position. But whereas Bituma, though conscious of the dangers involved, does not absolutely forbid its adepts the possession and manipulation of medicine, Moya does—including hunting or fishing medicine, or products from modern dispensaries. In both cults, adepts and particularly leaders are continually aware of the dangers of pollution that threaten them everywhere. For this reason they may avoid certain persons and activities. However, beyond the reluctance to apply sorcery medicine to further their own interests, the purity-orientated personal morality as derived from the regional cults appears to have little impact on everyday life.

For even if the regional cults differ from the non-regional ones with regard to moral connotations, they are quite similar in a more fundamental respect. Both types of cults are based on an individual-centred interpretation of misfortune: misfortune is considered solely a matter of the relationship between victim and an unpredictable supernatural agent. These cults do not link misfortune to the small-scale social proceses in which the victims are involved, and therefore cannot have a direct impact on such processes.

There is an intimate relation between these three outstanding features of the regional cults: their founders’ charisma, the appeal to more universal, theistic supernatural agents, and the introduction of a moral element. In the idiom of spirit possession, association with alien or neighbouring ethnic groups might well provide a basis for personal charisma. But somehow this seems less effective in a society where through interlocal contacts across ethnic boundaries, such association has become commonplace over the past century, and where a considerable variety of religious innovatory movements have already effected an overall tendency towards greater prominence of the High God. Under these conditions, visionary experiences involving supernatural entities of a much wider scope are more likely to endow exceptional individuals with the charismatic qualities that could lead to effective mobilization over a vast area. In other words, I suggest that the founders' charisma, and their propounding of universalist, theistic supernatural agents, imply each other.

Although universalist, theistic concepts were circulating in the area well outside the sphere of missionary Christianity, the three prophets started out under the latter s direct influence. Prior to their appearance as prophets, both Chana and Simbinga had been thoroughly exposed to missionary Christianity. Chana's parents had been converts of the Seventh Day Adventist Church, and Chana belonged to this church before his prophetic calling. He even continued to adhere to this church while heading the Nzila cult (Muntemba 1972: 7f. Reynolds 1963: 133f suggests the contrary). Simbinga was among the first evangelists of the fundamentalist South Africa General Mission at Luampa, and appears to have received further Christian teaching as a labour migrant in South Africa. Although very little is known yet of Moya's biography, the preponderance of Christian elements in the ritual of his cult (bible copies, church bells, and a supernatural entity whose name is the current local translation of the Christian concept of the "Holy Ghost") reveals a similar background.

If the universalist, theistic elements endowed the prophets with just the amount of charisma they required to set up regional cults, their propounding of moral elements fits well into the same picture. As Weber (1969: 361) wrote, "From a substantive point of view, every charismatic authority would have to subscribe to the proposition, 'It is written..., but I say unto you...' The genuine prophet, like the genuine military leader and every true leader in this sense, preaches, creates, or demands new obligations".

However, the development of a regional cult organization is an aspect not of charismatic leadership itself, but of its subsequent routinization (Weber 1969: 363f). Given the charisma, universalist and theistic agents, and moral emphasis by which the regional cults differ from the substratum of non-regional cults of affliction from which they sprang, the development of more or less formal interlocal organization does by no means follow automatically. Instead, such development represents a major analytical problem. Apart from the ill-documented Moya cult, we are fortunate in having, in the Nzila and Bituma cults, two reasonably well-known cases whose development into regional cults displays such divergence, that a detailed comparison is likely to yield some insights into the general dynamics of regional cults.

 4. The Development of Nzila and Bituma as Regional Cults

* 4.1 Nzila

After a spell of labour migration in Zimbabwe, Chana returned to his village in Kalabo district. He developed his affliction, cured himself through the methods shown to him in his visions, and appeared as a prophet in the early 1940's.[43] His methods involved the erection of a shrine, daily ablutions in this shrine with water medicated by selected herbs, and nocturnal ritual dances. Having recovered, Chana successfully applied this method to his first twelve patients, thus obtaining his first followers: the twelve first Nzila "doctors". Subsequent visions instructed him to put faith in God, to organize weekly services for Him on Saturday afternoons and to extend his activities to moral teachings. Thus a formal ritual routine was worked out, quite reminiscent of a Christian church service; the influence, in particular, of the Seventh Day Adventist Church is unmistakable (Muntemba 1972: passim; Reynolds 1963: 137). Assisted by his doctors, Chana treated a rapidly increasing number of patients in the Kalabo, Mongu, Senanga and Kaoma districts. A cult centre was erected near Mongu, the capital of the then Barotse Province (now Western Province). The growth of the cult was such that already in 1952 a larger building had to be constructed. At the cult centre, Chana would personally diagnose the patients' affliction as his own. After the diagnosis, the patient would return to his place of residence, where under the guidance of one of the doctors he would construct a windbreak in which he was to wash every morning, using medicated water. This would be continued until the patient appeared to be cured—which could take up to five months. Patient and attending doctor would then apply again to the cult centre, where Chana would subject the former to a series of tests in order to ascertain if he was truly cured. Some of these tests would be public and within sight of the weekly gatherings at the centre, whereas the final test would take place in Chana's sacred enclosure (Reynolds 1963: 136f). This finished, the patient would be told what he had to pay:

<quote>

'Payment is normally in the form of livestock; a cow, a few pigs or goats, but frequently, a fairly substantial sum of money has to be paid. He must also bring a beast to slaughter for the feast that night' (Reynolds 1963:137).

</quote>

During this feast the cured patient would be installed as a new doctor of the Nzila cult. This gave him the right to build his own sacred enclosure at his own residence. He would have authority to attend on new patients during their months of ritual washing, but could not use his own sacred enclosure to diagnose or pronounce final recovery: this would have to be carried out at the cult centre, by Chana personally.

In the mid-1950's the Mongu centre under Chana's direct leadership catered for the Mongu, Kalabo, and Kaoma district; a subsidiary branch, led by one of the twelve doctors, was then already in operation in the Senanga district. Branches soon began to proliferate. Muntemba (1972: 3) reports that

<quote>

"By the late 1950's it (the cult) had spread to most areas in Zambia that had strong Western Province influences and also to Bulawayo and parts of Botswana. In the 1960's branches were started in most towns along the line of rail including the Copperbelt. (...) People not only from Western Province but from other societies became Nzila members as well. The movement was registered as the Zambia Nzila Sect in 1966. Its membership stood at 80,000 people ihen. On 30th March, 1972, the membership figure stood at 96,872."

</quote>

Thus in a quarter of a century the Nzila cult developed from a core of a handful of followers around a charismatic leader, into a fully-fledged interlocal formal organization with government recognition, branches and property (in the form of buildings for worship) in most major towns of Zambia. The supreme leader's personal control over the crucial stages in the healing of each patient became, of course, no longer practicable. Branches and their leaders now enjoy a certain autonomy, which is however effectively checked by an interlocal organizational structure ensuring overall conformity of both belief and ritual, central administration of membership figures, and centralised control over the recruitment and performance of officers. This control is effected by the Annual Convention at the cult's headquarters, by the distribution of essential paraphernalia,[44] and by formal examinations concerning the cult's beliefs and regulations.

Here a creative process must be appreciated in order to see the general significance of this development of a regional organization in the Nzila cult. Imitation is not the crux of this development; Nzila is far more than a mere copy on the model of a Christian church. A failure to appreciate this leads Wilson (1975) to a radical misreading of the cult, and a wrong generalization about the primacy of imitation in the organizational development of sects. From Reynolds' account of Nzila, Wilson (1975: 92f) wrongly infers that Nzila developed no other congregations than the Mongu one over which Chana presided. Wilson goes on to speculate that

<quote>

"the abilities and facilities necessary for a more elaborate structure, however, were probably not yet available in Barotseland. Only where an organizational model of another type of movement can be imitated should we expect thaumaturgical responses (such as witchcraft-eradication movements and cults of affliction—WVB) to take on these structural characteristics which we associate with sects in advanced society. Such imitation, combining central direction with branch churches over a wide area, first occurred in this region in the Lumpa church.” (1975: 93f).

</quote>

Applied to the Lumpa church of Alice Lenshina the explanation in terms of an imitation of the mission as organizational model (Wilson 1975: 94f) is gross and superficial—particularly in view of Roberts’ authoritative statement that “there is very little information of any kind on the internal organization of the Lumpa church—a most important subject which perhaps will never properly be elucidated” (Roberts 1972: 3; see also Ranger 1973, for a critical review of Wilson’s approach, and Van Binsbergen 1977b).

Wilson’s errors are plain. Nzila did evolve branches over a very wide area, and even Reynolds mentions the early Senanga branch. Therefore, the structural requirements for a regional organization were obviously met in Barotseland in the 1940’s. The Bituma and Moya cults, as I will discuss below, show that Nzila was not even the only cult to develop such regional organization. Admittedly, all three cults borrowed part of their idiom from Christian churches (this is clearly what Wilson means by “another type of movement”). Moreover, the fact that Nzila was embedded in a social environment dominated by formal, bureaucratic organizations (including Christian churches) appears to have favoured Nzila’s expansion (see section 4.4 below). Nevertheless, it is a gross error to explain the development of regional organization as merely an imitation of the Christian church model. Such an explanation wholly ignores the creative process by which new organizational solutions have been gradually worked out in Nzila and similar cults. These solutions were primarily determined not by the desire to imitate an outside organizational model, but, as I demonstrate in the following discussion, by the founders’ personalities, their relations with their early followers and the structural characteristics of the cults’ regions.

* 4.2 Bituma

The development of Bituma is much less of a success story. Simbinga’s first attempt to found a cult failed. Public opinion rejected his claims of prophethood. His first activities (which included the propagation of unusual healing methods and the free distribution of his herd of cattle) were considered the acts of a madman. His early attack on what he considered the impurity of established healers and diviners, including his cousin Kapata, contributed to his public rejection. He left the area. However, when he returned in the late 1930's, he was in possession of an elaborate collection of paraphernalia,[45] and much more developed views concerning the nature of the afflictioncausing Angel. The affliction henceforth became known as Bituma ("sent him") or Chituma ("message"), referring to Simbinga's prophetic commission or (according to other present-day informants) to the Angel, who sends affliction and is himself sent by the High God. Simbinga shifted the area of his activities towards the east: the central and eastern parts of Kaoma district. There he treated his first seven patients, including Kapata. Kapata, and several others among these first followers, only joined Bituma after a career of intense personal crises involving previous initiation into such non-regional cults of affliction as kayongo and mayimbwe. In this respect they were Simbinga's junior colleagues, rather than his disciples; they had access to experiences similar to those on which Simbinga's charisma was based.

Simbinga built for himself a small, hut-like shrine (called kreki, "church") and made his initial followers do the same at their own places of residence. At these shrines healing sessions would be held at irregular intervals, according to the demand from patients. The session would start and conclude with prayer, and be built around songs featuring Simbinga and crucial signs of his prophetic calling: his communication with heaven, and his rising from death:

| 1
Tukuyako, tukuyako We are going, we are going ku ngonda, ku ngonda to the moon, to the moon (allegedly the first song Simbinga composed when he rose from death, claiming that he had been at the moon).

2
Thangwe ngoma Start beating the drum ngwa Shimbinga here comes Simbinga
(a song Simbinga used during ritual dances in the first years).

3
Kombelela nganga wayamukalunga Shimbanda-mwane nganga yetu yele kombelele nganga
wayamukalunga Shimbanda-mwane
Shimbinga-mwane kombelelelanga

wayamukalunga mwane Kapata yele kombelele nganga wayamukalunga

mwane
(a major song of the later period). |
We are going, we are going to the moon, to the moon

Start beating the drum here comes Simbinga

Clap hands for the cult leader
you were in the grave, Great Healer, you are out cult leader, indeed
clap hands for the cult leader
you were in the grave, Great Healer, we are continuously clapping hands for Simbinga the Great Great one, who were in the grave
Kapata indeed we clap hands for the cult leader
Great One, you were in the grave |

However, despite such distinctive elements as the regional organization centring around a charismatic leader, the theistic interpretation of affliction, and the purity-centred morality, the Bituma sessions in themselves remained, in their outside appearance, very close to the general idiom of the non-regional cults of affliction described above.

The cult took on well in Kaoma district, where in the 1940’s—1960’s a few thousand people were initiated. A more precise number cannot be given since in contrast with the Nzila cult no central records of membership were kept. (Individual leaders did keep records of their own patients, along with a price-list of various treatments available.)

In addition to the seven initial followers, about a dozen more leaders were appointed during Simbinga’s lifetime. These leaders would meet each New Year’s Day at the cult’s Annual Convention around Simbinga’s shrine, where they would hand over part of their patients’ fees and would enjoy a collective meal of white chickens.

In the 1950’s several leaders settled in Lusaka and other line-of-rail towns, where they held sessions for urban migrants from Kaoma district.

Meanwhile old tensions between Simbinga and Kapata (going back to the time of Simbinga’s first appearance as a prophet) became manifest again. They concentrated on the cult’s leadership and on the use of the cult’s funds. Simbinga had married a woman from the eastern part of Kaoma district and enjoyed the loyalty of the Bituma leaders there, several of whom were his close affines. Kapata had settled in the central part of the district, and other Bituma leaders there sided with him. Simbinga's sudden death during a hunting party (1960) was the occasion for the cult to fall apart. The leaders around Kapata (including those in town who hailed from the central part of the district) accepted his succession to the cult's leadership. They continued to visit the Annual Convention, now at Kapata's shrine, and to forward part of their fees to him. Those in the eastern part of the district (and urban leaders hailing from there) have severed their connection with the cult's organization and have since practised the Bituma ritual as independent, individual cult leaders, without any organization being maintained between them. For them and their patients, Bituma has lost its regional character and has become merely another non-regional cult of affliction among the many prevailing locally. These eastern leaders retain a reminiscence of Simbinga's original, theistic and universal visions. However, for those of their patients that have been initiated only recently, these associations are virtually lost. Surviving only in the central part of the district and among a few urban leaders, Bituma has elsewhere returned to the substratum of the factional, non-regional cults from which it sprang.

Thus the development of Nzila and Bituma has been very different indeed. We shall presently try to identify some of the factors responsible for this difference.

* 4.3 Bituma and Nzila compared from within

Let us first look at both cults from within: their internal structure and specific idiom.

As Reynolds rightly observed (1963: 137), during the first two decades of Nzila, Chana succeeded in maintaining control over crucial phases of the ritual. He kept most of his doctors in the position of mere assistants, without autonomous ritual powers. Only Chana's heir (nominated by Chana himself), and presumably his Senanga deputy, were allowed to exercise ritual powers on their own behalf. As the cults spread further, effective devices were worked out to safeguard the cult's unity and perpetuation even when it ramified into a number of geographically distant branches. A body of centralized administration, the Annual Convention, explicit regulations, indispensible paraphernalia whose distribution was strictly controlled, all in combination constituted an adequate structure through which the founder's charisma could be routinized and channelled without becoming dissipated or usurped. These devices constitute clearly recognized principles of legitimation, controlled from headquarters, outside which no cult leader pursuing the Nzila idiom could claim ritual efficacy. The gradual adoption of these devices rendered an ever-increasing specific identity to the Nzila cult. It more and more diverted from the substratum of non-regional cults. Nzila's interpretational idiom and cultic procedures became so specific that a relapse into the non-regional substratum became increasingly unlikely.

This may have been due not only to the cult's internal authority structure. Through the very large number of adepts and the participation of nonadepts in the mass services (Reynolds 1963: 136), the Nzila cult must have become something of a generally recognized social institution in the society of Western Zambia. Nzila's definition and perpetuaton came to be based not just on concepts and actions of leaders and adepts within the cult, but also on public opinion. The latter's influence is suggested by the one case of a break-away from Nzila cited by Muntemba. There the protagonist had to adopt an idiom explicitly different from Nzila; and even so, Nzila turned out to be so well established that after a temporary decline the population again made a mass demand on its services:

<quote>

"Two years ago Nzila was thought to be on the decline in the Mulobezi area when a former Nzila healer decided to leave the sect to concentrate on pure faith healing which he thought (and Christian leaders accepted) was more Christian. People went to him from all over Livingstone area and his activities met their needs. Yet now this man's authority is on the decline as more people turn back to Nzila." (Muntemba 1972:Ilf)

</quote>

A very specific ideology and ritual, and a well-defined structure of organization and authority, externally supported by expectations among the general population, produced for Nzila effective checks against the threat of fragmentation and kept the cult from returning to the non-regional phase.

By contrast, Simbinga failed to assert himself as a continually indispensible source of charisma vis-a-vis the other Bituma leaders. Once initiated, the latter could all act independently. Moreover, at least some of them had had experiences similar to those from which Simbinga derived his charisma. Simbinga's personal status in Bituma was far less exalted than Chana's in Nzila. The great benefits in terms of prestige, power and income attached to independent leadership along the non-regional model, produced a strong tendency towards fragmentation. Little could counteract this tendency but the leaders' personal emotional attachment to Simbinga, which ceased to have organizational relevance when he died. Moreover, in order to possess ritual efficacy in the eyes of adepts and of the general population, Bituma leaders were by no means dependent on paraphernalia that could only be obtained from the cult's headquarters and that, once obtained, would only be regarded as legitimating leadership as long as their owner continued to belong to the cult's organization. Instead, Bituma leaders freely obtained and augmented their paraphernalia, which were similar not only to Simbinga's but also to those in use in the non-regional cults of affliction: white clothes, scapulars, fly-switches, bells, etc. And although the cult certainly became an established institution in Kaoma district, in its public manifestations it remained so close to the well-established non-regional cults of affliction, that any external check (in the way of expectations from the general population, concerning ritual and organization) against relapse in the direction of these non-regional cults, could not have been strong.

As a regional cult, Bituma was far less powerfully designed than Nzila. Not so much Bituma's decline, but its part survival around Kapata seems to pose a problem. Personal ties based on past treatment supported the relationship between Kapata and his loyal leaders after Simbinga's death. In addition, however, there appear to be more systematic reasons for the survival of Bituma in the central part of Kaoma district, which will become clear as we now turn to a discussion of the structural characteristics of the regions of Bituma and Nzila.

Let us sum up the position. Nzila and Bituma sprang from the same substratum of non-regional cults of affliction, and both were triggered by very similar personal experiences of their founders. What then explains their their very different development? Part of an answer lies in personality differences: Chana was clearly a more creative innovator and organizer than Simbinga. Another part lies in the nature of social relationships between the leaders and their initial followers: in contrast with Chana's selfconfident and unchallenged control, Simbinga was much more of a primus inter pares and had to compromise with the cultic backgrounds and ambitions of his initial followers. The differences between the cults' organizational structures and ritual idioms as they were gradually worked out, provide, as a third part of an answer, such explanations as I have just attempted to give in the present section. However, it would appear that these organizational differences in themselves largely derived from the differences in structural characteristics between the Bituma and Nzila regions.

* 4.4 Nzila's and Bituma's Regions Compared

Although the regions of both cults extend into towns outside Western Zambia, the processes that have shaped the cults in the first two decades after the founders' first appearance as prophets have taken place within Western Zambia. I feel therefore justified in concentrating on that area, and I refrain from discussing the cults' wider ramifications.

Map 2 outlines the geographical location of the regions of both cults in this area, and indicated the main direction of spread. By comparison with Map I and with the geographical material contained in Davies (1971), a number of striking differences between these two regions can be observed.

Demographically the differences are considerable (Davies 1971:42–47). The Nzila region has, by and large, a higher density of population. In addition to small administrative centres at Kalabo, Senanga and Sesheke (which are perfectly comparable to Kaoma in the centre of the Bituma region), the Nzila region includes the only two significant towns in this area: Mongu and Livingstone.[46] Nzila's headquarters are near Mongu, whilst the Livingstone area (extending into the commercial timber concessions around Mulobezi) appears in Muntemba’s description as a major growth area of Nzila. By contrast Bituma has been a rural affair, whose present headquarters are located at about 25 kilometres from Kaoma. Admittedly, Bituma does have a few hundred urban adepts: but these are almost exclusively lower-class migrants from Kaoma district who, unable to become stabilized urbanites, keep circulating between town and village, and in many cases go through the Bituma ritual not in town but in the village. The occurrence, in the Mongu and Livingstone-Mulobezi area, of male/female sex ratios of more than 100 (as compared to under 70 in the Bituma region) further bears out the demographic difference.[47]

The demographic situation has important implications for the regional cults. Where population density is low (in the eastern part of Kaoma district it drops under 7 inhabitants per km²), the creation of local congregations and the maintenance of interlocal ties between them poses serious problems in terms of the number of people available, transport, and communications in general. The factional nature of the non-regional cults of affliction is partly explicable in this light. Similar problems play a much smaller role in densely populated areas, and a fortiori in towns.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-11.jpg]]

More important perhaps, the demographic differences reveal a social-structural difference between the situation of the typical Bituma adept in comparison with the typical Nzila adept. Bituma caters for a stagnated peasantry whose experience with urban living may be considerable (due to labour migration), but whose prime identification and source of economic and social security is the village. Modern institutions, and particularly formal, bureaucratic organizations in the political and economic sphere do penetrate from the metropolitan and national centres into the peripheral village scene, and determine the villagers’ lives to an ever increasing extent. Bui these institutions and organizations, with physical outlets at the district centres mainly, are seldom visible at the village scene. Their impact on rural life does not imply that the villagers frequently participate in them or identify with them—quite the contrary. Debarred from substantial economic and political participation in the wider national context, the people in the Bituma region see themselves primarily as part of an economic and political order whose major concerns and transactions refer to local, largely pre-capitalist, historical structures. Bureaucratic organizations set, from a distance, the narrow confines for the local social process but do not play a prominent role in the participants' subjective life-world. And it is primarily from the latter that we can hope to expect a solution to the problem of differential adoption of religious forms—that is, if we agree to view religion mainly as an interpretative and legitimating structure.

The social-structural situation that is typical of the Bituma region, does obtain in parts of the Nzila region as well. But in the latter's centres of gravity (Mongu, Livingstone-Mulobezi) the structural context is very different. Here people live in an urban or peri-urban environment, where their life to a large extent consists of participation in economic and political formal, bureaucratic organizations: civil service, industrial and commercial enterprises, schools, medical services, churches, political parties, recreational associations, etc. Understanding of, and identification with, complex patterns of formal task definition and bureaucratically legitimated authority based on legal rules, are essential for both psychological comfort and for economic survival in town and in the peri-urban and rural extensions of urban-based formal organizations. Parkin (1966) has emphasized the potential of urban voluntary organisations to become mechanisms of adaptation to the organizational structure of modern urban life. Nzila is likely to play a role in this respect. But what is more important in the context of the present argument, is that Nzila's being embedded, from the 1940's on, in a general urban organizational environment, did provide, in the perception of Nzila's potential patients and adepts, obvious organizational models and patterns of bureaucratic legitimatidn by reference to which this cult could successfully make the transition from direct to routinized charisma.

Whilst no doubt providing a solution for some of the problems engendered in its adepts by their confrontation with modern urban organizational structures, Nzila copied an organizational model derived from this very structure (and therefore recognizable, and acceptable, to its adepts). This appears to have been an important factor in Nzila's development into a successful regional cult.

The knowledge of such models and patterns was surely available in the Bituma region as well. But there such a formal organizational structure did not correspond with the peasants' subjective reality: the organizational micro-structure of their rural society. Nzila developed a regional organizational structure borrowed from and commensurate with the urban society by which it was surrounded. Bituma, after attempts towards regional organization, to a large extent lapsed back into a fragmented, factionalized organizational structure which is not only typical of the pre-existing non-regional cults of affliction, but which is also (in ways I cannot elaborate on here) in line with the fragmented economic and political structure of Nkoya village society.

I am not suggesting, though, that the structure of this rural society was entirely incompatible with formal, interlocal religious organization. Christian missions throughout Western Zambia demonstrate that such religious organizations are viable provided they receive ample political and logistic backing from national and metropolitan centres (a condition obviously not met in the case of Bituma). Missions are important for an understanding of the development of the regional cults in several other respects. They were among the few formal, bureaucratic organizations that were visibly present in the rural areas. In this way they introduced the rural population to a pattern of social organization prevailing in urban contexts. In addition the missions contributed to the ideological shift towards greater prominence of the High God, among the general population of Western Zambia.

Both Simbinga and Chana were exposed to local missions. But whereas Nzila subsequently spread in an area that was very heavily missionized, and where Christianity grew rapidly in the 1940's, Bituma spread in an area where missionary activity was very limited and in fact declining in the 1940's (map 2).[48] By consequence, Nzila could benefit much more than Bituma from the missions' instilling, in the minds of potential adepts, such attitudes and organizational models as are conducive to a regional cult organization.

The relation between Nzila and Christianity was and is extremely tolerant.

Muntemba points out (1972: 12f) that Nzila has developed a considerable degree of symbiosis with Christian churches. Many of the adepts and patients are Christians, even some Nzila leaders are church leaders, and Chana has remained a member of the Seventh Day Adventist Church throughout his life. In the early stages ot Bituma, on the contrary, Simbinga denounced membership of Christian churches, claiming that “now we have bur own church ’. In later years this antagonism made way for tolerance and at present the cult is indifferent with regard to its patients’ and adepts’ religious affiliations.

A final point ot difference between Nzila and Bituma revolves around the role that ethnicity has played in the development of either cult. Belonging to the Luvale ethnic group, Chana was an Angolan immigrant: one of the many thousands that have moved into the rural areas throughout Western Zambia since the 1920’s (Clay 1945; Colson 1970). Chana utilized Luvale ethnic identity to get his cult off the ground in the first instance. Nzila’s spread closely followed the penetration of Angolan immigrants in the area. However,

<quote>

“by the later 1940’s the movement had spread to other parts of the Western Province and drew adherents not only from the Luvale (…) but from the Lozi as well as other groups in the Province.” (Muntemba 1972:3)

</quote>

The mono-ethnic element now appears no longer to play a role in Nzila.

By contrast, Simbinga could hardly rely on ethnic support. He belonged to the Mbunda ethnic group and was an Angolan immigrant like Chana. Unable to find recognition and support among his own people, at the time of his first appearance as a prophet, he turned to the Nkoya who have lived in Kaoma district at least since the last century. The majority of Bituma leaders that Simbinga initiated were Nkoya, Kapata being a notable exception. Instead of utilizing the enormous numerical potential of the Angolan immigrants, as Chana did, Simbinga thus concentrated on a relatively small ethnic group tied to a rather small territory that was increasingly encroached upon by Angolan immigrants, and with no substantial portion of stabilized urbanites among their number. Concentration on the Nkoya is likely to have contributed to the lack of expansion of Bituma. On the other hand, this very concentration made the Bituma cult into a distinctive cultural feature, a sign of Nkoya identity especially among Nkoya migrants in town. Before that time, only the mayimbwe non-regional cult had played that role to some extent.

Ethnicity, or rather local rivalry in an ethnic disguise, also played a role in the later decline of Bituma as a regional cult. The central and eastern parts of Kaoma district form two subdivisions (“Nkoya proper” and “Mashasha”) of the Nkoya ethnic group. Despite frequent intermarriage and intra-rural residential mobility between these two subdivisions, they display mutual antagonism based on a different political, administrative and mission history. Each subdivision has its own senior chief. There are close kin relations between the Mashasha chief and Bituma leaders in the eastern subdivision, and the same is true of the chief in the central subdivision and the Bituma leaders there. The latterday cleavage between Simbinga and Kapata, even though both are non-Nkoya, coincided with one between ethnically-articulated power-blocks in the political structure of the district.

The preceding argument suggests systematic reasons why, with the decline of Bituma, Kapata could yet retain around him some remnants of the cult’s regional organization. Density of population is much higher in the central part of Kaoma district (and particularly north-west of Maoma township, where Kapata’s village is situated) than it is in the eastern part. Moreover, the large Mangango mission (created in the early 1950’s some 15 kilometres north-west of the earlier Mukunkiki site), the annexed hospital, and the secular enterprise it has generated in the way of trading firms and cooperatives, along with the proximity of Kaoma and of Luampa mission, create a structural and ideological milieu more favourable for an interlocal regional cult, than exists in the eastern part of the district.

* 4.5 Conclusion

My analysis of two recent Zambian regional cults is based, to a large extent, on far from complete, oral-historical data. Even though I can analyse these data against the background of acquaintance with the area, with the non-regional cults of affliction from which the regional cults in question emerged, and with main trends in the religious history of Central Africa in general, the whole argument remains too tentative to approach a theory of the dynamics of regional cults. However, my argument does lead to a few comparative generalizations.

Every regional cult seems to face a dual problem. On the one hand, it has to develop a distinct, specific cultic idiom (in terms of both ideology and ritual). On the other hand, it requires a formal organizational structure which shares out ritual authority sufficiently widely among officials to enable them to cover an entire region, whilst retaining these officials within an authority-legitimizing structure of such effectiveness as to prevent them from either breaking away from the cult or, within its organization, pursuing too deviant an idiom. The dialectical process in which solutions for this problem are worked out with varying success, is determined by a number of factors. In addition to personality traits and interpersonal relationships of the personnel involved, crucial factors appear to be of two kinds. First, the specific nature of a cult's organizational devices to a large extent determines its chances of survival as a regional cult. Secondly, these organizational devices are partly determined by the structural characteristics which obtain in the geographical area that the cult is to transform into a region. My argument suggests the importance, among these structural characteristics of the region, of demographic patterns and of the occurrence, besides the cult in question,, of other religious and non-religious, formal, interlocal organizations. However, only application to more, and better data from other parts of the world can throw light on the validity of these suggestions.

 References

<biblio>

Carter, M.

1972 Origin and Diffusion of Central-African Cults of Affliction. Conference on the History of Central-African Religious Systems, University of Zambia, Lusaka. Manuscript.

Clay G.C.R.

1966 History of the Mankoya District. Lusaka: Rhodes -Livingstone Institute Communication 4.

Colson E.

1970 The Assimilation of Aliens among Zambian Tonga. In From Tribe to Nation in Africa. R. Cohen and J. Middleton, Eds. Scranton: Chandler Publishing Co. pp. 35–54.

Davies D. H.

1971 Zambia in Maps. London:Athlone Press.

Doke C.M.

1931 The Lambas of Northern Rhodesia. London: George G. Harrap and Co.

Gluckman M.

1943 Notes on the Social Background of Barotse Music. In African Music. A.M. Jones, Ed. Livingstone: Rhodes-Livingstone Museum.

1951 The Lozi of Barotseland N.W. Rhodesia. In Seven Tribes of Central Africa. E. Colson and M. Gluckman, Eds. Manchester: Manchester University Press, pp. 1–93.

Ikacana N.S.

1971 Litaba za Makwanga. Lusaka: Neczam. (Reprint of 1952 edition).

Kolb W.L.

1964 Cult. In A Dictionary of the Social Sciences J. Gould and W. L. Kolb, Eds. New York: Glencoe. The Free Press.

McCulloch, M.

1951 The Southern Lunda and Related People. Ethnographic Survey of Africa, West Central Africa, I, London: Oxford University Press for International African Institute.

Merle Davis, J.et al

1933 Modern Industry and the African. London: Macmillan.

Muntemba, M.

1972 Zambia Nzila sect and Christian Churches in the Livingstone Area. Conference on the History of Central-African Religious Systems, University of Zambia, Lusaka. Manuscript.

Northern Rhodesia

1929 Blue Book for the Year Ended 31st December 1929. Livingstone.

1937 Blue Book for the Year Ended 31st December 1937. Lusaka.

1948 Blue Book for the Year Ended 31st December 1948. Lusaka.

O’Dea T.F.

1968 Sects and Cults. In International Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences. New York.

Parkin D.

1966 Voluntary Associations as Institutions of Adaptation, Man. 1: 90–94

Ranger T.O.

1972 Report on the Proceedings of the Conference (on the History of Central-African Religious Systems). African Religious Research 2: 6–35.

1973 Review Article: Magic and the Millenium. African Religion Research 3: 7–33.

Reynolds B.

1963 Magic, Divination and Witchcraft among the Barotse of Northern Rhodesia. London: Chatto and Windus.

Shorter A.

1972 Symbolism, Ritual and History: an Examination of the Work of Victor Turner. In The Historical Study of African Religion. T.O. Ranger and I. Kimambo, Eds. London, pp. 139–149.

Stefaniszyn B.

1964 Ritual and Social Life of the Ambo of Northern Rhodesia. London: Oxford University Press.

Symon S.A.

1959 Notes on the Preparation and Uses of African Medicine in the Mankoya District, Northern Rhodesia. Rhodes-Livingstone Communication 15. pp. 21–77.

Turner V.W.

1952 The Lozi Peoples of North-West Rhodesia. London: International African Instutute.

1957 Schism and Continuity in an African Society: A Study of Ndembu Village Life. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

1962 Chihamba the White Spirit. Rhodes-Livingstone Paper 31. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

1968 The Drums of Affliction. Oxford: Oxford University Press for the International African Institute.

Van Binsbergen, W.M.J.

1972a Bituma: Preliminary Notes on a Possession Healing Cult among the Nkoya. Conference on the History of Central-African Religious Systems. University of Zambia, Lusaka. Manuscript.

1972b Possession and Mediumship in Zambia: Towards a Comparative Approach. Conference on the History of Central-African Religious Systems. University of Zambia, Lusaka. Manuscript.

1975 Ethnicity as a Dependent Variable: the ‘Nkoya’ Ethnic Identity and Inter-Ethnic Relations in Zambia. 34th Annual Conference, Society for Applied Anthropology. Amsterdam. Manuscript. African Social Research, forthcoming.

1976a Ritual, Class and Urban-Rural Relations. Cultures et Developpement. 8: 195–218.

1976b Social Change and Intergenerational Conflict among the Nkoya of Zambia. Cultures et Developpement. 8.

1976c Law in the Context of Nkoya Society. In Law and the Family in Modern Africa. S.A. Roberts, Ed. The Hague: (In press)

1976d The Dynamics of Religious Change in Western Zambia. Ufahamu 6: 69–87.

1977a Explorations into the History and Sociology of Territorial Cults in Zambia. In Guardians of the Land: Essays in Central-African Territorial Cults. J.M. Schoffeleers, Ed. Gwelo: Mambo Press (In Press).

1977b Religious Innovation and Political Conflict in Zambia: A Contribution to the Interpretation of the Lumpa Rising. In Religious Innovation in Modern African Society. R. Buijtenhuijs and W.M.J. Van Binsbergen, Eds. African Perspectives, Leiden: Afrika-Studiecentrum. In Press.

Weber M.

1969 The Theory of Social and Economic Organization. Glencoe: The Free Press.

Werbner R.P

1971 Symbolic Dialogue and Personal Transactions among the Kalanga and Ndembu. Ethnology 10: 311–328

1972 Sin, Blame and Ritual Mediation. In The Allocation of Responsibility. M. Gluckman, Ed. Manchester: Manchester University Press, pp. 227–235.

Wilson, B.R.

1975 Magic and the Millenium. Frogmore: Paladin/Granada Publishing Limited. Reprint of 1973 edition.

</biblio>

© Wim M J Van Binsbergen 1977

* Part Three: Regional Instability: Cult Policy and Competition for Resources

 7. Continuity and Policy in Southern Africa’s High God Cult[49]

*by Richard P. Werbner

 Introduction: The Definition of Regions

The more a cult spreads across major ethnic and political boundaries, the more its organization may have to be variable and its ritual and symbolism transcultural. A cult in the middle range—neither exclusively parochial nor extremely universalistic—poses special problems. It calls for a theoretical approach that grasps variations in organization and ritual from one rather narrow context to another. Yet it also calls for another order of data and a wider perspective in order to make sense of the cult relations which transcend these narrow contexts. There is no question of alternatives: either to focus on the narrow or the more inclusive context. Both must be regarded, and in relation to each other, because the cult is in some senses both parochial and universalistic. That is why in this essay on a vast yet middle range cult, a High God cult in Southern Africa, fine nuances of cult activity and microhistories are brought into focus in a single perspective along with the connected regional relations and macrohistorical change.

Southern Africa’s most widespread High God cult, the cult of Mwali or Mwari, has its congregations divided in spatially distinct regions, each with its own central staff and oracle and its own adepts and communal shrines. Each region extends over thousands of square miles across ethnic,[50] district and even international boundaries. Yet each is somewhat concentrated in one part or another of the cult’s total domain. Not that any region has a continuous territory of its own: every region is scattered irregularly. Moreover, the congregations of different regions come between each other. A region is a set of many, separated pieces—the locally defined congregations—and it is in its pieces that a region is spatially distinct. There is more to a region, however, than the distribution of its congregations. From region to region there are also overlapping vicinities. The area from which supplicants come to consult a regional oracle as individuals rather than on behalf of congregations is a region's vicinity. Every region has a wider vicinity around it, beyond its congregations, from which it receives individual supplicants. Moreover, supplicants who come from a single congregation consult oracles in various regions, and these thus have vicinities which overlap. The overlap is selective, however, in that supplicants from one region go to certain others only, and they tend to favour oracles'more in one direction than another.

Regions also have other features of distribution, besides distinctness and selective overlap. Other features appear in the relations between regions and their enclaves and borderlands. The enclaves are territorial communities which do not themselves join any region, although they are virtually surrounded by affiliated congregations. Conversely, the borderlands are the territorial communities which block cult expansion and remain at the outer limit beyond any region. The enclaves tend to be less permanent and fluctuate back and forth from non-affiliation to membership in a region, whereas the borderlands are more enduring as barriers against cult expansion.

Finally, to complete an initial view of the regions' spatial relations, something must be said about centralization. Not only does each region have at least one regional centre for an oracle, but the regions all together are centralized. Their heartland is where virtually all the oracles are sited, and it is a geographically central location, an inner area of highlands that has special importance for the surrounding lowlands in the rest of the cult's domain. Moreover, the centralization is such that the heartland itself has a gradient, a decreasing order of oracles from centre to periphery: roughly, the closer an oracle is to the heartland's centre, the higher is its standing in terms of recognised seniority. The most central oracle is paramount, and in relation to it there are at least two junior lines, each with no more than four oracles under a senior or cardinal oracle. This order relates to permanence in location in that the cardinal oracles, including the paramount one, are relatively fixed; they move their sites the least, if at all.[51]

Both in number and distribution the regions are limited. They are virtually confined to a major ecological zone of savanna or mopane bush veld which runs from Botswana's central and eastern districts across the south of Zimbabwe and into Mozambique and the Transvaal of South Africa (for this zone see Keay 1959; Newman 1971: 119).[52] Their heartland is the high veld or highlands which cross Botswana and Zimbabwe, and their cardinal oracles are centrally sited in the Matopo Hills within a smaller ecological zone of wooded steppe[53] that is surrounded by the major ecological zone. Not that the regions cover the whole of this major zone: with peripheral, and thus revealing exceptions, only areas of dispersed, though sometimes quite dense settlements with relatively mobile and ethnically heterogeneous populations have congregations. This virtually[54] excludes the territorial communities that are based on large nucleated villages and led by Tswana in the zone's southwest. There is an oracular cult in the southwest in the Tswapong Hills, but it holds sway only in the smaller, less strongly centralized villages. Moreover, this is a cult of the microcosm,[55] rather than a cult of the macrocosm (see Horton 1975), as is the High God cult.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-12.jpg][Diagram 1: Regions and their Surrounding Vicinities]]

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-13.jpg][Diagram 2: Cult Domain and Ecological Zones: Distribution of Oracles]]

Within the major ecological zone of savanna, regions compete for congregations and wax and wane in relation to each other. They are unstable, but they do not change arbitrarily. Gradually and continuously, congregations which in themselves vary transfer their allegiance back and forth, from region to region. This transfer takes place during the lifetime of the priest who leads the region,[56] often for several decades or more, though it is all the more frequent at his death. Indeed, after a priest's death, a long period often passes without a successor in full control of the priest's office. During such an interregnum, perhaps for as much as a decade or more, the region appears to disintegrate and be partially taken over by others. Sometimes the disintegration lasts; somewhat new regions then emerge, without an increase in the total number of regions.

The cult's beliefs recognize and allow for such change. Even the site of the most senior oracle, now at Njelele (Snake Eagle),[57] is believed to be one site in a series that began elsewhere among Venda, who are now in the Transvaal to the south.[58] This oracle, like all others, is held to have ultimately come from a foreign site, though its origins were within the cult's total domain. Any priest may resite his oracle and virtually everyone does. He may move it from cave to cave or hollow boabab tree, on one hill then another. He need not keep to one site throughout his lifetime. He may consult the oracle at a series in succession or at a pair of sites or more, during the same period. From time to time, he may even leave his own centre to live with another priest for months or perhaps longer. Similarly, succession to office is also variable, and people recall only a few successors. A priest's son is his preferred successor, or alternatively a brother (see also Richards 1942: 55; Daneel 1970: 46). However, these are sometimes disqualified or lacking. The successor may then be another close relative or a newcomer who may claim descent from Njelele's founder, Njenje, within a rather short patriline.[59] Usually, two generations is the most a priest claims in succession from his region's founder. However, no direct succession need occur within a region, and an oracle may end with its founder.

Just as a region waxes and wanes so too do its many shrine congregations. The congregations change in span, kind and composition: a chiefdom or any of its parts, one territorial community or several, may become one shrine congregation. The variation is from the kind of congregation which is a whole territorial community (i.e. a chiefdom or a large or small division of it, a section or ward) to the kind which is a local cluster, (i.e. a select set of nearby, roughly contiguous communities and not a whole territorial division). Examples are shown on Map 1: a whole chieftancy (Habangana —D), a section (the south of Musojane—C, wards Cl, C2, C6, C8, CIO), a single ward (C9 of Musojane) and a local cluster (wards B3, B5, B7, B8, B9, of Masunga). Rarely does a congregation last as much as a generation with the same composition in territorial communities. Each congregation expands or contracts in accord with highly localized conditions, and these fluctuate from one small valley to the next (see Werbner 1975). The process is sensitive to local shifts in population, in the support a territorial ruler can mobilize, and in his commitment to a particular priest or even the cult itself.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-14.jpg]]

To understand how congregations vary four aspects must be examined in detail. These are the scale of a congregation's assets such as its donated fund and offerings, the grade of its shrine, the categories of its staff, and its coverage and composition. Later I take up each aspect in that order. But first lest my view be misunderstood, I must make it plain that cult change is not a process in which the cult's parts, such as regions or congregations, make a closed adjustment to each other, subject merely to constraints of a political, economic, or ecological kind. There are alternative cults, such as faith-healing and separatist churches; and the High God cult changes in relation to the organization and theology of these alternative, and sometimes opposed, cults.[60] Nor is this a passive relation, or a completely one-sided one. Representatives go back and forth, on an ad hoc basis, between the staff of various regions and the shrines and centres of different cults and also ritual associations, such as diviners' unions, for example, 'The Botswana Dingaka Association' (Mpaphadzi 1975a and b; Modongo 1975) and 'The Herbalist Association of Africa'. The opposition and rivalry between the cults and ritual associations contributes to rivalry and competition within the High God cult itself. Because of this a priest or would-be leader of a region has a changing series of managerial problems, some of which arise outside of his own cult or region. In due course I discuss these problems along with others that affect policy-making at an oracle. However, a further caution must be given in order for the later discussion to be tightly understood.

This caution has to do with the analysis of strategic action. My argument takes account of long and short-term planning by well-informed cult leaders. Sometimes they hold to the same general orientation for a considerable period of time, and this affects the way they understand the very fine and up-to-date intelligence which they may get even about remote local changes in their regions and elsewhere. But this is not to say that there is some grand and deliberate design and that cult leaders act or choose their policies in accord with it.

 Change in Congregations

Every congregation goes through a career of graded shrines in accord with its cult assets and investments. The grades are from a local, to an interlocal, to a regional shrine. Chart I shows the defining features of each grade along with its current distribution on Map 1. Very few communities progress to the higher grades. None remain there for as much as two generations without interruption and return to a lower grade or withdrawal from the cult and want of a shrine. This holds true in the western regions and, I infer, elsewhere too. The congregations which invest more than others attain the higher grades and accumulate the more enduring cult assets—both goods and personnel. But even these are, in certain critical respects, fluid rather than completely fixed. They do not, indeed cannot, anchor a congregation permanently to a particular region, though they may delay a congregation's decline within the cult. Nevertheless, lest I convey the impression of completely localized fluctuation, I must point out, in advance of my later discussion, that the assets of congregations and regions are checked by the cult's central organization. Changes in such assets—the slaughter of a black cow, the death of a priest, adept, messenger or affiliated chief and their replacement—should all be reported to a cardinal oracle in the Matapo Hills. Moreover, a cult fine for these changes may be levied centrally.

There are two categories of staff that are perhaps most important for change in a congregation. These are: first, the congregation's messenger (ntumwa), who is accompanied by one carrier or more, (nsengi)[61] and second, the cult adept (hosana or mwana wa Mwali, child of Mwali). The messenger is regarded as a courier, rather than a delegate with independent authority. His errand is on a territorial ruler's behalf to communicate and carry out transactions with other congregations, shrines and oracles. To the oracle, he carries offerings along with the congregation's petitions for rain, fertility and seeds, that are blessed and ritually treated against pests. From the oracle he brings back, besides the seeds, a declaration of Mwali's response in accord with the state of the land and moral order of the congregation, whether it observes Mwali's rest days and respects His injunctions such as not to fight and spill blood or kill certain insects, birds, and reptiles; not to sell too much grain or produce, like melons, customarily given free; not to play, especially during the rainy season, the incessant records that blare throughout sales at beer drinks; and, positively, to settle a man’s estate, fill his vacant office, and destroy his abandoned hut after his death. Daneel (1970: 73f) reports an instance of a prominent messenger who got the oracle at Matonjeni and its staff to take a side in a community’s succession dispute. However, an oracle does not regularly declare the winner of that kind of political struggle; and it is not usual for a messenger to seek to have the oracle mediate a dispute over succession to territorial office.

Chart 1: Grades of Shrine

| | GRADE I— LOCAL | GRADE II— INTERLOCAL | GRADE III— REGIONAL |

| Distribution on Map I | A18, A7, B3, C2, Tsamaya | C7 | D3, A15 |

| Kalanga Terms | Tanga (Nanga), ‘Ring’ | Gota (Daka), ‘Hut’ | Dombo (Ntolo), ‘Hill’ |

| Form | Clearing in ring around trees in fallows of local descent line | Clearing in ring; huts | Clearing in ring; more huts; oracle within congregation |

| Public | Mainly local (a ward or adjacent wards) | Local; some of near communities | Regional representation |

| Adepts’ Band | Own local band lacking or small | Local band; visitors | Local Band; visitors |

| Circulation of Messengers | Own staff to and from oracles and other shrines | Own staff; occasional visits by nearby congregations’ staff | Own staff; seasonal visits, at least, by staff of distant congregations |

| Offerings | Beer, rarely goats | Beer, goats, occasionally cattle | Beer, goats, at times cattle almost annually |

| Traffic in Supplicants | Absent, except rarely en route to regional shrine | Absent, except rarely en route to regional shrine | Continuous flow of afflicted and other supplicants |

Note: Trees of shrines are Mpani (Colophosperma Mopane), Nzeze (Peltophorum Africanum), Nthula (Sclerocarya Caffra).

The messenger is the cult official most bound to a particular congregation, its concerns and interests. He owes his appointment to his standing as an elder within that congregation, though he may also claim that his father was a messenger elsewhere. In some instances, a ward headman himself acts as messenger for his own ward and a set of others. Preferably, the one chosen at a meeting of the territorial ruler's relatives is a close paternal relative, a seminal brother or parallel cousin, or under special circumstances a close affine. It is crucial for the incorporation in the cult of diverse congregations that a man can hold the messenger's office irrespective of his ethnic origin or his kinship with a past messenger: Kalanga, Karanga, Venda, Khurutse, Ndebele, Ndau, all hold this office on behalf of their own congregations, whereas the offices of priest and adept are more restricted. As the ethnic composition changes within the cult's total domain so too may the composition of its messengers change, according to the petitions for affiliation by new congregations.

The messenger has a crucial part to play in the maintenance and growth of a shrine congregation. It is his duty to look after the collection of funds and livestock, to organize the brewing of beer for seasonal dances and shrine feasts, and to arrange for the annual repair of the shrine, if it has huts. On his efforts depends much of the local conversion of private goods into the cult's assets or its staff's benefits. A man stands little chance of becoming or remaining a prominent messenger, responsible for a prosperous or higher grade shrine, unless he is himself relatively rich and surrounded by numerous relatives who are ready, along with him, to contribute substantially to the cult. Only when they become, like him, great investors in the cult, can his congregation transcend its boundaries, in various respects, by securing and sustaining the grade of shrine that requires the congregation's own set or band of adepts.

Adepts, who are at once a major channel for and index of local investment in the cult, are part of its more universalistic staff. Like a priest and unlike a messenger, they may perform anywhere in the cult's total domain. Indeed, wherever invited, they may give their ritual services. They pray and chant laments to Mwali[62] and sing of the oracles and famous adepts of the past and present. They mime things and memorialize events of broad significance to every congregation in the cult’s domain: they dance with a stick or a wildebeest’s tail in a shrine’s clearing, or ring, sometimes like a fatted cow, an eagle, a game animal or horse, an elder bent with age, a marksman or hunter with a gun, a soldier on military drill with a rifle, or an afflicted victim. After a bout of dancing to three drums, they suffer stylized fits of dramatic, epileptoid possession, when they are ‘tied’ (svungwa) by Mwali, rather than possessed by a lesser or ancestral spirit.[63] They writhe and roll about in the dust, like a person punished by Mwali’s love. Some adepts perform feats: they rub hot coals from the fire on their backs and remain unburnt, as far as I could tell. While their suffering is believed to be on behalf of each congregation as a whole, they are also offered gifts for the sake of individuals-who seek a private blessing. Members of the public at a ritual donate beads, safety pins, or a few pence at a time, and make personal petitions silently or in a whisper to the adepts. For example, an old woman whose daughter’s breasts had run dry not long after childbirth, fixed a safety pin on a female adept’s pleated skirt and whispered an appeal for milk to one of Mwali’s three manifestations: Banyanchaba (The Mistress of Tribes)[64] whose one breast suckles all, mankind, animals, and birds.[65]

Such universalistic aspects of an adept’s status can be understood more, once highly particularistic criteria for succession, recruitment, and seniority are grasped. This will also clarify a crucial fact and its implications: that an adept’s status by comparison to a messenger’s is restricted ethnically and more under a priest’s control. A cult belief is that Mwali chooses each adept to succeed a close relative, and makes His choice known through possession after a more or less severe affliction. The symptoms in the roughly sixty cases which I recorded were severe anxiety, persisting headaches, attacks of hysteria, swelling of the elbows and aches all over the body, constant fatigue and weakness, crippling illness, and infertility. Most adepts claim a predecessor who is an ancestor no more than one generation removed from the oldest living generation and at most three generations from Ego. The relationship claimed is usually through the adept’s mother or father’s mother, but the predecessor is not the adept’s mother herself. In the cases I recorded only fourteen out of sixty-two adepts claimed to succeed a patrilineal ancestor. These cases cover the adepts who resided or performed during 1964–65 in the former Tati Reserve, a part of the cult’s domain shown on Map I and all within about 30 miles of a priest’s home and oracle. (For the distribution in detail, see Table I: Succession of Adepts.) Kalanga say that a person must be of the ‘stock’ (ludzi) of adepts to become an hosana of Mwali. This is a restriction which compels all adepts, irrespective of their own ethnic identities, to claim a predecessor, within living memory, with a Kalanga or Venda ethnic identity. All adepts thus claim common ethnic origins. Significantly, whether to recognise this and a person’s other qualifications, such as Mwali’s choice through possession, is a matter for the priest and his oracle to decide; and I will consider this shortly. The point that must be stressed here is this: on the basis of a claim to a common ethnic origin, ethnically different people can be admitted to the adept’s status. The cult is open to expansion and it includes ethnic newcomers as adepts. Indeed, matrilateral succession, the prevailing mode, fits, and, even more, fosters such inclusion through intermarriage among people from the various patrilineal societies in the cult’s domain. Above all, it is the penetration of newcomers’ communities by their predecessors in the cult that the succession and distribution of adepts represents; for example, the penetration of Ndebele or Khurutse by Kalanga and of them, in turn, by Venda.

Table 1: Succession of Adepts

Deceased Predecessor’s Relationship to Ego	Ego’s Sex
	Male	Female
father’s father	5	5
father’s father’s sister	0	3
father’s father’s father	0	1
father’s mother	1	8
father’s mother’s sister	1	0
father’s mother’s brother	1	1 father’s mother’s mother	0	1
mother’s father	4	4
mother’s mother	1	9

| mother’s mother’s sister | 1 | 0 |

| mother’s mother’s father | 0 | 1 |

| mother’s father’s mother | 1 | 3 |

| mother’s father’s father | 1 | 0 |

| mother’s father’s father’s sister | 0 | 1 |

| mother’s mother’s mother | 1 | 3 |

| unknown | 1 | 4 |

| Total adepts | 18 | 44 |

Table 2: Recruitment of Junior Adepts

| Immediate Senior’s Relationship to Ego | Ego’s Age and Status at Recruitment |

| | Unmarried Boy | Unmarried Man | Unmarried Girl | Married Woman |

| son | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |

| daughter | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 |

| brother | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 |

| sister | 1 | 0 | 3 | 0 |

| father | 2 | 0 | 1 | 0 |

| mother | 2 | 0 | 1 | 0 |

| father’s sister | 1 | 1 | 2 | 0 |

| father’s sister’s daughter | 0 | 0 | 1 | 0 |

| father’s brother’s daughter | 0 | 0 | 1 | 0 |

| father’s brother’s son | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 |

| father’s mother’s brother’s daughter | 0 | 0 | 2 | 0 |

| mother’s sister | 0 | 1 | 6 | 0 |

| mother’s sister’s son | 0 | 0 | 1 | 0 |

| mother’s sister’s daughter | 0 | 0 | 1 | 4 |

| mother’s brother’s daughter | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 |

| mother’s mother’s sister | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 |

| mother’s mother’s brother’s daughter | 0 | 1 | 0 | 0 |

| unknown | 0 | 2 | 1 | 2 |

| Total | 8 | 6 | 21 | 12 |

Table 3: Recruitment of Senior Adepts

| Age and Status at Recruitment |

| Unmarried Boy | Unmarried Man | Unmarried Girl | Married Woman |

| 3 | 1 | 5 | 6 |

Two further points must be made about restricted succession and its implications for the penetration of groups and communities. The first and immediate point illuminates how adepts and their kin connect within and across congregations. The second point needs to be considered later, since it concerns the extension of the priest’s own connections, and requires a detailed discussion of how the adepts recruited are a selection who have close kin or origins in the priest’s own home area.

Adepts enter the cult by joining bands or sets of relatives, in a series. Seniority is recognised thus: the earlier in the series, the more senior the adept, irrespective of kinship or other statuses. Usually, a recruit’s closest living relative in the cult, listed as the immediate senior in Table 2, is within the range of the recruit’s first cousins and their parents (i.e. at least 38 out of the 47 junior adepts; see Table 2 for further details). Recruitment follows from one rather close relative to another. The set of links between all of a band’s adepts has a greater range. A band must extend beyond the range of any individual link. Otherwise, little or none of the diversity within a congregation can be represented in the composition of its adepts. Among Kalanga, at least, each congregation—indeed, each component ward—includes sets of relatives, related in a variety of ways which, of course, change over time. Moreover, no single descent group is in the overwhelming majority or is even the largest in a ward, for very long (see Werbner 1971a, 1975). Thus to fit the highly variable and diverse composition of congregations, a band has to extend like a chain of short but cumulative links. The more the diverse sets of relatives meet the entry qualifications and —as will be seen immediately—the entry costs, the more comprehensive a band becomes. Similarly, as adepts change their residence, so too does a band change its local extension and thus the extension of ritual collaboration across congregations. Distance is an important factor: usually the closer the adepts remain, the more regularly do they return to their original congregation's shrine and rejoin a band during a performance. Genealogy I illustrates, for 1964–65, one band's series of adepts, shown in Roman numerals, and its current extension in terms of kinship and wards, in Arabic numerals. This band belongs to the interlocal shrine located in ward B7 of Musojane Chiefdom; it began in the early 1950's, when the daughter of its first messenger became an adept.

It is usually a messenger who establishes his congregation's band by sponsoring one of his dependants (his mother, sister, wife, son or daughter) to become the band's founder and most senior adept. His kin and affines then follow his lead, and sponsor their own dependants. The cost is considerable. Not much need be spent at first, while reaching a decision to sponsor a candidate: less than a pound or two in diviners' fees, paid by a close relative (a father, mother's brother, husband, or other elder with jural responsibility for an afflicted person) or, rarely, the candidate himself. This or another relative makes the next, larger donations once a candidate gets endorsed and urged to 'go forward' at seances. The close relative who becomes the sponsor takes the candidate forward to the priest's oracle, preferably accompanied by an immediate senior or some other related adept. For the candidate's treatment and initiation the priest receives an obligatory gift from the sponsor (fupa, to give for ritual services), often as much as ten pounds. The priest does not charge a fee. Payment must also be made for the adept's costume (which may become an heirloom), a kilt, preferably dark like a rain cloud, leg rattles and strings of many, brightly coloured beads. From the oracle's supplies, however, the priest allows the adept a black sash, limbo, a badge of recognition which is given at the oracle's command. Besides his gift, the sponsor may also namata 'make an offering to supplicate for a favour’ at the oracle and provide beer and perhaps a goat for slaughter. The sponsor then incurs a further obligation, to give a black cow to be dedicated to Mwali for the adept’s sake and, eventually, to be sacrificed and eaten mainly by the priest and adepts, though anyone from messenger to anthropologist may be honoured with a thigh. Such giving is not for once only. The same man may sponsor as many as two or three adepts. Repeated donations of stock for sacrifice are expected over a period of years, especially from messengers and territorial rulers whose generosity sets the pace for the growth or decline of a congregation and its band.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-15.jpg][1: Genealogy of a Band of Adepts]]

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-16.jpg]]

Some of this expenditure circulates or remains within a congregation rather than concentrates in the priest’s hands. Members of the congregation themselves thus have a stake in the material as well as intangible returns from investment in the cult. Within three or four years, depending on an adept’s participation and performances at home and elsewhere, the adept may earn back for himself (or herself) a sponsor’s initial cash expenditure. This income, which continues as profit, is in small sums from the public at performances, plus about a pound a year from the priest himself for an active adept. Similarly, the priest usually returns to a messenger a pound or more from the congregation’s donated fund, for expenses en route to the oracle. To a major donor, an important messenger or ruler, he sometimes gives a larger sum and goods. For example, for about ten years, while the southwestern priest, Ntogwa, kept an oracle in ward D15 of Ramokate Chiefdom, and until the decline of its regional shrine late in the 1960’s, the priest annually gave the ward’s headman about five pounds and a big sack of sugar.

Nevertheless, their stakes in the circulation of cult goods and investments are such that congregations may still shift from one region or priest to another. The stakes are not of a kind to stabilize a congregation’s affiliation, irrespective of the succession of messengers and territorial rulers and irrespective of adepts' personal preferences. The messenger who escalates the pace of donations and thus the importance of a shrine achieves a personal stake, materially and, in the spread of adepts as a band among his close kin and affines, organisationally also. This increasing personal stake attaches him more and more to a particular priest. However, the greater the stake one messenger achieves, the greater the hurdle for his successor. Primarily, this is due to change in the composition of the congregation, which also alters the set of relatives around the successor in that generation or the next. Despite such change, the successor is expected to begin with payments in accord with the established grade of the shrine, including a fine for his predecessor's death. He cannot gradually build up investment as his predecessor did. A decline in contributions and offerings readily becomes a matter for recrimination between the priest, messenger, and members of the congregation, until exasperated the priest may announce that he has broken with them and they may return to a former oracle of theirs.

Thus a messenger often begins by continuing with his predecessor's priest and then shifts to another one or simply rests so that his wards, left without any messenger, may cease to be one congregation in the cult. Similar careers hold for adepts. All are free, as befits the universalistic aspect of their status, to serve the priest of their choice, though sets of adepts usually choose collectively. Some remain attached to their initial priest, despite their congregation's shifts. Others become dissatisfied, for various reasons, and press their congregation to change priest along with them. Adepts thus hasten or retard a shift. They are not a barrier against instability in regions and their congregations. On the contrary, they are an essential force in the progress of a congregation through the grades of shrine; that is, in the process by which a congregation defines itself through a local shrine, transcends its own boundaries through an interlocal one, and becomes a major focus of ritual collaboration through a regional one.

Here a point that must be stressed is this: ritual collaboration is no deus ex machina, and does not resolve or redress conflict between communities or congregations. Admittedly, 'to settle down the country' (gadzikanya shango), to make peace with and on the land, is an avowed aim of adepts' performances; and though quarrels do sometimes break out, it is forbidden to disturb the peace of a shrine. However, there is no necessity that opposed communities, such as chiefdoms which compete for territory, collaborate in ritual. Such communities have an alternative to ritual collaboration: avoidance. A region is a set of scattered congregations, and opposed communities often resort to membership in alternative regions in order to avoid ritual collaboration with each other. Nevertheless, occasions for ritual collaboration do provide opportunities—sometimes even the necessity—for testing and proving the relations between competitors. This is so particularly in those ambiguous border areas where people from different territorial communities come to be mixed together and interspersed (see Werbner 1975: 115–17). For example, in a valley which the chiefdoms of Habangana and Musojane (D and C on Maps I and 2) disputed, people from each chiefdom were so interspersed that no clear boundary divided them, until Habangana expanded across the valley at Musojane's expense. Ritual action as a phase in the competition was a test of strength. Irrespective of their affiliation to one chiefdom or the other, people in the valley joined together in one congregation and thus proved that the valley was not divided within the cult. Even more, they anticipated the gain by one chiefdom, Habangana: they affiliated their congregation to the region centred on that chiefdom and where the chiefdom as a whole belonged. Thus a clear anticipatory definition was given through ritual collaboration across the valley, before the territorial and political ambiguity was resolved. Moreover, the congregations of one chiefdom continued to avoid those of the other for several decades until after a further adjustment between the chiefdoms took place, f*

 The Development of a Region and the Limits of its Expansion

To see change in congregations within a wider context, it is essential to consider at least one region and its relations in detail. The region I know best is the southwestern, formerly under the late priest Ntogwa Matafeni Dube, and I will therefore concentrate my discussion on this region. The conditions which are perhaps most crucial for the southwestern region relate to emigration and territorial encroachment. During Ntogwa's long career as priest, high rates of individual mobility (Werbner 1975: 99) have swelled into great tides of emigration towards the west and south. Partly, this has been due to a higher rate of human and animal population increase with resulting greater pressure on land and, in places, severe scarcity of land. Fundamentally, it has been due to the expropriation of the central highlands of Botswana and Zimbabwe for European ranches. These divided or displaced numerous chiefdoms and led to the founding of others, such as Habangana and Musojane. Most importantly, the land available to their people was restricted, both in Zimbabwe and in Botswana (Werbner 1971a and forthcoming).

Expansion from one chiefdom, Habangana, and migration from it to various others as much as a hundred miles away provided a main stem around which the southwestern region developed. As a youth the priest himself, Ntogwa, had been an immigrant from Zimbabwe, though after settling in Habangana Chiefdom he came to be known as ‘a man of Habangana’. Between 1914 and 1940, the Protectorate administration repeatedly had to allow this chiefdom to take over territory along with people from its weaker neighbour, Musojane Chiefdom. The region’s staff and oracle were thus drawn along with the chiefdom into problems of territorial encroachment and expansion. The expansion and emigration enabled Ntogwa to extend his cult connections widely yet retain some control over them through the selection of adepts with close kin or origins in his home chiefdom. However, a halt to Habangana’s expansion, for various reasons, became a threat to the further development of Ntogwa’s region. This he tried to overcome late in his career, somewhat unsuccessfully, through a more direct commitment to other areas of the region. What he did not do, though his children did, was marry anyone from the chiefdoms in the region’s heartland (shown in Map 1) other than Habangana. In his old age he took his other wives from the periphery of the region in the west (from Tonota, Chadibe, and Mathaipngwane in the Central District, where he also established a hamlet) just as earlier he had married eastern wives (from the areas of his youth in Zimbabwe). Throughout the region’s heartland, he spread his points of access strategically, in two ways. First, he distributed his wives and children in hamlets at the frontiers of each of the heartland’s chiefdoms, and his oracle at a site accessible to a railway station. Second, he established an alternative oracle with its own regional shrine in the only chiefdom that had much room for immigration or more livestock, i.e. Habangana’s greatest rival, Ramokate Chiefdom (A on Map 1). However, this strategic placement and wide division of his family brought its own pressing problems, mainly due to local instability and succession disputes (see above page); and after less than a decade, he retreated to Habangana, with his entire family except for his far western wives and children. Until his death, four or five years later, he continued to devote himself much more to the western areas than any others, and admitted new adepts from there almost exclusively.

This account of Ntogwa's career and his region's development raises a tough question, which calls for further research. What sets the limits to a region's expansion and extension? The most obvious part of the answer relates to competition between regions and to the priest's own perceptions. Much of Ntogwa's region was defined relatively in a competition for congregations between his region and at least one other, mainly the north region of Manyangwa II. Significantly, this competition was absent in the far southwest, which may have been a further reason for Ntogwa's preoccupation with this area late in his life: he largely withdrew from the main areas of established competition. Yet it was Ntogwa himself who perceived quite early in his career that there had to be another region besides his in the whole of the west. Within his region alone he could not manage the total area covered by several regions now. Using a customary formula, Ntogwa reported to the cardinal oracle at Njelele that "All these people are too heavy for me.' He requested another priest, 'Give me another to help me.' Ntogwa then insured that this other was a protege of his own and closely bound to him. He trained his protege, apparently a son of Manyangwa I; brought him for confirmation at Njelele; installed him in the north; took Manyangwa H's sister and gave him his own daughter in marriage; and continued to visit and help him for long periods. When I asked this daughter (Manyangwa II's wife) about the interspersion of the regions' congregations, she insisted that the two priests never fought over the country. She said,

<quote>

'It is the black people themselves who did this. When they complained against father [Ntogwa], they went to Manyangwa and when they complained against him, they came here. We have our home in Botswana; Manyangwa has his in [Zimbabwe] 'Rhodesia'. But if people want to jump over from one to the other, it is alright; there is no fault.'

</quote>

The mutual definition of the regions is, thus, in part a product of co-operation and adjustment between the priests in response to their recognized and shared interests in the management of competition.

The evidence from the southwestern region suggests another part of the answer to the question of what sets the limits to a region. Ethnic links or historic ties and past affiliations are inadequate and are not in themselves enough of a basis for extending a cult region far into communities of large, nucleated villages. The inadequacy and limitation persists even when the cult's staff try to enhance these links and further various interests through their personal contacts and through heavy investments of resources. I must stress that this limitation by large, nucleated villages is not simply a matter of a lack of cultural familiarity with the cult. Kalanga themselves spread far and wide among ethnically different people and beyond the cult s domain into the borderlands' nucleated villages. Moreover, they have done so for at least one century and perhaps several. However, Kalanga have not managed to establish cult congregations in the borderlands, with perhaps one peripheral exception, although as individual supplicants they come to the oracles[66] even from Serowe, the Central District's sprawling capital.

My immediate point about the borderlands requires that I discuss briefly the apparent exception, which I mentioned. This is on the periphery of the southwestern region at Tonota, the northernmost of the large nucleated villages. The messenger there, Radipitsi, holds the most senior title among the Khurutse, who are Tswana-speaking. But he does not hold the major political office or chiefship that once went with his senior title. Radipitsi claims direct descent from a Chief Rauwe who sent cult messengers to an oracle, while he lived among Kalanga. Under the colonial Tati Company this chief was paramount over Kalanga in the region's heartland from about 1898 until he and other Khurutse were compelled to withdraw south to Tonota in 1913 (Werbner 1971a: 33f). However, Radipitsi's interest in the north is not a matter of past history only. Recently, he approached the head of the Tati Land Board (his Khurutse cousin Chief Ramokate), which is now responsible for much of the Company's former land in the north. He expressed his desire to return north soon in order to settle in State Lands near Ntogwa's daughter, Galani, at Thema Shanga. In the meantime, as messenger, Radipitsi continues to assert a political claim, seniority, and a connection with the north and the region's heartland. He acts as messenger, however, on behalf of villagers from his own immediate locality. It is a distinct, and somewhat independent part, rather than the big village as a whole or its chief (the Senior Sub-Tribal Authority), which participates in the southwestern region. In Radipitsi's small and exceptional congregation the southwestern region has reached an outer limit of the cult's domain.

One further point about expansion must be made here. Just as ethnic and historic ties are inadequate as a basis for the extension of a region so too in the cult's history ethnic differences in themselves have not been a barrier to expansion. At a moment in time, however, certain enclaves may be defined ethnically, but this may not be permanent. An example of such an enclave is in the heartland of the southwestern region; it is the whole chiefdom of Moroka (E on Map 1) which has no adepts or shrine, though the regional shrine in Habangana is virtually on its borders. The founders of Moroka Chiefdom and their descendants along with a main body of Barolong immigrants who arrived after 1915 have largely remained ethnically separate from and, in some respects, opposed to the Kalanga among whom they live. The more the ethnic separation is modified through marriage, the more likely is the incorporation (or re-incorporation) of this area into the cult, a process already well advanced, as shown by the marriage of the priest's son Vumbu to a Barolong wife.

To complete the answer to the question about the limits to cult or regional expansion and extension calls for a comparative analysis beyond this essay's scope, indeed beyond the data now available to me. A fuller answer will be reached when more is known about religious organization in relation to basic aspects of competition in big, nucleated villages, such as how their component communities' boundaries fluctuate and, how their ruling elites vary along with concentrations of power and wealth.

 The Priesthood and Its Managerial Problems

How does a priest cope with the continual and sporadic changes in his region's many congregations? How does he, at the same time, also accumulate assets and control adepts and their connections? The cult funds and offerings in a region generate varying opportunities to accumulate assets. Every household’s adults are expected to contribute a few pence a year, voluntarily, to their congregation’s fund which is brought to the priest to be offered (namata) at his oracle. However, actual contributions are made more selectively.[67] As a congregation waxes and wanes so does its fund and other offerings such as grain for beer or black cows or goats for slaughter at shrine feasts. It may happen that as many as ten or fifteen head of cattle are kept in trust by a priest for a particular community, (Daneel 1970: 41; Richards 1942: 55). Nevertheless, rarely are even a few head kept in trust within the congregation for long; they are sacrificed, die naturally, or are embezzled.[68] Similarly, every region ought to have a least one shrine at which a granary is kept full of grain for passers-by or supplicants at the oracle. However, only one of the western regions, Manyangwa’s, now maintains such a public granary?[69] By far the greatest accumulation of assets in cattle, cash, and dependants is a personal one that belongs to the priest himself.

At the peak of his career, a priest may be rich in capital, the head of a very large family, and in charge of a great turn-over in cult transactions. For example, the southwestern priest, Ntogwa, kept ten wives and their children, for whom he paid heavily in bridewealth, a personal man-servant, and many retainers as herdsmen. At the time of his death in his eighties in 1972, he left an estate of hundreds of head of cattle, numerous two-hundred pound sacks of grain, a substantial bank account and large sums in small change, a donkey cart, a ruined tractor, and a greater assortment of consumer goods than most Kalanga could afford. His gross turn-over in the cult can be estimated, roughly, from the extent of his region during 1964–65 (see Map 4): at least seven communities in Zimbabwe[70] and fourteen in Botswana, [71] plus about half this total where his adepts lived in wards not affiliated to his region. All together this represents a considerable gross turn-over from a catchment area well over a hundred miles in length. Yet to keep many dependants and be very rich, a priest needs a source of income besides messengers’ congregational transactions and sponsors’ gifts for initiation. In these his gross turn-over may be great yet his net income low or inadequate for all his dependants, since he must return a share to the cult’s staff.

A priest has a more lucrative source for his net income from the cult: a great stream of gifts, often as much as £10 a visit, from afflicted supplicants’, who, throughout the year, consult the oracle about individual affairs, rather than seasonally about communal ones. However, the individual supplicants' traffic, so crucial for a priest's accumulation of great wealth, is not and cannot be divorced from the congregational traffic: one sustains the other. A priest must manage both together, or risk a decline in both. This is so, in part, because the priest gets funds from the supplicant's traffic which he can use, as he sees fit, to subsidise transactions with messengers and their congregations. For example, to continue to give five pounds to an important messenger, despite a shortfall or decline in his congregation's contributions (i.e. the messenger from D15, mentioned on page 196). Yet perhaps even more fundamental is the significance that one traffic has for the other in organisational terms. Each provides personnel and contacts for the other: the seasonal and more fixed for the continual but somewhat more ad hoc; and vice versa. However, the more far reaching traffic, the supplicants; seems to represent a region's potential and may set limits for its variation. This traffic comes from well beyond a priest's current region, and brings to it some of its future staff. Thus members of wards about to form a congregation or would-be-messengers may first come to an oracle as individual pilgrims; or a messenger from a congregation that is established in one region may throw out a feeler for an alternative, while on a personal visit to another oracle.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-17.jpg]]

This traffic, although somewhat more ad hoc, is directed, nevertheless, through regular channels. A supplicant, referred to the oracle by one diviner, may be referred back by it to another diviner elsewhere for further help and treatment; first, of course, the oracle may pronounce on the cause of the supplicant's affliction or misfortune. There is, thus, a two-way traffic between diviners and an oracle, directed through specific referrals and carried on with authoritative advice and counselling. The diviners themselves may visit the oracle. However, the priest also maintains his contact with them and first-hand, up-to-date information on local conditions, through the frequent circuits that he makes round his region's congregations and beyond them. For example, even in very old age, Ntogwa visited most of his congregations at least once a year, and annually danced, for payment, at places hundreds of miles apart, from Botswana's capital to Bulawayo in Zimbabwe. In the past, through such circuits, a priest carried out a further role: public witchfinder for a congregation. Kalanga elders recall occasions when a priest such as the northwest's, Njenjema, while on a visit to a community, spoke to an apparently empty hut from the front outside it and got a response from within in the oracle's voice. This accused someone by name or clan and ordered the person to cease the practice of sorcery. I observed no such occasion; nor could I get adequate confirmation of claims, which I doubt, that public witchfinding no longer happens in the cult. Consequently, some important managerial problems in a priest's career must await further study, and can merely be indicated here.

However, my observations of these circuits do enable me to reach certain conclusions. Perhaps even more than the major property from a priest's estate, which is inherited rather straightforwardly by rule and practice (the bulk for a senior wife's first-born son, in effect as a trustee for the family as a whole), a priest's successor needs to take over the cult sphere which the late priest managed through frequent circuits and long journeys. This is a highly personal sphere. It demands that a successor acquire intangibles of reputation, i.e. for authoritative knowledge of the herbs needed for patients or to treat seeds, ritually, against pests. It also demands, of course, organisational expertise—effective first-hand knowledge of and contact with patients, diviners, and the other cult officials spread over great distances. Yet reputation and organisational expertise, unlike inherited property, have to be gained gradually. Admittedly, they may be gained in good measure by a potential successor, before a priest dies, through the potential successor's service as his closest associate and companion on the circuits. But this gain hardly eliminates delays and disputes about the transmission of a priest's assets or about succession to his office. Indeed, such a gain may be the crux of delays and disputes, because a recognised heir to a priest's main property may have to come to terms with another potential successor, the closest associate and companion of the late priest.

Ntogwa's case illustrates the opposition between inheritance and personal achievement, and its consequences. For various reasons, Ntogwa relied more heavily, for cult purposes, on two of his daughters, Nlahliwe and Galani, than on his senior son and main heir, Vumbu. Nlahliwe was his first wife's first-born who married and then separated from the northern region's priest. She went with her father on trips to the central oracles. Galani was his third wife's first-born, and she accompanied and helped her father on most of his other trips. She regularly took charge, on his behalf, of performances at shrines, and she became, after him, the region’s most famous dancer: indeed, her father often sang, at shrines, ‘Galani is the senior’ (i.e. of the hosana adepts). In contrast Vumbu, an accomplished dancer though not an hosana,[72] almost never accompanied his father. He knew little about his father’s herbs, and he remained away working on the railway in Bulawayo, except for brief visits to his wife and children in his father’s hamlet. After Ntogwa’s death Vumbu was chosen to succeed his father by many of the region’s messengers and their rulers, led by Chief Habangana from Ntogwa’s home chiefdom. However, some important messengers and rulers did not go to the selection meeting, notably Chief Ramokate from the chiefdom which rivals Habangana in size and other respects. For confirmation and installation, Vumbu was sent, along with Habangana’s messenger and porters, to the cardinal oracle at Dula in Zimbabwe. He returned triumphantly with a black sash, given by the cardinal oracle as a badge of recognition; but when he addressed his own region’s oracle at Habangana Chiefdom, in the presence of a great assembly of messengers, he failed to get a response from Mwali’s Voice. On his visit to Dula, neither of his prominent sisters, Nlahliwe and Galani, accompanied him: a quarrel and bitter recriminations between him and Galani had already become public knowledge. Moreover, a member of the family, who had good reason to be certain, assured me that the Voice would not be heard so long as they continued to quarrel and not make peace with each other.

In the meantime, Galani has been increasing her prominence in the region through her continued circuits around it and by establishing a new, personal base of her own. After a year’s pause to mark her father’s death, she resumed charge of performances at some Kalanga and Khurutse shrines[73] to the southwest, in the Central District. To the southeast, she chose a site suitable for a new oracle. She left the former Tati Reserve and her father’s hamlet in Habangana Chiefdom, and moved south to an area of growing settlement—indeed, the region’s area of greatest growth in settlement—where she built her own hamlet at Thema Shanga. This site is next to a rocky kopje (a granite knoll) with Bushman cave paintings and thus, as she told a confidante, especially suited to impress supplicants with its ancient significance. Moreover, its location in the State Lands gives her a contemporary vantage ground that is crucially comparable to Habangana Chiefdom at the time it gained the regional oracle around 1914. Just as Habangana had then, so too the territory around her site has now a very recently enhanced political significance, besides room for immigration and expansion of settlement (presently lacking at Habangana). Then Habangana was, in various respects, foremost among the set of newly independent Kalanga chiefdoms in the Tati Reserve (see Werbner 1971a). Similarly, the new political community on the State Lands, formed under one territorial ruler[74] by the Government, is potentially the most prominent in the region. It covers a large part of the State Lands (including Thema Shanga) that were acquired by the nation in 1969 from a colonial company; and it exceeds Habangana in size and perhaps already in population also. At Thema Shanga, Galani thus has a base for the kind of shrine which only a major political community on the wax can sustain as the centre of a whole region. However, it is essential for such a shrine that the territorial ruler, his messenger, and other local followers make a strong commitment of support along with considerable investment in the cult. Galani, for various reasons, requires more time to secure such support, if she can.

Primarily, the unresolved problem is whether she can turn her personal base in the supplicants' traffic into a springboard sufficient to reach command of the congregational traffic. Besides her great organisational expertise, she has an important advantage due to her widespread reputation for mastery of her father's herbs, which she is said to have taken in great sacks to her own hamlet. So far she has been able to attract to her for treatment not only supplicants but would-be-adepts also. Since her father's death she has continued to initiate some from the region's periphery in the Central District, though not from its old heartland to the east in the former Tati Reserve. These and some other adepts closely related to her call her their leader, ntungamili, and insist that she must be recognised as regional priest. Along with them a few rulers and messengers from the Central District, most prominently the Khurutse Radipitsi from Tonota, have publically taken her side and invited her to take charge of performances at shrines. Others from the region's heartland, including the Khurutse Chief Ramokate, have aided and encouraged her without such public recognition. But most have continued to favour her brother Vumbu or begun to throw out feelers for an alternative, affiliation to the northern region.

Such opposition within the region's heartland, led by most of its messengers and rulers, has forced Galani to develop her personal base more with the help of separatist churches, particularly the one heavily supported by Radipitsi and other Khurutse. Through the churches she has access to local communities and organised bodies and thus an alternative to those represented by established messengers. In return, she has had to make a personal commitment to the separatists that is greater than her father's was. Even her father sent and received sufferers who went in a two-way traffic to and from separatists. He attended their services, and included Christian prayers in shrine rituals. The further step Galani herself has had to make is the assumption of a separatist church leader's role along with public conversion and affirmation of church membership. It is a step she told me she was forced to take to protect herself ritually against sorcery from closely related enemies. However, this step, in turn, has put another part of her supplicants' traffic at risk and provoked further opposition, this time from some of her father's other collaborators who are the separatists' own opponents and lead a diviners' union. In June 1975, they staged an encounter with her, according to their president's statement in the Botswana Daily News, 'Because she used a Christian church as a cover up, (Mpaphadzi 1975)'.[75] Their intention was 'to set aside Galani who self-installed herself as our god's chief minister' (ibid.). However, the encounter was indecisive: Galani has retained a personal base in the cult, but neither she nor any one else has succeeded Ntogwa and taken charge of a region as a whole.

Every interregnum has its distinctive problems. Yet this cult phase is one among others that are not only connected with it but must also respond to certain structural constraints which continue from phase to phase and affect the careers of a series of priests.

 Hierarchy and the Making of Oracular Policy

So far, with regard to areas of dispersed settlement and small competing political communities, I have examined the regional instability, relative impermanence of oracles, variability in priestly succession, and fluctuations in congregations and their staff. I must now show that the regions do remain constant, in a sense, and further consider the relations between priests and oracles in order to clarify the making of oracular policy.

Regions do not proliferate in the High God cult. My observations of the western regions over a fifteen year period, participants' memories, and documentary sources from 1896 onwards lead me to this conclusion. In response to population increase, migration, war, the dislocation of individuals and communities under colonial rule, and other major political change, the regions altered vis-a-vis each other. Their relative coverage and definition changed, but not their maximum number. Chart II shows that no more than three regional oracles have been in the west for at least the past eighty years, throughout a succession of priests and oracle sites. I do not have equally good evidence for other regions.[76] The available evidence shows the continuity of three cardinal oracles: Njelele (Cockin 1879; Richards 1942: 55; during an interregnum, Gelfand 1966: 37), Matonjeni (Cockin'ibid., Daneel 1970: 40) Dula/Umkombo (Cockin 1879; under Maswabi III, Gelfand 1966: 35f; see also Daneel 1970: 47 on the priestess Kombo at Matonjeni).

Chart 2: Western Regions of the High God Cult

| REGION | DATES | PLACE | PRIEST'S NAME AND RELATIONSHIP | DOCUMENTARY SOURCE |

| 1. SOUTHWEST | Pre-1896 | (a) Near Mangwe; Bango Chiefdom? | Zviposa. Child of Njenje. Zimbabwe. | (On messenger Hobani, Burnham & Armstrong 1896, in Ranger 1967: 187) |

| | Early 1900's | INTERREGNUM |

| | ca.1914 | (b) Jackalas 1; southwest of Habangana Chiefdom, Botswana. | Fulele 'Cloud (Rainless).. Child of Njenje. | Plumtree N.C. 1914: N 3/31/1-5 |

| | Early 1920's | (c) Nimakwali; southwest of (b). (d) Luswingo; southwest of (c), Habangana Chiefdom, Botswana. | Ntogwa, 'Taken (by God)'. Daughter's son of Njenje. |

| | Late 1950's | (e) Tamba Palale; West of (d) Ramokate Chiefdom, Botswana |

| | 1972 to present | INTERREGNUM
Preliminaries at Thema Shanga
Southwest of (d) | | Mpaphadzi 1975 a & b; Modongo 1975. |

| 2. NORTHWEST | 1876 | (a) Maitengwe River; Meng we Chiefdom? | ? Unknown | Holub 1881: 64. |

| | 1896 | (b) Dombo Dema; South of (a), Nilikau Chiefdom (west of Tegwani River), Zimbabwe. | Njenjema ‘Twinkles (Variegation) Child of Njenje | Reed 1896:LMS 18/9/1896; Ranger 1967: 190. |

| | ?? | INTERREGNUM |

| | 1930’s? | (c)—
? south of (b) | Maboni
Son of Njenjema | Sebina 1947: 84. |

| | ?? early 1950’s | INTERREGNUM | | Modongo 1975. |

| 3. NORTH | ca. 1904 | (a) — East of Maitengwe River, Nata Tribal Trust Land, Zimbabwe. | Manyang wa I. | Administrator’s Office, S.R. 1904: Al 1/2/12/11 in Ranger 1967:205. |

| | ca. 1920 | INTERREGNUM |

| | late 1920’s | (b) — Nkwasenga, Matiwayile Hill, Nata Tribal Trust Land, Zimbabwe. | Mandibenga (Palali), ‘You rejected me’. Son of Manyangwa I. |

Such overall constancy in regions is, crucially, an aspect of cult hierarchy. Far more checks the number of regions or priests than merely local conditions. Each cardinal oracle has its juniors. To be installed, with full authority, a would-be priest of a junior oracle requires a cardinal oracle’s recognition, which may be given through the grant of a black sash. Among the western oracles under Njelele and Dula, the line of seniority, and thus of some authority, corresponds to their geographical location: the farther east and the closer to Njelele, the more senior. Traditionally, this line is an historical sequence: Mwali arrived at each oracle according to its seniority (see note 8). There are also kinship and affinal links between some priests, if not all. But these links do not provide a conceptual framework for relations between regions or oracles. By reference to his kinship with Njelele’s founder, a priest may claim that he has more or less personal seniority among other priests. Such personal seniority, however, does not locate his oracle in a line of seniority within the cult hierarchy. To illustrate, Ntogwa recognised that his oracle was junior to Manyangwa’s. Personally, he claimed, he was senior to Manyangwa. Manyangwa I was a sister’s son of Njelele’s founder; that is, junior in kinship to Ntogwa. Moreover, Ntogwa boasted that his relationship to the founder placed him among the most senior priests, ‘We have no “senior fathers" (batatenkulu) only “junior fathers" (batatenini)’; thus he claimed that Tapa, another priest, with whom he had lived at another oracle (not of the western line), was his ‘junior father’.

As for the relations between the cardinal oracles themselves, these must be, for the moment, the subject of guesswork. I have yet to visit a cardinal oracle. I venture to guess, however, that the trinity of cardinal oracles—Njelele, Matonjeni, anu Dula—stand in relation to each other as do the Beings in the cult’s Trinity: Father, Mother and Son. The distribution of oracles in the hills corresponds to the celestial location of the Trinity: in the south, the Father and Njelele; in the east, the Mother and Matonjeni; and in the west, the Son and Dula.

Although it would be ideal to give a detailed account of the lines of oracles along with the hierarchical relations in the cult, less than the ideal must do, at present, for lack of information. The only list available to me that has been recorded at a cardinal oracle is incomplete, (it omits Ntogwa and Njenjema), and it has no stated order. Maswabi III told it to Gelfand (1966: 40) as an account of attendance at Dula, rather than as an account of the order in which oracles were established and thus the order or line of seniority (see above note 10 for the order as it is known among Kalanga in the western regions). Again, it would be ideal to spell out the transactions, rights and duties which make the lines into a hierarchy, and to show how laymen and cult officials use the hierarchy. Unfortunately, too little is known for more than an initial sketch. I have already discussed various hierarchical relations in installation, in the required accounting for cult assets, and in the directed flow of replacement payments (i.e. a cardinal oracle demands an ‘axe’—currently a cash equivalent—for replacement of a dead adept).

Two further aspects of co-ordinated control and authority must be mentioned, briefly. First, a junior priest is expected to take certain actions with his senior’s consent, after consultation. An example significant also for my later analysis of policy-making illustrates this. Ntogwa described three steps when he told me how Njenjema of the northwestern oracle rescued a missionary, Reed, before Ndebele warriors attacked (a rescue confirmed by Reed’s letter of 1/9/1896). Njenjema first took Reed under his protection to Manyangwa, his senior (wola), then reported (biga) Reed, and finally brought him to the safety of a settlers’ town, Bulawayo (see also Reed 4/4/1896 in Ranger 1967: 189). In anticipation of my later analysis, I must stress that these priests, and later their oracles, acted in co-ordination, according to a hierarchy of authority. The second aspect is this: besides such occasional co-operation, priests meet and consult the High God in council, when they collaborate seasonally in ritual at a cardinal oracle. They are said to sit then in a semi-circle, according to seniority, on both sides of the cardinal oracle’s priest, in their midst. Such councils have yet to be studied. They do appear, however, to provide a central and collective check on the affairs of individual priests and their standing, along with an oppor tunity for the most general pronouncements on issues of broad or universal concern.

A critical conclusion follows from my argument about cult hierarchy along with competition. Negatively, it is the rejection of a view, which I call the crisis conception of the cults. More positively, it is an appreciation of continuity despite, and in part in response to, political and economic change, even disruption. As for the crisis conception, this overruns the past eighty years of literature on the cults, since the so-called rebellion in nineteenth century Zimbabwe (Selous 1896: 14f; Campbell 1926; Jackson 1925; Tredgold 1956; Gann 1965: 134f; Ransford 1968: 8). Initially, this conception was fostered by white settlers along with their Ndebele allies or helpers to explain—or rather explain away—the war’s aims and inspiration. Yet, oddly enough, the most modern version comes from the British historian who provides the most closely documented and masterly assessment of the earlier versions: Ranger (1967).[77] Moreover, Daneel (1970, 1971), who insightfully reports clues contrary to this conception, follows Ranger’s lead, nevertheless. This oddity is, of course, a proper subject for writers of historiography to explain. My task is to make plain the inadequacy of the crisis conception, and put forward a better alternative. I must reserve for elsewhere a close examination of the historical data.

In brief, the most modern version runs as follows. A grave crisis, indeed the unprecedented catastrophe of white conquest, drove cult leaders to renounce their religious opposition to violence. Immediately after the onset of colonial rule, they ‘lent both their moral support and their organisational apparatus to the preparations for the rebellion... Curiously enough there is least evidence about the Njelele shrine, which all authorities agreed to be the senior and most influential', (Ranger 1967: 148–9 my italics).

Fundamentally, this crisis conception of the cults is wrong because it obscures that the diverse interests within the cult's domain called for a broad consensus in oracular policy. A war policy against white settlers, and thus for a restoration of a conquered Ndebele kingdom, suited the interests of people in no more than a small fraction of this domain. It was a fraction that included some non-Ndebele; they were connected with the Ndebele regiments, for example the people at the area's eastern fringe in Belingwe among whom a small number of Ndebele also lived (Selous 1896: 238). The people in the rest of the domain had one policy, and they were the ones who co-ordinated their action over the widest area. The policy of protecting the white settlers, even fighting in their defence against the restoration of Ndebele dominance, was, as seen at that time, more in the interests of the people who adopted it throughout a great crescent around the Ndebele kingdom's stronghold in the highlands of Zimbabwe. This crescent runs from east to west across Ndau, Karanga, Venda and Kalanga country (see Map I in the Introduction).[78] The cardinal and regional oracles of this vast crescent had to have—indeed, did have—a policy in accord with that of their people: there is neither evidence nor reason to think otherwise.

Even before 1893, when the colonial conquest put an end to the Ndebele kingdom, the staff of the cardinal oracles had interests which were, in various senses, unlike and greater than the Ndebele kingdom's. This staff stood for the High.God's hierarchy of authority which was beyond, prior to, and much more far-reaching than one king's. They were thus accused of being presumptuous and of committing acts of lese-majeste. In order to punish them, the Ndebele king let loose against them his personal bodyguard (the Imbizu regiment, and also the Insuka regiment), and some of the cult staff were killed. However, to argue that cult leaders did not take part in the 1896 war party merely because of their past history of conflict with a recently dead Ndebele king would be to clutch at a straw. What must be grasped are the underlying constraints and the predicaments at the very heart of their theology and their authority.

‘The shrines (daka) are many; God is one,’ Kalanga say, Their High God’s oneness transcends, in their theology, the recognized disparities, even hostilities between the communities that seek His blessings. It is the macrocosm, the order beyond that of the congregation or any single community, towards which their theology directs their attention. The right to free movement on religious errands across communal borders is basic; such borders must not be closed against the cult staff or supplicants. Moreover, while any murder offends God, the shedding of an adept’s blood is a grave sin, considered tantamount to killing oneself, since it causes a ‘standstill’ (chamwi), when rain fears to sow the earth, and men may die of hunger. Furthermore, the portion of the earth that individuals and communities have they hold from God, its Creator and ultimate Owner. In fighting over it (see Werbner 1975: 109f), they commit a sin which must be paid for. Not that their conception represents a single wider society: that would be, in theological terms, to reduce the macrocosm to a microcosm with its defined boundaries. Conversely, the microcosm must be sustained vis-d-vis the macrocosm: the autonomy of communities must be respected. Thus a person ought to die or at least be buried in .his or her own community; i.e. preferably the person’s home ward or in a European’s case, a hometown and not the countryside. Otherwise, the corpse becomes a chamwi.

Again, it would be clutching at a straw to argue that such cosmological conceptions or even the whole of their theology dictated the actual responses of the cult staff in a crisis. Yet equally trivial is insistence on another elementary and primary cause such as the one in any materialist view which disregards the cosmological conceptions. These conceptions are a significant factor in behaviour because they are of such a kind that communities can continue to define their broadest consensus through them irrespective of their differences, hostilities and competition. In a crisis, the more inclusive the majority who are rallied through the cults, the more comprehensive and fundamental is the appeal to such cosmological conceptions. Even the minority, in its somewhat unsuccessful call for wider support during the 1896 war (the so-called mass commitment—Ranger 1967: 353), had to recast these conceptions rather than make radical religious innovations. Thus a more fundamentally wrong view could hardly be put, in my opinion, than the following: ‘These hints justify us in finding in the risings of 1896–7 [including the war to the east among Shona], though in different proportions, the same elements which are so clearly detectable in the twentieth century millenarian movements with which they are in other ways so comparable’ (Ranger 1967: 354).

<quote>

</quote>

In my view the need to respond to a broad consensus, the cult procedures for the discovery and definition of such consensus (i.e. through councils at the cardinal oracles), the commitment to macrocosmic conceptions, all acted—and continue to act—as constraints on the cult leadership as a whole. Admittedly, the cult hierarchy was and is sustained through a capacity to collect, store, and allocate great resources and riches. But, in turn, this capacity must be sustained through voluntary consent for collaboration between communities. And it is here, in the winning of consent, that the predicament at the heart of the hierarchy’s authority lies.

One last point about oracular policy-making must suffice here. According to the crisis conception, in its modern version, the cults’ alternative to armed resistance has been, throughout most of the colonial period, a ‘sort of despairing passivity’ (Ranger 1967: 378) (see my note 14). Again the contrary is the case, as shown very clearly in the following account, which has numerous parallels elsewhere in the cult’s domain:

<quote>

‘Nyusa [Messengers] brought the instructions that [black people] were not to sell grain to white people except for salt, and then as little grain … as possible, as Mwari desired them to obtain their salt at Brak [sz’c., brackish] places or by burning salt grasses, as they did before the white people came. Should they barter grain for salt, they were to cover their baskets so that Mwali could not see it. [They] were told through Manyusa [messengers] that Mwari would send a great wind and that all the white people would leave the country in the night. On their departure, Mwari would introduce other white men who would charge I shilling tax only, and sell goods at a quarter of their present price.' (Franklin 1932: 82).

</quote>

As seen by some sophisticated Kalanga, such as an ex-headmaster, 'Mwali is a conservative God. He does not like change. He wants the old ways.' Indeed, to some Kalanga Mwali appears to have a devotion to customs for their own sake. Yet this appearance, though not a disguise, is nevertheless a cover for the enduring orientation of cult policy. It is conservative, but with economic and political concerns which are as basic in a neo-colonial period as in a colonial one. The oracles' messages have repeatedly advocated resistance to the inroads of a cash economy. They have urged the people to store their grain, to rely on mutual aid in agriculture, to brew beer for the co-operative labour of work bees, and not to be at the mercy of sales. 'Why do you sell all your grain, and not keep some to help the children?' As Ntogwa's daughter told me, 'Mwali objects to sales, for the country is not sold. It is given to its owners.' Similarly, in accord with the tide of popular opposition in Zimbabwe to measures for European control of agriculture (i.e. through the making of ridges and fences), the oracles' messages have condemned the measures: they spoil the land and cause 'standstills' (zwichamwi) of rain. Cult policy has been even more directly active politically (rather than 'passively despairing') in other respects also. At the time of the first elections prior to Botswana's Independence, the messages warned of the dangers of party politics; i.e. that office is given by people according to law, and not fought over. Furthermore, in 1974 the message brought back to Botswana shrines from the northern oracle in Zimbabwe was. 'The rain is held back because of those who fight over the country, those of Smith, Nkomo and Kaunda.' Thus the central concern of the oracles' messages was and still is to conserve order in the world and maintain the welfare of the land, its people and their economy. Continuity is the policy of the cults, and to explain it fully calls for a consideration of changes in the ecology and geopolitics of a vast domain of Southern Africa.

My account is concentrated primarily on the cult's western regions in Zimbabwe and Botswana. The reason for this is simple: I know them through long-term observation. However, as I have shown, these regions have to be understood in relation to others. There are wider sets of regions, and there is a definite order among the limited number of regions in each set. Moreover, the cult itself is an organized, if somewhat unstable, whole. It is hierarchical and centralized, and its staff are' ranked and recruited accordingly: the higher the rank, the narrower and more exclusive are the criteria for recruitment, and recruitment to the inner circle of priests is on the most exclusive basis. Furthermore, certain conditions have long prevailed across regions and virtually across the whole of the cult's domain. Perhaps most crucially, these conditions have favoured, even compelled, the relocation of communities or their boundaries and great waves of individual migration. The populations that have thus come to live side by side in dispersed hamlets and homesteads have become more and more diverse ethnically. That is why the cult has had to have the capacity to override cultural differences and admit newcomers, irrespective of ethnic origins. In directing their attention towards the macrocosm and a High God, the cult appeals to a more universal order: this order transcends their differences. It is essential to appreciate, however, that various constraints continue to operate, and are anticipated by the people themselves, because the cult's domain continues to be set within a field of relations which is somewhat like a patchwork. This field is made up of the diverse and competing congregations and communities in each region, the variable sets of supplicants in its vicinity, and disparate, even opposed churches and ritual associations. All these parts are hardly constant or alike in importance. Indeed, through a particular priest's efforts the importance of a part of the patchwork may alter or a new part may be introduced. Moreover, a priest must commit his various resources, and thus gets more involved in one part than another. Yet a part is not the whole, and radical change in a part need not transform the whole. It is the disparity and diversity of competing or opposed parts that continues to constrain responses within the cult and the orientation of its leaders.

My analysis of this High God cult illuminates that it is essential to study changes in regional relations in order to understand a cult which reaches, both in ideology and organization, beyond the boundaries of any single political community, whether this be a tribe or a nation. The supposed wholeness of a single society cannot provide the starting point for an analysis of such a cult. Nor can it be explained by reference to some 'correspondence' between religion and the social order of any single community: the cult's regions are not a replica of the social divisions which exist apart from ritual relations. On the contrary, the cult's regions, like all its ritual relations, have an autonomy of their own. Their transformation must be studied in its own right, therefore, and not as some dependent variable of other phenomena.

 References

<biblio>

Campbell, A.A. (Mziki)

1926 Mlimo: The Rise and Fall of the Matabele Pietermaritzburg: Natal Witness.

Caton-Thompson, G.

1931 The Zimbabwe Culture: Ruins and Reactions. Clarendon Press. Oxford.

Cockin, J.

1879 Letter to J. Mullens. London Missionary Society Archives. Matabele Mission Vol 4 LO/6/1/4.

Daneel, M.L.

1970 The God of the Matapo Hills. Mouton for Communications—1. Afrika—Studiecentrum, Leiden. The Hague.

1971 Old and New in Southern Shona Independent Churches. The Haguer-Mouton for Afrika—Studiecentrum, Leiden. Vol. 1.

1974 Vol. 2.

Franklyn, H.

1932 Manyusa. Nada, 10: 77–83.

Gann, L.H.

1965 A History of Southern Rhodesia. London’ Chatto and Windus.

Gelfand, Michael

1962 Shona Religion. Cape Town: Juta.

1966 An African’s Religion—The Spirit of Nyajena. Cape Town: Juta.

Holub, Emil

1881 Seven Years in South Africa—(1872–79) London: Sampson Low Marston Searle, and Rivington.

Horton, R.

1975 On the Rationality of Conversion. Africa, 45: 219–235.

Keay, R.W.J. (ed.)

1959 Vegetation Map of Africa. London: Oxford University Press.

Knothe, C.

1888 Kurzer Bericht Uber die Reise nach Bonyai. Berlin Missions Berichte.

Loyd, M.

1959 Diaries of the Jesuit Missionaries at Bulawayo 1879–1881, Publication 4, Rhodesiana Society, Salisbury.

Modongo, T.

1975 Over 100 to Atempt to Trace ‘Mwali’. Botswana Daily News (June 11th).

Mpaphadzi, M.

1975 Bid to Solve Mystery of a God in a Dead End. Botswana Daily News (July Gabarone.

1975 Report to the District Officer. Author’s Archives (Courtesy of Mr. Harry Finnigan.) Francistown.

Native Commissioner Plumtree

1914 Letter, Ref. N3/31/1-5. Archives of Southern Rhodesia. Salisbury.

Newman, K.

1971 Birdlife in Southern Africa. Johannesburg: Purnell.

O’Neill, J.

1920 The Natives of S.W. Matabeleland and Some of their Religious Customs. Proceedings Rhodesian Scientific Association 19: 3–11.

Posselt, F.

1927 Some Notes on the Religious Ideas of the Natives of Southern Rhodesia. South African Journal of Science 24: 530–36.

Ranger, T.O.

1966 The Role of Ndebele and Shona Religious Authorities in the Rebellions of 1896 and 1897. In The Zambesian Past, E. Stokes, and R. Brown, (Eds.) Manchester: Manchester University Press, pp. 94–136.

1967 Revolt in Southern Rhodesia. London: Heinemann.

Ransford, O.

1968 Bulawayo: Historical Battleground of Rhodesia. Cape Town: A.A. Balkema.

Reed, G.C.H.

1896 Letter from Dombudema. London Missionary Society Archives 18/9/1896. London.

Richards, J.B.

1942 The Mlimo Belief and Practice of Kalanga. Nada 19: 51–55 *

Schapera, I.

1971 Rainmaking Rites of Tswana Tribes. African Social Research Documents. Vol. 3 Cambridge and Leiden.

Schwellnus, E.

1888 Unser Vorstoss Zu Dem Bakhalanga. Berlin Missions Berichte. pp. 506–512.

Sebina, A.M.

1947 Makalaka. African Studies 6: 82–93

Stayt, H.A.

1931 The Bavenda. London: Oxford University Press.

Summers, R.

1961 The Southern Rhodesian Iron Age. Journal of African History 2: 1–13

Tredgold, Robert

1956 The Matopos. Federal Government Printer. Salisbury.

Van Warmelo, N.J.

1940 The Copper Miners of Musina. Government of South Africa Ethnological Publications (8). Pretoria. 1

Von Sicard, Harald

1952 Ngoma Lungundu. Studia Ethnographica Upsaliensia, Vol. 5. Uppsala.

Werbner, Richard

1964 Atonement Ritual and Guardian Spirit Possession Among Kalanga. Africa. 34:206–223

1971a Local Adaptation and the Transformation of an Imperial Concession in North-Eastern Botswana. Africa 41: 32–41.

1971b Symbolic Dialogue and Personal Transactions among Kalanga and Ndembu. Ethnology 10: 311–328

1972 Sin, Blame and Ritual Mediation. In The Allocation of Responsibility. M. Gluckman, (Ed.) Manchester: Manchester University Press, pp.226–55.

1973 The Superabundance of Understanding: Kalanga Rhetoric and Domestic Divination. American Anthropologist 75: 1414–1440.

1975 Land, Movement and Status among Kalanga of Botswana. In Essays in African Social Anthropology. M. Fortes & S. Patterson, (Eds.) London: Academic Press, pp.95–120.

Forthcoming. The Autobiography of An African Family.

</biblio>

© Richard P Werbner 1977

 8. Cult Idioms and the Dialectics of a Region

J. M. Schoffeleers

 Introduction

In the ritual cycle of the Mbona cult of southern Malawi and adjacent areas of Mozambique the most prominent event is of a sociologically distinct kind. It is the only occasion when its various participants act in unison. Outside the context of the Mbona cult they belong to different countries, to different administrative units within these countries, to different churches and to several other groups and sets which pursue their own, sometimes conflicting interests. Only in the Mbona cult do they have a conceptual basis for concerted action which transcends these boundaries and which brings them together in a kind of overarching region.

The event which requires their ritual collaboration is the rebuilding of the shrine and organisational centre of the cult. This shrine is like a hut, with the usual proportions, and highly perishable. It often has to be rebuilt, on average every five years but there are no rigidly fixed intervals. The decision to perform the ritual of rebuilding depends as much on the condition of the shrine as on the need for a ritual in order to counteract some calamity. In any case, rebuilding requires protracted consultations between the formal leadership of the cult and the rulers of the various chiefdoms of the region, on which occasion old animosities are habitually revived and fresh ones created. Often the ritual has to be postponed, because the parties involved are unable to reach unanimity. However, they may be forced to act by the cult medium who, while in a state of possession, personifies the deity and compels the various factions to make peace so that the act of rebuilding may proceed. One also observes on this occasion a general resurgence of people's faith in Mbona. Ancient myths are retold and refashioned; rumours about strange omens circulate and, when the shrine is finally rebuilt, a great many contributions are made in the form of food and labour.

Mbona's shrine is located at a short distance from the township of Nsanje in southern Malawi. The earliest known recorded mention of its existence dates from the time of Livingstone's travels through the area, but apparently it is much older (see Schoffeleers 1972). Local tradition associates its origin with the occupation of the region by the Mang'anja, a Chewa-speaking people (Tew 1950), who had already developed a centralised state system by the end of the sixteenth century. According to this tradition, Mbona was a rain-maker of great repute who, on account of his influence with people, aroused the wrath of the first paramount, Lundu, who had him killed. After the execution the rain-maker's head was severed from his body and shown to the people to prove that he was no longer alive. Subsequently, however, a violent storm began to rage. In it all the executioners perished. Mbona's spirit then took possession of a villager, and through his mouth Mbona made known that his head had to be buried and a shrine erected over its resting place. Mbona also ordered the paramount Lundu to provide a woman to live at the shrine as Mbona's wife. The paramount complied; then rains fell, and the country prospered. This is the essence of the myth, as it is recounted to this day.

What characterizes this region in the first place is the shared belief that only the cult and its staff has the means to counteract such calamities as droughts, floods, locusts and epidemics, and that it is therefore in the interest of all to support the cult. Yet the authority of the cult and its staff reaches beyond these pragmatic considerations. On the basis of the equally common belief that natural disasters do not happen independently but are caused by an angry deity in punishment of sins, the cult's staff also pronounces on the nature of these sins and thereby on social behaviour in general. In consequence of its acceptance of this authority the cult region is more than a collection of pragmatically motivated people; it also presents itself as a moral community with its own axioms and values and its own standards of conduct.

To understand how people conceptualize their region in the context of the cult two conceptions and the dialectical relations between them need to be analysed. These contrasting conceptions are respectively hierarchical and egalitarian in orientation. The first is embedded in the activities and mythical representations of the formal leadership of the cult, and it underscores the legitimacy of the traditional (or quasi-traditional) political organisation. The second underlies the activities and myths of the population and the medium, and it emphasizes values and concerns which transcend all forms of political and economic inequality including that between chief and subject. The hierarchical conception asserts itself in the day-to-day operation of the cult. The egalitarian conception, on the other hand, although continuously present as an undercurrent, asserts itself only intermittently, when the medium is possessed and during the processes which generate such possession. During the possession sequence, the authority of the medium takes precedence over that of the formal leaders of the cult, all of whom are also government acknowledged chiefs. Indeed, the medium may request that they act for the cult and their people in ways which they might otherwise have been unwilling to undertake. The cult leaders, on their part, may refuse to attend or accept the medium's demands: they may declare that his possession is simulated. The possession event thus assumes the character of a contest between a formal and an informal type of leadership within the cult organisation. Furthermore, such an event constitutes a moment in time when the two conceptions of the region are brought into direct confrontation by their respective protagonists.

Clearly, there are critical factors which influence the decision of the cult leadership whether or not to attend the mediumistic seance. The most critical of these factors is the degree of support that the medium receives from the people. It is not accidental that this support finds its expression in the outbursts of rumour which precede possession. The evidence suggests that such outbursts provide the contents of the communication transmitted by the medium. Consequently, the possession sequence has been regarded both as the summation and the climax of a wider process which, in principle, involves all the people.

Three main steps are necessary for my argument about the cult processes and conceptualizations. The first step which begins this paper is to examine the formal leadership in relation to the cult organisation and its political setting. Next the medium's position has to be considered in relation, on the one hand, to the formal leadership of the cult and, on the other hand, to the entire population. Finally, the actions of the two kinds of cult leader — the formal leadership and the medium — have to be related to the two opposing conceptions of a region.

 The Formal Organisation of the Cult

The organisation in its present day form may be envisaged as operating within four spatial categories that form four concentric circles (see Map I). In the innermost circle are the shrine grounds, some ten acres in extent, which comprise a sacred forest, the shrine proper, a place of assembly, and a small settlement where the attendants live. The shrine grounds are considered to be outside the jurisdiction of any secular authority, and they are therefore not subject to government rules and regulations concerning land use; nor do its inhabitants pay taxes. The next circle corresponds to a land area of about twelve square miles which directly surrounds the shrine grounds. This area, known as Khulubvi, is demarcated by topographical features associated with Mbona's martyrdom. Prominent among these is the sacred pool which is supposed to have originated when blood flowing from Mbona's body turned into water. Within this area reside the territorial chiefs who are the principals of the cult, the minor officials, and the cult medium. All of these hold their positions partly by virtue of their association with this spatial category. The third circle corresponds to the district of Nsanje which is the administrative division within which the principals act as territorial chiefs, subject to the policies of the central government. The outer circle corresponds to the entire area over which the Mang'anja are dominant in a traditional sense. This area is co-terminous with the cult region and covers part of Malawi as well as Mozambique. Apart from the Mang’anja, who consider themselves autochthonous, its population consists of a number of other ethnic groups that have moved in more recently and mostly from the Zambezi valley. The Mang’anja have remained dominant in traditional politics by dint of occupying all the chieftaincies, whereas the immigrants are only represented in village headmanships. On the other hand, many immigrants have been successful economically as rice and cotton growers, fishing entrepreneurs, cattle raisers and shopkeepers. Moreover, on this basis they have been able to secure prominent positions in the Malawi Congress Party. The cult organisation formally emphasizes the same division between autochthons and immigrants that is characteristic of the system of chieftainship: foreigners are not supposed to hold major positions in the cult.

[[r-p-richard-p-werbner-regional-cults-18.jpg]]

 The Chiefs and the Shrine

All Mang’anja territorial chiefs are agents of the cult by virtue of their office. They are consulted about the performance of major rituals; they receive requests for and organise the collection of contributions to the shrine, and they have the right to attend on major ritual occasions. Moreover, when a particular area suffers from drought or some other calamity, petitions to the shrine organisation for ritual assistance are made through its chief. Theoretically, therefore, the Mang’anja chiefs, whilst divided by different administrative systems, appear as one body in the Mbona cult. They can be said to share a common estate, i.e. the cult organisation; to hold common jural responsibilities in respect of that estate, and to be capable of concerted action for the maintenance of that estate.

As agents of the cult, the chiefs are differentiated according to their location in relation to Khulubvi, the ritual area marked off by events in the myth of Mbona’s death. The principals are the chiefs within Khulubvi, and it is through those outside it that the shrine organisation maintains its contact with the other areas of the region. The principals, like the rest of the chiefs, have independent jurisdiction over cult matters in their own constituencies, but in addition they also exercise authority over the shrine grounds, its personnel, and the performance of rituals at the shrine. They have authority to grant permission for the performance of rituals on behalf of other chiefdoms; to appoint or dismiss personnel; to judge cases of violation of the shrine grounds, and to preside over any deliberation which concerns the conduct of the cult. For most of the colonial and post-colonial period there have been three principals, but in 1968 one of them was divested of his office for reasons to be discussed immediately. The relationships between the principals are characterized by perpetual conflict due to continuous attempts on the part of each of them to achieve ascendancy over his peers, which in turn leads to frequent accusations of abuse of authority and to allegations of sorcery.

This quest for primacy is expressed in the origin myths of each principal's office. I will consider each in turn and later present a schematic resume of two versions in Chart I. Chief A claims the right to primacy because his apical ancestor was granted exclusive jurisdiction over Khulubvi by one of the Mang'anja paramounts. Chief A's ancestor had then delegated the right to offer sacrifices to Chief B's ancestor, but without granting him any secular jurisdiction. This, Chief A maintains, was the situation till the introduction of the colonial government, when B obtained his chiefly title from the government under false pretenses. C's right to the office of principal. was even less defensible, according to this version, as his ancestors had been no more than ordinary headmen in precolonial times.

Chart I: Resume of Origin Myths of Two Principals

| Issues of Conflict: | A's version | B's version |

| Original nature of ego's authority | Secular and ritual | Ritual and secular |

| Grantor Onego's authority | Secular authority (Paramount) | Ritual authority (Mbona) |

| Original nature of rival's authority | Ritual only | Secular only |

| Grantor of rival's original authority | A's ancestor | B's ancestor |

| Nature of rival’s illegal action | B assumes secular authority
B makers himself independent | A makes himself independent and assumes ritual authority |

Chief B’s version of the myth is that Mbona himself appointed Chief B’s apical ancestor to be priest and granted him secular jurisdiction over the entire area of Khulubvi. Chief A’s predecessors were then given part of Khulubvi to administer on behalf of B’s lineage. Chief A, in his turn, subdelegated part of his jurisdiction to an ancestor of Chief C, who then became a sub-chief.

Chief C’s account is less clear, which is probably due to the fact that his office is of rather recent origin. One of his predecessors was among the first converts of the Protestant mission which was established in 1900. It was partly due to mission protection that he was officially recognized chief in 1913 and raised above a predecessor of A, who became his sub-chief. This relation was maintained until 1968, when the Malawi government restored A to the chiefship and reduced C to the status of senior headman. In 1972, C was even divested of that position following charges of slander and sorcery against A.

To underStand these conflicting accounts it is convenient, to limit discussion to A and B, and omit C, for the moment. Their differences have been schematized in Chart I.

The two rival versions show a common sequential structure which evolves in three parts: (1) A superior authority (either that of the paramount or the cult organisation) grants someone combined ritual/secular authority over the Khulubvi area; (2) the grantee delegates either the ritual or the secular part to another person; (3) the person thus given one part appropriates the other part which is lacking and makes himself the equal of the person who delegates him.

Reduced to its essentials, the cause of the conflict appears to be the illegal appropriation, by one’s rival, of one type of authority on the basis of the other type. Thus one of the two is accused of extending his ritual authority to the field of secular authority, and the other is accused of having done the opposite. Each in fact assumes that the combined exercise of the two authorities is legitimate in his own case (and, by implication, also in the case of his grantor), but not in the case of his rival. This, I believe, is more than a conflict between two rivals over a particular right; it is also, and more profoundly so, a questioning of the right itself. It reveals in its own way the profound tension between ritual and secular authority which appears to pervade the cult at all levels: its mythology, its formal organisation and its informal operation.

The permanent condition of conflict between the principals reaches its climax on two different occasions and in two different settings which are nevertheless in many ways related. One of these occasions is the rebuilding of the shrine; the other presents itself whenever the district administration contemplates changes in the boundaries of chiefdoms or in the positions of individual chiefs. The Nsanje district administration has for one of its constituent bodies a chiefs' council whose chairman is the district commissioner, now known as the government agent. The chiefs' council, in its turn, is responsible to the district council on which it is represented and to which it makes recommendations. A perennial problem of the Nsanje district administration has been the relative smallness of the chiefdoms in the southern part of the district, a state of affairs historically attributable to the presence of the Mbona shrine. Consequently, there have been a number of attempts, partly for the sake of administrative efficiency, partly for the sake of more intensive political control, to arrange them into larger units. Between 1913, when chiefdoms for the first time became officially recognized administrative units, and the present, there have been eight alterations of boundaries, five of which involved the Khulubvi area. In each case this led to severe competitive struggles and to the creation of a powerful undercurrent of hostility in the relationships between individual chiefs.

Competition for chiefships in the district affects the cult in a number of ways. Such competition is inextricably enmeshed with the competition between the principals: their standing with the district administration is a major factor in their quest for primacy. It also affects the relationships between principals and neighbouring chiefs to the extent that the latter frequently refuse to support the shrine organisation. Even a catastrophic drought may not be sufficient to rally the local chiefs around the shrine. A case in point is the drought in 1948–9, this led to a general revival of rain cults in Malawi, but in Nsanje it coincided with one of these periodic power struggles, and a number of chiefs did not rally around the shrine. Finally, the competition emphasizes the ambiguous position of chiefs operating within a system of modern government. A chief's position under such a 'system is more directly dependent on the support of the government in power than on the support of the population. Capable individuals may be able to steer a cautious course between the demands of one party and the other, but the conflict is never far from the surface. In the Nsanje district, where the most sensitive issues have traditionally been those relating to taxation, cotton prices and agricultural regulations, this situation has at times led to occasions when the chiefs, including the cult principals, were expected to implement government policy whereas the cult medium encouraged disobedience and resistance.

Against this background of conflict and ambiguity it may be asked how the principals are able to exercise effective authority. Part of the answer is that their position is similar to that of other chiefs in that their authority largely depends on the support which the central government is willing and able to provide. This constraint appears at its clearest in the history of principal C who was ultimately deposed but who, while his favour with the government lasted, was able to maintain his authority in the cult. In addition to this, the principals, like all Mag'anja chiefs, are credited with the power to withhold rains or cause some other calamity. However, in their case, this power along with their cult jurisdiction is believed to operate also beyond the boundaries of their chiefdom. To illustrate briefly, in December 1967 principal B had requested his people to repair the grass roof of his house, but without success. At the same time there was the threat of a drought, the rains having already been a few weeks late. It was decided to offer a sacrifice, but B refused to be present. No rain fell after the sacrifice, and since it was the general opinion that this was due to the sorcery of the principal, apologies were offered and the roof repaired.

The religious and secular authority of the principals, although protected by the same sanctions, are in part challenged by different agencies. In their role of secular rulers they are subject to challenges by the central government represented in the person of the district commissioner; as religious authorities they are particularly open to challenges by the people represented in the person of the medium.

 The Spirit Medium and the Informal Operation of the Cult

Within the cultural idiom of the Mang’anja a medium is a person who is able and authorized to receive and transmit messages thought to emanate directly from supernatural beings. The word ‘directly’ serves to distinguish mediums from ordinary diviners whose contact with the supernatural, insolar as it is thought to exist, is mediated through some external object. I’he distinction between medium and common diviners is socially important, among other reasons, because divination is sometimes used deliberately by chiefs who wish to avoid the services of spirit mediums. Contact with the supernatural is commonly established through trance during possession. The medium is said to be seized (-gwidwa) by a spirit (mzimu) and, while in a condition of dissociation (-gwa), he babbles and raves (-bwebweta). His utterings are often unintelligible to outsiders unless ‘translated’ by the medium’s acolyte or interpreter.

In the course of their history the Mang’anja have developed or adopted a variety of mediumistic institutions. Broadly, Mang’anja distinguish between mediums who operate on behalf of private interests and those whose concern is with public interests. The former specialise in the diagnosis and treatment of diseases, whilst the latter — whom I designate territorial mediums — predict and explain disturbances in the natural environment. Territorial mediumships show significant variations according to differences in sex, means of contact with the divine, relationships with chiefly lineages, and the spatial extent of their jurisdiction (Schoffeleers 1974). Thus some mediumships are exclusively held by women; others by men and women. A few receive their revelations in dreams, while the majority receive and transmit them through possession. Some are members of the local chief’s lineage; others operate independently. Finally, some have local significance, whereas others such as the Mbona mediums have regional significance. Politically, the most crucial variable is that of the relationship between medium and chief. For it is considered that, where a medium is a member of the ruling lineage, he will be close to the interests of that lineage, and that, where he is not so related, there is a definite potential for opposition to the ruling lineage’s interests. Indeed, it would appear that the history of territorial mediumship among the Mang’anja can be validly interpreted only in terms of these two conflicting tendencies.

Chart 2: Mbona Mediums in the Twentieth Century

| Name of Medium | Sex | Period of activity (approx.) |Biographical Notes |

| I Mbote | Male | c.1900–1914 | Immigrant lineage; independent; divested |

| 2 Mbandera | Female | c.1920–1930 | Full sister of 1; independent; died in office |

| 3 Onsewa | Female | c.1930–1933 | Relative of principal B; died m office |

| 4 Edward Harrison | Male | c. 1933–1943 | Relative of principal B; died in office |

| 5 Jailos Thom | Male | 1946–1951 | Younger brother s son of I and 2; independent; died in office |

| 6 Thapuleni Mybeck | Male | 1952- | Claimed to be relative of principal B; rejected as medium |

| 7 Joseph Thom | Male | 1954-to date | Younger brother of 5; independent |

Much the same can be maintained of the post-1900 history of the Mbona mediums (see Chart 2). The leading mediums during this period have been members of an immigrant lineage whose ancestress had been granted asylum at the shrine. The present medium of that line, like his predecessors, is quite definitely independent of the principals with whom, moreover, he is in almost continuous conflict. Other mediums of this period, however, have belonged to the lineage of one of the principals. One of them, Edward Harrison, enjoyed considerable renown between the mid-thirties and 1943. His was a case in which attachment to a chiefly lineage could be successfully combined with the confidence of the population. His success was due to the convergence of several favourable factors, including Edward’s own personality, the popularity of the principal whose kinsman he was, and the political circumstances of the time.After Edward’s death, however, the credibility of the chiefs came increasingly to be questioned during opposition to unwanted agricultural reforms and the imposition in September 1953 of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. It would have been difficult in such a climate for any medium closely related to a chief to maintain himself. Although at least one aspirant did try, he was unsuccessful, and the Mbona mediumship has from 1946 onwards remained in the hands of independents.

 The Medium’s Entourage

One particular facet which needs to be made explicit is that the Mbona mediumship, at least in its present form, is not being used as an oracle in the sense that the medium can be called upon to provide divinely inspired solutions to such problems as succession disputes. Possession is conceived of as an event which is entirely dependent on the initiative of the divinity, and solutions to specific problems, insofar as they are provided, are not given at the request of one or other party but only in response to a general feeling of crisis. This has the important implication that the medium need not be in any way better informed than the average inhabitant of the region. All he needs is to keep in tune with the general sentiment of the population. In accordance with this principle, the medium does not travel widely; nor does he maintain a network of informants. What information he needs he can, in principle, pick up from village or market talk. There is one exception to this, which is that he must be better informed than the average person about what goes on at the shrine. However, since he lives nearby, and since little remains secret on account of the conflicts between the principals, this constitutes no particular problem.

Still, the medium has a small entourage of kinsmen and sympathizers who in various ways assist and support him. Within this entourage the important roles are those of the medium’s guardian (kholo) and of his acolyte/interpreter (womasula). The former is the head of the lineage section (mbumba) to which the medium belongs, and he is always male. The latter may be any adult member .of the lineage, but preference is given to a woman of mature age. The guardian as the head of the lineage is co-responsible for the actions of its members, including the medium, unless their relationship is severed on account of some conflict. He is further entitled to act on behalf of a lineage member when he or she is permanently or temporarily incapable of acting on his or her own behalf. This is considered to be the case when the medium is possessed. It is the guardian who then takes command by sending messages to the principals and by formally receiving them, if they decide to come.

The task of the interpreter, usually a woman, is to render the ravings and mumblings of the medium intelligible and understandable to those to whom they are directed, and to convey the replies of the latter back to the medium. Her role is a critical one in the sense that the outcome of the seance partly depends on her ability to formulate. She has therefore to be a person of proven ability. The choice of an interpreter is the exclusive affair of the lineage to which the medium belongs. Should one medium die and another emerge from the same lineage, as has been the case with the present medium, then the interpreter will also serve the next medium. If, on the other hand, the next medium comes from a different lineage, then she will cease to function as an interpreter. The point really is that medium, guardian and interpreter co-operate in the interest of their own lineage which stands to benefit from its association with the mediumship. In the past, it seems that successful mediumship could, given the right conditions, be converted into one or other form of hereditary secular authority. This no longer is the case, but the present medium and his kinsmen seem to think that he or his successor may possibly become the sole head of the cult. This at least is the interpretation which the principals give of the fact that the staff have built a separate possession hut which at the same time is used as a shrine. It appears, therefore, that the hostility between the medium and the principals, which is so much a feature of the present situation, is not merely incidental, rather, it is to be viewed as a logical consequence of the fact that the medium is a potential rival of the principals, both in their role of secular rulers and in their role of heads of the cult organisation.

 The Mbona Medium and the Chiefs

The Mbona medium becomes possessed rather infrequently, at intervals of several years. Such possession maybe provoked by three different types of events, viz. environmental calamities, offences against the social order, and offences against the cult. In actual fact, it may be difficult to establish in any particular case which of the three is to be regarded as the activating factor, since nature, society and cult appear to form an indivisible triad. Environmental and climatic disturbances are routinely explained in terms of social disturbances and vice versa, while both again are connected with the cult as the censor of public mores and as possessing the means of expiation. Whatever the immediate cause of possession, it invariably involves a pronouncement on the social and moral condition of the community. Moreover, there is a further general aspect of the message transmitted by the medium: it is always centrally concerned with the behaviour of the chiefs and with the relationships between the chiefs and the population. Characteristically, the chiefs have to bear the brunt of the medium's criticism, either because they are accused of siding with the central government against the population, or because they are accused of failing to put an end to social abuses within their territories.

The antagonism between medium and chiefs, which manifests itself in possession, is equally apparent outside it. The present medium continuously criticises the actions of chiefs, particularly the Khulubvi chiefs. In their turn, they criticise the medium for trying to enhance his status by unlawful means. The chiefs are particularly critical of the fact that, with the help of kinsmen and sympathizers, the present medium has built for himself a large shrine with an altar to which he retires when possessed. They regard this as a departure from tradition and as a sign that he wants to make himself independent of the cult organisation. It is a striking fact, however, that despite these allegedly unlawful acts, they have left the medium in peace. One of the principals whom I questioned on this point replied that, notwithstanding such obvious irregularities, one still ought to respect the medium, since he spoke with the voice of Mbona. Nevertheless, in view of the fact that mediums in the past have sometimes been discredited by the chiefs, one may ask why they have not done so to the present incumbent. The most likely answer is that he enjoys considerable reputation among the people, both because of the capable manner in which he performs his role and because of the courage which he has shown in crises. He was for instance one of the..persons arrested as one of the suspected leaders during the political riots of March 1959.

The principals may also express their disagreement with the medium by refusing to attend a possession seance. They themselves state that this depends on whether possession is real or feigned, and they claim that they are able to judge this by the medium's behaviour. Thus principal B once said of a candidate medium who presented himself in the early 1950s (number 6 in Chart 2), "I went to listen to his ravings, but when I heard what he had to say, I turned away in disgust. The man was a drunkard." Nevertheless, the fact that they may decide to stay away from the seance before they have actually observed the medium suggests that their judgment may be based on an entirely different criterion. My suggestion would be that the criterion actually applied is their view of the degree of political pressure which generates a seance in a particular case. If this pressure is considered insufficient, chances are that possession will be declared false, and that none of the principals will attend.

Lest this suggestion be taken to imply that those involved do not actually believe in the reality of spirit possession, I must stress that all my evidence indicates, that they do. My suggestion does point to the fact that they may be using conscious and unconscious criteria at one and the same time. Much the same can be said of the medium. Although, from the political viewpoint, the art of mediumship consists in choosing the right moment for possession, the medium himself may be under the impression that it occurs spontaneously.

 The Encounter between Medium and Principals

Formal encounters between medium and principals take place in the context of the possession sequence which is always precipitated by a combination of social, environmental, and cultic factors. A closer look at the rebuilding of the shrine will clarify some of the factors in the cult itself which trigger such a possession sequence.

The shrine is made of perishable materials — grass, reeds, wood and bamboo — all particularly subject to rot and destruction by white ants.

Permanent materials must not be used and are not allowed; nor may repairs be carried out. The shrine remains untouched, apart from the occasional sweeping of its interior, till the next rebuilding. The act of rebuilding is accompanied by two further rituals, namely the induction of the spirit wife and an animal sacrifice on behalf of the entire population. In the past the spirit wife would live permanently at the shrine, but nowadays a woman is chosen who stays there only for the duration of the ceremony. These actions require the co-operation of the paramount chief, Lundu, and of a number of senior chiefs, all of whom are supposed to perform certain parts of the ritual. The lesser chiefs are mainly involved through the collection of grain and other victuals for the sacrifice and the feeding of those who participate. As mentioned earlier, a good many always refuse to co-operate because of their conflicts with the principals. The principals may make attempts at reconciliation or they may try to bring pressure to bear on the unwilling through the offices of friendly chiefs, but the outcome is always the same: the rebuilding is performed with the help of substitutes and in what is considered to be a simplified and adapted form. The traditional ritual, as preserved in oral accounts, has in its entirety never been performed since the middle of the last century, and it is doubtful whether it ever has been. At any rate, the way the rebuilding is to be carried out nowadays is the source of endless altercation between those who may be conveniently labelled the ‘purists’ and the more ‘practically minded’. One party demands that tradition be followed to the letter; the other allows for adaptation and simplification. This dispute is in reality a political one. No chief will ever admit that he refuses co-operation because he has been outdone politically. Rather, he will maintain that his reason is a conservative one: he is opposed to the principals and senior chiefs who no longer care for the cult or perform its ritual according to the way of the past. The political losers thus tend to become the ‘ritual purists’. The usual result of these altercations, however, is that negotiations drag on without a decision being taken.

The negotiations about the rebuilding of the shrine are a major source of rumour among the people. While on the whole uninformed about the details, people, even when they live at a great distance from the shrine, are aware of the essentials which they interpret in their own fashion. The medium, on the other hand, living close by the shrine, is fully informed about what goes on, although he does not directly participate in the negotiations himself. In the case of the present medium possession announces itself days beforehand through severe aches in the back and the head. The decisive sign, according to his own information, comes when he Sees a small cloud moving at great speed through an otherwise bright sky. If he is away visiting, or working his gardens, he returns and tells his wife. Throughout the rest of the day he shivers and mumbles, and towards evening he is secluded in his special possession hut where he wraps himself in a black cloth. Messages are then sent by his guardian and relatives to the principals and their assistants.

This summoning is a critical point in the possession sequence, for those called may or may not come depending on their reading of the situation. If possession occurs in the midst of a drought or some other calamity, the decision will be easier to take. Failure to come might be interpreted as a sign of sorcery, and the principal would then pit himself against the medium and the population, which involves considerable risk. The less pronounced the element of environmental and climatic crisis, therefore, the greater will be the chance of a clash of wills between medium and principals. If indeed the majority do not show up, the medium's career is in jeopardy and it may be irreparably damaged. If, on the other hand, a majority has assembled, the medium begins to stir and his acolyte, who is his interpreter, holds a roll call from behind the reed door of the hut. This is followed by the message proper, which is in three parts, First, the nature of the crisis is stated; then an explanation is given in terms of some delict committed; finally, the means to avert disaster are indicated and a promise solicited.

The next critical moment arrives when it is time for the spokesman of the principals to reply. If everything goes well, he makes a formal act of submission by addressing the medium as his senior; by confessing to neglect of the shrine and such other offences as may have been mentioned by the medium; and by promising that things will be done as requested. In that case, the medium gives a parting admonition in a conciliatory tone and all disperse. If, however, the principals find it impossible to accept the terms posed by the medium, or if they feel offended by the medium's denunciations, the session may break up and the medium's future is once again in jeopardy.

The specific and immediate effect of intervention by the mediumist is the rebuilding of the shrine which ideally signals the end of a period of contestation and the beginning of a new era of unity and co-operation. The traditional accounts of the ritual lay particular stress on this aspect. Thus, no household was to give more than one cob of maize or head of millet “so that the gifts of all would form part of the libational beer”. Nobody was allowed to carry more than one shaft of reed or a bundle of grass thicker than one’s own arm “so that the labours of all would be required to rebuild the shrine”. This injunction is no longer followed, if it ever was, but the contributions in the form of food and labour are still impressive as is the participation by the people in the ceremony itself.

 Rumour and Possession

The three types of events which may provoke spirit possession may also provoke spates of fantastic rumour. The following are instances of rumours which circulated in the late 1960s, at a time when particularly vigorous efforts were made to rebuild the shrine and to revive certain features of ancient organisation.

According to one of these stories Mbona had sent a monkey from the sacred forest to Lundu with the message that he, Mbona, wanted a wife from the paramount as had been customary in the past. Lundu, however, not only declined to grant the request, but he also had the monkey put to death. Because of this atrocious behaviour all monkeys are said to have left the sacred forest, which in turn was interpreted as a sign that Mbona himself had withdrawn from the shrine and that some serious calamity would follow. In fact, and not only in legend, Lundu had indeed received several requests from the shrine organisation to re-institute the old custom of providing a spirit wife; he had, however, refused to comply on the ground that such a thing was no longer possible in modern times. Perhaps the killing of the monkey also had some substance: someone may have seen such an animal killed near Lundu’s village. However this may be, the rumour itself was clearly being structured like the myth of Mbona’s death; only the sequence was reversed. Instead of the killing preceding the request for a woman it now came after the request. This again expresses another and more fundamental difference, viz. that the original Lundu had been penitent, whereas the present incumbent had not.

Another rumour was that fishermen on the Shire River had dragged up a small iron box from which emerged a little man with a pronounced limp. When asked how he got his limp, he said he had broken his leg walking through gardens which had been ridged, and that he was now on his way to the District Commissioner to tell him that this practice must be discontinued. In another version of the same rumour Mbona was supposed to have declared (presumably through the medium) that he would no longer bless the gardens, because he might break his leg due to the ridges.

According to a third rumour, the waters of the sacred pool had turned red. This was taken as an omen of worse things to follow. Finally, there circulated rumours to the effect that the medium had already become possessed, and that he had spoken out on several issues concerning the cult and the region.

The body of rumour of which these particular instances formed part had at least four distinctive effects. They undoubtedly contributed to a revival of the people's awareness of the cult on a regional level. Moreover, some of the rumours at least seemed to represent a collective effort by the people to establish unanimity on issues of general concern. Furthermore, they appeared to provide much of the pressure which finally generated the possession seance. Finally, they also determined the contents of the message which the medium was to communicate.

As to the spatial aspect of these rumours, only a general estimate can be given. I made no effort to establish with any degree of accuracy how widely they had spread, but the fact that they were repeated to me in locations some ninety miles apart may serve as a general indication of their appeal. Nor was it difficult to establish that these rumours were part of, and in their own way contributed to, a revival of people's interest in the cult. Indeed, for several weeks there was talk of little else. As for the causal connection between the outbursts of rumour and the possession event, particular attention needs to be paid to the rumours concerning the medium, since these provide the most explicit indication of such a connection. The very fact that it was widely rumoured that possession had already taken place meant that it was part of people's expectations in this situation. In addition, those rumours purported to broadcast what the medium had said and thus expressed what people expected him to say.

I was not able at the time to establish whether information about his own alleged prophecies did in fact filter back to the medium. If it did, as I suppose was the case, he never mentioned it. On the other hand, it became clear in the course of several interviews with him that he very much shared the concerns which they expressed. His complaint, however, was the quite significant one that the people remained too divided and too indifferent for him to force the principals and their fellow chiefs into action. He said this primarily in connection with the reinstatement of Mbona's wife, but he obviously meant it to apply to other issues as well. The significance of this complaint is that it suggested, at the very least, that the medium himself was conscious of the fact that he could not operate without the support of the people in general.

Peter Lienhardt (1975: 130) has recently argued that "rumours of the more fantastic sort represent or may represent complexities of public feeling that cannot be made articulate at a more thoughtful level", and furthermore, that "they join people's sympathies in a consensus of an unthinking or at least uncritical kind". Whilst agreeing that, in the'case described here, rumour very much seemed to have the effect of establishing and expressing widespread consensus on certain issues, I do not think that this consensus was of an unthinking or uncritical kind. Nor would I agree that these issues could not be made articulate at a more thoughtful level. Indeed, it is not difficult in our case to show that at least some of the issues had been the subject of articulate discussion. This was not only so with regard to the reinstatement of Mbona's wife, which had been endlessly discussed by the shrine officials, but also with regard to the ridging of the gardens, the pros and cons of which were continuously being assessed by villagers and agricultural instructors. What the rumours did though, was to establish an alternative level of discussion, where quite different, non-rational arguments were brought into play, and where the emphasis shifted from technical to social considerations. It is possible and indeed most likely that a number of people whose attitude to modern agricultural methods was not altogether unfavourable, were thereby swayed in the other direction, but even so, one hesitates to apply such epithets as 'uncritical' and 'unthinking*. It would be more realistic to view rumour in this case as part of an ongoing process of self-assessment in which the people of the region tried to come to terms with factors of change and division within its boundaries.

* The Conceptualization of a Regional Community

In the foregoing description an explicit distinction has been made between the formal and informal operation of the Mbona cult. Formally, it has been suggested, the cult operates through a leadership which, although divided by participation in different states and administrations, is regarded in the cult as one elite group. From this viewpoint, then, the cult may be said to support a system of social differentiation in which a relatively small aristocratic group sees itself as possessing an unquestionable right to political rule. Our discussion of the informal operation of the cult has, in a sense, reversed this picture by showing that in certain situations and under certain conditions the interests of the people could be made to prevail over those of the principals and the chiefs. The key figure in this process is the medium who has recourse to possession and who could use it, given sufficient popular support, to effectively confront the traditional political establishment.

In this final section further aspects of the contrast between modes of operation can now be considered. First, it has a pronounced ideological content which has to be made explicit here. Second, the social antagonism enacted through it has to be seen more broadly. This antagonism is not confined to the chief-subject relationship: it extends to antagonism of every kind which affects the population as a whole. To pursue the first point, it is useful to start with the striking ideological differences in the bodies of cultic myth which are characteristic of the group of principals and chiefs on the one hand, and of the medium and the people on the other.

The myths of the principals and chiefs are fundamentally concerned with history, the legitimation of their positions and, in a more general way, the legitimacy of social inequality by discrimination between aristocrats and commoners and between autochthons and immigrants. The myths of the medium and the population, by comparison, have a pronounced ahistorical character. This is pointedly illustrated by the fact that the present medium, for all his influence and importance, has almost no knowledge of or interest in the history of the cult. His interest is entirely in the present, notably in the deeds of principals and chiefs and the manifestations of public discontent. It would be fairly easy for the medium to acquaint himself with the details of history, as easy as it would be for any inhabitant of the district. The fact that he does not avail himself of this opportunity and that he feels no need to do so reflects a deep-seated aversion. This is readily understandable, given his identity: he himself belongs to an immigrant family, and gains no legitimacy from cult history.

What has been said of the medium equally applies to the people at large. Their myths reveal a similar lack of concern with history and a similar emphasis on Mbona's relevance to the present condition of society. They differ further from the myths of the chiefs in that they project an image of a region which is unified on the basis of common concerns and a common morality. Distinctions between chiefs and commoners or between autochthons and immigrants are left unmentioned and are implicitly denied. Whereas the myths of principals and chiefs are cast in a purely traditional idiom, those of the medium and the people at large have increasingly come to be expressed in biblical language. Mbona is now said to be the 'Son of God' (Mwana wa Mulungu) and the 'black Jesus' (Yesu wakuda), who is the guardian spirit of all ethnic groups, and not just of the Mang'anja. The fact that the older traditions do not mention Mbona's father, a logical correlate of a matrilineal system of succession and inheritance, has been converted into a myth of virgin birth which once again de-emphasizes the ethnic factor. The Christian bible has thus provided an external idiom to which neither Mang'anja nor immigrant can lay exclusive claim, and on the basis of which both may unite.

The concept of a non-differehtiated society is put forward as the ideology of a region through the formal organisation of the cult. For it is the formal organisation which defines that region as a spatial entity and makes it visible to itself through its ritual. Paradoxically, therefore, the very organisation which asserts social difference and privilege becomes the vehicle through which the denial of difference and privilege is affirmed. There occurs here & functional transposition which is activated, as we have seen, by a concurrent awareness of social and environmental threats. In the light of this observation, climatic and environmental calamities, or the fear of such calamities, are not only to be viewed as causes of cultic revival but also as activators of an alternative mode of conceptualizing its constituency.

A particular quality of this process of conceptualization is that, in principle, it concerns itself with all instances of social inequality which affect the population as a whole, but that it subsumes them all under the chief-subject relationship. The same suggestion has been made earlier in different terms: i.e., that the communication transmitted by the medium in the possession sequence is always centrally concerned with the behaviour of the chiefs and with the relations between chiefs and people. The chiefs are held accountable for the existence or persistence of almost every kind of social grievance, whether this springs from central government policy, from the actions of the chiefs themselves or one or other section of the people. That this should be so is partly due to the extensiveness of the chiefs' jurisdiction and partly to the ambiguousness of their authority, which makes them both the representatives of the central administration vis-a-vis the people and the representatives of the people vis-a-vis the central administration. In situations of social discontent they thus become, from the viewpoint of the population, either the ones who have been instrumental in causing the discontent, or the ones who are in a position to eliminate the cause of discontent, or both. It is this viewpoint which finds its dramatic expression in the encounter between the medium and the principals.

It would be gratifying at this point to conclude the analysis, were it not for one unresolved question: What explains the situation in which the medium is close to the interests of the principals, as apparently was the case between 1930 and 1946? In a wider context this raises questions about the structural position of the medium. Given the chief-subject relationship as a constant factor in the region's organisation, how is it that at one time the mediumship appears to support the social differentiation which this relationship implies, whereas at another time it manifests itself as decidely antagonistic to the same differentiation? My explanation would be that this depends primarily on the degree to which the functioning of chieftainship is problematic in the perception of the people. Such was the case, for instance, after 1946, when the credibility of the chiefs had increasingly come to be questioned in connection with the federation issue and the introduction of agricultural reform. This, as has been noted, made it difficult, if not impossible, for any medium to maintain close ties with the principals and, through them, with the chiefs. The structural position of the medium, then, is changeable, and not fixed. It would, however, be incorrect to view it as oscillating between the interests of the traditional political establishment and those of the people, for it has to remain within the orbit of the latter. Only insofar as public sentiment gives assent to the chiefs' performance of their office can the medium support them and the chieftainship. Whenever this is the case, one would expect also that the contrast between the formal and informal operation of the cult and between the two conceptions of a region would become submerged. The structural position of the medium would thus be an indicator of the degree to which tensions within the region have become acute.

Essentially, what has been maintained in the present essay is that the Mbona cult functions as a mechanism by means of which the inhabitants of a particular geographic area perceive themselves as constituting a region. This perception springs from two different sources, each of which endows it with an entirely different character. One of these sources is the formal organisation of the cult which projects the image of a hierarchically structured region, and which thereby underscores the legitimacy of social differentiation. The other sources are widespread feelings of anxiety and discontent with issues that cannot be effectively dealt with by isolated groups. These feelings are characteristically focussed on the chiefs, and they are cast in a symbolic idiom which in various ways denies the legitimacy of social differentiation. The situation which ultimately emerges is that of a co-existence of two opposing conceptions of a region and of an alternating movement by which now one then the other conception is given emphasis. [79]

 References

<biblio>

Lienhardt, Peter

1975 The Interpretation of Rumour. In Studies in Social Anthropology. J. H. M. Beattie and R. G. Lienhardt, eds. London: Oxford University Press, pp. 105–131

Schoffeleers, J. M.

1972 The History and Political Role of the Mbona Cult among the Mang’anja. In The Historical Study of African Religion. T. O. Ranger and I. Kimambo, eds. London: Heinemann, pp. 73–97.

1974 The Prophets of Nsanje: A History of Spirit Mediumship in a Southern Malawian District. Conference on the History of Central African Religious Systems. University of Zambia: Lusaka. Manuscript.

Tew, Mary

1950 The Peoples of the Lake Nyasa Region. Ethnographic Survey of Africa: East Central Africa, Part I. London: International African Institute.

</biblio>

©J M Schoffeleers 1977

 Notes on Contributors

 van Binsbergen, Wim M. J.

Born 1947, the Netherlands; educated at University of Amsterdam (Municipal), “Kandidaatsexamen” (1968), “Doctoraalexamen” (1971).

Assistant Lecturer, later Lecturer, in Sociology, University of Zambia, 1971–73; Research Affiliate, Institute for African Studies, University of Zambia, 1973–74; WOTRO Research Fellow, University of Amsterdam (Municipal), 1974–75; Acting Professor of African Sociology and Cultural Anthropology, University of Leiden, 1975-

Author of ‘Durkheim’s Begrippenpaar “Sacre Profane”’, in Kula, 1968; ‘Saints of the Atlas: Ernest Gellner’, in Cahiers des Arts et Traditions Populaires, 1971; ‘Ritual, Class and Urban-Rural Relations: Elements for a Zambian Case-study’, in Cultures et Developpemement, 1976; ‘The Dynamics of Religious Change in Western Zambia’, in Ufahamu, 1976; ‘Law in the Context of Nkoya Society, Central Western Zambia’, in Law and the Family in Modern Africa, ed. S.A. Roberts, 1976; ‘Social Change and Intergenerational Conflict among the Nkoya of Western Zambia,’ in Cultures et Developpement, 1976; Explorations into the History and Sociology of Territorial Cults in Zambia’, in Guardians of the Land: Essays on Central-African Territorial Cults, ed. J.M. Schoffeleers, 1977; ‘Religious Innovation and the Deprivation Thesis, with Special Reference to Zambia’, in African Dossiers, 1977; Shrines and Ecstasy in the Social Structure of North-West Tunisia (forthcoming), and Explorations in Zambian Religion (forthcoming); editor (with R. Buijtenhuijs), Religious Innovation in Modern African Society, 1977.

 Colson, Elizabeth

Born 1917, U.S.A.; educated at University of Minnesota, A.B. (1937); A.M. (1940); Radcliffe College, A.M. (1941), Ph.D. (1945).

Assistant Social Science Research Analyst, War Relocation Authority (1942–43); Research Assistant, Harvard University (1944–45); Senior Research Officer, Rhodes-Livingstone Institute (1946–47, 1956–57, 1962–63); Director, Rhodes-Livingstone Institute (1948–51); Senior Lecturer, Manchester University (1951–53); Associate Professor, Goucher College (1954–55); Associate Professor and Research Associate, African Studies Program, Boston University (1955–59); Professor, Brandeis University (1959–63); Visiting Professor, Northwestern University (1963–64); professor, University of California, Berkeley (1964-); Fellow, Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, Stanford (1967–68); Fairchild Fellow, California Institute of Technology (1975–76).

Author of The Makah, 1953; Marriage and the Family among Plateau Tonga, 1958; Social Organization of Gwembe Tonga, 1960; The Plateau Tonga, 1962; The Social Consequences of Resettlement, 1971; Tradition and Contract: the Problem of Order, 1974; Autobiographies of Three Porno Women, 1974; co-editor with Max Gluckman, Seven Tribes of Central Africa, 1951; “Spirit Possession among the Tonga of Zambia” in Spirit Mediumship and Society in Africa, eds. John Beattie and John Middleton, 1969; and various other articles.

 Eickelman, Dale F.

Born 1942, USA; educated at Dartmouth College, A.B. (1964); Institute of Islamic Studies, McGill University, M.A. (1967); University of Chicago, M.A. (1968), Ph.D. (1971).

Assistant Professor of Anthropology, New York University, 1971-;

Fellow, Center for Middle Eastern Studies and the Committee for the Comparative Study of New Nations, University of Chicago, 1973–1974; Member, Institute for Advanced Study, Princeton, 1967–77.

Author of ‘Musaylima: An Approach to the Social Anthropology of Seventh Century Arabia’, Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient, 1967; Is There an Islamic City? The Making of a Quarter in a Moroccan Town’, International Journal of Middle East Studies, 1974; ‘Islam and the Impact of the French Colonial System in Morocco’, Humaniora Islamica, 1974; Moroccan Islam: Tradition and Society in a Pilgrimage Center, 1976; ‘Time in a Complex Society: A Moroccan Example’, Ethnology, 1977, (In press); and other papers.

 Garbett, G. Kinglsey

Born 1935, England; educated at London University, B.Sc(Soc) 1957, University College of Rhodesia, 1958–1959; Manchester University, Ph.D (1963).

Research Assistant in Social Anthropology, Manchester University, 1961–1962; Lecturer in Social Anthropology, University College of Rhodesia, 1963–1965; Lecturer in Social Anthropology, Manchester University, 1966–1974; Senior Lecturer in Sociology, Aberdeen University, 1974–1976; Reader in Anthropology, Adelaide University, 1976-

Author of Growth and Change in a Shona Ward, 1960; ‘The Land Husbandry Act of S. Rhodesia’ in African Agrarian Systems, ed. D. Biebuyck, 1963; ‘Religious Aspects of Political Succession among the Valley Korekore’ in The Zambezian Past, eds. R. Brown and S. Stokes, 1966; ‘The Rhodesian Chief’s Dilemma’, Race, 1966; ‘Prestige, Status and Power in a Modern Valley Korekore Chiefdom, Rhodesia’, Africa, 1967; ‘Spirit Mediums as Mediators in Korekore Society’ in Spirit Mediumship in Africa, eds. J. Beattie and J. Middleton, 1969; ‘Circulatory Labour Migration in Rhodesia: Towards a Decision Model’ in Town and Country in Central and Eastern Africa, ed. D. Parkin, 1975.

 Marx, Emanuel

Born 1927, Munich; educated at The Hebrew University M.A. (1958); University of Manchester Ph.D. (1963).

Research Associate, University of Manchester 1960–63; Senior Research Fellow, 1963–67; University of Manchester; Simon Fellow, University of Manchester 1969–70; Lecturer and Head of Department of Sociology, Tel-Aviv University 1968–69; Associate Professor, Tel-Aviv University 1971- Head of Research on Bedouin Settlement, Desert Research Institute, Ben Gurion University 1976-

Author of Bedouin of the Negev, 1967. Some Sociological and Economic Aspects of Refugee Camps on the West Bank, 1971 (with Y. Ben-Porath); The Social Context of Violent Behaviour, 1976, and various papers.

 Schoffeleers, Matthew

Born 1928, Netherlands; educated at Montfort Theological College, Netherlands; St. Catherine's College, Oxford (Nuffield Scholar), Diploma in Social Anthropology, B.Litt., D.Phil.

Pastoral and educational work in Malawi, 1955–1970; Senior Lecturer in Social Anthropology, University of Malawi, 1971–75; Reader (Lector) in Religious Anthropology, Free University, Amsterdam. 1976-

Author of "The History and Political Role of the Mbona Cult among the Mang'anja" and co-author of "The Resistance of the Nyau Cult to the Catholic Missions in Malawi" in The Historical Study of African Religion, eds. T.O. Ranger & I. Kimambo, 1972; "Livingstone and the Mang'anja Chiefs" in Livingstone Man of Africa, ed. B. Pachai, 1973; "From Socialisation to Private Enterprise: History of the Nomi Labour Associations in the Nsanje District of Malawi, 1892–1963", Rural Africana, 1973; "The Interaction between the Mbona Cult and Christianity" in Themes of the Christian History of Central Africa, eds. T.O. Ranger & J. Weller.

 Thoden van Velzen, Bonno

Born 1933, The Netherlands; educated at the University of Amsterdam (M.A. and Ph.D;).

Research assistant of WOSUNA (Netherlands Foundation for the Advancement of Research in Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles), 1960–1963; Research Fellow of the Afrika-Studiecentrum, Leyden, 1966–1971; Professor of Cultural Anthropology, the National University of Utrecht (1971-).

Author of ‘Residence, Power Groups and intra-societal Aggression’ (with W. van Wetering), International Archives of Ethnography, 1960; Politieke Beheersing in de Djuka Maatschappij (Political Control in Djuka Society), 1966; Land Scarcity and Rural Inequality in Tanzania (with van Hekken) 1972; ‘Robinson Crusoe and Friday: Strength and Weakness of the Big Man Paradigm’, Man 1973; ‘Staff, Kulaks and Peasants: A Study of a Political Field’ in Socialism in Tanzania, vol. II, eds. Lionel Cliffe and John Saul, 1973

 Werbner, Richard P

Born 1937, U.S.A.; educated at Brandeis University, B.A. (1959); University of Manchester, Ph.D. (1968).

Research Assistant, University of Manchester 1961–62; Assistant Lecturer, University of Manchester 1962–66; Lecturer, University of Manchester 1966–1974; Senior Lecturer, University of Manchester 1974-

Author of ‘Atonement Ritual and Guardian Spirit Possession among Kalanga’, Africa, 1964: ‘Federal Administration, Rank and Civil Strife among Bemba,’ Africa, 1967; ‘Consitutional Ambiguities and the British Administration of Royal Careers among Bemba,’ in Law in Culture and Society, ed. Laura Nader, 1969; ‘Local Adaptation and the Transformation of an Imperial Concession in North-Eastern Botswana’, Africa 1971; ‘Symbolic Dialogue and Personal Transactions among Kalanga and Ethnology, 1971; ‘Sin, Blame and Ritual Mediation’, in The Allocation of Responsibility, ed. Max Gluckman, 1972; ‘The Superabundance of Understanding: Kalanga Rhetoric and Domestic Divination’, American Anthropologist, 1973; ‘Land, Movement and Status among Kalanga of Botswana’, in Essays in African Social Anthropology, ed. Meyer Fortes, 1975; and other papers.

 Author Index

[Page numbers don’t correspond to this version]

<biblio>

Abraham, D. P., 67, 82

Albitrouw, Izaak, 99

Ali Bey (Domingo Badia y Leblich), 9

Barth, F., and holistic analysis, ix

Beach, D. N., 67, 82

de Beet, Chris, 93, 96, 97, 99, 100

de Beet, M., 99

Beidelman, T. O., 4

de Bellefonds, Linant, 29

Ben-David, J., 36

Berque, Jacque, 22, 25

Bhardwaj, S. M.,

Boissevain, Jeremy, 7

van Binsbergen, W. M. J., xv, xviii, 140, 141, 142, 152, 153, 155

Bourdillon, M. F. C., 76, 78, 79

Burckhardt, J. L., 43

Franklin, H., 211

Franssen Herderschee, A., 98

Fry, Peter, 86, 87

Gann, L. H., 208

Ganor, A., 32

Garbett, G.K., 70, 71, 90, 123

Geertz, Clifford, 30, 45

Gelfand, M., 79, 83, 87, 123, 177, 207, 208

Gellner, Ernest: on correspondence theory, xxi; on Islam, 29; on marabouts, 23–24; on segmentation, 25

Glasner, M. I., 34

Gluckman, M.: on affliction of individuals, 140; change within the wider social context, ix; on cults among the Lozi, Nkoyo, Totela, 143

de Goeje, C. H., 98

Grunebaum, G. E. von, 29

Campbell, A. A. (Mziki), 177, 208

Campbell, A. C., 67

Canaan, T., 30, 45, 46

Carter, M., 141

Chavanduka, G. L., 86

Christian, William A. Jr., 7

Clay, G.C. R., 142, 169

Cockin, J., 181, 188, 207

Colson, E., xiv-xvii, 120, 127, 128, 131, 132, 169

Hatt, Doyle, 10, 24

Holub, Emil, 177, 181

Hurault, Jean, 101

Ikacana,N. S., 143, 152

Jackson, G. H., 208

Jemma, D., 15, 24

Junker, L., 99, 100

Daneel, M. L„ 123, 177, 182, 184, 187, 188, 199, 207,209

Davies, D. H., 165

Davis, Merle, 165

Doke, C. M., 143

Douglas, M., and holistic analysis, ix; cargo cults, xxv (see also Mary Tew)

Draioui, Bouzekri, 17

Durkheim, Emile: and correspondence theory, xviii; on ideology and social action, 4

Eickelman, Dale F., xviii, xxi, 9, 10, 17, 18,22,24, 30

Emerson, Ralph Waldo, xxii

Evans-Pritchard, E. E.: on Bedouin of Cyrenaica, 30; on ideology and social action, 4;

Fagan, B., 121

Firth, Raymond, on marabouts, 20

Kapara, Y., 45

Keay, R. W. J., 178

Keller, A., 37

Knothe, C., 177, 207

Kobben, A. J. F., 100

Kolb, W. L., 140

Kraag, Christiaan, 99

Kuntz, M., 140, 143

Lancaster, C. S., 130

Leerdam, H., 100

Levy, R., 29

Lienhardt, Peter, 235

Livingstone, D., 125, 126, 129

McCulloch, M., 140, 142, 143

Mannheim, Karl, 6

Marx, E., xvii-xxi

Mauss, Marcel, on ideology and social action, 4

Ranger, T. O., 77, 79, 80, 83, 87, 123, 152, 159, 177, 181, 188,207–211

Ransford, O., 208

Rattray, R. S., 103

Reed, G. C. H., 208

Reynolds, B., 152, 155, 157, 158f, 163

Richards, J. B., 177, 182, 199, 207

Roberts, A. D., 159

Runciman, W. G., 5

van Warmelo, N. J., 177

Weber, M., 153, 157

Werbner, R. P., xviii, 119, 184, 188,

195f, 198, 204, 210

van Wetering, W., 102, 106, 111, 112

White, C.M.N., 140, 141

Wilson, B. r. 159

Wilson, B. R., 159 de Ziel, H. F.,93,99

Sapir, E., 45

Schapera, I., 177

Scheffler, Harold W., 13

Schneider, David M., 5

Schoffeleers, J. M., xiii, xiv, 219

Schwellnus, E., 177, 207

Scudder, T., 199, 120, 122, 125–128, 131

Sebina, A. M., 177

Selous, F. C., 126, 129, 208, 210

Shils, Edward, on correspondence theory, xxi, 4

Shilling, Paul, 125

Shorter, A., 141

von Sicard, Harold, 177

Smith, Carol A., ix, xi

Smith, Raymond T., 5

</biblio>

 Subject Index

[Page numbers don’t correspond to this version]

Note: References are listed at the end of each article, and these lists are not indexed separately.

<biblio>

Acolytes: as interpreters of mediums, 229, 230, 233; Korekore, 57, 74, 75, 79; and relations with Korekore medium, 77

Adepts: and congregational change, 195; and cult songs, 145; death of, 185; duties of, 187–188; as index of investment in cult, 187; as ritual faction, 147,

149; seniority of, 191; social structural characteristics of, 167; succession of, 190; value in ritual, 147

Affinity: and cultic participation, 191; in Morocco, 21; relations between priests, 207. See also Marriage Affliction, causation theory, 155. See also Misfortune

Agnates, as tribesmen, 34

Agnatic descent group: described, 34–35; and economic cooperation, 34.

Agnation: as ideology, 47, 48; in Morocco, 21; obligations of, 21. See also Kinship.

Agnosticism, and Tonga, 128

Agricultural ritual, Korekore, 73

Alien spirits, 143

Alliance formation, in Morocco, 23

Ancestors, 146

Ancestor ghosts, Bush Negro, 105

Ancestral shades, Tonga, 121, 123, 130, 132

Ancestral spirits: and Korekore territorial cult, 56; as local spirits, 57

Angels, xv, 131

Animals, as sacrificial offerings, 19, 22, 40,44, 158, 194, 199

Atonement, among Tonga, 135

Attire, of Korekore medium, 74, 75

Authority: of cult principals, 223, 226; distinction and tension between secular and ritual elements, 225, 227; of gravediggers' leaders, 104; illegal appropriation of, 225; of Korekore mediums, 76; of Mbona cult medium, xiii; of medium, precedence over chiefs', 220, 230–231; of priests, 94, 208; of regional oracle, 93, 100; of Tonga local shrine custodians, 122; of Tonga prophets, 127; of Zezuru local spirits, 58

Authority structure, of cult of affliction, 163

Avenging spirits, and similarity of Bush Negro High God, 101

Avoidance, between communities, 195

Awlad Sa'id: environment and economy of, 37, 38, 39; as pastoralists, 32, pilgrimages and gatherings of, 31, 42, 43,44, 45

Baraka (God's grace), and maraboutism, xxi, xxii, 6, 12, 20

Barotseland, cults of affliction in, 139

Basangu, 121 f; ethnic and territorial loyalties, 126; properties of, 124; spirit manifestations, 123

Bedouin: major ideologies of, 47; pastoralism described, 36; regionalism, 47; settlements of in Sinai, 33; symbolization of territorial rights, xix, 45–46; wage labor, 37–38;

Belief: of cult leadership, 150; patterns of, 6; shared tribal, 41, 220; variation in Tonga, 128

Bethania Mission Apostolic Church, 184

Biographical patterns, for religious innovators, 153

Bituma: dispute over cult funds, 162;

meaning of cult name, 161

Bituma cult, 160–165, 167, 168, 169, 170. See also Cults

Botswana: cult policy in, 212; ecological zones of, 178; priest’s income from, 200; restrictions on land, 196

Botswana Dingaka Association, 184

Boundaries, of social groups, 16

Boundedness: of Central African ethnic groups, 144; and concept of “community of the god,“ xviii, xix; as emphasized by Tonga cults, xv; and ideology of agnation, 47–48; of Mbona cult, xiii

Bridewealth, 200

Bureaucratic organizations, 167

Bush Negro cult: decline of, 100; distribution of, 94; emergence and decline of, 94; fractionization of, 93, 94, 100, 102; history of, 98–100. See also Cults

Calling, and ritual leadership, 150

Cargo cult, xxviii

Carrying the corpse, among Bush Negroes, 103, 104

Cash economy, oracular resistance to, 212

Central place: of Bush Negro regional cult, 93, 99; decline of Bush Negro, 115; dominance among Bush Negroes, 100; See also Shrines

Centralization, and cult regions, 178

Chaminhuka, 57f. See also Local spirits Charisma, xxvii, 161, 164, 167; of a Korekore medium, 74; and ritual field instability, 91, and Zezuru cult instability, 90 spirit provinces, 71; and Korekore mediums, 70, 72; and Kupara’s early experience, 80; and significance of mediumships, 72; and Zezuru mediums, 86

Charismatic leaders, 153, 156, 157, 161 Chiefly succession: and adjustment of 9

Chiefs: Bedouin, at tribal gatherings, 44–45; credibility of, 238; criticized by mediums, xiii; government acknowledged, 220; and myths of Mbona cult, 236–237; principals of Mbona cult, xvi, 221,223

Chiefships, competition for and effects on cults, 226

Christianity: and Bush Negro opposition, 98; churches as cults, 140; influences on cults of affliction, 157–158, 160, 168–169; influences on Mbona cult, xiv, 237; and Korekore mediums, 77; and payments to regional cult, 100; previous experiences of cult prophets in, 157, 169; and rise of regional cult, 99; social history of, 6; and Tonga, 127–128

Chthonic beings: Korekore, 66, 67; as owners of the earth, 78

Chthonic cults: decline of Korekore, 78; domain of Korekore, 78–79; Korekore, 67; and relation to territorial cults, 79. See also Cults

Chthonic spirits, and Zezuru local cults, 57

Clientele: of Korekore regional mediums, 71; of new parochial cult, 113; of parochial oracle, 107; of regional cult, 93; in service of priests, 108–109; of Tonga prophets, xvi, 125, 129, 136. See also Patron-clients relationships

Closeness: definition of, 11; as organising principle, 24

Coffin-makers, Bush Negro, 104

Cognitive management, of cult interpenetration, 58

Cognitive phenomena, 89

Colonial administration: and chthonic cults, 78; impact on cults of, 61, 66; and mediums, 77; and regional cult, 98, 102

Colonialism, and Moroccan lodges, 10 Commensality, xxii, xxiii

Competition: between congregations, 197; between cults, 184, 195; between Zezuru mediums, 86; between Zezuru mediums and instability, 90

“Condensation symbol,” defined, 45

Conflict, between Mbona cultists and principals, 230, 231, 232

Congregations: competition between, 197; gradations of, 185, 195; of Mbona cult, xiii; staff of, cult adept, 185; staff of, messenger, 185; staff of, porter, 185

Consensus, and Korekore chiefly succession, 71

Correspondence, between ideologies of agnation and saints’ cults, 48

Correspondence theory, xviii-xxii, 4, 213

Creator, ancestor as, 57

Crisis concept, 208–209

Cross-cult: affiliation, 58; dialectics, 90; elite, 74; history of connections, 86; instability, 91; interpenetration, 88; interpenetration as emergent property of ritual field, 90; kinship of mediums, 80; rivalry of mediums, 83; rupture, 91; spirits, 83; translation of belief, 80; validation of mediums, 58, 87, 88. See also Cults of affliction: cheating in, 151; communications networks of, 152–153; conceptual shift in, 141; introduced, 139–140; leadership of, 148–150; non-regional, xxvii, 139, 141–152, 154, 155; organizational structure of, 149–150, 170; participation in by women, 146; as redistributive economic institution, 149; regional, 139,. 152–170; regional organization of, 152–153; structural shift in, 141 congregations, 119; gradations of, 185, 195; variations in, 184, 194

Cults

general: ancestral, xii, 142–143; cargo, xxviii; changes in, 184; clientele vs. constituency, 120; connection of leaders, 58; and cross-cultural standards, 97; and cultural model, xi, 150; effects of political and economic changes, 142; egalitarian, xxii f; elitist, xxii f; expansion of, 58; hierarchy of, xxiv, 153, 207, 208; inclusive and exclusive domains of, x, xvi, xviii-xxii; interpenetration, xvii, 55, 58; “levelspecific regional analysis,” ix-xi; of macrocosm, 181; of microcosm, 181; as “nodal forms of organization,” ix, xiii, xxi; non-ancestral, xii, 142–143, 145; organizational problems in Shona, 58; parallel dichotomies in analysis of, xii-xiv, xvi; and political change, 142; of regularization, xxviii; separatist church, as alternative, 184; transformation of regions, xi; succession of leadership of, 148; within urban contexts, xvi, xxvi, 167. See also Bituma cult, Bush Negro, Chthonic cults, Cross-cult, High God cult, Local cult, Mbona cult, Nzila cult, Parochial cult, Prophet cult, Regional cults, Saints’ cults, Sherqawi, Territorial cults, Zezuru cult

Cult policy, 211–212

Cultic expansion, and ethnicity, 143–144,190, 198,212

Cyrenaica, Bedouin of, 30

Dawwar (rural local community), 21–22 Death rites: and changes made by regional cult, 105–106; as influence on cult development, 94, 105; as levelling practices, 105

Debts: as cause of affliction. 109; to regional cult, 100; resulting from ritual success, 147, 149; settlement of Bedouin, 44

Deity, as punisher, 220

Demography, of Bituma and Nzila regions, 165

Deprivation hypothesis, 146

Descent: categories, 13; as ideology, 4; as jural rights, 4; Maraboutic, 12–15; and territorial rights, 34

Descent groups: congregational membership of, 191; Sherqawi, 13

Diagnosis: of cause of death by Bush Negro gravediggers, 104; by cult adepts, 145, 146; Korekore, 74; of misfortune by Bush Negro priests, 107–108

Dialectics: of cross-cult relationships, 90, in cult organization, 170

Dietary prohibitions, Korekore, 73

Divination: Korekore, 74; Zezuru, 86

Divinatory ritual, 140

Divine grace, from Bush Negro High God, 101 See also Grace

Diviners: distinguished from mediums, 227; opposition to separatist churches, 205; referals to oracles, 202

Diyah (blood compensation), among Bedouin, 35

Domains, of cults, xvi, xviii-xxii

Donations: and selection of adepts, 191; to Sherqawi lodges, 16, 19

Dreams, revelations in, 148, 227

Dzivaguru, 67f. See also Territorial cult

Earth cults, xii. See also Territorial cult

Ecological zones: and local shrines, 129; and powerful prophets, 136; Tonga, xvi-xvii, 120, 122, 125

Ecology: and distribution of High God regions, 178–182; and distribution of Sherqawi lodges, 17; prophecies relating to, xvi, 142; of South Sinai, 31–32

Economic change: and cults, 93, 94; and decline of parochial cult, 110–111; and rise of new parochial cult, 112; Tonga, 127

Economic inequality, between chief and subjects, 220

Egalitarianism: apparent among Bush Negro grave-diggers, 104; Basangu, 123; among Bush Negroes, 96; and role of regional priests, 106–107; Tonga, 123; and Tonga history, 129; and Tonga prophets, 134

Egypt: effects of negotiations with Israel, 39, 43–44; as source of jobs for Sinai Bedouin, 38, 42

Elite: cross-cult, 74; and Korekore mediums, 80; and Tonga ritual, 128.

Emigration, 196

Enclaves, defined, 178

Eschatology, 142, 154

Ethnic boundaries, 177

Ethnic groups, cult associations between, xvi, 154

Ethnicity: and cult expansion, 143–144, 190, 198, 212; and cultic officials, 187,190; and intermarriage, 169, 198–199; as local rivalry, 169–170; as mobilizing factor, 169

Expansion, of Korekore cults, 74

Factions, in ritual cults, 147, 149, 167

Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasa-land, effects of imposition of, 229

Fees: of Bush Negro priests, 109; of Korekore mediums, 75; reduction of Bush Negro priests', 110

Fission, of Korekore chiefdoms, 71

Flexibility, of Tonga prophet cults, xv

Fluidity: of cultic assets, 185; in Sam'la tribal relations, 20, 21

Fractionization, of regional cult, 93, 94, 100, 102

Gaan Tata, 93f

Games, among Moroccan tribes, 22–23

Genealogies: acceptance of revision of, 84–85; of Bedouin, 35; and inclusion of Zezuru local spirits, 83–84; of Korekore territorial spirits, 56, 80; as legitimation, 13, 14; revision of, 84, 88; truncated among Tonga, 218–129

Gifts, to priest, 200

God’s cargoes, 103; attacked by new cult, 111; distribution of, 106; new distribution of, 110

Gold, effect on Bush Negroes of discovery of, 96–97

Gossip, and Korekore mediums, 77; See also Mbona cult

Grace, and maraboutism, xxii, 10, 11, 12. See also Divine grace

Grave-diggers: Bush Negro, 103; as holders of inquests, 104; leaders of, 104; pressure from priests upon, 111

Great Deity, of Bush Negroes. See also High God

Healing, from cult ritual, 145, 148

Herbalist Association of Africa, 184

Hierarchy: of Bush Negro regional cult, 99; of Korekore mediums, 56; of Korekore mediums, cross-cut, 72–73; of Korekore mediums related to genealogy, 84; of Korekore territorial spirits, 56; in local cult and territorial cult, 87, 89; of Zezuru local spirits, 57

High God: associated with cults of affliction, 154, 168; of Bush Negroes, xxvii, 93; as challenge to traditional cosmology, 101; conceptual shift towards in cults of affliction, xxvi, 155, 156, 168; and Korekore, 57; as rebellion leader, 101; ritual consultation of, 208, 212; and Zezuru, 57

High God cults: Gaan Tata, 93f; expansion of, 196–199; faith-healing as alternative, 184; investments in, 187, 194; located, 177, macrocosmic, 181; opposition and rivalry between, 184, 195; as participants in rebellion, 209–211; recruitment to hierarchy, 212; regional stability, 205; Trinity of, 207. See also Cults

Historical change, and cultism, 177

Historical context, of maraboutism, 25

Historical structures, and reference to by cult participants, 167

History: as legitimization, 237; and myths of Mbona cult, 236–237; span of, among Tonga, 129

Holistic analysis, faults of, ix

Holy tombs: description of, 45, 46; pilgrimage to, 29, 40–41; significance of location of, 42; as symbol, 45–46

Iconoclasm, in a regional cult, 101 Ideological change, and maraboutism, 25 ,

Ideology: of agnation, 47, 48; of Bedouin social organization, 34; and cult organization, 163, 170; cultic, shift in, 141; maraboutism as partideology, 6, 10; mediation by cult leader, 151; as myth, 17, 236–237; part-ideology, 3; prophetic, 4; realms of, 3; reasons for participation in Bituma cult, 167; systems of, 5

Idiom of universalism, 237

Imagery, Biblical, 163; 237

Inclusiveness: of parochial cult, 116; of regional cult, 102, 114

Income, Bedouin, 36–37

Incorporation: permanency of, 89; of Zezuru local spirits, 88

Inheritance, of priests’ estates, 202

Initiation ritual, 140

Innovation: and theology, 156; and Tonga prophets, 125

Innovator of cult, 164

Inquests: held by Bush Negro gravediggers, 104; held by Bush Negro priests, 103; and verdicts altered, 111

Interaction theory, 4

Investment, limited possibilities for

Bush Negro entrepreneurs of, 103

Invocations, of Tonga prophets, 131

Islam: code of conduct, 18; and cults of saints, 29; inheritance, for Sherqawa, 14; maraboutism. as version of, 3, 6; reformist movements, xxii, 15, 24

Islamic community, symbolized by saints, 47

Islamic hagiography, 47

Israel, effects of negotiations with Egypt, 39, 43–44

Jebaliyeh: environment and economy of, 37–38; pilgrimages and gatherings of, 31,42,43,44

Joking: and Bedouin women, 44; and Korekore mediums, 77

Kalanga: burial ritual, 188; congregations of, 191, 197–198, 203; order of shrines, 208; participation in High God cult, 177; and succession of adepts, 190; theology, 210; tradition, origins of senior oracles, 182; Zimbabwe rebellion, 209

Karanga: participation in High God cult, 177; Zimbabwe rebellion, 209

Khurutse: participation in High God cult, 177, 203; and succession of adepts, 190

Kinship: and cultic participation, 191; as ideology, 47; importance of, between medium and ruling chiefs, 227, 229–230; maintenance of dependent upon co-residence, 148; perpetual,

Korekore, 58, 73; and relations between adepts and priests, 190; relations between priests, 207; ties among Nkoya, 147–148. See also Affinity and Agnation Korekore: agricultural ritual of, 73; belief in antiquity of, 69; demarcation of, 61; domain of, 56; historical origins of, 67; mediums of, 70, 72. See also Cults

Kupara, George, 74–80, 90; See also Medium

Land: basic in economy, 42; rights in, 48; scarcity of, 196; sentimental value of, 39

Land-shrine community, Korekore, 69; See also Kalanga, Tonga

Land-shrine rituals, and regulation by regional medium, 73

Leadership

Bedouin, at tribal gatherings, 44

Cultic: competition within, 149; formal opposed to informal, 220–221, 236; mythical representations of, 220; opposition within, 148, 220; restraints on, 211; strategies of, 184–185; urban, 162

Organization of Bush Negro regional cult, 99

Lenje, cult expansion, 144

Literacy, 153

Loans, by Korekore mediums, 75

Local cult, 120; domain of Zezuru, 57; external validation of, 89; and interplay with prophet cult, xiv-xv; and support by territorial cult, 87; and territorial cult, 83. See also Cult

Local shrines, 121; hut, 126; memory of, 129; non-proliferation of, 129; re-establishment of, 132; ritual jurisdiction 130; tenacity of, 128; viability of, 129

Local spirits: assimilated to territorial cult, 82; and incorporation into genealogy of territorial spirits, 87–88; recrudescence of Zezuru, 87; spirit provinces and Zezuru, 82; and territorial authority, 58; as territorial spirits, 83; and Zezuru conceptual hierarchy, 57

Lozi, cult expansion of, 144

Luvale, cult expansion of, 144

Malawi Congress Party, 223

Mamhuko, 14 (Praises)

Mang’anja: as autochthonous group, xiii, 221, 223; mediums, 227; participation in Mbona cult, 219, 221

Mangelo, 131, See also Prophets Maraboutic tomb, 22 Maraboutism: bonds with clients, 18; as closeness, xxi, xxii, 10, 11; defined for Morocco, 6; and descent, 11, 12–15, 21; and elite status, 11; and group formation, 20; in an historical context, xviii, 25; as ideology, XViii, 5,20, 24–26; and marriage, 11; in Morocco, xviii, 3; and myth, 17–18; as obligation, xxi, 10, 11, 15; as part-ideology, 6, and power in Morocco, 10

Marriage: and ethnic groups, 198–199; as strategy of priest, 196. See also Affinity

Materialism, 93

Mbona: myths of, xiv, 219–220, 221, 223, 224, 234–235; possession by, xiii

Mbona cult: boundedness of, xiii; ritual cycle of, 219. See also Cults

Mecca, 18, xxv

Mediums: acolytes-interpreters of, 229, 230, 233; attire of Korekore, 74, 75; as bankers, 75; and chiefly succession, 70, 72, 86; communal, 57; competition between, 86; constraints upon, 77; control of staff of, 77; cross-cult confirmation of, 58; and cross-cult links, 87; and cross-cult rivalry, 83; decline of income of Bush Negro, 110; and descent, 80; distinguished from oracles, 229; drawn from elite, 80; fines upon, 73; genealogy and hierarchy of, 84; guardians of, 229–230, 233; hierarchy of Korekore, 69, 67, 70–72; hierarchy cross-cut, 73; influence from seance, 76; and jurisdiction of Zezuru, 58; Korekore, 56–57; Mang’anja, description of, xiii, 227; Mbona, ancestress of, 228–229; as mediators, 72; messengers of Korekore, 69; of Mutota, 74; and mystical retribution, 70; myths of, 236–237; new Zezuru, 87; objectives of, 77–78; oppositions to chiefs, xvi, 230–231; organizational instability of, 90; and origin myth, 67; as personification of deity, 219, as political activist, 231; and rebellion, 80, 87; regional, 72; and revision of genealogy, 84; and spirit provinces, 60; and tribute, 72; and validation of candidates, 75, 80; validation of Zezuru, 80, 85; wealth of Bush Negroes, 97

Mediumship: as hereditary secular authority, 230; structural position of, 238–239

Messenger; congregational, duties des cribed, 185–187; gifts to, 200; and relations with priests, 195; selective determinants of, 187

Mhondoro, 56f; and territory, 61

Migrant labor: among Bedouin, 42; cult prophet as, 157

Migration: Bedouin, 35, 38; Bedouin, annual cycle of, 39–40; labor, effects of 141–142

Misfortune: cause of Korekore, 74; cultic interpretation of, 140; diagnosis by Bush Negro priests of, 107; interpretation of, 156; and Korekore territorial spirits, 71; Tonga prophets’ interpretation of, 135. See also Affliction

Missions, 168

Mode of production, change in Bush Negroes, xxviii, 94, 96–97, 114–116

Monopoly, of transport by Bush Negroes, 96

Monze, xvi-xvii, 125f

Moral community, Korekore, 70

Moral and natural disturbances, 132

Morality: in non-ancestral cults, 145–146; in regional cults of affliction, 155–156

Morocco: “closeness” in concept of social order, 3, 10–12, 21, 23, 24–25; and maraboutic beliefs, 6–7, 10, 20; and prominence of Sherqawa, 15; urban ties with Sherqawa, 15, 17

Mosque: leadership and lodge, 14; in rural local community, 22

Mozambique: ecological zones of, 178;

location of Mbona cult, 219

Mtembo’s Church of Christ, 184

Mutape. See Acolyte

Mutota, 56f. See also Territorial cult

Mutuality, and rights to pasture land, 48 Muzeneh: environment and economy of, 36–37, 39; as pastoralists, 32; pilgrimages and gatherings of, xix, 31, 42, 43, Mwali (or Mwari) cult, 177; See also High God.

Myth: and claims of mediums, 83; as cult propaganda, 234–235; ideological differences in, within Mbona cult, 236–237; Korekore origin, 66; and maraboutism, 17–18; of Mbona, 219–220, 221, 223, 224, 234–235; of origin of cult principals, 223–225; as support of cross-cult trickery in, 79

Namzwa, participation in High God cult, 177

Nationalism, and Islam, 16

Natural disaster, and Tonga cult response, 125,132

Ndau, Zimbabwe rebellion, 209

Ndebele: participation in High God cult, 177; and succession of adepts, 190; and Zimbabwe rebellion, 208–210

Ndembu, cults of affliction among, xxv, 141

Nechombo, 57f. See also Acolyte Nehanda, 57f. See also Local spirits Nkoya: ancestral cults of affliction among, 142; early participation in Bituma cult, 169; kinship ties among, 147–148; as urban migrants, 169; women’s power, 151

Nzila cult, xxvii, 157–160, 167, 168, 169. See also Cult

Offerings: assets of congregation, 184; to chtonic cults, 79; Korekore, 69–70; Tonga, 126, 132

Oracles, 119–120; of Bush Negro cult, 93–108; coordinated actions of, 208; decline of authority of, 93; Delphi, 120; geographical locations of, 178; injunctions by, 185–187; origin and sites of, 182; of parochial cult, 107; and political manoeuvring, 108; political significance of location, 196–199, 204; questioning of, 108; as regional centre, 178; and regionalism, 178; ritual indoctrination of adepts, 191–192; senior or cardinal, 178, 181, 182, 185, 197, 203, 207, 208, 210; and wealth, 97

Ordeals, of Bush Negroes, 97, 101, 102 Organizational model’s, Nzila cult and, 167–168

Pantheons, Bush Negro, 101

Paraphernalia, 148, 159, 160, 164

Parochial cult: Bush Negro, 94; replacement of Bush Negro, 111–112; causes of decline of Bush Negro, 110; as survival of regional cult, 100. See also Cult

Particularism, xviii, xxii; in lodges, xx, 18

Pastoralism, as economic base, 39

Pastoralists, nomadic, participation in saints cults, 30

Patrilineality, and adept succession, 190

Patron-client relationship, 7; and closeness, 11; and maraboutism, 11, 12, 25. See also Clientele

Peasantry, participation in Bituma cult, 167

Pilgrim “trade,” 19, 194f

Pilgrimage: Bedouin, described, 41;

Bedouin, as ideology, 34; Bedouin, participation in, xix, 40–41; to Boujad, 19; of Creoles, 99; leaders of, 40; to Mecca, 18, 40; network of routes, xii, xiii; reasons for tribal, 41; as rite of passage, 42; structural similarities of tribal, 30

Political boundaries, 177

Political divisions: and authority among Tonga, 122; and Korekore spirit provinces, 56; Tonga, 121; and Tonga cult, 135

Political inequality, between chief and subjects, 220

Pollution, 70, 155, 156, 160

Population density, for Bituma and Nzila regions, 165

Possession: characteristics of, 188, 190; confirmation of, 85; as contest between formal and informal leadership, 220; of cult adepts, 188; described for Mbona cult, 227, 230, 233; dispute about, 86; and egalitarian conception, 220; fake, 76; as result of mounting social, environmental and cultic factors, 232–234; suppressed by High God cult, 101; of Tonga prophets, 131; validation of Zezuru, 86–87

Power: changes in as contributors to religious transformation, 142; female, 151; maraboutic, scope of, 19; and maraboutism, 10; in ritual, 146; of Tonga prophets, xv

Pre-capitalist structures, reference to by cult participants, 167

Priests: of Bush Negro oracle, 93; coordinated actions of, 208; death of, 182, 185; and disposal of legacies, 106–107; donations to, 191, 199; gifts to, 200; and inquests, 103; leader of cult region, 181; maintenance of reputation, 202; managerial problems of, 184, 199f; partial to privileged group, 114; personal wealth of, 109, 199; of regional cult and missionaries, 98; reliance in separatist churches, 204–205; sacrifices by, 194, 199; seasonal councils of, 208; and strategies to combat declining incomes, 110–111; succession of, 182, 187, 202–205; as validators of moral status, 97

Property, Morocco, ownership of, 20 Prophets

Bush Negroes: and economic change, 94; and institution of new cult, 111; and political involvement, 113 general: as founder of cult of affliction, 153–154; as healer, xvi; relations with clientele, xv

Tonga: after resettlement, 133; ambitious, 136; appeal to clientele, 136; authority of, 127; and Basangu, 122; competition among, 124; confirmation of, 125, 134 death of, 134; demands of, 133; distribution of clientele, 121–122; most powerful, 125; origin of spirits of, 123–124; redefinition of role, 120; and shrine custodians, 135; symbolism, 126

Prophet cult, 120; and local cult, 128; tenacity of Tonga, 128

Prophets’ shrines: and local shrines, 134; proliferation of, 129; reinstatement of, 131

Public opinion, and medium’s freedom of action, 77 rebuilding shrines, 232–233; as response to calamity, 219; Tonga agri

Purity, 155,156, 162

Qur’an, 6, 15, 26

Rebellion: and High God leadership, 101; and Zezuru mediums, 80, 87

Regional cults, 55; change in organization and ideology, xi; and chthonic beings, 67; competition for congregations, 181; and economic change, 94; evolution and devolution of, 93, 100, 139–140, 182; fractionization of, 93 , 94, 100, 102; history of Bush Negroes, 98–100; new, 111; and receipt of legacies, 100, 103, 106; structural characteristics of, 130, 159, 165, 168; among Tonga, xiv; widespread distribution of, ix; of Zambezi valley, 67. See also Cults

Regional expansion, of cults, 58

Regional medium, Korekore, 71

Regional organization, of regional cults of affliction, 152–153, 163

Regional pilgrimage center, xxi, 7

Regionalism: among Bedouin, 29; among Tonga, 135–146

Regions, 55; comparison of Bituma and Nzila, 164–165; as cult congregation. 177–178; distribution of Korekore, 66; identity with maraboutic cult, 15; of influence, 6

Regularization, cults of, xxviii

Relationships, Bedouin maintenance of, 39, 42

Religious lodge, Sherqawi, 7

Religious transformation, in cults of affliction, 142

Resettlement, of Tonga, 130

Residence: of adepts, 191; and maintenance of kinship ties, 148

Resources, Bedouin, restrictions on use of, 48

Responsibilities, jural, 191,223

Rest days, Korekore, 73

Rite of passage, pilgrimage as, 42

Ritual: and adepts, 188; of Bush Negro dead, 104; conformity by Tonga nonbelievers, 128; divinatory, 140; factions in, 147, 149; of initiation, 140; politics of, 147, 149, 151; of

Punishment: by Basangu, 124; of feelings by High God, 101–102 cultural, 131, 132; and Tonga elite, 128; transactions in, 147, 149, 151; as transcultural, 177

Ritual collaboration, 195, 219

Ritual cycle, of Mbona cult, 219

Ritual field: and inclusion of two cults, 89; instability of, 90; and secular field, 70; sub-fields of, 89; in Zimbabwe, 55

Ritual innovation, in cults of affliction, 148,153

Ritual jurisdiction: of Tonga local shrines, 130; of Zezuru local spirits, 57

Ritual territories, adjustment of Korekore, 61, 66, 69, 71, 73

Rumor, as widespread consensus, 234–236. See also Gossip

Sacrament, of Bush Negro regional cult, 101

Sacrifice: and chthonic cults, 79; collective groups for, xix, 20; by cult priests, 199; and maraboutism, 19, 20, 22, 26; in Mbona cult, 226, 232; as part of kinship ideology, 47; prior to pilgrimage, 40; at ritual indoctrination of adepts, 194; Tonga, 126

Saint Catherine’s Monastery, xx 33, 37, 43

Saints: associated with God, 48; efficiency of, 41; equality of, 41; lack of specialization, 41; as mediator, 29, 41, 48; origins of, 47; symbolic significance of, 47. See also Maraboutism

Saints’ cults, sphere of influence of, 29–30. See also Sherqawi

Saints’ tombs, general location of, xix xx, 31

Sanctuary, 83, 108–109

Satirical songs, 205 note 24

Saudi Arabia, narcotics trade, 36

Seance: of incorporation into Korekore spirit genealogy, 87–88; Korekore, 74; and Korekore mediums’ influence, 76; in Mbona cult, xiii

Segmentary societies, in Morocco, 20, 24

Separatist sects, 77

Seventh Day Adventist Church, 157, 158, 169

Sherqawi: and clients, 9, 10; elites, xxii, 14–15; expansion of, 16–17; lodges and urban ties, 15; sphere of influence of lodges, xxi, 16–17

Sherqawi politics, 7, 9

Shrine custodians: and Basangu, 122; and prophets, 135; after resettlement, 130, 133; Tonga, xv, 121

Shrine grounds, Mbona cult, described, 221

Shrines: as central places of regional cults, ix; of chthonic cults, 78; as communal symbol, 141; congregations of, xix, 182; Mbona cult, rebuilding of, 219, 232; payment for opening of Bush Negro, 99; peripherality of, xxiv xxv; as recipients of legacies, 106; of regional cult, 93; reputations of Bedouin, 40–41; Sherqawi main, 14; symbolizing control over crucial resources, xviii. See also Holy tombs, Local shrines, Prophets’ shrines, Cults

Sin, 146

Sinners: burial of, 104; changes in categories of, 102; posthumous condemnation of, 103

Smugglers, keepers of tradition, 43

Smuggling: in South Sinai, xix, 33, 34, 36, 37; and tribal allegiance, 39

Snuff, 69, 88

Social inequality, myth as legitimization of, 236–239

Song texts, 144, 161

Sorcery, 145, 146, 155, 156, 202, 205, 223, 226, 233

South Africa General Mission, 157

South Sinai: ecology of, 31–33; as location of saints’ cults, 30–31

Spatial categories, of cult organization, 221

Spirit mediums. See also Mediums

Spirits: manifestations of Korekore, 56;

Tonga conceptions, 123; and Tonga prophets, xv. See also Basangu

Spirit provinces: adjustment of, 71; and genealogies, 82; Korekore, 56; and land-shrine communities, 69; and mediums, 69, 61; new, 72

Staff, of Bush Negro oracle, 108–109

Strategies, of cult leaders, 184, 196

Succession: of adepts, 190; of cult leadership, 148; of priests, 182, 187

Suffrage, and rise of a parochial cult, 112–112

Supplicants: gifts to priests, 200; to regional oracles, 178

Svikiro, 56f. See also Mediums

Swidden agriculture, Korekore, 69

Symbol: definition of, 45; holy tomb as, 45; as integrative unit, 45; as systems, 5

Symbolic messages, of Korekore mediums, 69, 61, 73

Symbolism: of Tonga prophets, 126; transcultural, 177

Tallensi, xii

Taxes, imposed by Bush Negro priests, 99, 109

Territorial cult: expansion into domain of local cult, 89; Korekore, 56–69; of local spirit, 83: See also Cults, Dzivaguru, Earth cults

Territorial spirits: conceptual hierarchy of, 56; and land-shrine communities, 69; as lions, 56; wrath of, 70

Theology: of Bush Negro regional cult, 101–102; Islamic, 6; Kalanga, 210; relationships between cults, 184

Tonga: cult expansion, 144; and land shrines, xiv-xv

Traffic in supplicants, 194; See also Pilgrimage

Transport

Bush Negroes: decline of river, 110; later increase in interior, 112; monopoly of, 96; wealth derived from, 97 and traffic movement of Tonga, 122 and location of Tonga prophets, 136

Transhumance, Bedouin, 38, 39–40

Translation of belief, 80

Transvaal, ecological zones of, 178

Tree shrines, Korekore, 69

Tribal ancestor, association with holy tomb, 47

Tribal organization, as conceptualization, 34

Tribal reunions: Bedouin, attendance at, 43; among Bedouin, reasons, for, 31, 42; influence of economic factors, 43; influence of political factors on, 43–44; as pilgrimage, 42

Tribalism, and cult regionalism, xix

Tribe: Bedouin as administrative unit, 33, 45; Bedouin as territorial rights, 33; ecological influences on, 40; as political unit, 40; rights to holy tomb, 41, 46; territorial unit, 44; as visible group,40

Tribute

Bush Negroes: decline of, 93, 110; to regional cult, 99 general: between Korekore mediums, 72: to chthonic cult, 79; to territorial cult, 67

Trickery in myth, 79

Typology, of cults, xii-xiii, xvi

Universalism: of Bush Negro High God cult, 102; characteristic of cults, xviii, xxii, 120, 154, 157, 177; and status of adepts, 188; and Tonga prophets' claims, 136; and Tonga ritual, 135, See also High God cult

Urban centres, of Bituma and Nzila regions, 165, 169

Urban voluntary organizations, as mechanisms for adaptation to urban life, 167

Validation: of chiefly succession, 86, 88–89; of genealogical amendment, 84; of local spirits, 88; of mediums, 75, 80, 87, 88–89; of moral stature by Bush Negro priests, 97; of moral stature by ordeal, 101, 102

Venda: origins of senior oracle, 182; participation in High God cult, 177; and succession of adepts, 190; and Zimbabwe rebellion, 209

Vicinity: collapse of, 91; expansion of Korekore mediums', 77, 78; of Korekore regional mediums, 71; of Tonga prophets, 124

Visions, of cult prophets, 153–154

Wage labor: Bedouin, 37–38; and transhumance, 38

Water wells, for Bedouin, 32

Wealth, of Korekore mediums, 75

Witchcraft: abatement of fears of, 110; and burial, 104; Bush Negroes, 94; as cause of misfortune, 74, 82; and new parochial cult, 113–114; and payments to regional cult, 100; posthumous accusations of, 103, 106–107; and protection by High God, 101; regional cult prohibition of, 102; threat to nouveau riche of, 98, 113; voiding of accusations of, 97

Witchfinding, 202

Women: as adepts, 145; Bedouin, 37; Bedouin and sexual joking, 44; as cult leaders, 149, 150; mediums in Mbona cult, 227, 228–230; participation as cult leaders, 203–205; as patients of non-ancestral cults of affliction, 146; powers of, 151

Zambia: Christian missions in, 168; cults of affliction in, 139, 140, 141, 152, 154, 158, 163, 165, 168, 170; immigration to, from Angola, 169

Zambia Nzila Sect, 159

Zezuru cult: cult instability, 90; divination, 86; expansion and personality of mediums, 90; High God of, 57; local spirits of, 58, mediums, of, 86; myth and interpenetration of, 83. See also Cults

Zimbabwe: cult prophet in, 157; ecological zones of, 178; expression of cult policy, 212; nineteenth century rebellion in, 208–210; priest’s income from, 200; restrictions on land, 196

</biblio>

[Back Cover]

ASA MONOGRAPHS

Reently published

13. Social Anthropology and Medicine

edited by

J.B. Loudon

University College of Swansea, Wales

November 1976, xxvi + 600pp.

0.12.456350.3

14. Social Anthropology and Law

edited by

Ian Hamnett

University of Bristol, England

April 1977, x + 234pp.

0.12.322350.4

Volume in preparation

15. The Anthropology of the Body

edited by John Blacking

Department of Social Anthropology

Queen’s University. Belfast, Northern Ireland

Academic Press

London — New York — San Francisco

A Subsidiary of Harcourt Bruce Jovanovich, Publishers

24–28 Oval Road, London NW1 7DX, England

111 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10003, USA

Australian office: PO Box 300, North Ryde, NSW 2113, Australia

[1] This paper is based on fieldwork in Boujad, Morocco, and its environs from October 1968 until June 1970. It was sponsored by the Foreign Area Fellowship Program and the National Institute of Mental Health, to whom I am deeply grateful. Additonal fieldwork ensued in the summers of 1972 and 1973 and was sponsored, respectively, by the Foreign Currency Program of the Smithsonian Institution and the Social Science Research Council. The transliteration of Arabic terms in this text is based upon colloquial usage. The plurals of most Arabic words are indicated here by the addition of to the singular forms, except for those few which frequently occur in Western literature. However, to avoid awkward circumlocutions, the maraboutic descent group discussed in this paper are Sherqawi in the singular and adjectival forms, Sherqawa in the plural, as they are in Arabic. Because of publishing economies, I have been unable to indicate emphatic consonants by the use of special transliteration marks. For comments on this paper I wish to thank Karen I. Blue, T.O. Beidelman, Nicholas S. Hopkins, and especially Richard P. Werbner.

[2] Although rarely used as such marabout is an English word. I deliberately use this term rather than saint to avoid facile analogies to the Christian context. Although both North African marabouts and the saints of Mediterranean Europe serve as intermediaries to the supernatural and frequently are associated with specific places and clientele, they occur in significantly different cultural contexts which cannot usefully be equated, as Turner has persuasively argued (1974: 56–71).

[3] For similar analogies concerning saints in the European Mediterranean, see Boissevain (1966: 30–31) and Christian (1972: 44).

[4] The acquisition of clientele independent from immediate ecological considerations continues to be the case. In recent years a Boujad Sherqawi active in electoral politics (when they are possible) has successfully sought maraboutic status in certain villages in the Sus area and has collected substantial donations. These are provided in part by wealthy Casablanca merchants who originate from these villages and seek to facilitate their business enterprises in return. Other villagers sought to become his clients on the basis of less practical “religious” ends.

[5] This baraka, as these attributes are popularly considered, can be acquired equally from kinsmen and nonkinsmen. The “closeness” through which these qualities are transmitted is frequently envisaged in highly concrete terms in maraboutic myths. In one case, bread is prepared by a marabout and eaten by his disciple. In another instance, a Sherqawi child sucks the fingers and toes of a sleeping marabout.

[6] I specify currently because a number of other sons of the marabout are recognized, some of whom have shrines in Boujad. Both in the past and today, Moroccans recognize the possibility of other descent groups being “discovered” (or sociologically speaking, of descent groups crystallizing out of descent categories).

[7] For a further discussion of these brotherhoods, see Eickelman (1976: 224–227).

[8] The same descriptive term designates pilgrims who visit maraboutic shrines.

[9] A similar process takes place in the formation of urban quarters (Eickelman 1974b). By rough calculation, there is a maraboutic shrine for every six square kilometres, or one for every 150 persons, on the western plains of Morocco. Comparable figures prevail for the High Atlas mountains (Berque 1957: 7). It is futile to place much faith in such a census, but it does indicate the prevalence of maraboutism. Of course, the vast majority of such shrines draw only miniscule offerings and clientele.

[10] Because Jacques Berque's interpretation of maraboutic cults is the most prominent one in French literature on Morocco, it is useful briefly to analyze it here. While Gellner relies upon the logically elegant imagery of segmentation to describe "tribal" social structure, Berque elaborates a botanical metaphor to conceptualize Moroccan social forms, especially those of High Atlas Berbers. For Berque, these forms resemble "a hopelessly tangled undergrowth, formed of miniscule twigs, with the roots of each extending to all points of the horizon" (1953: 263). Having extracted full value from the botanical metaphor, Berque proceeds to an incendiary one to describe historical shifts in the distribution of power: "tribal hegemonies, personal power, spiritual or dynastic expansion flame up and die out like torches. Their radiation lacks depth. It is spread out over a milieu diverse and diffuse at the same time, fragmented but universal" (1953: 269). Berque sees maraboutic cults as an integral part of Moroccan social identity from at least the eighteenth century to the present (1953: 270). The title of the article, "Qu'est-ce qu'une 'tribu' nord-africaine" is probably meant to evoke Renan's "Qu'est-ce-qu'une nation?" (1887) and thus suggests the significance which Berque attributes to the study of "tribal" social identities. Unfortunately, however, his general argument, as opposed to his Ethnography of the Seksawa (1955), is limited to a presentation of his key metaphors and an analysis of prior scholarly assumptions toward local and tribal identities. Yet in various other writings, Berque acknowledges the persistence of maraboutism in diverse historical and social circumstances (e.g. 1949: 82–84; 1957).

[11] Field work in South Sinai was carried out between 1971 and 1976. I spent a total of eight months in the field. In 1973–4 Miss Shuli Hartman participated in the research and carried out field work. The Ford Foundation, through the Israel Foundation Trustees, supported the project and this help is gratefully acknowledged. The South Sinai Administration, and especially Moshe Sela, greatly facilitated my work. The comments of the participants in the 1976 ASA Conference, particularly Ernest Gellner, Raymond Firth, Shuli Hartman and Richard Werbner, were of great help in the revision of this essay. Map I is at the end of the article on page 49.

[12] Fieldwork was carried out among Zezuru of Musami, Mrewa for three months in 1958 and among Korekore of the Sipolilo and Darwin Districts over a period of 25 months during 1960–61 and 1963–64. I make grateful acknowledgements to the Leverhulme Trustees, to the International African Institute and to the Research Council of the University College of Rhodesia, for generous support.

I particularly wish to express my debt to the late George Kupara, the ‘Lion’ of Mutota, who welcomed me to his seances and patiently instructed me in the ways of the Mutota cult.

In writing, I have used the ethnographic present, occasionally, for convenience. However, it must be borne in mind that throughout the seventies the whole of the Zambezi Valley has been the scene of intense military activity. The Korekore are now very much in the front line of the struggle for an independent Zimbabwe. Sadly, many have been concentrated in ‘fortified villages’ and a number of mediums of the cult of Mutota have come under the close scrutiny of the colonial military. The medium of the Korekore Nehanda fled to Mozambique to escape their attentions and one, the medium of Chihwahwa, was imprisoned for 20 years, allegedly, for aiding guerillas. The senior medium of Mutota ended his days in a village surrounded by security officers who vetted every supplicant who came to him.

[13] I was not able to enter Mozambique to establish how far the cult extended. Korekore say that the cult’s region extends to the northern escarpment of the Zambezi valley. I was able to establish that the spirit provinces of Nebedza and Nehanda did extend into Mozambique.

[14] Often spoken of as ‘Lions of the Heavens’ (Mhondoro dze Matenga) and called ‘supra-tribal’ in much of the literature (see Gelfand 1959; Abraham 1966).

[15] All names, unless otherwise stated are of rivers or streams. With the exception of the Bwase (‘Gwase’) River, all streams and rivers which appear on official maps have been named as they appear there. Many are wrongly recorded. For example, in Chikorekore, Kadziruve is Kadzuruve, Ambi is Hambe, Hunyani is Manyami, Mahuwi is Mauhwi, Katsawa is Katsahwe, etc.

[16] Boundaries were established by working from one land-shrine community to the next and asking to whom the “beer of the earth” (hwahwa hwe pasi) was offered. Forest boundaries were established by joining hunting parties and noting the different spirits to which hunters made symbolic offerings of leaves and twigs. The eastern part of Map 1, including the chiefdoms of Mzarabani and Kasekete and the west bank of the Msengezi, was mapped in 1960–61. The remaining areas were mapped in 1963–64.

[17] References under A refer to Genealogy 2 and under B, to Map I. Under A, T refers to Tavara, Ch. to Chthonic, S to Stranger. The affiliation of Mukarazi was not fully determined. Almost certainly, this spirit forms part of the Chikunda cult of Kanyemba.

[18] Mutota dies because his sons conspired together to prevent him knowing that he had reached the Zambezi Valley. He was thus placed in mystical danger. As he died, he stated that unless one of his sons had intercourse with his daughter, Nehanda, his body could not be buried. Eventually, Nebedza slept with his sister. The ground then opened miraculously to receive Mutota’s body. From this incestuous union all present day Korekore are held to derive.

[19] I have distinguished chthonic beings from ordinary Tavara chiefs in terms of the powers accorded to them in the myth by Korekore. Tavara chiefs are described as being killed by ordinary, physical means; the chthonic beings are always overcome by mystical means. Some Tavara do not make this distinction and claim the chthonic beings as their ancestors. In some accounts Musuma and Nyamukokoko are distinguished as two beings. Korekore in the Dande hold that Musuma Nyamukokoko was a son of Dzivaguru who was raised in Chimombe's village. Later, Chimombe is said to have moved from the Dande, leaving Musuma behind, to land beyond the Hunyani and Angwa rivers.

[20] In the past, mediums were forbidden to cultivate and were maintained by tribute in grain given by members of their spirit provinces. Even now a medium obtains a dispensation from his spirit before he begins to cultivate.

[21] An ngozi is an afflicting ancestral spirit. In most areas of the Valley, one will find ngozi possession cults. Their organisation tends to cut across the land shrine communities. A candidate for ngozi possession is seated on a mat and senior adepts of the cult will rub his head vigorously, from time to time, to aid possession.

[22] An unpossessed medium is referred to as Novana. Often, a medium speaks of himself as a container or pocket (homwe) for the spirit.

[23] Abraham (1959) has presented a composite of several genealogies collected throughout the Zambezi Valley. In this, segmentation occurs earlier. Nevertheless, only Nebedza, of the 16 children of Mutota given, is credited with a line of descendants (see also Beach 1972).

[24] Mediums do not drink immediately before or during seances. The spirit is held to enter the stomach. Drinking water would both cool and displace it.

[25] I attended 40 seances at which 74 separate issues were raised by 63 supplicants. Supplicants together with their companions and retinue numbered in all, 153.

[26] Field work in the Tapanahoni area of Surinam took place from June 1961 till November 1962, during August 1965, in September and October 1970 and again for a few weeks in December 1973 and January 1974. The first and second periods were financed by The Netherlands Foundation for the Advancement of Tropical Research (WOTRO), the third period by the Afrika-Sudiecentrum at Leyden. My stay in 1973–1974 was supported by the University of Utrecht. I feel indebted to Chris de Beet and Diane Vernon for valuable criticism of an earlier draft and for drawin attention to documents in French and Dutch archives.

[27] The name Gaan Tata has fallen into disuse. Nowadays, the Djuka usually refer to Gaan Gadu or Bigi Gadu (Thoden van Velzen 1966a). Kersten, a missionary who visited the Tapanahoni in 1895 (MBB 1896: 185), noted that the name Gaan Gadu was also used by high priest Labi Agumasakka. Other names mentioned in the earliest accounts of the movement are Masa Jehovah and Bakaa (MITT 1895: 52), respectively ‘Sir Jehovah’ and ‘European’. I have preferred to use the name Gaan Tata as this distinguished the movement from the other High God or Great Deity cults that periodically erupted in Bush Negro territory; adherents of these cults often called the central divinity Gaan Gadu.

[28] In 1885, gold-diggers were willing to pay 32 florins ($12.40) per barrel, the unit of freight. Ten years later, freight prices on the Albina-Lawa route were down to 10 florins ($4), to skyrocket again to levels of 32,50 and even 50 florins during the second gold rush (1901–1904) in the Lawa basin (De Beet and Thoden van Velzen 1977). The colonial administration repeatedly attempted to curb price rises by putting pressure on tribal chiefs. They had to wait for the decrease in the demand for transport, before these efforts were successful.

[29] The attitude of government officials tdwards the cult varied considerably. Usually, at the turn of the century, the higher echelons showed themselves opposed to any aggressive policy towards the Gaan Tata priests. However, officials at the lower levels at times supported the missionaries in attempts to suppress the cult. Such divergencies enabled the Gaan Tata priests to operate an oracle at Santigron, fifteen kilometres from the capital.

[30] But of course some clashes did take place: at Moarimbomofo in 1892 (MBB 1893: 179–180), 1894 (MITT 1896: 70–71); at Dritabiki in 1900 (MITT 1901: 598), at Koffiekamp in 1892 (MBB 1892: 367–368) and in 1893 (MITT 1895: 317–318); and again at a Cottica village (MBB 1907: 62–66) where Djuka men and women dragged their kinsman Kwassi Hendriks from the hands of a missionary who was about to baptize him.

[31] Modern ethnography has been deplorably silent on the history of the cult, its spread throughout the interior and its present-day functioning.

[32] Personal communication, Chris and Miriam de Beet.

[33] ‘Outsiders’ is my translation for Bakaa. All those who are neither Bush Negroes nor Amerindians are called Bakaa by the Djuka.

[34] Quite healthy Gaan Tata cults continued to exist in other areas as well. In 1962,-Agiti-Ondro on the Cottica River was thriving with patients and supplicants. To a lesser extent this, also seemed to have been the case at Santigron and Toti-Kampu on the Saramacca River. Gaan Tata worship also continued at several places on the Suriname River.

[35] Apparently, only the Tapanahoni’s parochial cult was destroyed. Other parochial Gaan Tata cults are thriving.

[36] This paper is based on my research into Central African religious change, in which I have been engaged since 1971. Fieldwork was undertaken alternatingly in Lusaka and Kaoma district, Western Province, Zambia, during 27 months, from February 1972 to April 1974. Of this period, rural research was carried out in February 1973, May-June 1973 and August-April 1974.

Research both in Lusaka and Kaoma district concentrated on the Nkoya ethnic group but in addition involved religious and political organizations of a much wider scope. A research grant from the University of Zambia covered initial research expenses in the period February-April 1972. In 1973–74 I was a Research Affiliate of the University of Zambia's Institute for African Studies, in which capacity I benefited from its various research facilities. The Netherlands Foundation for the Advancement of Tropical Research (WOTRO) provided a writing-up grant for the period 1974–75. The University of Leiden paid towards my participation in the 1976 ASA conference, which led to the present paper. While registering my indebtedness and gratitude vis-a-vis these various instutitions, the Zambian authorities and my informants, I wish to thank in particular the following people: Denes Shiyowe for excellent research assistance; Henny van Rijn, my wife, for sharing much of the fieldwork and analysis; the late Max Gluckman, Andre Kobben, Maud Muntemba, Bob Papstein, Terry Ranger, Mathew Schoffeleers, Jaap Van Velsen, and Richard Werbner who over the years through comments and discussions, have contributed to my analysis; and finally Richard Werbner for his most stimulating editorial efforts towards the production of the present paper.

[37] Christian churches are cults in terms of my definition of cult. However, they would be distinguished from cults in the dominant sociological approach to types of religious organization, which has been developed on the basis of the writings of Troeltsch, Von Wiese, Becker, and Yinger (cf. Kolb 1964; O'Dea 1968).

[38] The following associations between non-regional cults of affliction and ethnic groups are recognized in Western Zambia: the songo cult is associated with the Songo people of Angola (McCulloch 1951), and introduced in Western Zambia by the Luvale (Ikacana 1971), chimbandu with the Angolan Ovimbundu (McCulloch 1951); kayongo with the Luvale (Kuntz 1932) or in general with Angolan immigrants (my fieldnotes); kalendamawulu with the Lozi (my fieldnotes); blyaya or slyaya with the Luvale (Ikacana 1971, my fieldnotes); liyala with the Lozi (Kuntz 1932; Gluckman 1951); macoba with the Kaonde (Kuntz 1932); mayimbwe with the Nkoya (Kuntz 1932; Gluckman 1951; Ikacana 1971; my fieldnotes); kasheba with the Kaonde (my fieldnotes); muba with the Totale (Gluckman 1951; Ikacana 1971, who also mentions the neighbouring Toka); Lenje (my fieldnotes), or even groups further to the east, like the Lamba (Doke 1931) and the Ambo (Stefaniszyn 1964).

[39] “Anamnesis” is used here in the technical, medical sense of a patient’s own account of the history of his complaint.

[40] In this context one should bear in mind that most cult leaders are women, who in extra-religious public settings are not supposed to sit on chairs.

[41] This might be read to constitute a moral aspect, in contrast with what I have said above about the amoral nature of these cults. However, this concern with fair play points in a different direction—just as the ethics of fair play do not turn soccer or the retail trade into a predominantly moral institution.

[42] Mongu district files; the report could not be consulted.

[43] Reynolds (1963: 133) mentions the date of 1944, Muntemba (1972: 1) 1940.

[44] Initially a jar of chalk, and church bells (Reynolds 1963: 135, 137); later also a sacred cup for the administering of medicine (Muntemba 1972: 5, 11).

[45] The paraphernalia which Simbinga brought from his journey, and which to this day are in possession of his widow (one of my chief informants), were mainly the following. In three differently-coloured bottles (allegedly brought from Johannesburg by somebody else, and for secular purposes) Simbinga had collected water from three rivers: the Zambezi,.Jhe Kabompo and the Lungwebungu. These bottles he used as divining device: only a patient who managed to indicate which bottle contained water from which river could be considered to suffer from Bituma, and thus be eligible for treatment. In addition Simbinga brought a round, grey stone (about 10 cm diameter); a mpande shell partly covered with copper-wire; a flyswitch made of eland-tail; a number of cowrie shells; a genet skin (mbomba) a circular ornament, made of parts of white water-lily sown into strings of white beads; a small copper bell of European manufacture; and finally a leather-bound copy of an Afrikaans hymnbook (Di Berijmde Psalms, 1936). For the healing ritual, Simbinga would dress in fully white clothes. Although I cannot elaborate on this point here, to one familiar with the material culture and symbolism of Western Zambian cultures it will be clear that Simbinga's choice of paraphernalia was largely based on widespread conventional symbolism in this area, and reflected personal idiosyncrasies only to a limited degree—except in their combination.

[46] In the 1969 census Mongu had 10,700 inhabitants, Livingstone 43,000 inhabitants, and the other centres mentioned less than 4,000 inhabitants (Davies 1971: 126).

[47] Despite increase in population, the relative demographic difference between the Bituma and Nzila regions was of essentially the same nature as in the 1930's, when Mongu and Livingstone had already been provincial and national capitals respectively for several decades, and (cf. Merle Davis 1933, appendix map) population density in Western Zambia showed variations similar to the present-day distribution.

[48] Map 2 gives, inter alia, an overview of the size, growth and distribution of Christianity in Western Zambia between the years 1929 and 1948, the crucial period for the emergence and early development of Nzila and Bituma. Basic figures were derived from: Northern Rhodesia, 1929, 1937, 1948.

[49] I began my study of this cult in the course of fifteen months fieldwork in Zimbabwe during *1960–61, and continued the fieldwork in Botswana for the following periods: 1964–65, fifteen months; 1969, three months; 1974, one month. I wish to thank the Fulbright Commission, the University of Manchester, and the Social Science Research Council (U.K.) for grants and leave for the research. I am grateful also to the many Kalanga and Khurutse, cult officials and laymen alike, who helped me to understand the cult, especially the southwestern priest, Mr. Ntogwa Matafeni Dube, Reverend Mongwa Tjuma, Mr. Mpubuli Matenge Ngulube and their families. Public personalities and places referred to here are historically significant and too readily recognisable to be disguised. I have therefore not used pseudonyms, as I usually do to protect personal identities.

[50] Included in the cult are such ethnically different people as Kalanga (Holub 1881; O'Neill 1920; Richards 1942; Sebina 1947; Gelfand 1966), Karanga (Knothe 1888; von Sicard 1952; Daneel 1970, 1971), Venda (Schwellnus 1888; Stayt 1931; van Warmelo 1940) Ndau (Daneel 1970: 57), Khurutse (Shapera 1971), Ndebele (Campbell 1926; Ranger 1967), and others. I am not sure whether Namzwa to the north, near Wankie, have congregations.

[51] Cockin, a missionary at Hope Fountain in 1879, mentions three oracles in the Matopo Hills (Cockin 1879, cited in Ranger 1967: 145), as follows, relative to his mission station, Ematjetjeni (Matonjeni) to the east, Entjeleli (Njelele) to the south, and Umkombo to the south-west. (I am grateful to Mr. Richard Brown for supplying me with Cockin's full text.) Another oracle, contemporary with them, is mentioned by Holub for the northwest in 1876 at the Maitengwe River (Holub 1881: 64). Note that all these oracles continue into the twentieth century. Ranger misreads Cockin's report floc. cit.). He eliminates one of the central oracles; he mistakes a lesser oracle outside the central Matopo Hills near Mangwe for a cardinal oracle. This misreading leads Ranger into an ad hoc view of the cult in its response to change; he obscures continuity in the cult.

[52] The cult's domain also coincides, roughly, with the distribution of Khami-type Iron Age buildings (with the exception of Mtoko, in the east). (For a map see Summers 1961: 9.) The somewhat wider distribution of Zimbabwe-type buildings extends beyond the present cult domain into the Korekore-Zezuru areas to the north, where cults of local and territorial spirits have their domains (see chapter 3 above).

[53] This smaller zone of wooded steppe with abundant Acacia and Comiphora has somewhat higher rainfall.

[54] I discuss an apparent exception below, page 200.

[55] My assessment is on the basis of a preliminary study of the cult of komana, which I carried out in 1972–3 during a year's fieldwork among Tswapong in central Botswana.

[56] At a cardinal oracle of Matonjeni, two offices are distinguished: that of shrine keeper, customarily a Venda, and that of priest, customarily from the Shoko (Monkey) clan among Mbire. This distinction is not maintained in the western regions. Lumbi, minstrel, is the term commonly used for the priest Ntogwa, who also spoke of himself as 'Leader', ntungamili. Similarly, here unlike at Matonjeni, the term hosana is used for both male and female adepts.

[57] Newman (1971) records, 'In the Matopos Hills in Rhodesia there is a remarkably dense population [of eagles], possibly t(ie most concentrated eagle population known anywhere in the world' (59). Note that snake eagle is a friend of man in that it preys on snakes. I am tempted to suggest that the two figures of the famous Zimbabwe figurine may be a snake eagle or a martial eagle and its prey, a monitor lizard.

[58] According to Kalanga tradition, the oracle of Mwali came from: 1) Lutombo Lutema to 2) Bambudzi, 3) Zhomba, 4) Chizeze, 5) Mavula Majena, 6) Njelele, 7) Dula, 8) Manyangwa, 9) Njenjema, 10) Ntogwa.

[59] In the region that I know best, the priest Ntogwa succeeded his mother's sister's son, Fulele, and also claimed that Njenje was his maternal grandfather. He claimed Venda origin for his patriline in a Zebra clan (Dube or Ntembo). Njenjema, a priest of the northwest, was of Njenje's clan, a Monkey (Shoko or Ncube, praise name Luvimbi). Manyangwa, the northern priest, is a Leya.

[60] Daneel (1974: 109) stresses hostility and opposition between Zionist churches and the cult staff at the cardinal oracle of Matonjeni, though he also mentions more co-operative relations between the cult and Ethiopian-type churches. In Botswana the southwestern priest, Ntogwa, co-operated in various ways with leaders of the Bethannia Mission Apostolic Church and J. E. Mtembo's Church of Christ.

[61] A messenger explained the distinction between him and the porter thus, "I carry the truth; he carries the blankets." In fact, this messenger was slightly deaf, and at a public meeting, the porter gave most of the report about their pilgrimage to their regional oracle. It is common for a porter to become a messenger, in turn.

[62] Ranger (1967: 378) reads his own interpretation, somewhat mistakenly, into a cult lament which Mr. Timon Mongwa Tjuma transcribed for me, and I translated with his help. The text is not 'a despairing lament for the ruin created in the Shona world by the white man and the powerlessness of the defeated to do anything about it'. Nor does it express 'a mood of despondency' (Daneel 1970: 35). It expresses moral outrage and complaint—indeed, a refusal to be defeated—as shown by the chorus and remarks at the time. The prevailing attitude of protest and complaint in cult songs is explained thus by Kalanga themselves, 'A child must cry so that his father will heed his suffering.'

[63] At a different time, and on a domestic occasion, an adept may act as a host of Mazenge and be possessed by a bush spirit. (See Werbner 1964, 1971, 1972 and also Daneel 1970: 51 on Jukwa possession in the cult of Mwari.)

[64] Her Husband, Shologulu, (The Great Head), dwells in the sky to the south, Her Son, Lunji (The Awl), to the west; and She Herself, to the east. She and Her Son go back and forth and communicate with each other and Shologulu via a shooting star. Note that Kalanga bury a corpse with its orientation in accord with the trinity thus: its face towards the south, its head to the east, and feet to the west, along the sun's path.

[65] When an elder, after reciting Her praise poetry, professed to me the conventional piety that She has one breast because that suffices for all, another elder interjected, 'Tell him the truth—it's because she is too stingy that she has only one.' Her parts are half a person's: one eye, ear, nose, arm and leg. (See also Cockin 1879 for an early missionary's report.)

[66] Note that Kalanga, both from the cult's domain and outside it, also approach the Tswapong oracle as supplicants; some Kalanga claim Tswapong ethnic origins.

[67] The fund is conceived of as one whole from the congregation. Neighbours know, at the time, who contributes, since the collections are made or announced at public meetings. But it is taboo to make a permanent record of this public knowledge, by writing down a list of donors and contributions.

[68] A close kinsman of a deceased cult messenger once boasted to me about the debt his kinsman incurred through such embezzlement.*

[69] Another is at a cardinal oracle in the Matopo Hills, which is called Dula (Granary), apparently after the shape of its rock. In the past, during the youth of the oldest living elders, valuables were stored at the senior cardinal oracle, Njelele, including durables such as hoes, and consumer goods, i.e. tobacco, hides, cloth. A ruler or locally important elder was, on occasion, given a hoe from the store.

[70] i.e.: Chichi, Mapokani, Vaka, Mpini, Makwela, Jeshen, Madlambudzi.

[71] i.e.: besides the six shown in detail on Map 4 (including Letsholathebe outside the Tati Reserve), Mpapo, Nkange, Dagwe, Goshwe, Sinete, Mzonga, Matobo, Tonota.

[72] Vumbu was, like his father, a dancer of hosho (the gourd rattle) and a singer of its somewhat satirical ballads. This dance is performed for recreation and ridicule at rituals and also beer parties. It is the dance Mwali prefers to the Gumba-Gumba and pop music on records. See above page 187. Note also that Galani, too, never became possessed or wore a black sash, though she otherwise dressed and danced as a hosana.

[73] From north to south in 1974: Mathamngwane, Tonota, Mmadinare.

[74] This was formed about 1972 under Letsholathebe, Senior Headman in the official grade and a chief in my terms.

[75] I am grateful to Mr. Harry Finnigan for the Botswana Daily News references. In reply to my enquiries and at Mr. Finnigan’s suggestion, the News reporter, Mr. Mishingo Mpaphadzi, kindly wrote for me a further, unpublished account.

[76] Other oracles apparently under Mtonjeni are these two: 1) the oracle sometimes known as Magubu (perhaps a hereditary title) which has been southeast of Fort Usher and under Mtabani then Magubu (Richards 1942: 55; ‘Majuba’, Gelfand 1966: 35f; Maguhu, Daneel 1970: 41) and 2) the oracle at Shangonyima/Jahunda in turn under Tapa, Mike, Kamba (Knothe: 1888; Schwellnus: 1888, Posselt 1927: 530f; Richards, ibid.). The first oracle is the one that figures so largely, indeed too largely, in Ranger’s account (1967: 149); the second has been especially important for Venda in the Transvaal and in the Gwanda District south of the central highlands.

[77] Ranger (1967: 187) misreports that I was ‘told that [a] high priest had been shot at Mangwe in 1896 by a fellow American’. Despite his assertion, it is not so that ‘There can be little doubt that the man killed and called Jobani or Tshobani was the High Priest of Mwari for the southwest, remembered by the Kalanga today under the name Habangana (my italics).’ Kalanga told me that during the war, Armstrong murdered Chief Bango’s messenger, his parallel cousin. Hobani (no connection with Botswana’s Chief Habangana of the same totem, Zebra, but not of the Bango clariy, Zviposa, the priest, continued to perform near Mangwe, clandestinely, even after the war. His oracle was a junior southwestern one. In 1960/61, I observed that Chief Bango sent adepts and a messenger to the cardinal oracle of the priest Maswabi at Dula in Kubutu cave.

[78] Ranger (1967) misses the general accord in the crescent from Chilimanzi south and eastwards and including Gutu, Chibi, Ndanga along with others, because he isolates each instance and treats as exceptional any congregation such as Ndanga’s which opposed the war (see Selous 1896: 238).

[79] The fieldwork on which this paper is based was carried out in 1967–8 and in 1973–4. The earlier part was financed by a Nuffield sociological scholarship; the latter by a grant-in-aid from the University of Malawi. I wish to record my indebtedness to both organisations and to my research assistant Mr. E. C. Mandala.

#title Liberal Islam

#subtitle A Source Book

#author Charles Kurzman

#date 1998

#source Oxford University Press

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-08-10T17:58:17

#topics

#cover c-k-charles-kurzman-liberal-islam-1.jpg

#DELETED temporarily

 [Front Matter]

 [Title Page]

Liberal Islam

A Source Book

Edited by Charles Kurzman

New York • Oxford

Oxford University Press

1998

 [Copyright]

Oxford University Press

Oxford New York

Athens Auckland Bangkok Bogota Buenos Aires Calcutta

Cape Town Chennai Dar es Salaam Delhi Florence Hong Kong Istanbul

Karachi Kuala Lumpur Madrid Melbourne Mexico City Mumbai

Nairobi Paris Sao Paulo Singapore Taipei Tokyo Toronto Warsaw and associated companies in Berlin Ibadan

Copyright © 1998 by Oxford University Press, Inc.

Published by Oxford University Press, Inc.

198 Madison Avenue, New York, New York 10016

Oxford is a registered trademark of Oxford University Press

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of Oxford University Press.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Liberal Islam: a source book/edited by Charles Kurzman.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 0-19-511621-6; ISBN 0-19-511622-4 (pbk.)

1. Islamic renewal. 2. Islam—Essence, genius, nature.

3. Islam—20th century. I. Kurzman, Charles.

BP60.L53 1998

297.2’7—dc21 97–30284

9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Printed in the United States of America on acid-free paper

 Acknowledgments

Chapter 1. ‘Ali ‘Abd al-Raziq. Al-Islam wa usul al-hukm (Arabic: Islam and the Basis of Government). Cairo: publisher unknown, 1925, book 2, part 3. Translated from Arabic by Joseph Massad.

Chapter 2. Muhammad Khalaf-Allah. Al-Qur’ an wa al-dawla (Arabic: The Qur’ an and the State). Cairo: Maktabat al-Anjlu al-Misriya, 1973, pp. 55–79. Translated from Arabic by Joseph Massad. Published with permission.

Chapter 3. Mahumd Taleqani.Majmu’eh-e goftar-e “Pedar Taleqani”(Persian: Collection of Speeches of “Father Taleqani”). Tehran: Mujahedin-e Khalq-e Iran, 1979, pp. 51–53. Translated from Persian by Charles Kurzman.

Chapter 4. Muhammad Sa’id Al-‘Ashmawi. Islam and the Political Order, edited by George F. McLean. Washington, D.C.: Council for Research in Values and Philosophy, 1993, pp. 95–110. First published as Al-Islam al-siyasi (Arabic: Political Islam) in Egypt in 1987. Published with permission.

Chapter 5. Muhammad Natsir. “The Indonesian Revolution: Harmony of Life! Freedom of Religion! Unity of the Nation!” translated by Peter Burns in Revelation and Revolution: Natsir and the Panca Sila (Townsville, Australia: Committee of South-East Asian Studies, James Cook University of North Queensland, Southeast Asian Monograph Series No. 9, 1981), pp. 112–136. First published in Indonesian in 1955. Published with permission.

Chapter 6. S.M. Zafar. ‘Avam, parlimant, Islam (Urdu: The People, Parliament, Islam). Lahore, Pakistan: A’inah-e-Adab, 1980, pp. 304–318. Translated from Urdu by Afroz Taj. Published with permission.

Chapter 7. Mehdi Bazargan. “Din va Azadi” (Persian: Religion and Liberty), in Bazyabi-ye arzesh’ha (Persian: The Recovery of Values). Tehran: Nehzat-e Azadi-ye Iran, 1983, pp. 59–88. Translated by Mahmoud Sadri. Published with permission.

Chapter 8. Dimasangcay A. Pundato. “Making International Politics More Humane” and “Letter to Secretary Manglapus,” in Christian-Muslim Democracy: Wave of the Future. Pasig, Metro-Manila, Philippines: Pandan Bookpress, 1991, pp. 312–321 and 419–420. Published with permission.

Chapter 9. Rachid Ghannouchi. “The Participation of Islamists in a Non-Islamic Government,” translated by Azzam Tamimi, in Azzam Tamimi, editor, Power-Sharing Islam? London: Liberty for Muslim World Publications, 1993, pp. 51–63. Published with permission.

Chapter 10. Sadek J. Sulaiman. “Democracy and Shura,” unpublished manuscript. Arabic original © 1996 Sadek J. Sulaiman. Translation and introduction © 1996 Dale F. Eickelman. Published with permission.

Chapter 11. Nazira Zein-ed-Din. “Unveiling and Veiling: On the Liberation of the Woman and Social Renewal in the Islamic World,” translated by Ali Badran and Margot Badran, in Opening the Gates: A Century of Arab Feminist Writing, edited by Margot Badran and Miriam Cooke (London: Virago Press; Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990), pp. 272–276; and “Removing the Veil and Veiling: Towards Women’s Liberation and Social Reform,” translated by Salah-Dine Hammoud, Women’s Studies International Forum, volume 5, number 2, 1982, pp. 223–226. The original was published as Al-Sufur wa’l-hijab (Arabic: Unveiling and Veiling) in 1928. Published with permission.

Chapter 12. Benazir Bhutto. “Politics and the Muslim Woman.” Cambridge, Mass.: Unpublished audio recording, Rama Mehta Lecture, Radcliffe College Archive, April 11, 1985. Published with permission.

Chapter 13. Fatima Mernissi. The Veil and the Male Elite: A Feminist Interpretation of Women’s Rights in Islam, translated by Mary Jo Lakeland. Reading, Mass.: Addison-Wesley, 1991, pp. 1–4, 49–61, 62, 64, 70–81. First published in French in 1987. © 1991 by Fatima Mernissi. Published with permission of Addison-Wesley and Edite Kroll Literary Agency.

Chapter 14. Amina Wadud-Muhsin. Qur’an and Woman. Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia: Penerbit Fajar Bakti Sdn. Bhd., 1992, pp. 1–10 and 64–74. Published with permission.

Chapter 15. Muhammad Shahrour. “Islam and the 1995 Beijing World Conference on Women.” Unpublished manuscript, an earlier version of which appeared in the Kuwaiti newspaper Al-Siyasa (Politics), September 30, 1995, p. 15. Arabic original © 1996 by Muhammad Shahrour. Translation and introduction © 1996 by Dale F. Eickelman. Published with permission.

Chapter 16. Humayun Kabir. Minorities in a Democracy. Calcutta, India: Firma K.L. Mukhopadhyay, 1968, pp. 9–13, 20–30, 64–70. Published with permission.

Chapter 17. Chandra Muzaffar. “Introduction,” in Universalism of Islam. Penang, Malaysia: Aliran, 1979, pp. 1–11. Published with permission.

Chapter 18. Mohamed Talbi. “Religious Liberty: A Muslim Perspective,” Liberty and Conscience. Aldershot, England: Committee for the Defence of Religious Liberty, Spring 1989, volume 1, number 1, pp. 12–20. Published with permission.

Chapter 19. Ali Bulay. “Medine Vesikasi Hakkinda General Bilgiler” (Turkish: General Information on the Medina Document), Birikim (Turkish: Collection), no. 38, June-July 1992, pp. 102–111, translated from the Turkish by Duygu Koksal; “Bir Arada Yasamanin Mumkun Projesi Medine Vesikasi” (Turkish: The Medina Document: The Possible Project of Cohabitation), Bilgi ve Hikmet (Turkish: Knowledge and Wisdom), Winter 1994–1995, pp. 3–15, translated from the Turkish by Betigul Ercan. Published with permission.

Chapter 20. Rusmir Mahmutcehajic * Living Bosnia, second edition, translated by Spomenka Beus and Francis R. Jones. Ljubljana, Slovenia: OsloboSenja International, 1995, pp. 153–155, 197–205. First published in Bosnian in 1994. Published with permission.

Chapter 21. ‘Ali Shari’ati. “Modern Man and His Prisons,” in Man and Islam, translated by Fatollah Marjani. Houston: Free Islamic Literature, 1981, pp. 46–62. Edited with the assistance of “The Four Prisons of Man,” in Man and Islam, translated by Ghulam M. Fayez. Mashhad, Iran: University of Mashhad Press, 1982, pp. 60–99. First published in Persian around 1969. Published with permission.

Chapter 22. Yusuf Al-Qaradawi. Islamic Awakening between Rejection and Extremism, revised and edited by A.S. Al Shaikh-Ali and Mohamed B.E. Wasfy. Herndon, Va.: American Trust Publications and the International Institute of Islamic Thought, 1991, pp. 21–46. First published in Arabic in 1981. Published with permission.

Chapter 23. Mohamed Arkoun. “Rethinking Islam Today.” Washington, D.C.: Center for Contemporary Arab Studies, Georgetown University, Occasional Papers Series, 1987. Published with permission.

Chapter 24. ‘Abdullahi Ahmed An-Na’im. Toward an Islamic Reformation: Civil Liberties, Human Rights, and International Law. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1990, pp. 161–187. Published with permission.

Chapter 25. Alhaji Adeleke Dirisu Ajijola. Islam, Dialogue, Christianity. Kaduna, Nigeria: Straight Path Publishers, 1992, pp. 85–102. Published with permission.

Chapter 26. Abdul-Karim Soroush. An earlier version of this unpublished paper was delivered as a lecture at the Institute of Islamic Studies, McGill University, April 13, 1995. Published with permission.

Chapter 27. Muhammad Iqbal. The Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1930, pp. 139–170.

Chapter 28. Mahmoud Mohamed Taha. The Second Message of Islam, translated by Abdullahi Ahmed An-Na'im. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1987, pp. 43–47, 130–137, 146–153, 157–161. First published in Arabic in 1967. Published with permission.

Chapter 29. Murcholish Madijid. "The Necessity of Renewing Islamic Thought and the Problem of the Integration of the Ummat" and "Reinvigorating Religious Understanding in the Indonesian Muslim Community," translated by Muhammad Kamal Hassan in Muslim Intellectual Responses to "New Order" Modernization in Indonesia. Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia: Dewan Bahasa dan Pustaka, Kementerian Pelajaran, Malaysia, 1980, pp. 188–198 and 217–233. First published in Indonesian in 1970 and 1972, respectively. Published with permission.

Chapter 30. Mamadiou Dia. Islam et Humanisme (French: Islam and Humanism). Dakar, Senegal: Nouvelles Editions Africaines, 1977, pp. 49, 83–87, 114–124, 139–142. Translated from French by Charles Kurzman. Published with permission.

Chapter 31. Fazlur Rahman. Islam and Modernity. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982, pp. 130–162. Published with permission.

Chapter 32. Shabbir Akhtar. A Faith for All Seasons: Islam and the Challenge of the Modern World. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 1991, pp. 202–214. First published in England by Bellew Publishing Co. in 1990. Published with permission.

 Contents

Introduction 3

Liberal Islam and Its Islamic Context

Charles Kurzman

Part I

Against Theocracy

Message Not Government, Religion Not State AH Abd Al-Raziq

Legislative Authority

Muhammad Khalaf-Allah

Taleqani’s Last Sermon

Mahmud Taleqani

Shari’a: The Codification of Islamic Law

Muhammad Sa’Id Al-‘Ashmawi

Part II

Democracy

The Indonesian Revolution

Muhammad Natsir

Accountability, Parliament, and Ijtihad

S.M. Zafar

Religion and Liberty

Mehdi Bazargan

Christian-Muslim Democracy

Dimasangcay A. Pundato

Participation in Non-Islamic Government

Rachid Ghannouchi

Democracy and Shura

Sadek J. Sulaiman

Part III

Rights of Women

Unveiling and Veiling

Nazira Zein-Ed-Din

Politics and the Muslim Woman

Benazir Bhutto

A Feminist Interpretation of Women’s Rights in Islam

Fatima Mernissi

Qur’an and Woman

Amina Wadud-Muhsin

Islam and the 1995 Beijing World Conference on Women

Muhammad Shahrour

Part IV

Rights of Non-Muslims

Minorities in a Democracy

Humayun Kabir

Universalism in Islam

Chandra Muzaffar

Religious Liberty

Mohamed Talbi

The Medina Document

Ali Bulag

The Downhill Path and Defense, Not Surrender

Rusmir Mahmutcehajic *

Part V

Freedom of Thought

Humanity and Islam

Aii Shari’Ati

Yusuf Al-Qaradawi

Rethinking Islam Today

Mohamed Arkoun

Shari’a and Basic Human Rights Concerns ‘Abchlllchii Ahmed An-Na’Im

The Problem of ‘Ulama’

Alhaji Adeleke Dirisu Ajijola

The Evolution and Devolution of Religious Knowledge

Abdul-Karim Soroush

Part VI

Progress

The Principle of Movement in the Structure of Islam

Muhammad Iqbal

The Second Message of Islam Mahmoud Mohamed Taha

The Necessity of Renewing Islamic Thought and Reinvigorating Religious Understanding

Nurcholish Madjid

Islam and Humanism

Mamadiou Dia

Islam and Modernity

Fazlur Rahman

Islam and the Challenge of the Modern World

Shabbir Akhtar

Glossary

Index of Qur’Anic Citations

Index of Personal Names

 Introduction: Liberal Islam and Its Islamic Context

Charles Kurzman

“Liberal Islam” may sound like a contradiction in terms. For centuries, the West has identified Islam with its most exotic elements. Islamic faith is equated with fanaticism, as in Voltaire’s Mahomet, or Fanaticism (1745).[1] Islamic political authority is equated with despotism, as in Montesquieu’s intentionally redundant phrase “Oriental despotism” or Francis Bacon’s definition (1612): “A monarchy, where there is no nobility at all, is ever a pure and absolute tyranny; as that of the Turks.” Islamic military practices are equated with terror and rape, as in Eugene Delacroix’s famous painting “Massacre at Chios” (1824). Islamic tradition is equated with backwardness and primitiveness, as in Ernest Renan’s inaugural lecture at the College de France (1862), one of the founding documents of modern Orientalism:

<quote>

Islam is the complete negation of Europe ... Islam is the disdain of science, the suppression of civil society; it is the appalling simplicity of the Semitic spirit, restricting the human mind, closing it to all delicate ideas, to all refined sentiment, to all rational research, in order to keep it facing an eternal tautology: God is God.[2]

</quote>

These themes continue today, as Western perceptions of Islam identify the religion with threatening images of theocracy and terrorism. The Iranian revolution of 1979 and the rise of Islamic radicalism from West Africa to Southeast Asia contribute to the impression that a new Cold War is looming.[3] Within the academic world, too, the study of Islam has devoted considerable attention to radical interpretations of the religion, as witnessed in academic works with alarming titles such as Radical Islam, Militant Islam, and Sacred Rage. Indeed, some Muslims agree with Western Orientalists that Islam is timeless and unchanging, that Muslims must interpret the word of God as literally as possible, and that East and West are mutually exclusive and inexorably opposed. A Pakistani Muslim, for example, has written: “Those who think of reforming or modernizing Islam are misguided, and their efforts are bound to fail.... Why should it be modernized, when it is already perfect and pure, universal, and for all time?”[4]

Yet the Orientalist view of Islam should not be mistaken for the whole of Islam. In historical terms, Islam has consisted of countless varied interpretations, among these a tradition that voices concerns parallel to those of Western liberalism. Exponents of this tradition have expressed resentment that their positions “have been generally ignored by Western scholars and members of the media who appear to prefer to highlight the sensationalism of extremist discourse that captures the attention of Western audiences.”[5] Among the concerns of this neglected tradition are opposition to theocracy, support for democracy, guarantees of the rights of women and nonMuslims in Islamic countries, defense of freedom of thought, and belief in the potential for human progress—themes that form the six sections of this volume. Voicing such concerns can be dangerous in some countries, and proponents of this tradition have suffered for their beliefs, as discussed later in this chapter. Others, it should be noted, have benefited from relations with Western counterparts; this book, for instance, may confer a certain legitimacy on the authors who are included.

Just what to call this tradition presents a bit of a problem. I have followed the suggestion of legal scholar Asaf Ali Asghar Fyzee (India, 1899–1981), who wrote: “We need not bother about nomenclature, but if some name has to be given to it, let us call it ‘Liberal Islam.’”[6] I use the term liberal with several caveats: First, the authors in this collection do not necessarily self-identify as liberals. Second, the authors may not espouse all aspects of liberal ideology, even if they subscribe to some. Third, the term “liberal” has negative connotations in parts of the Islamic world, where it is associated with foreign domination, unfettered capitalism, hypocritical paeans to rights, and hostility to Islam. Fourth, the concept of “liberal Islam” should be viewed as only a heuristic device, not a hard-and-fast category. Fifth, I make no claims as to the “correctness” of liberal interpretations of Islam. I am not qualified to engage in such debates; I wish only to describe them.

A small group of Western scholars has begun to examine liberal Islam, in what amounts to a paradigm shift in the academic study of Islam. Building on earlier studies of regional diversity within Islam, the new focus on liberal Islam heralds an increasing recognition of ideological diversity within Islam. Leonard Binder, for instance, discusses a variety of Islamic thinkers whose tenets overlap partially with Western liberalism and the relations that these tenets have with other elements of Islam. Abdallah Laroui examines the changing concept of liberty in Islam, explicitly noting the debate over the origin and application of the term in the Arabic-speaking world. Kevin Dwyer interviewed human-rights activists in North Africa and detailed their struggles with competing visions of progress and the good society.[7] In this book, I intend to contribute to this intellectual project by making the texts of major liberal Islamic thinkers available in English in a single anthology.

In addition, I want here to contribute to the literature on liberal Islam by emphasizing its Islamic context. It is common in analyses of liberal Islam to compare it with Western liberalism, with the implication ofjudgment according to Western standards; such work runs the risk of criticism such as that leveled against one Western author, who has been accused of being "mostly interested in Muslims who, in effect, speak her mind back to her in terms that she finds familiar, and who reassure her of the supremacy of her own Western values."[8] Insofar as the study of liberal Islam focuses on its Islamic dimension, however, I believe it escapes such criticism. The similarity of liberal Islam and Western liberalism does not imply that liberal Muslims are stale and reassuring imitators of Western philosophy. Many of their writings are firmly rooted in Qur'anic exegesis, in the lives of the Prophet Muhammad and the early Muslims, and in traditional Islamic forms of debate.

The next section traces the development of liberal Islam and its ongoing debate with two other major traditions, customary and revivalist Islam. It then identifies three modes of liberal Islam in terms of their readings of basic Islamic sources. The last section explains the selection criteria for the authors and themes included in this volume and introduces each of them briefly in terms of the three modes of liberal Islam.

 The History of a Debate

Virtually every region of the Islamic world has witnessed parallel debates over the past two centuries between three traditions of socioreligious interpretation. These traditions overlap and intertwine and should not be considered mutually exclusive or internally homogeneous, but as heuristic devices the three labels provide significant insight into the recent history of Islamic discourse. The first tradition may be called customary Islam, characterized by the combination of regional practices and those that are shared throughout the Islamic world. In Morocco, the customary tradition includes reverence for saintly figures that some Muslims feel have no basis in Islamic scripture; in Indonesia, the customary tradition includes ritual displays of spirituality and power that express regional cultural traditions.[9] We might also mention drumming in West African Islam and other musical traditions throughout the Islamic world, belief in spirits among Kurdish and other Muslims, celebration of the pre-Islamic New Year and other holy dates in Iran and elsewhere, caste-like social hierarchies in South Asian Islam, belief in persons and objects with magical powers, and so on. With no apparent ill ease, local custom may even contravene injunctions that are commonly acknowledged as pillars of Islamic faith, as in Southeast Asia, where “in some localities pilgrimage to sacred stones is regarded as an acceptable substitute for the haj”—the pilgrimage to Mecca—which “is regarded as an Arabian trick to hoodwink the Faithful.”[10] The customary tradition represents the great majority of Muslims in most places and times. Yet the customary tradition is not a unitary phenomenon, since each region of the Islamic world has forged its own version of customary practice. Thus the customary tradition tends to be justified in local terms, not global ones: identity (this is the way “we” do things), prudence (it can’t hurt to propitiate the powerful, be they spirits or spirit-infused humans), and linkages to the past (loyalty to one’s teacher, one’s teacher’s teacher, and so on).[11]

The second tradition, and the most common alternative to customary Islam, is revivalist Islam, also known variously as Islamism, fundamentalism, or Wahhabism. This tradition attacks the customary interpretation as being insufficiently attentive to the letter of Islamic doctrine. Against local deviations, the revivalist tradition urges a renewed emphasis on the Arabic language (the language of revelation), the illegitimacy of local political institutions (as usurpers of God’s sovereignty), the authority of the revivalists as the sole qualified interpretators of Islam, sometimes drastic expressions of personal piety, and the revival of practices from the early period of Islam. Muhammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab’s revivalist movement in eighteenth-century Arabia—the prototype for all such movements since—was aimed precisely at ridding the Islamic heartland of the customary tradition, the un-Islamic practices that had returned to the region in the millennium after Islam was revealed. A more recent example is Tayyib ‘Uqbi of Algeria (died 1960), who attacked customary Islam as heresy: “I have never performed the circumambulation [of a saint’s shrine] ... nor propitiatory sacrifices.... I do not invoke the dead.... Invoke whom you will, I shall never surrender to your idolatry.”[12]

Many analyses of Islamic debates stop with these two traditions, the customary and the revivalist, and ignore a third major tradition that is the focus of this volume. Liberal Islam, like revivalist Islam, defines itself in contrast to the customary tradition and calls upon the precedent of the early period of Islam in order to delegitimate present-day practices. Yet liberal Islam calls upon the past in the name of modernity, while revivalists might be said to call upon modernity (for example, electronic technologies) in the name of the past. There are various versions of Islamic liberalism (several modes are discussed here later), but one common element is the critique of both the customary and revivalist traditions for what liberals sometimes term “backwardness,” which in their view has prevented the Islamic world from enjoying the fruits of modernity: economic progress, democracy, legal rights, and so on. Instead, the liberal tradition argues that Islam, properly understood, is compatible with—or even a precursor to—Western liberalism.

These three interpretations of Islam have battled virtually continuously throughout the Islamic world for more than a century, with revivalism making occasionally significant inroads into the customary tradition and liberalism making somewhat less of a mark. Indeed, liberal Islam has more often been victim than victor.

Liberal Islam emerged out of the revivalist movements of the eighteenth century, a fertile period for Islamic debate.[13] Politically, the great Muslim dynasties of the Mediterranean basin (the Ottoman Empire), Southwest Asia

(the Safavid dynasty), and South Asia (the Mughul dynasty) were in various stages of collapse. Evangelically, Islam was continuing to win converts to the west, in West Africa, and the east, in Southeast Asia. Theologically, scholarly migration throughout the Islamic world accelerated, creating an international community of religious scholars who had either studied at the great centers of learning in Arabia or apprenticed under someone who had.

These scholars launched a series of revivalist movements that sought to rid Islam of un-Islamic practices not sanctioned by orthodox sources. The solution, according to the revivalists, was to replace the customary tradition with theologically sound Islamic teaching—namely, the teaching of revivalist religious scholars, who essentially argued that the authority of custom be replaced by the authority of the original sources of Islam, as interpreted by the revivalists.

This international community of revivalist scholars had its intellectual center in the great schools of Arabia, where Muslims from all lands visited as pilgrims or lived as students and then returned to their homes inspired to do battle with un-Islamic customary practices: Muhammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab from the Nejd region of Arabia, Shaykh Jibril ibn ‘Umar al-Aqdisi from West Africa, Haji Miskin from Sumatra, Hajji Shari’at Allah and Ahmad Brelwi from South Asia, and Ma Mingxin from China.[14]

Liberal Islam has its roots in this revivalist context, in the person of Shah Wali-Allah (India, 1703–1762). Born in the last years of the Mughul dynasty, Wali-Allah inherited his father’s position as head of a religious seminary. To complete his education, he traveled to Mecca, the holy site and seminary center in Arabia. On his return, he began to espouse a form of revivalism heralded by later liberals as the intellectual forebear of liberal Islam. Like other revivalists, Wali-Allah perceived Islam to be in danger, sought to revitalize the Islamic community through a combination of theological renovation and sociopolitical organization, and viewed the customary tradition as a major source of Islam’s problems.

Wali-Allah, however, developed a considerably more humanistic response to the customary tradition than did the Wahhabis and other revivalists. He was, for example, relatively tolerant of certain practices that other revivalists considered beyond the pale, arguing that Islamic law—while divinely inspired—must be adapted for the needs of different peoples and eras. If local custom is not in accordance with orthodox Islamic prescriptions, “it is not considered desirable to replace it by a different one [Islamic law] which is absolutely unknown to them [the local people].... The basic purpose is that these reforms should be introduced in such a way that [the local people’s] faculty of reasoning is satisfied and does not repel them.”[15] The importance of human reasoning was a recurrent emphasis in Wali-Allah’s work and a major precedent for later liberal Muslim thinkers, as in this Wali-Allah quotation translated by a twentieth-century liberal: “Time has come that the religious law of Islam should be brought into the open fully dressed in reason and argument.”[16] Fazlur Rahman (Pakistan-United States, 1919–1988), a liberal whose work is excerpted in chapter 32, summarized Wali-Allah’s approach as follows:

<quote>

So far as the Law is concerned, Waliy-Ullah did not stop at the medieval Muslim Schools of law but went back to its original sources, the Quran and the Apostolic Tradition and recommended ijtihad—exercise of independent judgment as opposed to the imitative following of medieval authorities.... The fundamental religious and moral fountains of mankind are the same in all times and climes, he holds, but have to adjust themselves to and re-express themselves in terms of the genius of a particular age and of a particular people.... Islam, being a universal religion, had to find a vehicle of flesh and blood whereby to propagate itself and was bound to be coloured by that vehicle—the Arab tradition and way of life. But in different cultures, this vehicle will obviously undergo a change.[17]

</quote>

Yet Wali-Allah was in many ways a revivalist. Despite his comments about dealing reasonably with local un-Islamic customs, he was highly intolerant of practices that he felt were equivalent to apostasy, such as visiting the tombs of great men to pray for intercession. Despite his comments about the age of reason—contemporaneous but apparently unconnected with European enlightenment sentiment—Wali-Allah did not place any great stock in “modern” forms of knowledge and deemed traditional Islamic scholarship to be sufficient to meet the demands of the contemporary world: “If I had been convinced that the good of this age depended upon the free circulation of Mathematics, Astronomy, Architecture, Technology and Engineering, I would have devoted my energies to their spread.”[18] Instead of these novel forms of education, Wali-Allah emphasized traditional Islamic training and held that only graduates of this training were competent to practice ijtihad. On occasion, Wali-Allah appeared to suggest that only he was competent to practice ijtihad and that all other Muslims must practice taqlid (imitation) and follow his teachings. In statements that come close to messianism, Wali-Allah wrote that God appeared to him in a dream and appointed him leader of the world and reviver of Islam.[19]

An analogous development occurred in Shi’i Islam, with Aqa Muhammad Baqir Bihbihani (Iran, 1705–1790) playing a role similar to that of Wali-Allah. Bihbihani also was born into a leading clerical family and trained in traditional modes. He, too, converted to a position, later known as the Usuli school, that emphasized ijtihad. Also like Wali-Allah, Bihbihani combined the conservative concept of taqlid and the potentially liberal concept of ijtihad by restricting the practice of ijtihad to competent religious scholars. This view evolved in the nineteenth century into the position that each era must obey a single religious scholar as the marja’-i taqlid, or source of imitation, though this concept involves no hint of divine inspiration, as in Wali-Allah’s work.[20]

Only in the nineteenth century, however, did liberal Islam begin to distinguish itself more clearly from revivalism, and it did so both intellectually and institutionally. On the intellectual plane, first, liberals began to separate ijtihadfrom taqlid, reason from authority. Most of the major figures of nineteenth century liberal Islam echoed these themes:

<quote>

Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (born in Iran, 1838–1897): “In their beliefs they [the members of each community] must shun submission to conjectures and not be content with mere taqlid of their ancestors. For if man believes in things without proof or reason, makes a practice of following unproven opinions, and is satisfied to imitate and follow his ancestors, his mind inevitably desists from intellectual movement, and little by little stupidity and imbecility overcome him—until his mind becomes completely idle and he becomes unable to perceive his own good and evil; and adversity and misfortune overtake him from all sides.[21]

Sayyid Ahmad Khan (India, 1817–1898) and Sayyid Mahdi Ali Khan (India, 1837–1907): “Taqlid is not incumbent [on the believer]. Every person is entitled to ijtihad in those matters concerning which there is no explicitly revealed text in Qur’an and sunna [the practice of the Prophet].”[22]

Muhammad ‘Abduh (Egypt, 1849–1905): “First, to liberate thought from the shackles of taqlid ... to return, in the acquisition of religious knowledge, to its first sources, and to weigh them in the scales of human reason, which God has created in order to prevent excess or adulteration in religion ... and to prove that, seen in this light, religion must be accounted a friend to science, pushing man to investigate the secrets of existence....”[23]

</quote>

Taqlid became anathema to liberals of the early twentieth century, as it symbolized the popular influence of the liberals’ traditionalist opponents. Jamal al-Din al-Qasimi (Ottoman Syria, 1866–1914), for example, called taqlid “a leprosy which has spread widely among the people ... an infectious disease, a general paralysis, a stupefying lunacy plunging man into apathy and indolence.”[24] Ijtihad, by contrast, allowed Islam to be interpreted in accordance with the perceived needs of the modern age. Nonetheless, considerable disagreement existed as to what these needs might be: whether to resist European rule or acquiesce, whether to reform traditional schools or establish new ones, whether to relax or restore religious practices. Liberals of this period criticized one another almost as enthusiastically as they criticized customary and revivalist Islam.

The expansion of the right to practice ijtihad directly threatened the authority of both revivalist and customary Islamic leaders, in that it urged all Muslims to study Islam for themselves and, in effect, to be their own authority. However, few if any nineteenth-century liberals drew from this the twentieth-century conclusion that the opinions of the people should dictate public affairs. Instead, the liberals sought to impose themselves as tutelary authorities, and their primary means of activism was in the field of educational reform. Though many liberals of this period were themselves the product of traditional religious educations, they deemed these institutions insufficient to meet the needs of the day and sought to reform them or to create new institutions combining traditional and modern approaches. Sayyid Ahmad Khan, for example, founded the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College in Aligarh, India; ‘Abduh attempted to reform the ancient al-Azhar University in Cairo, Egypt; al-Afghani was involved in the early years of Istanbul University in the Ottoman Empire. In addition, we may cite:

- Rifa’a Rafi’ al-Tahtawi (Egypt, 1801–1873), trained at al-Azhar in Cairo, who lived for several years in Paris as religious instructor to a group of Egyptian students; on his return to Egypt, he sought to develop a new educational system that incorporated both Islamic and European elements.

- Shihab al-Din Maijani (Russia, 1818–1889) and Ahmad Makhdum Danesh (Bukhara, 1827–1897), both trained in traditional schools at Bukhara, who worked to reform the curriculum in this seminary city by introducing secular subjects.

- Ismail Bey Gasprinskii (Russia, 1851–1914), trained in Islamic primary and Russian secondary schools, who founded a large network of modern (jadid) schools throughout Russia that combined secular and religious education.

- Shaykh Muhammad Tahir Jalaluddin (Sumatra-Malaysia, 1867–1957), Kiyai Haji Ahmad Dahlan (Java-Indonesia, 1869–1923), and Ahmad Surkati (Sudan-Indonesia, 1872–1943), all of whom studied at al-Azhar or in Mecca and later helped to found reformist schools in Southeast Asia.

- Wang Haoran (China, 1848–1918), influenced by al-Azhar and pan-Islamic sentiments centered at Istanbul, who founded reformist schools and Islamic organizations in China.

The distinguishing feature of these new reforms was their introduction of Western subjects into the traditional curriculum, a practice that reflected the liberals' second intellectual contribution: respect for "modernity." While revivalists sought to cure the ills of the Muslim world by refocusing on the seventh-century sources of the Islamic faith, liberals sought to combine this refocus with an additional focus on Western disciplines such as engineering and military science, medicine and natural science, comparative legal studies and social science, and modern languages. For this reason, liberal Islam of the period is generally known by the rubric of "Islamic modernism."

These educational institutions that the liberals reformed or founded, spawning further liberal graduates, formed the first of three institutional bases for liberal Islam. By the early twentieth century, liberals were in charge of al-Azhar in Egypt, the leading schools of the Ottoman Empire, the system ofjadid (new) schools in the Muslim regions of Russia, the Aligarh and other leading Islamic universities in South Asia, and the Muhammadiya school system in Indonesia.

The second institutional base, somewhat shakier, was journalism. As literacy increased, Islamic liberals made active use of this new medium to communicate with their followers. Indeed, the names of many leading liberals of the era are associated with periodicals: Namik Kemal's Tasvir-i Efkar (Herald of Ideas) and Hurriyet (Liberty) in Ottoman Turkish, 1865–1870; Sayyid Ahmad Khan's Tahzib al-Akhlaq (Refinement of Morals) in Urdu, 1870–1896; Gasprinskii's Tercuman/Perevodchik (The Interpreter) in Tatar

Turkish and Russian, 1883–1914; al-Afghani and ‘Abduh’s al-‘Urwa al-Wuthqa (The Strongest Link) in Arabic, 1884; Mirza Malkom Khan’s Qanun (The Law) in Persian, 1890–1898; Muhammad Rashid Rida’s al-Manar (The Lighthouse) in Arabic, 1898–1935; Jalaluddin’s al-Imam (The Leader) in Malay, 1906–1908; Rizaeddin Fakhreddin’s Shura (Consultation) in Tatar Turkish, 1908–1917; Mahmud Tarzi’s Siraj al-Akhbar (The Lamp of the News) in Afghani Persian, 1911–1918; Abdullah Ahmad’s Al Munir El Manar (Light of the Victors) in Indonesian, 1911–1916; Abu’l-Kalam Azad’s al-Hilal (The Crescent) in Urdu, 1912–1914; Mahmud Khoja Behbudiy’s Ayina (The Mirror) in Uzbek Turkish, 1913–1916; and others. Some of these periodicals were short-lived, and some had to be published in Europe because of political pressure in Islamic countries. Still, these journals had a tremendous reach and influence among educated Muslims: for example, Ahmad Faris al-Shidyaq’s al-Jawa’ib (Rumors), published in Constantinople, was read “in all countries of the Arabic speech” in the 1870s, according to a British observer, and was even found “in the Nejd [Arabian] merchants’ houses at Bombay”; Rashid Rida’s al-Manar “was widely read in the Islamic world and was a major factor in shaping Muslim thought from North Africa to Southeast Asia”; Gasprinskii’s Tercuman was influential in China.[25]

A third institutional base was an international network of intellectuals centered primarily on Muhammad ‘Abduh and his disciples in Cairo. Not only were ‘Abduh’s books and his followers’ newspapers, in particular al-Manar, read throughout the Islamic world—Cairo also became a central site for liberals to visit and study, just as Mecca and Medina had been for revivalists a century earlier. Diverse figures such as Jalaluddin, Dahlan, Syekh Ahmad Khatib (Sumatra, 1855–1916) Abdullah Ahmad (Sumatra, died 1933), and Sayid Syekh al-Hadi (Malaya, 1867–1934) from Southeast Asia, Sayyid Ahmad bin Sumayt (Comoros-Zanzibar, 1861–1925), Muhammad Kurd ‘Ali (Syria, 1876–1952), Abu Shu’ayb al-Dukkali (Morocco, 1878–1937), Abd al-‘Aziz al-Tha’alibi (Tunisia, 1879–1944), Ha Decheng (China, 1888–1943), and Abu’l-Kalam Azad (India, 1888–1958) returned from Cairo to spread the liberal message in their own regions. A secondary center for this international network was Istanbul, capital of the Ottoman Empire, whose influential students included Gasprinskii from Crimea, Mehmed Dzemaludin * Causevic* (Bosnia, died 1937), ‘Abd al-Qadir al-Maghribi (Ottoman Syria, 1867–1956), Numan Chelebi Jihan (Russia, 1885–1918), and Abdal Rauf Fitrat (Bukhara, 1886–1938). A few scholars, such as Musa Yarullah Bigi (Russia, 1874–1949), trained at both Cairo and Istanbul. Numerous others maintained contact with these centers through correspondence, meetings abroad, and the traffic in publications.

Liberals reached the apogee of their power in the first two decades of the twentieth century. During the nineteenth century, liberal reforms had begun at the behest of modernizing monarchs (Mehmet ‘Ali in Egypt, Mahmud II in the Ottoman Empire, Ahmad Bey in Tunisia) more interested in military and administrative efficiency than in liberalism or Islam; they had continued under prime ministers (Amir Kabir in Persia, Mithat Pasa* in the Ottoman Empire, Khayr al-Din in Tunisia) who introduced liberal educational or political reforms but lasted only several years in office. By contrast, the early twentieth century saw liberal Islam rise to significant political influence in its own right. In colonized regions, Muslim communities came to be represented by liberal organizations such as Ittifaq al-Muslimin (Russia), the Muhammadiya (Dutch Indonesia), and the Aligarh establishment (British India). In still-independent lands, liberals gained state power through constitutional revolutions in Iran (1906) and the Ottoman Empire (1908). Unlike the reforms of the previous century, granted from the top down, these revolutions were foisted upon reluctant monarchs. Among the key supporters of the Persian constitutional movement were Sayyid Muhammad Tabataba’i (Iran, 1843–1921), Sayyid ‘Abdullah Behbehani (Iran, 1846–1910), and other religious scholars who participated in the revolutionary mobilization and played large roles in the parliamentary government that followed.[26] The Young Turks in the Ottoman Empire made considerable use of liberal clerics such as the Sheyh-ul-Islam, the leader of the clerical establishment in the empire, who told a British interviewer: “Our [Islamic] law, rightly interpreted, is in accordance with the principles of representative government.... [The Ottoman Constitution] becomes binding upon those who profess Islam. Especially those who are called to lead, our ‘ulama’, are bound to help actively in carrying out the Constitution.”[27] Liberal religious scholars were not the sole movers in these democratic experiments, and many of the leading figures had to be pressured into maintaining a consistently pro-democratic line by activists among their followers.

Nonetheless, state sponsorship gave the liberals a tremendous advantage over their theological opponents.

This advantageous position proved to be temporary. The new democracies in Iran and the Ottoman Empire succumbed to the combined onslaught of revivalist Islam and secular military might. In the Ottoman Empire, a revivalist organization incited a mutiny in the capital, calling for the implementation of the shari'a, Islamic law, in place of the constitution. In response, the largely secular armed forces marched on the capital and suppressed both the liberal parliament and its clerical allies. In Iran, revivalists politicked actively against the constitution and parliament and supported the coups d'etat of 1908 and 1911.

Elsewhere, revivalists sought to cast liberals as apostates, as in this statement by a Russian Muslim leader: "Whoever believes in God and Muhammad must be an enemy of the modernists. For them the shari'a demands the death penalty."[28] Such accusations were inevitable, as the liberals' attempt to learn about and from the West exposed them to charges of inauthenticity and betrayal of their own cultural tradition. "The modernist aroused suspicion even about his loyalty to Islam, and he was accused of being a pale reflection of the West and of sacrificing Islam at its altar," according to Rahman.[29] Indeed, this is the image of modernist Islam that appears to have stuck.[30] Many later liberal Muslims have accordingly distanced themselves from liberals of the modernist period. "The tragedy," according to 'Ali Shari'ati (Iran, 1933–1977), "is that, on the one hand, those who have controlled our religion over the past two centuries have transformed it into its present static form and, on the other hand, our enlightened people who understand the present age and the needs of our generation and time, do not understand religion...."[31] Few of the liberal authors in this volume cite 'Abduh and his contemporaries approvingly.

While some liberals of this era were no doubt guilty of these charges, adopting the Orientalist perspective and calling Islam backwards and unsalvageable—"There is no second civilization; civilization means European civilization," according to one Ottoman reformer[32]—most liberals of the modernist period were far more protective of Islamic faith and culture than they are generally given credit for. For most of them, the goal was not to displace Islam but to rejuvenate it.

Indeed, it is ironic that liberal Islam was accused of secularism, since secularism was largely responsible for undermining it. Beginning in the 1920s, educated Muslims who might otherwise have subscribed to liberal Islam now turned in large numbers to secular ideologies such as nationalism and socialism. Widespread secularization undermined liberalism in a second way by creating a sense of crisis within Islam that favored revivalists: “Faith rather than explanation or formulation of Faith, intuitive certainty rather than discursive thought-content becomes the cry of the hour.”[33] For example, ‘Ali ‘Abd al-Raziq (Egypt, 1888–1966; chapter 1) was fired from his position at al-Azhar in 1925 for arguing that Islam leaves the form of government to human invention. This liberal position might not have been considered beyond the pale several years earlier, prior to the abolition of the seventh-century-old Ottoman caliphate by Turkish secularists. Al-Azhar had become more conservative; even ‘Abduh’s disciple Rashid Rida condemned ‘Abd al-Raziq. Western observers contended that liberal Islam had become stagnant.[34]

Still, liberal Islamic thinkers helped to found or shape a number of anticolonial movements in the 1920s and 1930s: ‘Abd al-Hamid Ibn Badis’s Association of Algerian Religious Scholars, Muhammad Iqbal’s All-India Muslim League, Muhammad ‘Allal al-Fasi’s Istiqlal party in Morocco, and ‘Abd al-‘Aziz al-Tha’alibi’s Destour party in Tunisia. In addition, the decolonization of Islamic countries renewed debates over Islamic governance, for example, in India, Indonesia, Nigeria, and Pakistan, debates in which liberals participated. However, liberal Islam was largely overtaken by other ideological trends during the middle part of the twentieth century.

Since the 1970s, however, liberal Islam has enjoyed a renewed popularity. The timing is perhaps unexpected, since it is precisely the period when Islamic revivalism has also gained adherents. The two traditions have clashed on numerous occasions, usually in intellectual debate but sometimes violently.

Liberals of diverse ideologies are disproportionately the victims of such violence, among them:

- Mahmoud Mohamed Taha (Sudan, circa 1910–1985), who opposed the revivalist Sudanese government's interpretation of shari'a law, was executed for alleged apostasy in 1985.

- Subhi al-Salih (Lebanon, died 1986), a former vice-mufti of Lebanon, who argued for "opening of all gates of ijtihad" and banning taqlid, was assassinated by Shi'i gunmen in 1986.

- Farag Fuda (Egypt, 1945–1992), a liberal politician and columnist who criticized Islamic extremism, was assassinated in 1992.

- Maulvi Farook (India, 1945–1990) and Qazi Nissar Ahmed (India, 1948–1994), both Muslim religious scholars and proponents of rights for Muslims in the Kashmir region of India, were killed in 1990 and 1994, respectively, for opposing the violent tactics of Islamic separatists in the region. Yassin Malik, another critic of violence, was attacked several times in 1994 but survived.

- Mohammad Sa'id (Algeria, circa 1947–1995) and Abderrazak Redjam (Algeria, circa 1957–1995), both prominent activists in the Islamist movement in Algeria, were executed along with several dozen followers by a militant Islamist faction in 1995 after they had publicly objected to the faction's violent methods.

On a less violent scale, a number of the authors included in this volume have been subjected to confrontations that go beyond intellectual debate. Muhammad Khalaf-Allah (Egypt, born 1916; chapter 2) was urged not just to burn all the copies of his work but also to reaffirm his faith in Islam and renew his marriage vows; Mehdi Bazargan (Iran, 1907–1995; chapter 7) was hounded out of the prime ministership and then out of parliament in Iran; Muhammad Shahrour (Syria, born 1938; chapter 15) saw his work banned in several Middle Eastern countries; Abdul-Karim Soroush (Iran, born 1945; chapter 26) has been barred from speaking publicly in Iran and publicly threatened with assassination.

Some liberals are understandably depressed about their unpromising position in contemporary Islamic debates. Indeed, Hassan Hanafi (Egypt, born 1935) has placed this pessimism at the heart of his analysis of Islamic history, arguing that nonliberal interpretations of Arab-Islamic heritage have become so firmly entrenched that Arabs have lost the ability to debate and learn.[35] One scholar concludes that with the rise of Islamic revivalism since the 1970s, “the time for Muslim liberalism has certainly passed.”[36] Another scholar suggests that liberal Islam faces an “impossible life”: “In one Moslem society after another, to write of liberalism ... is to write obituaries of men who took on impossible odds, and then failed.”[37]

At the same time, however, there are indications that pessimism may be premature. On the intellectual plane, liberal Islamic thinkers are building a more self-confident liberalism that apologizes neither for its liberalism nor for its Islamic essence. The contemporary generation is far more familiar with Western society and education than were previous generations. Many of the authors in this volume received postgraduate degrees in Europe and North America; unlike nineteenth-century liberals who called for the implementation of Western disciplines that they themselves were ill-trained in, their late-twentieth-century descendants approach “modern” themes from a position of strength. ‘Abdullahi Ahmed An-Na’im (Sudan-United States, born 1946), Mohamed Arkoun (Algeria-France, born 1928), and Rahman, for example, have been certified by faculty positions at elite Western universities. At the same time, contemporary liberals are more confident than their ancestors in asserting the need for Islamic contributions to modern problems. In part because their familiarity with the West allows them to critique it more confidently, in part because of the renewed self-respect that militant revivalist Islam has generated, contemporary liberals are able to argue that the West is suffering from a spiritual crisis—any number of Western sources can be cited in support—that Islam may help to cure. By contrast, liberal Muslims of a century ago were considerably less critical of the West.

A further source of optimism for liberal Islam is the rising level of education in the Muslim world. Literacy allows Muslims to read the Qur'an and other Islamic sources for themselves, rather than rely on religious scholars, and as traditional religious schools have lost their monopoly on education over the past century, an increasing number of Muslims have applied their nonreligious education to develop novel approaches to Islam. Recall the large percentage of nineteenth-century liberals who were trained traditionally; by contrast, many of the authors in this volume are the products of secular educations: Bazargan and Shahrour were trained as engineers, Arkoun and Rachid Ghannouchi (Tunisia, born 1941) as philosophers, Chandra Muzaffar (Malaysia, born 1947) and Shari'ati as social scientists, and so on. In addition to providing the theorists for liberalism, expanding systems of education are providing an audience as well. For example, Shahrour's first book was a bestseller in North Africa, though it had to be copied clandestinely; Shari'ati's work is especially popular among university students; Soroush is frequently discussed by Iranians on the Internet.

A final cause for optimism is the emergence of an organizational infrastructure for liberal Islam. Multidenominational organizations have emerged in Malaysia (Aliran), the Philippines (Christian-Muslim Democracy), Senegal (Yewwu Yewwi), and elsewhere with the aim of fostering peaceful co-existence among religious communities and combating intolerance, Islamic and otherwise. In addition, a number of research institutes have been founded to support research, publications, translations (including several in this volume), and conferences. One of the earliest such organizations was the Islamic Research Institute in Pakistan, which Rahman ran until revivalists forced his resignation in the 1960s. Also in the early 1960s, Bazargan, Mahmud Taleqani (Iran, 1911–1979), and other liberals established the Freedom Movement of Iran, which urged liberal reforms on both Islamic institutions and secular ones. Many similar organizations are located in the West: the International Institute of Islamic Thought in Herndon, Virginia; the Institute for Research and Islamic Studies in Houston, Texas; the World and Islam Studies Enterprise in Tampa, Florida; the Liberty for Muslim World human-rights organization in London, England; and the Ibn Khaldun Society in London and Washington, D.C., among others.[38] These organizations' activities appear to be aimed both at Westerners, by showing the non-"fanatical" face of Islam, and at Muslims, in the attempt to disseminate liberal perspectives within the Islamic world. As such, they represent the first real effort since the late nineteenth century to generate an international scholarly movement of liberal Islam.

 Modes of Liberal Islam

Liberal Islam operates in two intellectual contexts: one Islamic and one Western-oriented. The authors in this volume place different emphases on each, yet all can be analyzed in terms of either context, as Islamic liberals (a subset of liberalism) or as liberal Muslims (a subset of Islam). Much of the academic literature on these authors takes the first approach: Just how liberal are Islamic liberals? Do Islamic variants of liberalism meet Western standards of liberalism? Leonard Binder's erudite analysis of Islamic Liberalism largely takes this approach, weighing elements of the thought of leading Egyptian writers against Western traditions. I wish to take the opposite tack: to examine liberal Muslims in light of Islamic tradition.

This context is the one that most liberal Muslims themselves appear to favor, even those such as Mamadiou Dia (Senegal, born 1911; chapter 30), whose work deals more with French Christian theology than with Islamic theologians. Dia and other liberals seem to be highly sensitive to charges of cultural inauthenticity and view their work as a renewal of, not an escape from, long-standing debates within Islam. Dia writes: "Islamic authenticity requires a return to the sources, that is, to the Qur'an and to the [sunna], not to take shelter there, to drown current cares there, but to draw from thence elements for the renovation and revitalization of Islamic philosophy."

Taking these Islamic debates as the context, we may identify three principal "modes" of liberal Islam. These involve the relationship of liberalism to the primary sources of Islam: the divinely revealed book (Qur'an) and the divinely inspired practice of the Prophet Muhammad (.sunna), which together constitute the basis for Islamic law (shari'a).

The first mode takes liberal positions as being explicitly sanctioned by the shari’a; the second mode argues that Muslims are free to adopt liberal positions on subjects that the shari’a leaves open to human ingenuity; the third mode suggests that the shari’a, while divinely inspired, is subject to multiple human interpretations. I call these modes liberal, silent, and interpreted. Examples are taken from the authors in this volume and from other liberal Islamic thinkers whose works could not be included in this volume for lack of space, but whose ideas and reputations deserve to be more widely recognized.

* The Liberal Shari’a

The first mode holds that the shari’a is itself liberal, if interpreted properly. For instance, Ali Bulay (Turkey, born 1951), one of the leading liberal Islamists in Turkey, argues in previously untranslated articles (chapter 19) that the Medina Document—by which the Prophet Muhammad granted rights to non-Muslims living under Muslim rule—presents a model of how the shari’a solves contemporary problems in a liberal manner. Abdur Rahman I. Doi (India-Nigeria, born 1933) argues that the Qur’an is the world’s first constitution and that European Christians discovered constitutionalism only centuries later. Maurice Bucaille (France, born 1920) argues that the Qur’an prefigures methods of scientific inquiry that secular scientists took centuries longer to understand. Shafique Ali Khan (Pakistan, born 1936) and Abdelkebir Alaoui M’Daghri (Morocco, born 1942) argue that the shari’a establishes freedom of thought.[39]

The “liberal shari’a” mode of liberal Islam is undoubtedly the most influential form of liberal Islam. I propose three explanations. First, it avoids the charge of inauthenticity by grounding liberal positions solidly in orthodox Islamic sources. Second, it suggests that liberal positions are not merely human choices but divine commands (leading to the anomalous position, which Western liberalism suffers from as well, ofjustifying liberalism by reference to illiberalism, such as “God-given” rights).[40] Third, it appeals to pride of discovery: To argue that liberal Islam predates Western liberalism is a powerful rhetorical strategy among peoples who have too often internalized Western images of inferiority and backwardness.

Yet this mode of liberal Islamic discourse is most susceptible to theoretical counterattacks on orthodox theological grounds. The “liberal shari’a” must be argued on the home turf, as it were, of orthodoxy: the detailed analysis of the meaning of the Qur’an, the sifting of reliable chains of oral transmission of the traditions of the Prophet, the very sort of research for which orthodox scholars are extensively trained. Bulay and Bazargan, by contrast, are basically autodidacts venturing into textual analysis for which others are better prepared. I do not mean to judge this work but rather to point out that it is a difficult intellectual venture. By contrast, the other two modes of liberal Islam strategically shift the field of debate away from these orthodox strongholds.

* The Silent Shari’a

The second mode of liberal Islamic argumentation holds that the shari’a is silent on certain topics. Legal scholar Muhammad Salim Al-‘Awwa (Egypt, contemporary) summarizes this approach as follows:

<quote>

If Islam does not “mention” something, this indicates one of two things: either that it is not stated anywhere in the traditional sources or that Muslims have never practiced it thoughout their history. In the first case, the non-mentioning of something implies that it is permitted. The only exception to this rule is the subject of worship.... In the second case ... [i]t is only natural that Muslims should respond to changes and developments at all times and in all circumstances.[41]

</quote>

‘Abd al-Raziq (chapter 1), the controversial Egyptian scholar, helped to pioneer this trope in the 1920s by arguing that the shari’a does not specify the form that the state should take, thus allowing the establishment of liberal democracies. As Islamic scholar Muhammad Sa’id Al-‘Ashmawi (Egypt, born 1932) notes in chapter 4: “Of some 6000 Qur’anic verses, only 200 have a legal aspect, that is, approximately one-thirtieth of the Qur’an, including the verses which were abrogated by subsequent ones.” He and others have concluded, therefore, that the Qur’an does not dictate the adoption of any particular form of government:

<quote>

[T]he shari ‘a of God, as embodied in Qur’an and sunna, does not bind mankind in mu’amalat (worldly dealings) except by providing a few broad principles of guidance and a limited number of injunctions. The shari ‘a only rarely concerns itself with details. The confinement of the shari ‘a to broad principles and its silence in other spheres are due to divine wisdom and mercy.... The fact that the shari ‘a is silent on these points —and we should bear in mind that, as the Qur’an remarks, “God is not forgetful”—means only that the application of the general injunctions of the shari ‘a to the multifarious details of human life, and the confrontation of new problems according to the dictates of maslaha (public good) have been left to the discretion of the body of conscious Muslims.[42]

</quote>

<quote>

There is nothing in the Islamic shari ‘a that compels one to bind religion to a state-setting. The shari ‘a does not deal with any specific form of government.[43]

</quote>

<quote>

The Qur’an came to ask them [the Muslims] to cease directing queries to the Prophet, peace be upon him, that required revelation.... Leaving these matters to the people causes the people to develop and grow, and permits change.[44]

</quote>

The “silent shari’a” relies on Qur’anic exegesis to make its central point. However, its burden of proof is somewhat lower than the “liberal shari’a’s” in that it needs only to show positive injunctions for human decision-making abilities in the abstract, rather than for specific liberal practices. It thus removes entire arenas of human action from the field of Qur’anic scholarship, where orthodox training has a distinct advantage, and places them in the field of public debate.

The weakness of the “silent shari’a” mode of liberalism is its connotation—which liberals of this mode would no doubt deny—that God’s revelation is incomplete. It is vulnerable to the counterargument that God’s message encompasses all aspects of human life and that religion and politics are not separate in Islam. ‘Abd al-Raziq has been critiqued sharply from this perspective, in the 1920s and since, even by liberals of the “liberal shari’a” mode such as Rashid Rida and Muhammad Dia’ al-Din al-Rayyis (Egypt, mid-twentieth century).[45]

On occasion “silent shari’a” arguments appear to warrant the charge of hostility toward Islamic revelation, as in the case of the socialist organization called the Muslim Committee for a Progressive Nigeria, which opposed the implementation of shari’a law in the 1970s on the grounds that it offered “no positive answer for such chronic problems such as starvation, unemployment, rotten cities, high rents, failures of U.P.E. [Universal Primary Education], disease control, etc.”[46] Yet other liberal authors of this mode take care to phrase the silence of the shari’a in positive terms, speaking of God’s “wisdom and mercy,” as in the quotation from Sa’id Ramadan (Egypt, mid-twentieth century), in leaving certain matters to human deliberation.

A further weakness of the “silent shari’a” mode of liberalism is that it leaves little room to challenge illiberal elements that are not silent in the shari’a. The Qur’an speaks on a number of occasions, for example, of the propriety of slave owning, the ransoming of prisoners of war, and the maiming of criminals; if these practices are explicitly sanctioned by divine revelation, liberals of the “silent shari’a” mode can object only that the Qur’anic message is limited in its application. Shah Wali-Allah, for example, argued that Islam, while universal and timeless, takes on the form of the particular people and age to whom it was first revealed. By implication, certain of the commands and regulations contained in the shari’a may be tailored to seventh-century Arabia and not intended to bind all peoples and times. A number of authors in this volume make a similar argument with regard to specific topics, such as the status of women. Taha (chapter 28), by contrast, makes this argument in its boldest form, arguing that large sections of the Qur’an were intended for temporary use only (what Taha calls the First Message of Islam), until the Muslim community was prepared to receive the ultimate truths of Islam (what Taha calls the Second Message), which grant far more human choice and autonomy. According to Taha, the permanent injunctions were revealed first, when the Prophet Muhammad lived in Mecca, before he took temporal power; the temporary injunctions were revealed later, when the Prophet Muhammad ruled the city of Medina, and applied to the needs of the era. Taha argues that the earlier revelation abrogates the later (in contrast to “liberal shari’a” authors such as Bulay who argue that the later experience at Medina abrogates the earlier).

This theoretical position is a difficult one. First, it makes the challenging argument that the shari’a is silent even on topics it appears to speak clearly about. Second, it gets drawn back into the home ground of orthodox scholarship, namely, textual analysis of classic sources. Third, it limits portions of revelation in a way that some scholars find heretical. Taha himself was executed by Sudanese authorities, in part on these grounds, in 1985.

* The Interpreted Shari’a

The third mode of liberal Islamic argumentation, and the one closest to Western liberal sensibilities, holds that the shari’a is mediated by human interpretation. In this view, the shari’a is divine, but human interpretations are conflicting and fallible. This trope is the most vulnerable to accusations of relativism, but liberals such as Muhammad Asad (Leopold Weiss, Austria-Pakistan, born 1900) draw on sources within the shari’a such as the saying of the Prophet Muhammad: “The differences of opinion among the learned within my community are [a sign of] God's grace."[47] According to another saying of the Prophet: "The Qur'an is malleable, capable of many types of interpretation. Interpret it, therefore, according to the best possible type."[48] Muhammad Bahr al-'Ulum (Iraq, born 1927), a Shi'i religious scholar and prominent supporter of the Iraqi democracy movement, cites two verses from the Qur'an in this regard: "The right to differ in ideas, positions, and methods is acknowledged so that one does not deprive others of their convictions. 'Had your Lord pleased, He would have made mankind a single nation.' (Sura 11, Verse 118) 'There was a time when men were one nation. They disagreed among themselves....' (Sura 10, Verse 19)."[49]

Other liberals argue on empirical grounds that interpretative diversity is one of the hallmarks of the Islamic tradition. Arkoun has stated categorically: "ideological deviation occurs within the framework of Islamic thought each time that an author, echoing more or less faithfully a school, a community, or a tradition, transforms Qur'anic discourse from an open into a closed cognitive system."[50] Rafik Zakaria (India, born 1920) concludes, "As we have noticed in the course of our survey, on none of the basic issues involving religion and politics, was there at any time consensus among the 'ulama' [religious scholars]."[51] Ziauddin Sardar (Pakistan-England, born 1951) argues that Islamic epistemology has long emphasized "diversity of ways of knowing" that "are equally valid in Islam."[52] Soroush (chapter 26) argues that religious interpretation, Islamic and otherwise, is always a human phenomenon and subject to multiple perspectives: "Revealed religion, of course, is divine, but not so for the science of religion, which is a thoroughly human production and construction. It is human in the sense that it is imprinted by virtually all characteristics of human beings, both noble and mean."

A third basis for the "interpreted shari'a" is normative: that disagreement in interpretation is useful for the community of Muslims. For example, Islamic scholar Yusuf Al-Qaradawi (Egypt-Qatar, born 1926) justifies diversity of opinion in practical terms:

<quote>

My worst fear for the Islamic Movement is that it opposes the free thinkers among its children and closes the door to renewal and ijtihad, confining itself to only one type of thinking that does not accept any other viewpoints.... The end result will be for the Movement to lose the creative minds among its ranks and eventually fall prey to stagnation. ...[53]

</quote>

Along parallel lines, Sa'id Binsa'id (Morocco, contemporary) has argued that proper understanding of religious truths requires dialogue; radicals who coerce their opponents into silence can only "worship God in ignorance."[54] 'Abdelfatah Mourou (Tunisia, contemporary), a leading Islamist who protested the movement's growing intolerance, wished to found a more liberal Islamic party in order to garner wider support: "When we enter the political arena, I won't say that those on my side go to heaven and those who oppose me will go to hell. Everything I suggest will be open to debate."[55] 'Abbasi Madani (Algeria, born 1931), considered one of the more liberal leaders of the Algerian Islamic movement, has spoken in favor of democracy in similarly pragmatic terms:

<quote>

Pluralism is a guarantee of cultural wealth, and diversity is needed for development. We are Muslims, but we are not Islam itself.... We do not monopolize religion. Democracy as we understand it means pluralism, choice, and freedom.[56]

</quote>

Fahmi Huwaydi (Egypt, born 1937) argues that democracy is so crucial to the development of the Islamic world that if democracy is not already sanctioned in Islam, "We ought to 'invent' it by any means possible."[57]

One of the recurrent themes in this mode of liberal Islam is that human interpretations should not be raised to the same plane as divine revelation, since human interpretations are fallible and open to debate. Yet, ironically, the "interpreted shari'a" may be vulnerable to accusations that it reduces revelation to the level of fallible human interpretation. These liberals stand accused of the very confusion that they criticize.

For example, M’Daghri, a Moroccan cabinet minister and proponent of the “liberal shari’a,” pauses in his defense of freedom of thought in Islam to attack Fatima Mernissi (Morocco, born 1940), whose analysis of debates over women’s rights in the early days of Islam is excerpted in this volume (chapter 13). Mernissi’s work— he does not mention the author or title by name—“describes the Qur’an as being obscure and contradictory, claiming that there were two movements in strife with each other around the question of women’s rights.... The whole book is nothing more than sheer, doubtful questioning of the legitimacy of the Qur’an and the hadith [traditions of the Prophet], and a series of groundless misgivings levelled to the Prophet’s august companions.”[58] Mernissi argues on historical grounds that interpretations of revelation may be contested; her critic takes her to be contesting revelation itself, an act that is not covered by the “liberal shari’a’s” protections for freedom of thought. Mohammad Charfi (Tunisia, born 1946), a human-rights activist, has expressed concerns about such counterattacks:

You know, here in Tunisia, we are very attached to the notion of interpretation or ijtihad. ... And logically, in order to guarantee the freedom of ijtihad, you have to, in effect, suppress punishment for apostasy. Why? Because if you suggest an ijtihad that goes against establishment thinking, and if your right to express and argue for your right to express and argue for your ijtihad isn’t guaranteed, you may be accused of apostasy, of no longer following Islam.[59]

This fear of being accused of apostasy applies to all forms of liberal Islam— indeed, it hangs over all Islamic thought that is not impeccably orthodox— but is especially potent in the case of the “interpreted shari’a,” given the sensitive nature of its challenge to orthodox scholars. Whereas the “liberal shari’a” mode leaps into the fray of orthodox scholarship and the “silent shari’a” mode tries to carve out areas where orthodox scholarship does not have the final say, the “interpreted shari’a” mode denies that orthodox scholarship ever has the final say. It takes the 1,400-year history of scholarly debate and wields it against the scholars engaging in the debate. Every theoretical advance is taken as evidence of interpretive variation; every great mind is presented as a reframer of divine revelation. Short of renouncing their own history, orthodox scholars can only respond to the “interpreted shari’a” by casting it out of the bounds of permissible debate. [60]

 Selection of Authors and Themes

The authors in this volume were selected according to the criteria that they be:

- “liberal” in some sense of the word (in particular, those who express opposition to Islamic revivalism)

- “Islamic” in some sense of the word (those who believe that Islam has an important role in the contemporary world, as opposed to secularists)

- widely read in their own countries, if not also beyond national boundaries

- geographically representative of the entire Islamic world

- ideologically representative of the variety of liberal Islam

- temporally representative of the post-caliphate era (1920s to the present) but with special emphasis on the contemporary period

The resulting roster includes 32 authors from 19 countries: 18 from Asia, including 8 from the Middle East, 6 from South Asia, and 4 from Southeast Asia; 12 from Africa, including 8 from North Africa and 4 from sub-Saharan Africa; and 1 each from Europe and North America. Five of the authors are Shi'i, the rest Sunni. Twelve of the selections were first written in the 1990s, 8 in the 1980s, 6 in the 1970s, 3 in the 1960s, 1 in the 1950s, 1 in the 1930s, and 2 in the 1920s (the chapters are arranged in chronological order within each section). Three have never been published; 8 have not been published in English; 9 were published in English but not in Britain or North America; 5 were published in Britain or North America by small research institutes and have not received widespread distribution. The introductions are my work, except where specified.

In order to maintain consistency among the selections, spelling and grammar have been standardized according to U.S. usage, even in selections previously published in English. The name of God has also been translated into English throughout. Transliteration follows the standard Arabic system except that: All diacriticals are omitted save 'cyn and hamza; non-Arabic words are transliterated according to common practice in the country of origin; authors' preferences for transliteration of their names are respected, where these preferences are known; and words common in English are spelled according to English usage. All dates are given in the Christian calendar, also known as the Common Era, except where specified. Quotations from the Qur'an have been translated with the assistance of Al-Qur'an: A Contemporary Translation, translated by Ahmed Ali, revised definitive edition (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1988). The editor's annotations are set off with brackets; these annotations have been generated primarily through consultation with John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World, 4 volumes (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995); and E. van Donzel, Islamic Desk Reference, Compiled from the Encyclopedia ofIslam (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1994). Annotation is omitted where information has not proved to be available.

The pieces have been divided into six sections according to liberal theme:

* Against Theocracy

Liberal Muslims object to the implementation of the shari’a on several grounds. The traditional argument, pioneered by ‘Ali ‘Abd al-Raziq (chapter 1) and echoed by Khalaf-Allah (chapter 2), applies the “silent shari’a” mode: divine revelation has left the form of government for human construction. The Prophet Muhammad was the leader of the polity, as well as the leader of the faith, but did not establish principles for successor governments. As expressed at the recent founding meeting of the Ibn Khaldun Society: “Since the Qur’an emphasizes a just society rather than an ideological state, the form the state takes is not mandated.... [Muslims] should regard the Qur’an as a moral edifice rather than a code of laws. Thus, the new Muslim state will, in effect, be a secular state, with the proviso that the term ‘secular state’ should not be understood in a negative sense. Such a state can protect religion against political manipulation by state authorities....”[61]

A further objection to theocracy focuses on the corrupting influence that political power necessarily has on those who rule in the name of God. Taleqani (chapter 3), a leader of the Iranian revolution, expressed his misgivings about the emerging theocracy in Iran in the last sermon before his death in 1979, criticizing “police restrictions imposed upon the people sometimes in the name of religion, which is the most frightening of all.” Similarly, Matori Abdul Djalil (Indonesia, contemporary), former secretary-general of the United Development Party, an Islamic coalition, has stated: “Whenever man acts as the agent of God, then there will be no democracy and theocracy will corrupt. If one group of people say they get legitimacy to govern from God, then they will use God as an instrument against others. And this is fundamentally undemocratic.”[62]

Another objection argues that the demand for shari’a law distracts Muslims from pressing issues. ‘Abd al-Hamid Ibn Badis of Algeria (1889–1940), founder of the Association of Algerian Religious Scholars, argued during the controversy surrounding the abolition of the Ottoman caliphate in the 1920s that certain European powers—in particular, the British—wished to restore the caliphate for their own purposes. He warned against revivalists who offered Islamic cover for these plots: “Islamic nation today, stop being vain and deceived and enslaved by these scare-tactics, even if they do emanate from under cloaks and turbans [clerical garb]!”[63]

Fuad Zakariyya (Egypt, born 1927), a philosophy professor, put it this way in the 1980s:

<quote>

The important element of [the revivalists'] rosy dream is that the application of the shari'a will automatically evaporate all the problems from which we suffer. How? No one knows. Most seem to believe deep in their hearts that divine providence will guard us in the application of the shari'a. Afterwards, the forces of heaven will intervene to solve our problems without anyone making any effort.[64]

</quote>

A final objection suggests that those who call for the implementation of shari'alaw fundamentally misunderstand the status of shari'a. Al-'Ashmawi (chapter 4) notes that the Qur'an refers to shari'a as a path, not as a ready-made system of law, waiting to be put in practice. Aziz Al-Azmeh (Syria-England, born 1947) argues that revivalists reduce Islamic law to a handful of symbolic elements, such as bans on alcohol and usury, that are taken to represent the rule of Islam. Yet recasting these elements of faith as law transforms them into modern ideology, a shift that removes the context that provided their original justification.[65]

* For Democracy

The second theme, democracy, is largely argued in the "liberal shari'a" mode, with special emphasis laid on the concept of shura, or consultation, which is taken to allow or require the expression of the popular will in matters of state. (Let us keep in mind that democracy need not be limited to the specific institutional forms that it has taken in the United States or elsewhere.[66]) Bazargan (chapter 7) and Sadek J. Sulaiman (Oman, born 1933; chapter 10) are this volume's primary proponents of shura -as-democracy. Bazargan's son 'Abdul 'Ali Bazargan (Iran, born 1941)—a leading member of his father's opposition group, the Liberation Movement of Iran—has also written extensively on this topic, detailing the precedents for shura in the shari’a and arguing that “an Islamic government without shura is not different from a dictatorship.”[67] Similarly, Hassan al-Alkim (United Arab Emirates, born 1958) argues that shura does not mean merely consultation but the legislative power of representative bodies: “Islam emphasizes that the people have the right to control their president and to advise him as well as to criticize him.”[68] Ebrahim Yazdi (Iran, born 1931), Bazargan’s successor as leader of the Freedom Movement of Iran, finds an alternative justification for democracy in the Islamic assertion of faith (shahada), “There is no deity but God.” According to Yazdi, this belief demands:

<quote>

the renunciation of the sovereignty claims and lordship of any one man, or group of men, over other human beings. It is [God’s] design and command that man must be his own master and be free to govern himself. Man must not permit anyone to manipulate his will and life. Man must not tolerate despotism and dictatorship.[69]

</quote>

Muhammad bin al-‘Arbi al-‘Alawi (Morocco, 1880–1964) argued on analogous lines in 1962, “The right that the rulers have given themselves to formulate a constitution and to appropriate for themselves means to make it pass by forcing the people to vote for it are in flagrant contradiction with the principles of Islam and are contrary to the national interest.”[70]

Other authors, such as Al-‘Awwa of Egypt (quoted previously), adopt the “silent shari’a” mode in support of political pluralism. Indeed, Al-‘Awwa dismisses the “liberal shari’a” approach explicitly, arguing that shura by itself is vague and provides insufficient justification for democratic practices. In the early period of Islam, he writes, “Islam at that time had only prescribed shura (consultation) as a method for making the choice. What matters is that the umma (community) should be able to exercise its free will in choosing and appointing the ruler.... The actual procedure is left for the community to determine, and may therefore differ from time to time and from one place to another."[71] S.M. Zafar (Pakistan, born 1930; chapter 6) adopts a similar stance, arguing that systems of government accountability must be adapted to meet the needs of different communities; parliamentary rule, he writes, is simply the most effective means of ensuring accountability in the contemporary era.

A further approach to democracy is a pragmatic version of the "silent shari'a," as exemplified by Muhammad Natsir (Indonesia, 1908–1993; chapter 5), Dimasangcay A. Pundato (Philippines, born 1947; chapter 8), and Ghannouchi (chapter 9). All cite Qur'anic precedent, but their primary argument is the need for democracy in particular national conditions. For Natsir, these conditions are the creation of the Republic of Indonesia out of the highly diverse islands of the Dutch East Indies. Natsir, a nationalist, defends the new democracy as an expression of the characteristics of the Indonesian people. Pundato sees democratic coalitions with Christians as the best way to safeguard the rights of the Muslim minority in the Philippine islands. Ghannouchi speaks to the condition of Muslims living under nonMuslim rule (including secular government by Muslims), arguing that participating in a non- Muslim democracy is better for these Muslims than suffering under a nondemocracy.

A final approach to democracy involves the "interpreted shari'a" mode. For example, Zaki Ahmad (Egypt, contemporary) identifies four traditions of pluralism within Islam: the practice of the early generations of Islam, centuries of scholarly debates over Islamic jurisprudence, prescriptions in favor of freedom within the shari'a, and pragmatic appeals for peaceful coexistence among diverse peoples.[72] On a more theoretical plane, Muhammad Asad, an Austrian convert to Islam, justifies democratic procedures through the fallibility of human interpretation, along with a reference to the "liberal shari'a" principle of shura:

<quote>

Nevertheless, it is difficult to see what alternative there could be, within a legislative body, to the principle of majority decisions? Who is to establish, from case to case, whether the majority or the minority is right? Whose opinion shall prevail? One might, of course, suggest that the final verdict should rest with the amir [ruler]; but quite apart from the fact that the granting of such absolute power to any one person militates against the principle of amruhum shura a baynaham [whose affairs are conducted according to shura— Qur’an, Sura 42, Verse 38] so strongly insisted upon by the Law of Islam—is it not equally possible that the amir is mistaken, while the view of the majority is right? Is there any Divine guarantee attached to his views?[73]

</quote>

* Rights of Women

Liberal Islamic positions on the rights of women—unlike those on democracy—have to contend with a number of statements in the Qur’an and the sunna that appear to run in direct contradiction. For example, verses of the Qur’an discuss male polygamy, men’s unilateral right to divorce, men’s greater rights of inheritance, and the greater weight of male legal testimony. Traditions of the Prophet discuss veiling, gender segregation, and women’s unsuitability for leadership of a Muslim community. Liberal scholars have challenged these statements in several ways. First, they reexamine the statements and find them less hostile to women’s rights than previously supposed. Benazir Bhutto (Pakistan, born 1953; chapter 12) and Amina Wadud-Muhsin (United States, born 1952; chapter 14) pursue this strategy with extended discussions of Qur’anic verses that are often interpreted to justify male domination over women. This approach attributes women’s exploitation in Islam to prerevelation and postrevelation social customs, not to the message of Islam. Interestingly, some revivalists have adopted similar arguments, most famously Hasan Turabi (Sudan, born 1932), whose widely read 1973 pamphlet on women and Islam states baldly that the seclusion of women and restriction of their rights is a result of customary misreadings of the shari’a:

<quote>

A revolution against the condition of women in the traditional Muslim societies is inevitable. The Islamists are urged by their own ideals to reform the traditional society and to close the gap between the fallen historical reality and the desired model of ideal Islam. This is even more urgent with respect to the present state of women.[74]

</quote>

Sometimes combined with this is the separate argument that antiwomen statements refer to the conditions of seventh-century Arabia and are not necessarily applicable to other times and places. These verses are then weighed against more liberal portions of the shari’a, which, it is argued, enjoy greater authenticity. Nazira Zein-ed- Din (Lebanon, born circa 1905; chapter 11) takes up this argument, suggesting that God’s revelation permitted the continuation of pre-Islamic Arab customs such as polygamy and slavery only in order to ease the Arabs’ transition to Islam, and that the Prophet Muhammad died before he could fully eradicate these customs, as Islam intended. Another example comes from Isa Wali (Nigeria, 1929–1967), a government clerk and Islamic scholar whose 1956 articles on women in Islam “provoked a wide-ranging debate throughout northern Nigeria.”[75] Wali begins with the standard argument that the shari’a’s position on women has been historically misunderstood or ignored, to the detriment of women:

<quote>

In order to get a clear picture [of the position of women in Islam] one must start by drawing a clear distinction between custom and religion. People so often confuse the two, that in so many cases custom is even trying to gain an upper hand over the religion.

</quote>

He goes on to suggest, however, that certain parts of the shari’a are in keeping with oppressive customs, such as male polygamy. These injunctions, Wali argues, were only intended to be temporary:

<quote>

In a small community, as the Muslim Arabs were then, denuded of its manpower by incessant wars, there was bound to be a surplus of a large number of women who must be protected and supported. Unless these women were legally wedded and got economic support and social esteem, they were bound to become a disgrace and danger to society. Under such circumstances, therefore, a legalized restricted polygamy became a social necessity.... It was never meant to be a permanent feature in the society. It was never meant to be an ideal married life. It was allowed in strictly emergency cases as an expediency, rather than as a principle. And, in the absence of such causes now, in the twentieth century, there is no justification for it.[76]

</quote>

A further approach, a version of the “silent shari’a,” accepts the seemingly antiwomen statements but argues that they do not prohibit women from organizing to protect their rights. For example, feminists in the Islamic Republic of Iran have succeeded in passing legislation requiring couples to sign a prenuptial agreement granting women divorce rights equal to men. Asghar Ali Engineer (India, born 1940) has criticized Islamic leaders who cling to illiberal elements of the shari’a in the name of communal survival:

<quote>

Islam allows ijtihad (creative interpretation). However in the the Indian subcontinent taqlid (unthinking imitation) has reigned supreme and there have been very few instances of ijtihad. It is high time that Indian Muslims used the provision of ijtihad in secular India.... While it may not be possible to scrap Muslim personal law altogether, the Muslims should adopt a resilient and creative attitude towards it. They should accept certain necessary changes in it, such as abolishing triple divorce in one sitting [the male right to divorce his wife by saying “I divorce you” three times].[77]

</quote>

A final approach to discomfiting statements about women in the shari’a involves the multiplicity of interpretations to which these statements are subject. Rather than replace an incorrect interpretation with a more faithful one, this approach suggests that all interpretation is human and fallible. Shahrour (chapter 15), for example, argues that “jurisprudential ruling bears the historical stamp of the era in which it was created and the society in which it was shaped.” Mernissi (chapter 13) writes in this “interpreted shari’a” mode that the Companions of the Prophet—revered in Islamic scholarship as the source of testimony about the statements and actions of the Prophet—disagreed about basic facets of religious injunctions with regard to women. Indeed, she quotes one Companion as being hesitant to relate testimony out of fear of misspeaking:

<quote>

If I wanted to, I could recite traditions about the Prophet for two days without stopping. What keeps me from doing it is that I have seen some of the Companions of the Messenger of God who heard exactly what I myself heard, who saw what I saw, and those men recounted hadith. Those traditions are not exactly what we heard. And I am afraid of hallucinating, as they hallucinate. [78]

</quote>

 The Rights of Non-Muslims

The issue of interreligious relations arose in the first years of Islam in the context of Muslim conquest of non-Muslims. The shari’a granted non-Muslims, especially the “peoples of the book” (Jews and Christians), the right to continue practicing their own religions, so long as they granted allegiance and paid tribute to their Muslim rulers. Bulay (chapter 19) takes this system as a model for humane treatment of non-Muslims in the contemporary world.

Yet other authors argue—the “silent shari’a”—that Muslims are presented with circumstances somewhat different from those in which the shari’a was established. According to Syed Vahiduddin (India, born 1909), the late twentieth century is a period:

<quote>

when Muslims are tempted to take an extremely static view of religion. Their preoccupation with issues which are not of capital importance has made them uncompromising not only in inter-religious dialogue but also in inter-Islamic dialogue.... In a pluralistic and multi-religious society one cannot do better than to ponder on the Qur’anic vision of human conflicts:

To every one of you we have appointed a right way and open path. If Allah had willed, He would have made you one community but that He may try you in what befalls you. So push forward in good works; unto Allah shall you move back all together and He will let you know of that whereon you are at variance. (Sura 5, Verse 48)[79]

</quote>

The “silent shari’a” approach seems particularly conducive in countries where Muslims live under non-Muslim rule. Humayun Kabir (India, 1906–1969; chapter 16) and Pundato (chapter 8) represent liberal responses to such situations in India and the Philipines, both men standing in opposition to Islamic separatist movements. Muzaffar (chapter 17) and Rusmir Mahmutcehajic * (chapter 20) speak to a somewhat different situation: in Malaysia and Bosnia-Herzegovina, a slim Muslim majority rules but with far less power over non-Muslim communities than the Prophet and early Muslims enjoyed. Interestingly, these authors do not appeal to early Islamic precedent, preferring to construct arguments around more general Islamic themes of tolerance and diversity. Similarly, in Lebanon, Indonesia, and Egypt, where sizeable minorities are non-Muslim, Sobhi Rajab Mahmassani (Lebanon, born 1911) has argued that discrimination based on religion is impossible in an Islamic system; Abdurrahman Wahid (Indonesia, born 1940), leader of the largest religious organization in Indonesia and founder of that country’s Forum for Democracy, has stressed that “an Islamic society in Indonesia is treason against the Constitution because it will make non-Muslims second-class citizens”; and Tariq al-Bishri (Egypt, born 1933) has urged that Christian Copts be included with Muslims as integral partners in Egyptian nationalism.[80]

Mohamed Talbi (Tunisia, born 1921; chapter 18) approaches the topic of interreligious relations in the abstract, arguing in all three modes: He cites positive injunctions towards good treatment of non-Muslims (the “liberal shari’a”)’; he argues that the general injunction of tolerance allows the construction of intercommunal dialogue, regardless of past precedent (the “silent shari’a”)’; and he challenges intolerant elements of the shari’a, specifically on the penalty for apostasy, as potentially dubious (the “interpreted shari’a”). Like Muzaffar, Pundato, and others, Talbi has translated his liberal positions into political action, joining with liberals from other faiths in ecumenical dialogue and calling for a reduction of religious tensions.

* Freedom of Thought

This heading covers the topic of intellectual disagreement, which is at the heart of liberal Islam. Indeed, freedom of thought is logically prior to other liberal tenets, since liberals must defend freedom of thought in order to justify their expression of other positions. Generally discussed under the rubric of ijtihad (considered earlier in this introduction), freedom of thought involves the stretching of two boundaries: who may speak and what may be spoken. The question of “who may speak”—that is, who may legitimately practice ijtihad—is of crucial importance for liberals without orthodox religious educations. Shahrour (chapter 15), for example, trained in engineering, proposes that his method of analyzing the Qur’an is “scientific,” an attempt to undermine the implicitly unscientific methods of traditional scholars. It is fortunate for liberal Islamic scholars that a number of prominent revivalists also lack orthodox educational credentials and often argue themselves that such credentials are not required for the practice of ijtihad. Naturally, the holders of such credentials are likely to disagree. As for what may be spoken, this boundary is too fluid to begin to define.

The “liberal shari’a” approach to the freedom of thought argues that God has made humans to be thinkers and that the shari’a encourages Muslims to investigate and reflect. “This word ‘freedom’ is the word that God chose for the blessed ones in paradise,” wrote Aminu Kano (Nigeria, born 1920).[81] ‘Ali Shari’ati (chapter 21) is a particularly influential exponent of this position, combining these views with vehement criticism of religious scholars who would monopolize the interpretation of Islam. Al-Qaradawi (chapter 22) cites specific injunctions on the toleration of opposing views, especially views on religious obligations, and criticizes extremists who would foist their interpretation of religious obligations upon all Muslims. Along similar lines, Abdelwahab El-Affendi (Sudan, born 1955) opposes revivalist movements that deprive Muslims of the “freedom to sin,” thereby depriving them also of “the freedom to be virtuous”: “This was certainly not God’s purpose when He created man and woman and endowed each with free will.”[82] Ghulam Ahmad Parwez (India-Pakistan, born 1903) has argued that the Qur’an’s protection of individual freedom is so strong that it overrides all forms of authority: “No person has the right to compel any other person to obey his orders: ‘It is not [possible] for any human being unto whom God has given the Scripture and wisdom and prophethood that he should afterward have said unto mankind: Be slaves of me instead of God.’ (Sura 3, Verse 79)”[83]

The “silent shari’a” approach argues on pragmatic grounds that freedom of thought is useful for the intellectual advancement of the Muslim world and is therefore permissible according to general injunctions in favor of the well-being of the community of believers. Alhaji Adeleke Dirisu Ajijola (Nigeria, born 1932; chapter 25) offers one example of this form of reasoning. Another example comes from Haji Andi Mappetahang Fatwa (Indonesia, born 1939), who defended himself in a 1985 sham trial along these general lines:

<quote>

Under the blessing of freedom, people must be given protection in developing the activities of investigation and consequent contemplation. Society must be given the liberty to think and to hold opinions. Such is the society envisioned by a democracy.[84]

</quote>

Laith Kubba (Iraq-England, born 1954), director of the International Forum for Islamic Dialogue in London, offers a similar argument:

<quote>

As Muslims devise strategies for economic growth in a competitive world and redefine their priorities, their outlook will shift from the abstract concepts and values of Islam to the realities of the Muslim world. They will continue to turn to Islam as a source of personal and communal identity and moral guidance, but they will also critically assess the legacy handed down by previous generations who may have narrowed Islam in ways that had less to do with the essence of the faith than with historical accidents and parochial circumstances.[85]

</quote>

Kubba's argument also broaches the "interpreted shari'a" mode, with the suggestion that religious interpretations may be the product of particular historical conditions. According to Husain Ahmad Amin (Egypt, born 1932), Muslim jurists of the early centuries of Islam went so far as to "invent hadiths [traditions of the Prophet] that would incorporate their opinions and could cope with current developments, and then attribute them to the Prophet."[86] The "sociologization" of religious interpretation forms the heart of Arkoun's deconstructionist-linguistic approach (chapter 23) and Soroush's sociology-of-knowledge approach (chapter 26). What distinguishes these authors from nonbelievers' approaches to Islamic interpretation is their firm belief in Islam and in the need for a reinterpretation of tenets more in keeping with contemporary social conditions.

Arkoun has also written on the topic of human rights, which forms a distinct subcategory within the theme of individual freedoms. Arkoun begins by discussing the Universal Islamic Declaration of Human Rights, prepared in 1980 by the Islamic Council for Europe in response to the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a document that lies firmly in what we are calling the "liberal shari'a"mode. The declaration is entirely grounded in statements from the shari’a and argues that “Islam gave humanity an ideal code of human rights 1400 years ago.” Arkoun calls this approach “mimetic overbidding; it picks up the enunciations of Western declarations and confers upon them an Islamic origin.” Arkoun prefers to ground an Islamic approach to human rights in the social and political conditions of the Islamic world—the actual practices of Muslims, rulers and ruled, that provide precedent for human rights—but is not entirely sanguine about the prospects for this project in the near term.[87]

By contrast, An-Na’im (chapter 24) is somewhat more optimistic. A human-rights activist as well as a scholar, he, too, argues in the “interpreted shari’a” mode that the historical context of the early Muslim jurists shaped their interpretation of public law. He appears to feel that present conditions allow an alternative, “enlightened” construction of the principle of reciprocity—the granting of rights to others in return for their granting of rights to you—which he sees as the basis for a nonethnocentric conception of universal human rights.

* Progress

The final category in this book refers to authors who view modernity and change as potentially positive developments. This attitude reflects a significant departure from traditional views in Islam, which view contemporary history as decline and continuous departure from the revered early days of revelation. Progress in this view can mean only a recovery of past practices, and, indeed, much revivalist activism has adopted the rubric of “renewal,” “renaissance,” and “return to first principles.” Nonetheless, few revivalists actually desire a full-fledged return to the world of seventh-century Arabia. Imam Ruhollah Khomeini of Iran, for example, was himself an inveterate radio listener and used modern technologies such as telephones, audiocassettes, photocopying, and British shortwave radio broadcasts to promulgate his revivalist message. After the revolution, Khomeini allowed the appearance of women on radio and television, chess playing, and certain forms of music. When other religious leaders objected, he responded: “I feel it necessary to express my despair about your understanding of the divine injunctions and that of the [Shi’i] traditions.... The way you interpret the traditions, the new civilization should be destroyed and the people should live in shackles or live forever in the desert."[88]

Liberal Muslims, like the revivalists, seek to ground their interpretation of Islam in a return to original sources. What distinguishes liberal Islam from revivalist Islam, in terms of progress, is the willingness to see change as a good thing in itself. Khomeini and other revivalists are pleased to borrow modern technologies from nonMuslims, but only as a means to the end of reviving the pure practice of Islam, as they interpret it. Liberals, by contrast, consider change itself—though not all forms of change, of course—part of proper Islamic practice.

The most influential liberal Muslim of the twentieth century, Muhammad Iqbal (India, 1877–1938; chapter 27), placed "the principle of movement" at the heart of his theology. Iqbal works in all three modes of liberal Islam: the "interpreted shari'a" (Islamic legal systems "are after all individual interpretations, and as such cannot claim any finality"); the "silent shari'a" (the Qur'an is "far from leaving no scope for human thought and legislation"); and, his primary mode, the "liberal shari'a," whereby he argues that the essence of Islam, properly understood, is evolutionary change. Similarly, Mohammad Akram Khan (Bengal, India, 1868–1968) has suggested, "What is Islam is not stationary, what is stagnant is not Islam. Islam welcomes all creative innovations. Islam never lacked nor ever will lack in providing solutions to any problem in the world, because its gate of ijtihad remains open at all times."[89]

Taha (chapter 28) also writes in the "liberal shari'a" mode, though he uses the term shari'a to refer to one part of the teaching of Islam, the "first message of Islam," as he calls it, which was intended for the people of seventh-century Arabia. Taha argues that, beyond this first message, Islam contains an evolutionary directive that urges Muslims to aspire to a higher plane of religious consciousness, in keeping with the "second message of Islam." Muslims of the late twentieth century, Taha suggests, are ready to move into this higher phase.

The “silent shari’a” approach has tended to be less heterodox. Both Nurcholish Madjid (Indonesia, born 1939; chapter 29) and Shabbir Akhtar (Pakistan-England, born 1960; chapter 32) argue that the blanket rejection of modernity and historical change has ossified Islamic thought, stifled the religion’s ability to speak to “modern” Muslims, and sacrificed the positive potentialities of modernity. Similarly, al-Sadiq al-Mahdi (Sudan, born 1935) makes “the case for social change”: Because Islam prescribes “no particular system” of government, economics, international relations, or legislation, Muslims are not bound by traditional approaches. Rather than seek shelter in traditionalism or accept Western culture and reject traditionalism entirely, al-Mahdi proposes a third path: “separating Islam from the traditionalist thesis, separating modernization from the acculturation syndrome [that is, the acceptance of Western culture], and establishing a synthesis which is both Islamic and modern.”[90]

Within the “interpreted shari’a” mode, Hassan Hanafi of Egypt has proposed the compatibility of Islam and progress through the construction of an Islamic liberation theology analogous to Christian ones:

<quote>

There is no eternal theology which fits every time and every space. Theology is always an expression of the spirit of the time. Every time gave us two spirits: The spirit of the institutional religion, which is always conservative, formal and static. It tries to keep the status quo of things. It formulates a theology for the elite and for the upper class. It monopolizes the interpretation, prevents any opposition and even oppresses the masses. The second spirit is progressive, concrete and dynamic. It tries to change the status quo of things. It formulates a theology for the masses and for the oppressed classes.

There is no one interpretation of a text, but there are many interpretations given the difference in understanding between different interpreters. An interpretation of a text is essentially pluralistic. The text is only a vehicle for human interests and even passions.... The conflict of interpretation is essentially a socio-political conflict, not a theoretical one. Theory indeed is only an epistemological cover-up. Each interpretation expresses the socio-political commitment of the interpreter.[91]

</quote>

Similarly, Syed Vahiduddin of India has challenged:

<quote>

the tacit assumption that Islam, as it unfolded from its birth, was complete and perfect in all its expressions. Hence any supposed deviation from the earliest pattern must carry its own condemnation. But as the Qur’an’s vision of God cannot be confined exclusively to any one of its historical expressions, religion itself cannot be a static construct made once and for all without revealing fresh nuances in its historical development. This static concept of religion neglects the truth that at no point of history can all possibilities be exhausted, though a given point in history might be pregnant with implications for the future. History is a process of creative expression; not a perpetual repetition, and hence it is presumptuous to limit Islam to its classical expression.[92]

</quote>

Rahman (chapter 31) also writes in an “interpreted shari’a” mode: “To insist on absolute uniformity of interpretation is neither possible nor desirable.” Indeed, he writes, “difference of opinion, provided it is meaningful, has to be assigned a high positive value.”[93] Rahman criticizes traditional Islamic thought for clinging to the interpretations of the past rather than meeting the challenge of change. At the same time, he also criticizes revivalists for dismissing earlier interpretations in an attempt to return afresh to original sources. Rahman prefers to develop new interpretations of original sources while studying the interpretations of the past, both to learn from their insights and to understand them as products of their historical environments. Rahman is keenly aware of the difficulties involved in reforming Islamic thought and of the generations of earlier reformers who have largely failed in the attempt. He proposes to effect this reform through a focus on educational institutions, a gigantic task that requires a critical mass of reformist thinkers and reformist ideas. The size of the present book suggests that this movement may, indeed, be reaching its critical mass—that liberal Islam need no longer be considered a contradiction in terms.

* Part I—Against Theocracy

 1. Message Not Government, Religion Not State

‘Ali ‘Abd al-Raziq

‘Ali ‘Abd al-Raziq (Egypt, 1888–1966) unleashed a storm of debate with this controversial short book. A shari’a (Islamic law) judge and an academic at the Al-Azhar University in Cairo, ‘Abd al-Raziq argued that Islam does not specify any particular form of government, thus allowing Muslims to create democratic regimes. This reasoning may have been intended to undermine the Egyptian king’s claims to the caliphate in the wake of the elimination of the Ottoman caliphate in 1924.[94] However, the argument is worded in general terms, thereby challenging the holistic view of Islam as comprising both spirituality and politics. ‘Abd al-Raziq was fired from his judgeship and his academic position and was even criticized by Islamic modernists such as Rashid Rida.[95] Beyond the borders of Egypt, his book “generated violent controversy throughout the Muslim world” and “continues to stimulate debate” today.[96] Other portions of ‘Abd al-Raziq’s book were translated into English from a French edition in 1982.[97]

 1

I saw then that there exist obstacles that are not easily overcome by those who are of the opinion that the Prophet, peace be upon him, in addition to the Message [which he carried], was also a political king and a founder of a political state. I saw that every time these people attempted to avoid a trap, they would fall into the next, and each time they attempted to rid themselves of a problem, the problem would confront them again more intensely than before.

There remains before the reader just one school of thought, and I hope that the reader will find that it offers a convenient starting point.... This is that Muhammad, peace be upon him, was a Messenger of a religious call, full of religiosity, untainted by a tendency to kingship or a call for government, and that he did not have a government, nor did he rule, and that he, peace be upon him, did not establish a kingdom, in the political sense of the term or anything synonymous with it. For he was but a messenger like his brethren, the preceding messengers. He was not a king nor the founder of a state, nor did he seek to rule. The above may not be a well-known view, and may in fact be resented by many Muslims, although it has great vision and is based on strong evidence.

 2

Before we proceed to prove this, we must warn readers about an error that they may fall into unless they observe [the following] accurately and carefully—namely that the Message in itself obliges the Messenger to have some kind of leadership and authority over his people, but this is nothing like the leadership of kings and the authority they have over their subjects. Therefore, one should not confuse the leadership of the Message with that of kings, since they are so different that they could be opposites. Readers have seen that the leadership of Moses and Jesus with regards to their followers was not a kingly leadership, rather it was similar to the leadership of most messengers.

 3

The nature of the honest religious call obliges its carrier to have primarily a perfection of the senses, whereby he will lack nothing in his body, sentiments, or feelings, and have nothing that would repulse. And, he must have—because he is a leader—a strong presence to awe those around him, and an attraction that would make him sympathetic enough that men and women would love him. He must also have spiritual perfection, which is necessary for his communication with the other world.

The Message requires its carrier to enjoy considerable social distinction among his people; and as it has been said: “God does not raise a prophet unless he is loved by his people, and unless he commands authority over his clan.”[98] The Message also requires its carrier to have the kind of strength which will prepare him to influence the minds of people so that they will heed his call. For God, may He be elevated, does not take the Message lightly and does not raise a messenger of righteousness unless He wants his call to be heeded, and that its teachings be engraved on the tables of the world, eternally preserved and intermixed with the realities of this world: “We have sent no apostle but that he should be obeyed by the will of God.” (Qur’an, Sura 4, Verse 64)[99] “Surely messengers have been mocked before you; but what they had mocked rebounded on the mockers themselves. Say: ‘Travel in the land and see what happened to those who disbelieved.’” (Sura 6, Verse 10) “But God wished to confirm the truth by His words, and wipe the unbelievers out to the last, so that Truth may be affirmed and falsehood negated, even though the sinners be averse.” (Sura 8, Verses 7–8) “Our word had already been given before to Our servants, the apostles, that they would be helped. And that certainly, Our armies will be victorious [over them].” (Sura 37, Verses 171–173) “We will certainly help Our messengers and those who believe, in this world and on the day the witnesses take the stand, the day when their excuses will not benefit the evil-doers, and the condemnation and evil abode will be theirs.” (Sura 40, Verses 51–52) The status of the Message grants its carrier a wider authority than that which exists between ruler and ruled, and even wider than that of a father over his children.

The Messenger may tackle the politics of his people as a king would, but the Prophet has a unique duty which he shares with no one, namely to communicate with the souls embedded in bodies, and to remove visual obstacles in order to look in upon the hearts embedded in chests. He has the right, nay, he must open up the hearts of his followers in order to reach the sources of love and hate, of good and evil, the passages of thought, the places of obsessions, the origins of intentions, the repository of morality. His is open work in general politics and concealed work in managing the relationship between partners, allies, master and slave, parents and children, and those relationships that only husband and wife are privy to. He has patronage over that which is manifest and that which is latent in life, as well as the management of the affairs of body and soul, and our worldly and heavenly relationships. He directs the politics of worldly living and that of the next world. The Message gives its carrier—as it is seen and beyond the way it is being seen—the right to communicate with each soul, care for it and manage its affairs, as well as the right to unlimited free conduct for every heart.

 4

Readers should note that, in addition to the above, the Message of the Prophet, peace be upon him, specialized in a myriad of things that other messengers did not deal with. For he, peace be upon him, came with a call that God chose for him to rally the people to. And God ordained that he deliver it in its entirety, and that he preside over it in order to complete the call to religion, so that grace be established and conflict not arise, and so that all religion be to God. This Message grants its carrier the kind of extreme perfection that human nature seeks to achieve, the kind of psychological strength that is the end-limit of what God had fated for His chosen messengers, and enough of God’s support that would be compatible with this great and general call. In this vein, God has said: “Great have been the blessings of God on you.” (Sura 4, Verse 113) “For you are always before Our eyes.” (Sura 52, Verse 48). And in the hadith [tradition of the Prophet]: “By God, God will never humiliate you.”[100] “For—without boasting of it—of all of Adam’s children, I am my Lord’s favorite.”[101]

For this purpose, the authority of the Prophet, peace be upon him, was, because of his Message, a general authority; his orders to Muslims were obeyed; and his government was comprehensive. For nothing that the arm of government can reach is beyond the authority of the Prophet, peace be upon him, and any imaginable kind of leadership or authority is included in the Prophet’s, peace be upon him, reign over the believers.

If it is reasoned that it is possible for a messenger’s authority over his people to have gradations, then I would say that Muhammad, peace be upon him, should have the right to exercise the highest possible authority of all messengers, peace be upon them, command the highest possible obedience, have the strength of the prophecy, the authority of the Message, and the influence of the honest call, which God had fated to be raised over the call to wrongdoing and to remain on earth. The authority is sent by Heaven, from God, to him whose divine revelation is delivered by Heaven’s angels. This sacred power, special to those worshipers of God whom He had raised as messengers, does not hold within it the meaning of kingship, nor does it resemble the power of kings, nor can the [authority of the] sultan of all sultans approximate it. This is the true leadership of the call to God and of the delivery of His Message, not kingly leadership. It is a message and a religion; it is a prophetic government not a government of sultans.

Once again we warn the reader not to confuse the two kinds of governments, and not to conflate the two kinds of trusteeships—the trusteeship of the Messenger, on account of his being a messenger, and the trusteeship of powerful kings. The Messenger’s trusteeship over his people is a spiritual trusteeship whose origin is faith from the heart, and the heart’s true submission followed by the submission of the body. On the other hand, the trusteeship of the ruler is a material one. It depends on subduing bodies without any connection to the heart. While the former is a trusteeship leading to God, the latter is one for managing life’s concerns and populating the earth. While the former is religion, the latter is the world. The former is divine, the latter is human. The former is a religious leadership, the latter a political one—and there is much distance between politics and religion.

 5

Having said this, we would like to draw readers’ attention to something else. There exist a number of words [dealing with our subject matter] that are used as synonyms, and others as antonyms. A disagreement or a difference in point of view arises as a result of such usage. In addition, this creates a confusion in judgment. Such words are “king,” “sultan,” “ruler,” “commander,” “caliph,” “state,” “kingdom,” “government,” “caliphate,” and so on. If we were to ask if the Prophet, peace be upon him, was a king or not, we would be asking if he, peace be upon him, had attributes other than being a messenger. Would it be correct to state that he indeed founded, or began to found, a political unity or not? Kingship in our use of it here—and there is no embarrassment faced by the reader who may wish to call him caliph, sultan, commander, or whatever pleases him—means a ruler over a people who have political unity and who have civilization. As for “government,” “state,” “sultanate,” or “kingdom,” we mean that which political scientists mean by the English words “kingship,” “state,” or “government” and the like.

We do not doubt that Islam constitutes religious unity or that Muslims form a unified group; or that the Prophet called for that political unity and had in fact achieved it before his death; and that he, peace be upon him, headed this religious unity as its only prayer leader (imam), its strong manager, its master whose orders are never questioned. And that in the interest of this Islamic unity, he, peace be upon him, struggled with all his might, and with the victorious support of God, conquered. He, peace be upon him, received the support of God’s angels until he delivered his Message and completed his trusteeship. For he, peace be upon him, had the kind of authority over his people that no king before him or after him ever had. “The Prophet is closer to the faithful than they are themselves.” (Sura 33, Verse 6) “No believing men and women have any choice in a matter after God and His Messenger have decided it. Whoever disobeys God and His Messenger has clearly lost the way and gone astray.” (Sura 33, Verse 36)

And he who wants to term this religious unity a state and this authority of the Prophet, peace be upon him—which was an absolute authority—a kingship or caliphate, and the Prophet himself, peace be upon him, a king, caliph, or sultan, and so on, he is free to do so. For this is a matter of semantics which should not stop us here. What is important in what we have said is the meaning, and that we have specified to the reader with precision.

The crucial thing is to find out whether the leadership of the Prophet, peace be upon him, over his people was the leadership of the Message, or a kingly leadership. And whether the different aspects of his trusteeship that we observe at times in the biography [of the Prophet], peace be upon him, were aspects of a political state, or of a religious leadership. And whether this unity over which the Prophet, peace be upon him, presided was a unity of a state and a government or a religious unity proper, not a political one. And, finally, whether he, peace be upon him, was only a messenger or a king and a messenger.

 6

The Glorious Qur’an supports the view that the Prophet, peace be upon him, had nothing to do with political kingship. Qur’anic verses are in agreement that his heavenly work did not go beyond delivering the Message, which is free of all meanings of authority. “He who obeys the Messenger obeys God; and if some turn away (remember) we have not sent you as a warden over them.” (Sura 4, Verse 80) “This (Book) has been called by your people a falsehood, though it is the truth. Say: ‘I am not a warden over you. A time is fixed in every prophecy; you will come to know in time.’” (Sura 6, Verse[s] 66–67) “So follow what is revealed to you by your Lord, for homage is due to no one but God, and turn away from idolators. Had He willed it, they would not have been idolators. We have not appointed you their guardian, nor are your their pleader.” (Sura 6, Verses 106–107) “If your Lord had willed it, all the people on the earth would have come to believe, one and all.” (Sura 10, Verse 99) “Say: ‘O people, the truth has come to you from your Lord, so he who follows the right path does so for himself, and he who goes astray errs against himself, and I am not a guardian over you.’” (Sura 10, Verse 108) “We have not sent you as warden over them.” (Sura 17, Verse 54) “Have you considered he take his own lust as his god? Can you act as a trustee for him?” (Sura 25, Verse 43) “We have sent down this Book to you with the truth for all mankind. So, he who comes to guidance does so for himself, and he who goes astray does so for his own loss; on you does not lie their guardianship.” (Sura 39, Verse 41) “If they turn away (you are not responsible); we have not appointed you a warden over them. Your duty is to deliver the message.” (Sura 42, Verse 48) “We are cognisant of what they say; but it is not for you to compel them. So keep on reminding through the Qur’an whoever fears my warning.” (Sura 50, Verse 45) “Remind them: you are surely a reminder. You are not a warden over them, other than him who turns his back and denies, in which case he will be punished by God with the severest punishment.” (Sura 88, Verses 21–24)

As the reader can see, the Qur’an clearly prohibits the Prophet, peace be upon him, from serving as a guardian of people, or their trustee, or a subduer ... or a dominator. Moreover, he did not have the right to force people to become believers. In addition, he who is not a guardian or a dominator is not a king; for the prerequisite to kingship is absolute domination and might, which constitute an authority without limits. And he who was not a trustee over his people is also not a king. For God has said: “Muhammad is not the father of any of man among you, but messenger of God, and the seal of the prophets. God has knowledge of every thing.” (Sura 33, Verse 40)

The Qur’an is clear that Muhammad, peace be upon him, had no rights over his people except that of delivering the Message; and, had he, peace be upon him, been a king, he would have had the right to govern his people. For kings have other rights beside the Message, and other sources of legitimation beside the Message, and an influence other than its influence. “Tell them: ‘I am not master of my own gain or loss but as God may please. If had the knowledge of the Unknown, I would have enjoyed abundance of the good, and no evil would have touched me. I am only a bearer of warnings and bringer of happy news for those who believe.’” (Sura 7, Verse 188) “You may perhaps omit some of what has been revealed to you, and may be disheartened because they say: ‘Why was no treasure sent down to him, or an angel to accompany him?’ Yet you have been sent to warn alone, for God takes care of every thing.” (Sura 11, Verse 12) “But you are only a bearer of warnings, and a guide for every nation.” (Sura 13, Verse 7) “Say: ‘I am only a man like you, but it has been communicated to me that your Lord is one and single God, and that whosoever hopes to meet his Lord should do what is right, and not associate any one in the worship of his Lord.’” (Sura 18, Verse 110) “Tell them: ‘O people, it is my duty to warn you clearly.’” (Sura 22, Verse 49) “Only this has been revealed to me: that I am a distinct warner.” (Sura 38, Verse 70) “Say: ‘I am a man like you, (but) it is revealed to me that your God is one God.’” (Sura 41, Verse 6)

As readers have observed, the Qur’an is clear that Muhammad, peace be upon him, was but a Messenger preceded by other Messengers, and it is also clear that he, peace be upon him, had only to deliver God’s Message to people and that he was not commissioned to do anything except deliver it. And it is not incumbent upon him [to ensure] that the people accept what he brought them, nor is it incumbent upon him to force them into believing in it. “If you turn away, remember, that the duty of Our Messenger is to give you a clear warning.” (Sura 5, Verse 92) “It is for the Prophet to convey the Message: God knows what you reveal and what you hide.” (Sura 5, Verse 99) “Have they not bethought themselves that their companion is mad? He is only a plain admonisher.” (Sura 7, Verse 184) “Are the people astonished that a man who is one of them was commanded by Us to warn them and to bring glad tidings to those who believe that they are on sound footing with their Lord?” (Sura 10, Verse 2) “Whether We allow you to see (the punishment) we have promised them, or end your life before (its execution), it is certainly for you to convey the Message; the reckoning is for Us to do.” (Sura 13, Verse 40) “Need messengers do anything except to convey the Message in clearest terms?” (Sura 16, Verse 35) “We have sent down this Book to you that you might explain to them what it is that they are differing about, and as guidance and a grace for those who believe.” (Sura 16, Verse 64) “If they still turn away, your duty is to warn them in clear terms.” (Sura 16, Verse 82) “We have sent you only to give good news and to warn.” (Sura 17, Verse 105) “So we have made this (Qur’an) easy in your tongue that you may give good news to those who take heed, and warn the people who are contentious.” (Sura 19, Verse 97) “Ta Ha.[102] We have not sent down the Qur’an to you that you should be burdened, but as an admonition for him who fears.” (Sura 20, Verses 1–3) “The duty of the Messenger is to convey the Message clearly.” (Sura 24, Verse 54) “Yet we have sent you only to give good tidings and to warn.” (Sura 25, Verse 56) “(Say:) ‘I am commanded to worship the Lord of this land He has blessed, to Whom all things belong; and I am commanded to be one of those who submit,[103] and to recite the Qur’an.’ Whoever comes to guidance does so for himself; as for him who stays astray, tell him: ‘I am only a warner.’” (Sura 27, Verses 91–92) “‘But if you deny, then many a people have denied before you. The duty of the Messenger is to convey the Message clearly.’” (Sura 29, Verse 18) “O Prophet, We have sent you as a witness and a bearer of happy tidings and an admonisher, and to call (people) to (know) God by His leave, and as a lamp resplendent.” (Sura 33, Verses 45–46) “We have sent you only as a bearer of good tidings and admonisher for all mankind; yet most people do not understand.” (Sura 34, Verse 28) “There is no madness about your companion. He is a warner against the dreadful affliction (that awaits).” (Sura 34, Verse 46) “You are only a bearer of warnings. We have sent you with the truth, to give glad tidings, and to warn. Never has there been a community to which an admonisher was not sent.” (Sura 35, Verses 23–24) “(The messengers said:) ‘Our duty is to convey the Message clearly.’” (Sura 36, Verse 17) “Say: ‘I am only a warner, and there is no other god but God, the One, the Omnipotent.’” (Sura 38, Verse 65) “Say: ‘I am not a new Messenger to come, nor do I know what is to be done to me or you. I only follow what is revealed to me. My duty is only to warn you clearly.’” (Sura 46, Verse 9) “We have sent you as witness [of the truth] and harbinger of good news and a warner.” (Sura 48, Verse 8) “Obey God and the Prophet, and beware. If you turn away, remember, that the duty of Our Messenger is to give you a clear warning.” (Sura 5, Verse 92) “Say: ‘God alone has knowledge. My duty is only to warn you clearly.’” (Sura 67, Verse 26) “Say: ‘I call on my Lord alone and I do not associate any one with Him.’ Say: ‘Neither is your loss within my power nor bringing you to guidance.’ Say: ‘No one can save me from God, nor can I find a place of refuge apart from Him, unless I convey from God and deliver His Message.’” (Sura 72, Verses 20–23)

 7

If we were to go beyond God’s Book to the sunna [practice] of the Prophet, peace be upon him, we would find the matter even clearer, and the argument more insistent:

One of the Prophet’s biographers[104] narrates the story of a man who came upon the Prophet, peace be upon him, to take care of a matter. As he stood before him, an intense shiver and fear overtook him. The Prophet, peace be upon him, said: “Be calm, for I am no king nor a subduer, for I am the son of a woman of Quraysh who used to eat dried meat in Mecca.” And it has been said in the hadith that when the Prophet was given the choice by the angel Israfil of being a king-prophet or a worshipping prophet, the Prophet, peace be upon him, looked up to [the angel] Gabriel, peace be upon him, as his consultant. Gabriel looked down to the ground, indicating humility. And as the story goes, Gabriel indicated for him to be humble. So the Prophet said: “A worshipping prophet.” As is evident, this makes it very clear that the Prophet, peace be upon him, was not a king, and did not seek kingship, nor did he, peace be upon him, desire it.

Look between the two covers of the Qur’an for open or latent evidence supporting those who think that the Islamic religion has a political character, and then look for evidence, as hard as you can, among the hadiths of the Prophet, peace be upon him—these pure sources of religion which are within your hands, close to you. If you were to look in them for evidence or anything resembling it, you will find no proof, only guesses, and guessing does not replace Truth.

 8

Islam is a religious call to God and is a school of thought, from among many such schools, which seeks to reform a certain type of people, guiding them to what will render them closer to God, may He be elevated, and opening up the path to everlasting happiness, which God had prepared for His righteous worshipers. [Islam] is a religious unity that God sought as a bond linking all people, and with which he wanted to surround all the regions of the earth.

It is a pure sacred call to the people of this world, the red [Arabs] and the black [Africans] among them, that they be beholden to one God, that they be one nation worshipping one God, and that they be brothers in their worship of Him. It is a call to the highest example of worldly peace. That it be adopted with the perfection befitting it [the world]. It is a call to the happiness that God prepared for the world; for this is the mercy of Heaven and Earth and God’s bounty for this world. Calling on the world to be a fraternity in religion is a reasonable call. There is in the nature of human beings a readiness to achieve it.

Indeed God, may He be elevated, has pledged that this call be heeded. “Think not that God would go back on His promise.” (Sura 14, Verse 47) “God has promised to make those of you who believe and do right, leaders in the land, as He made those before them, and will establish their faith which He has chosen for them, and change their fear into security. They will worship

Me and not associate any one with Me. But those who disbelieve after this will be reprobates.” (Sura 24, Verse 55) “It is He who has sent His Messenger with the guidance and the true faith, so that He may exalt it over every other creed. God is sufficient as a witness.” (Sura 48, Verse 28) “Who is more unjust than he who invents a lie against God when he is called to submit? God does not show the evil-doers the way. They want to extinguish the light of God by uttering blasphemies. But God wills to perfect His light, however the disbelievers may dislike it. It is He who has sent His Messenger with the guidance and the true way to raise it above all faiths, however the idolators may dislike it.” (Sura 61, Verses 7–9)

It is reasonable to say that the world could adopt one religion and that all human beings could be organized into one religious union. However, for the entire world to adopt one government and to be grouped in a shared political union would be foreign to human nature and have nothing to do with God’s will. For this is a worldly aim, and God, may He be elevated, has rendered it a matter to be resolved by our minds, and has left people free to manage it in the manner that their minds, knowledge, interests, desires, and tendencies would guide them. God’s wisdom in this aims at maintaining differences among people. “But if your Lord had pleased, He could have made all human beings into one community (umma). But they would still have differed from one another, except those on whom your Lord had mercy.” (Sura 11, Verses 118–119) In addition, in order that competition continue among people so that [the] population [of the earth] would be achieved. “If God did not make people deter one another, this earth would indeed be depraved. But gracious is God to the people of the world.” (Sura 2, Verse 251) And, so that the Book’s purpose be achieved and God’s will be done.

This is one of the worldly concerns on which the Prophet, peace be upon him, had denied himself the right to pass judgment or arbitration. For he, peace be upon him, stated that “you are more knowledgeable of your worldly concerns.” This is a worldly concern; and the world from beginning to end, and all that it encompasses of concerns and goals, is too trivial for God to have it managed by anything beside the minds He endowed us with, and what He had placed within us of sentiments and desires, and what He had taught us of names and of what things are called; all this is too trivial for God to raise a Messenger to deal with, and it is too trivial for God’s Messengers to be concerned with and occupy themselves in managing it.

 9

The reader should not be alarmed by what he may occasionally observe in the biography of the Prophet, peace be upon him, which may seem to him like government work, as if it had the appearance of kingship and statehood. If the reader were to scrutinize it, he would not find it so. Rather, it was only a means that the Prophet, peace be upon him, would seek for the strengthening of his religion, in support of the call. And it is not strange thatjihad [religious struggle] is one such means. It is a violent and tough way, but who knows, evil may be necessary at times for good to be achieved. Perhaps, destruction becomes imperative in order that construction take place.

<quote>

They have said that it [jihad] is not free of problems, and we said that this is God’s way in His creation. For the struggle between good and evil and between good thinking and evil thinking will persist in this world until God puts a stop to it. If God were to bring forth the springtime upon an arid land in order to revive what is dead in it, to benefit from its harvest and to grow its plants, would its worth be diminished if it came upon an obstacle in its way and overstepped it, or if it came upon a house with strong foundations and destroyed it?[105]

</quote>

<quote>

They said: Have you conquered! and God’s messengers were sent not to kill a soul, nor did they come to murder anyone.

Ignorance and leading astray, dreams and inanities, for you have conquered with the sword what you had first conquered with the pen.

When those of good ilk followed you on their own, [it was left to] the sword to take care of common and ignorant people.

If you confront evil with good, you will tire of the confrontation,

But if you confront it with evil, you shall vanquish it.

For you have taught them all that they did not know

Including fighting and what it encompasses of morality.[106]

</quote>

 10

From this, the reader can see that it is not only the Qur’an which prohibits us from thinking that the Prophet, peace be upon him, was calling upon us, along with his religious Message, to found a political state. Nor is it only the sunna which also prohibits us from doing so. Rather, along with the Book and the sunna comes the wisdom of reason and what the meaning of the Message and its nature reveal. For the trusteeship of Muhammad, peace be upon him, over the believers is the trusteeship of the Message, untainted by anything that has to do with government.

Away with it, for there was no government, no state, and nothing of the tendencies to politics, nor of the aims of kings and commanders.

Perhaps, the reader has by now been guided to what he had questioned about the lack of any aspect of government or the aims of a state during the prophetic epoch. The reader now knows that there was no governmental organization, nor were there trustees or judges, a seat of government, and so on. Hopefully, the darkness of this dilemma which the reader faced has by now been transformed into light, and fire has been transformed into coolness and peace of mind.

 2. Legislative Authority

Muhammad Khalaf-Allah

Muhammad Khalaf-Allah (Egypt, 1916–1997) first gained notoriety in the early 1950s for his literary analysis of the Qur’an. The purpose of the Qur’an, he argued, was not to record historical facts but to exhort listeners to Islam. A number of Qur’anic scholars took offense at the implication that the Qur’an was not factually complete, and Khalaf-Allah was subjected to scathing criticism in the Egyptian press.[107] His work in the 1970s continued to upset traditionalists and revivalists. In The Qur’an and the State, excerpted here, Khalaf- Allah goes beyond ‘Abd al-Raziq’s argument that Islam is compatible with democracy; instead, writes Khalaf-Allah, it lays out the basic tenets of democracy and requires Muslims to work out the implementation. In short, divine revelation does not simply allow democracy; it requires democracy. “This is a new and novel idea, which cannot be found outside of Khalaf-Allah’s thought,” according to one commentator.[108] Chapter 3, “Legislative Authority,” excerpted here, discusses the revelation of the shura (consultation) system of governance and its importance for secular, parliamentary authority. Khalaf-Allah is not an easy author to follow, in Arabic or English, as he tries to build his argument on sound Qur’anic reasoning. His conclusions, however, are straightforward and bold.

 1

<quote>

And seek their counsel in all affairs. And when you have come to a decision, place your trust in God alone.

<right>

(Qur’an, Sura 3, Verse 159)[109]

</quote>

</right>

When this verse was revealed by God, Muhammad, son of ‘Abdullah, peace be upon him, knew that the shura [consultation] system had become obligatory.

From that day on, he would have to perform the duties for which God had chosen him to be a messenger and prophet. He had to explain to the people the signs that were revealed to them. In such a situation, the Messenger’s explanation was not simply abstract, in the sense that he cannot limit himself to reciting the verse to the people and writing it on a patch of cloth—rather, he must explain its relevance to them in practice.

In this situation, a practical explanation means transforming the idea from an intellectual value into a social reality that people can use as a resource in their everyday life…. What we are referring to—the organic relationship between idea and action—is that to which the bounteous Qur’an had referred in numerous verses when it linked faith and action. Faith according to the bounteous Qur’an is not righteous unless it derives from the spiritual value of acting for the purpose of the general interest, and achieving the good for all. When action does not derive from faith in the principle and doctrine [of religion], it inevitably becomes a harmful act—harmful to he who takes it and harmful to the collectivity.

The Qur’anic verses which juxtapose faith to action are so numerous that we are relieved from citing many of them in this regard. All Muslims have heard them from [Qur’an] reciters, or have recited them from the Qur’an if they are reciters, or during prayers if they are worshippers.

The Qur’anic verse which obliges the Prophet, peace be upon him, to seek shura was not the first of its kind; it had been preceded by another revealed verse speaking of shura. Whereas our verse is a Medinan verse, the other verse is Meccan.[110] The Meccan verse is the one in which the bounteous Qur’an praises the believers for having Muhammad, peace be upon him, among them, when it states: “And they run their affairs by shura among themselves.” The difference between the two verses is based on the fact that one of them [the Medinan verse] is obligatory, while the other is not—it limits itself to congratulation.

Explaining this Qur’anic phenomenon is not very difficult. The explanation derives from our perception of the historical situation of the Prophet, peace be upon him, and of Muslims in Mecca and Medina. In Mecca, Muslims were a small minority. They were oppressed, and the call [to Islam] was to a certain extent clandestine. And they were unable—this was their situation—to establish institutions with legislative authorities beside the authority of God, may He be praised and elevated.

Things changed in Medina, where Muslims were the rulers, whom people turned to as the new power, which undertook to rebuild life anew on new foundations— foundations established by the entirety of [God’s] revelation. The Prophet and his Companions elaborate the details and make legislation which God delegated to the Prophet and to Muslims. The situation in Medina was such that it allowed the establishment of legislative institutions; and the Qur’an came to demand of the Prophet that he be committed to the establishment of those institutions, now that circumstances allowed them during the Medinan period. The Prophet established the legislative institution in response to this Qur’anic verse.

 2

The Prophet, peace be upon him, established the legislative institution relying on the previous verse and another Medinan verse: “And when any tidings of peace or war come to them, they spread the news around. Had they gone to the Messenger or to those in authority among them, then those who check and scrutinize would have resolved it.” (Sura 4, Verse 83) Whereas the first verse obliges the Prophet to establish this institution, this verse specifies this institution’s fields of action, while simultaneously specifying which form such action is to take. The fields of action are the fields of security, fear, and the like. And the form which such action takes is one whereby Muslims would refer matters that concern them to the Messenger and to those in authority among them, in order that they work through them in their minds and conclude with the opinion that will realize the general interest.

And all this happened at the same time that the Qur’an was still being revealed. What this means is that during the life of the Prophet, peace be upon him, there existed two legislative authorities: God’s authority, may He be praised and elevated, and the authority of the Prophet and those in authority among the Muslims. And the field of divine authority is these ideas which provide an image of the divine self and which clarify religious beliefs, and from which derive religious permission and prohibition.

As for human authority, the authority which belongs to the Prophet, peace be upon him, and to those in authority, it is concerned with worldly matters—especially that which deals with security, wars, political, economic, and administrative matters, etc.

Professor Imam Shaykh Muhammad ‘Abduh [Egyptian modernist, 1849–1905] settled this matter when he stated: “And he counseled them in the general matter which is the policy of the community in war and peace, in fear and security, and in other concerns of their worldly interests.”

What is meant by this is the community’s worldly concerns, not a purely religious concern whose realm is that of revelation, which is not of opinion. For if religious matters, like doctrines, worship, what is permitted and what is prohibited, were concerns decided by consultation, then religion itself would have been the work of human beings. Religion is established by God. No one may have an opinion on it, either during the lifetime of the Prophet, peace be upon him, or afterwards....

[We end up with] this statement about God’s delegation of worldly concerns to Muslims and their decisions about what they see as benefiting the general interest—this helps us to understand the following Qur’anic verse:

<quote>

O, believers, do not ask about things which, if made known to you, may vex you. But if you ask about them when the Qur’an is being revealed, they will be unfolded to you. God has overlooked [your failings] in this [respect], for God is forgiving and forbearing. Such things were asked by a people before you, but disbelieved them afterwards. (Sura 5, Verses 101–102)

</quote>

This verse speaks of events that occurred during the Prophet’s lifetime, peace be upon him, when the first Muslims would go to him with questions about unresolved matters, asking him to explain the opinion of religion in these matters. The Prophet would turn to the Lord hoping that He would send down from Heaven a verse that would respond to their queries and answer their requests. The Qur’an came to ask them to cease directing queries to the Prophet, peace be upon him, that required revelation. It requested this from them, explaining the reasons which necessitate it. These reasons are as follows:

1. There is a possibility that an answer to their question may harm them in terms of commissioning them to carry out a strenuous task, or to abandon tasks to which they were accustomed and which their souls enjoyed.

2. When they ask questions at the time when the bounteous Qur’an is being revealed, then it becomes imperative that there be a response and that opinion be given in the matter.

3. For those who came before them, asking many questions and waiting for revelation to answer them—whether to take action or not—was not at all in their interest. Because of this, they became disbelievers.

4. Those matters that change with the change of place and time should be left to the people to decide what they consider to be in their interest in the time during which they live, the place where they reside, and in the community to which they belong.

Leaving these matters to the people causes the people to develop and grow, and permits change. As for turning to Heaven and awaiting revelation that provides a point of view in a certain matter, this would render the decision constant and stagnant, incapable of growing or changing, no matter how much times change and places multiply.

The bounteous Qur’an requests that they cease [posing] these questions so that they would not be like their predecessors and follow their path of disbelief when interests change along with the change in time and place. The stance of the bounteous Qur’an emphasizes that this agrees with historical patterns and social laws.

What we have just arrived at allows us the following conclusion: we must stop directing questions to religious scholars—those questions whose aim is to find out the opinion of these religious scholars in matters of worldly living. Religious scholars can perform the duties of prophets, peace be upon them, in explanation and in analysis of Qur’anic texts—especially that which deals with beliefs, worship, and [social] interactions. But the religious scholars cannot do what the prophets, peace be upon them, could not do.

The bounteous Qur’an obliged the Prophet to seek the counsel of his Companions, to decide with them how to achieve the general interest, and to execute that decision without awaiting revelation. In this vein, God’s statement, “And when you have come to a decision, place your trust in God alone,” means: execute this decision without waiting for divine opinion.

The establishment of legislative authority is what guarantees the achievement of legislative goals, according to the Qur’anic verse: “And seek their counsel in all affairs.” The establishment of such an authority is what makes possible various ways of responding to these numerous questions which people pose as they seek to know the basis or the principle on whose foundations we must conduct our worldly living. Our attitude toward religious scholars should be our attitude toward the Prophet, peace be upon him: that which deals with [Qur’anic] texts, we requested of him that he clarify and explain; for that which did not deal with Qur’anic texts, we turn to the legislative authority, we turn to those who are specialized [in secular governance], those who respond to people’s concerns—we turn to those in authority.

 3

The Prophet, peace be upon him, established this legislative authority, which oversaw and decided matters with him. There existed no specific place for this institution; rather, its members used to meet with the Prophet, peace be upon him, at any place that they saw fit, or wherever circumstances required them to look into matters. We believe that the mosque or the home of the Prophet, peace be upon him, was the preferred place for such a meeting.

The number of Muslims was so small at that time that it facilitated their meeting at such places for counsel. The Prophet, peace be upon him, used to follow this principle [of shura]—which is one of the principles of Islam—during his life as circumstances allowed, and as the particular situation permitted. He used to consult those Muslims who were with him, and he would consult some of his personal friends, if the disclosure or publicity of the matter would have been harmful. He consulted the great majority of his Companions and the Emigrants [those who emigrated with the Prophet from Mecca to Medina] on the day of the battle of Badr, when he found out that the [tribe of] Quraysh had left Mecca for the purpose of war. It did not take long for the Emigrants and the Ansar [residents of Medina who adopted Islam] to give their approval. It has been said that once he received the news of the caravan and of the Quraysh, God's Messenger, may God's prayers and benediction be upon him, consulted with his Companions, with the Ansar being the first among them. God's Messenger said: "Show me the way, O people." Sa'd ibn Mu'adh [al-Nu'man] al-Aws [Companion of the Prophet, died 627] arose, saying, "By God, it would seem that you want us, O Messenger of God." [The Prophet] said, "Yes." Sa'd said:

<quote>

I am responding on behalf of the Ansar. For we have had faith in you and we believed you and we witnessed the righteousness that you brought. And as a result of that, we gave you our pledges and our covenants to hear and obey you. So, depart where you wish, for we are with you, for He who sent you has sent you with righteousness, and if you were to show us this sea and then you crossed it, we would cross it with you, with no one of us staying behind....

</quote>

When the Prophet, may God's peace and benediction be upon him, consulted with his friends, he would accede to their opinion and would not hold fast to his own opinion. Of the narratives that deal with this is an incident which the narrators have told us of: The Companions of the Prophet, God's approval be upon them, would not offer their opinions contradicting what the Prophet had said on worldly matters except after knowing that what he had said was an opinion and not derived from revelation—as they did on the day of [the battle of] Badr. The Prophet came to the source of water closest to Badr and camped by it. Al-Habbab bin Mundhir bin al-Jammuh said, "O, Messenger of God, have you seen this location? If this location was chosen for you by God, it is not our place to object to it, or it an opinion about war and a stratagem?" [The Prophet], peace be upon him, said: "It is rather an opinion about war and a stratagem." Al-Habbab said: "O, Messenger of God, this is not a good location, so rise up with the people until we come upon a source of water that is closer to the people, to camp there and then penetrate [the desert] far beyond it." [The Prophet], may God's peace and benediction be upon him, said to him: “Your opinion has shown the way.” And he [the Prophet] followed his opinion.

The Prophet asked his Companions for counsel the day of [the battle of] Uhud. He would consult with them on every matter except that which was revealed to him, which he would execute without counsel, and Muslims would help him execute as well.

All this took place when Muslims were a small minority with the Prophet in Medina. When Muslims increased in number and Islam’s rule expanded through conquest to areas far from Medina—when there were men of status and opinion among the Muslims in every tribe and every village—there had to be a system of counsel that would guarantee, for those who are far from the centers of power and from the seat of the caliphate, participation in legislative decisions that dealt with issues of worldly living.

But the Prophet, peace be upon him, wisely chose not to establish this system. We will mention the [following] reasons:

1. The matter [of shura] changes with the changes in the social situation of the people in time and place. The period in which [the Prophet], peace be upon him, lived after the conquest of Mecca—which saw the beginning of the acceptance of God’s religion by multitudes of people—was too short to allow for the establishment of such a system. [The Prophet], peace be upon him, died after a few years of the conquest of Mecca. This is in addition to [the Prophet’s], peace be upon him, realization that this situation will only increase in magnitude as God opens up realms to his people and subdues people before them.

All of this was an obstacle to the establishment of a basis for counsel that would work for the umma [Muslim community] in the year of the conquest and afterwards, during the remaining period of the Prophet s life and the following period when realms were being opened and civilized people were accepting Islam or coming under the sovereignty of Islam.

The rules that applied at that time could not be good for all times, or [else the rules] that applied to the situation of the Arabs in their simplicity would apply thereafter to all peoples. It was wiser, then, for the Prophet, peace be upon him, to leave the establishment of such a system to the umma, so that they might establish in every age a system that is suitable for that age and that serves their interests in different circumstances.

2. Had the Prophet, may God’s peace and benediction be upon him, established temporary rules for counsel, according to the needs of that time, Muslims would have adopted them as a religious ordinance and would have followed them in every time and places, although this is not a religious matter....

Some would go so far as to say that [the Prophet], peace be upon him, could have established such a system and then stipulated that the umma would have the right to change and alter this system so that it would be compatible with the temporal or cultural development of the Muslim people. The answer to such a claim is that people would have continued to consider the words of [the Prophet], peace be upon him, on a matter of worldly living as a religious injunction. They would have continued thus, although they knew that he, peace be upon him, said, “You are more knowledgeable of your concerns,” and, “That which deals with your religion, [refer it] to me, and that which deals with your worldly concerns, you are more knowledgeable of that.”

If a just person were to contemplate this matter, and if such a person knew the true feelings, on this matter, of the different classes of believers, the public and private ones, it would be plainly clear to him that it would be difficult for most people to accept changing something that the Prophet, peace be upon him, had established for the umma—although they may be permitted to do so. They would go very far in their various interpretations of his position. They would say, for example, that he was committed to the people’s right to change and alter [the system] as a sign of his modesty and good manners, and that [in doing so], he was explaining to us this truth in order that we not renege on our opinions, but that, at any rate, his opinion would be the higher one.

3. Had he [the Prophet] established this system on his own account, he would not have been practicing counsel, which God had ordered him to do. It would be impossible for him, peace be upon him, to do this, since he would never disobey any order issued by God, may He be praised and elevated.

And had he established it in counsel with his contemporaries, the Companions and Emigrants, he would have decided the matter according to the opinion of the majority, as on the day of [the battle of] Uhud. The opinion of the majority on the day of Uhud was different from his, and he acceded to the opinion of the majority, which later appeared to be wrong. In addition, he, peace be upon him, did not want legislation to be issued by them, which the umma would have been beholden to for all time, and which would have provided the base and foundation for the establishment of Islamic government. It was wiser to leave the establishment of such a system to the umma so that they may establish in every age [a system] that their preparation and their scientific and cultural achievement qualifies them to establish.

The conclusion of this section is that the establishment of such a system [of shura] was one of those matters that God had delegated to Muslims to establish. He did so purposely, not out of forgetfulness or inattention, for He does not err or forget. Muslims have an interest in establishing such a system. It is up to them to establish it on a basis that is good for the time period in which they live and for the nation to which they belong.

We will state this one more time: God has delegated to Muslims the treatment of such a system on the basis of matters that are connected to worldly interests. Such matters for Him are matters of security and fear. We conclude with this statement from the interpretation of al-Manar [The Lighthouse, modernist Islamic newspaper, early twentieth century]:

The matter in which there is no doubt is that God has guided us to the best and most perfect of foundations and rules on which to build our government and to establish our state. And he gave us the task of building, thus granting us absolute freedom and full independence in our worldly concerns and social interests. He has done so by making our concerns a matter of counsel among us. Those knowledgeable ones of status, whom we trust, look into these concerns and decide on our behalf in every period that which serves our interests and bestows happiness on our people.

 4

Here is a third verse [from the Qur'an] that charts out the path that believers must follow in dealing with matters related to security and fear, that involve issues of their worldly living. In this third verse another issue arises, which is knowledge of the attributes that fit those who are beside the Prophet, peace be upon him, when such matters are discussed—holding a dialogue with him on the matter and participating in decision-making with him.

It is clear that those who are beside him are the people of whom the legislative body consists, during his time and after. This Qur'anic verse is God's statement: "And when any tidings of peace or war come to them, they spread the news around. Had they gone to the Messenger or to those in authority among them, then those who check and scrutinize would have resolved it." (Sura 4, Verse 83)

The people whom the Qur'an calls "those in authority" are those who are beside the Prophet, peace be upon him. The legislative body which they comprise has the right to look into matters and to deduce the legal ruling in the case—deducing it from the texts or from scholarly works on the basis of the goal of the general good and the general interest.

Thinkers disagree as to who "those in authority" are. One group states that they are the rulers, princes, kings, sultans, allies, and so on. Others deny that this is what is meant by the verse and state that what is meant are specialists who have knowledge, knowhow, and experience enough to qualify them to oversee people's concerns. And, that they must be trusted by all people.

Their rejection of the logic of the first group in specifying the meaning of "those in authority" is based on a simple yet strong intellectual foundation. They state those addressed in this verse are the community of believers who were the contemporaries of the Prophet, peace be upon him, and that this address is directing them to refer all matters of security and fear to the Prophet, peace be upon him, and to "those in authority." It is also true that "those in authority" themselves are contemporaries of the Prophet, peace be upon him, and that there was no prince or ruler or king or caliph or the like beside the Prophet. Only the Emigrants, the Ansar, and the Companions stood beside the Prophet. Among them were the people with know-how and status whom the Prophet consulted. It is they whom the Qur'an addressed as "those in authority."

On this basis, it is impossible to interpret "those in authority" to mean ruler, princes, and the like. These [thinkers] go further in explaining to us the reasons for which the first group offered such an opinion—that the people with that opinion are actually those who have authority themselves. Those who have authority wanted the scholars of interpretation and religion to interpret "those in authority" to mean princes, rulers, and the like. In doing so, they were aiming to control the masses. For when the masses are told that obeying rulers, princes, sultans, and caliphs is a religious matter, they submit to them with voluntary, not coerced obedience.

Reaching this interpretation of this phenomenon, and uncovering its motives and goals contains within it the accusation by the [second group of] interpreters, that [the first group] did not explain what is right but what the rulers desire.

We would do better to follow the second group and explain their school of thought in specifying the meaning of "those in authority." Professor Imam Shaykh Muhammad 'Abduh states "that 'those in authority' in our time are these: the great scholars, the commanders of soldiers, judges, big agriculturalists and merchants, the owners of public interests, heads of cooperatives and companies, heads of [political] parties, and the geniuses among the writers, physicians, and lawyers. Those whom the umma trusts and to whom they refer their problems, no matter where they are." The people of every country know who among them is trustworthy and whose opinion is the most respected. It is easy for the head of government in every country to recognize them and to call upon them for counsel, if he so wished.

As ['Abduh] states: those countries whose authority derives from the basis of counsel have delegated to the people the right to elect those whom they trust to make the laws and oversee the government's execution of them, and to elect those whom we trust to the courts and to administrative councils, etc.

Such elections will not be considered legitimate by us unless the people have absolute choice in the elections, without governmental or other kinds of pressure, without coaxing or coercion. The purpose of this is that the people [should] know their rights to such elections and their aims. If others were to be elected due to the use of governmental authority or that of some other party, such elections would be illegitimate, and those elected would not have the authority of "those in authority." From this it follows that obeying them would not be a duty legitimated by the [above] verse; rather, the matter would enter the realm of the authority of those who defeat others. This situation is illustrated by the similarity between someone who is forced to elect a man to be a representative of the umma for a so-called legislative authority, if he is coerced, and someone who marries or buys [something] through coercion—neither his wife nor his purchase will be permitted to him by God.

The above statements by the Imam ['Abduh] lead us to the conclusion that there are two rules: the rule of selecting "those in authority," and the electoral rule that is applied in those countries that build their authority on the basis of counsel. The Professor Imam's ['Abduh's] mention of the second rule indicates that general elections had not yet been mandated during his lifetime, and that governing was not parliamentary.

Today, we practice our electoral life based on the second rule. We have a parliament, and in it there are a variety of specialized committees overseeing matters from a technical perspective, which they then refer to parliament for a decision. Some people say that this suffices, and that parliament is shura, consisting of members who are “those in authority.”

It is not exactly so. For “those in authority” are a special type of people. They are experienced in life and have dealt practically with technical and vocational matters, and in doing so, have acquired the know-how which made them trustworthy to the people and capable of handling their concerns. Here we suggest a practical procedure which helps to combine the two rules: the rule of selecting “those in authority” and the rule of general elections, in order that the matter of forming a legislative authority be resolved on a good foundation, in accordance with the first meaning of “those in authority.” This suggestion can be summarized as follows:

First, the size of the legislative council should be double the number of electoral districts. There is no objection to reducing the current number of electoral districts, so that the public treasury will not be charged large sums of money.

Second, people will elect one member for each district. This member will serve as the representative of the people. The duty of the people’s representative is to convey to the council the desires of the people for reform and the problems of their daily living which inhibit their labor and production.

Third, those who represent the vocational and technical institutions in parliament should be selected on the basis that they will serve as “those in authority.” They should look into problems that the people’s representatives bring to them, study the solutions, and then make decisions whose execution is obligatory. These decisions must be made with the approval of all members, both those elected by the people and those selected by the vocational and technical institutions.

In this way we combine the old and the new in the counsel system. We take from the old the group of “those in authority,” the people with influence, those who participate in the shura, and from the new we take the constitutional systems forming parliaments or legislative bodies. This is the only way to establish our modern state on the basis of our traditions and in the spirit of our religion. In doing so, we achieve the general good of all citizens, and we render the rights of the people and those of religion compatible.

Obeying these people is mandated by the Qur’anic text: “Obey God and obey the Messenger and those of you in authority.” (Sura 4, verse 58)

The Professor Imam [‘Abduh] states on the issue of “those in authority” and their authority, which the bounteous Qur’an has bestowed upon them, that if they were to agree on a matter or on a judgment, they must be obeyed, provided that they be from among us; that they not contradict God’s ordinances or the sunna [practice] of His Messenger which was handed down to us; that they be selected to look into matters ... and that they be in agreement over general interests—the only things over which “those in authority” have any authority. As for worship and religious matters, this does not involve those with influence—for that is taken solely from God and His Messenger. No one should have an opinion on these matters, except to understand them.

The people must accept these judgments and submit to them in secret and in public. In this, the people will not be submitting or humbling themselves to any human being, nor lie outside the circle of the unity of God, whose slogan is: “For the lawgiver is God, and judgment belongs to God, who has ordained that you will not worship anyone but Him.”

The people will follow God’s ordinances, the judgment of His Messenger, may God’s peace and benediction be upon him, or their own orders, which were deduced on their behalf by the community of “those in authority” and those with influence, know-how, and experience from amongst them, in whom they have placed their trust, feeling secure in their loyalty and agreement as to what is best for them.

 5

The orthodox caliphs [the first four caliphs who followed the Prophet Muhammad] and their just judges knew the heads of the community as well as those with knowledge, sound opinion, and religion. They knew that these were “those in authority” and called upon them when the need arose. The umma oversaw their prince, so that if he made a mistake, even the weakest of men or women would reproach him for it.

None of the orthodox caliphs had any sense of chauvinism that would have allowed them to be despotic toward the Muslims if so desired.... The orthodox caliphs were loyal to [the principles of] “those in authority” participating in governance and abiding by their opinion on things about which there was no [Qur’anic] text, because of the strength of their religiosity and their justice, and because this was ordained [by God]. Even if [the caliph] desired, he could not adopt—though Islam was at the zenith of its power—a sense of chauvinism that he would use to rule arbitrarily without “those in authority.”

The Umayyads [caliphs, 661–750] shook the structure of Islamic authority away from the basis of shura by developing a chauvinism in Syria, through which, by trickery and violence, they destroyed the authority of “those in authority” over the rest of the Muslims and kept all authority to themselves. Thus the prince answered to the authority of his group, not to the authority of “those in authority” among the Muslims. Little by little, they strayed from the guidance of religion.

Then came the ‘Abbasids [caliphs, 750–1258] with Persian and Turkish chauvinism. Then came power plays among the kings of the different sects with their own chauvinism. Islamic government was no longer based on obedience to God, His Messenger, and “those in authority.” Rather, it removed “those in authority” from public authority.

As for obeying God and His Messenger by being just and returning trust deposits to their owners, this varied according to the degree of difference in knowledge and religion among the princes. The judgments of ‘Umar ibn ‘Abdul ‘Aziz [caliph, 682–720] were comparable to the orthodox caliphs in justice—but he was unable to return the greatest trust deposit to its rightful owners, because his chauvinism had monopolized the love of authority and leadership.

Then followed the authority of the Ottoman kings [reigned 1281–1924] with their nationalist chauvinism, and the well-known strength of their Janissary army. These [soldiers] were not selected from “those in authority,” nor from those knowledgeable in Islamic jurisprudence, nor those of sound opinion, who would normally have been the people with influence among Muslims. They were mixtures of Muslims and unbelievers whom the sultans took and raised in military style. They then became Muslim soldiers, and then soldiers of different mixtures.

 6

What remains is a balancing act between what scholars have concluded and what is taking place in modern states. The [following] text is from the Imam [‘Abduh]. He states, may God have mercy on his soul, that there exists only a simple difference between the basic law which the [Qur’anic] verse mandated and the basic laws of the highest forms of government of our time [European governments]—and we are closer to what is correct. They [the Europeans] say that the umma is the source of laws. We say the same thing with regard to matters for which there is no Qur’anic reference or mention in the sunna, as the Imam [Fakhr al-Din] al-Razi [1149–1209] has stated. And very few things have such references [in the Qur’an].

They [the Europeans] say there must exist those who would represent the people so that what they decide would be as if the people had decided it. We too say the same thing. They say that this is known as elections, and that they have different ways of organizing them. We have not been limited by the bounteous Qur’an to a specific way. We have the right to follow in every age the way we feel will achieve what is intended. [God] called those who represent the people “those in authority,” which means those who are distinguished among the people, to whom people’s interests are referred, whom the people feel safe in following. They may be confined to the center of government at times, as they were at the beginning of Islam.

They [the Europeans] say that if [the representatives] agree, the government must execute that which they agree upon. And the people must obey. They have the right to bring down the ruler if he does not execute their law. And we say the same thing. This is the real consensus which we consider to be one of the fundaments of our law.

They [the Europeans] say that if they disagree, the opinion of the majority should be followed. We know that the Prophet acceded to the opinion of the majority, even if it was incorrect, as occurred during the battle of Uhud. And this position on his part, peace be upon him, trained us.

The opinion of the majority is not the correct opinion—but it is the one on which people with real interests agree.

 3. Taleqani’s Last Sermon

Mahmud Taleqani

Ayatollah Mahmud Taleqani (Iran, 1911–1979) established a reputation as a reformist within the Shi'i Muslim religious establishment in the early 1960s when he helped to lead (along with Mehdi Bazargan, whose work is also included in this volume) a religious movement aimed at revitalizing both Islamic theory and Iranian politics.[111] Arrested and jailed repeatedly by the monarchy for his political opposition, Taleqani was released for the last time in the fall of 1978 and immediately became one of the most respected leaders of the Iranian Revolution. Upon the shah's fall in early 1979, Taleqani began to chart a course somewhat independent of the official policies of Imam Ruhollah Khomeini, particularly in his defense of Islamic leftists and local elections.[112] The final sermon before his death in September 1979, excerpted here, is famous among Iranian oppositionists for its sharp criticism of religious oppression. The sermon's reference to Sanandaj (capital of the Kurdish region of northwest Iran) concerns Taleqani's attempted mediation between Kurds who sought autonomy through local councils—a political structure that Taleqani preferred—and the central government in Tehran, already organizing itself in an authoritarian direction. Taleqani's mediation failed and the councils were crushed militarily.[113] Brief portions of this sermon have been translated in more colorful language by Suroosh Irfani.[114]

<quote>

Those who follow the Messenger, the Prophet of the common folk, described in the [Jewish] Torah and the [Christian] Gospel, who enjoins righteousness and forbids wickedness, makes lawful what is good and prohibits what is bad, who relieves them of their burdens, and the yoke that lies upon them. Those who believe and honor and help him, and follow the light sent with him, are those who will attain their goal.

<right>

(Qur'an, Sura 7, Verse 157)[115]

</right>

</quote>

Those who follow this great Prophet, this exalted leader of humanity, this Prophet of the common folk, who arose from among the masses of the people, from among the illiterates and for them, for their benefit, not from among one specific group, the class specified in the verse “the Messenger, the Prophet of the common folk.” This Prophet, whom the other prophets had foretold, fulfilled their prophecy and their mission [as stated in] the verse “described in the Torah and the Gospel.” This Prophet came in order to raise the people to righteousness, to free them from wickedness, this Prophet came to make lawful all the good that previous religions had forbade, to remove the yokes and prohibit what is bad. The verse “who relieves them of their burdens”: he removes the heavy burdens which lay upon the shoulders of humanity, and opens the bridges that had been closed to the people’s mind and thought, to the people’s living and life.

This goal was the basis for the moral of “enjoining righteousness and forbidding wickedness,” the moral of banning the Kharijites [an early sect of Islam], removing burdens and yokes. What does “burden” mean? It means ... those impositions of mind and thought and belief which the world of paganism and unbelief had imposed upon the minds and thoughts of the people, the class system which had been imposed and bound upon the mass of the people, those laws and rules and customs which had burdened the people with back-breaking impositions, those deceits which had bound the mind and movement of the people hand and foot. This Prophet came to remove all this and expose these deceits. This was the goal of this Prophet—that is, to free the people, to free them from class oppression, to free them from pagan thoughts which had been imposed upon them, to free them from the ordinances and laws which had imposed for the benefit of one group, one class, over others.

This was the mission of your Prophet, [and] we also must pursue this same mission. These martyrs also were pursuing this same mission, against imposed culture, against imposed economics, against imposed laws, against police restrictions imposed upon the people sometimes in the name of religion, which is the most frightening of all. This is what the bishops and monks and their cooperation with the ruling classes have imposed on the people in the name of religion. This is the most frightening imposition: that which is not of God, which is not on the side of truth, has been bound upon the people hand and foot in the name of God. They have blocked people from evolving, they do not allow the right of protest, they do not allow the right of criticism, they do not allow the right of tree activity for people and Muslims and the free people of the world. This too is a “burden.” This too is a yoke. These are the yokes for which the Prophet was sent, to save humanity afflicted with all these deceits, so that following this Prophet, we might save ourselves and save others.

The call of Islam is the call to mercy and freedom. The start of each sura begins in the name of two mercies, a general mercy and a specific mercy: “In the name of God the merciful and compassionate” and “We have sent you as a mercy unto all the creatures of the world.” [Qur’an, Sura 21, Verse 107] In this mercy is mercy for all people. Even the sinner who is condemned to death—under Islamic law there is mercy for him too, that his sins might be cleansed of his residual evil, and that people may become free [through] mercy to others. His [the Prophet’s] jihad [religious struggle] was mercy, his hijra [migration from Mecca to Medina] was mercy, his laws were mercy, his guidance over principles was mercy—the Islamic order ought to be based on mercy.

If we begin by carrying out this mission of God’s mercy for our own people and others, many problems will be solved, many of these convulsions [of postrevolutionary Iranian society] will disappear. Already oppressed people throughout the country do not believe that the mission of Islam and of our revolution [against the shah] is for freedom, because [freedom] has been so little seen in these problems which arose in Kurdistan. If we had tried prevention instead of punishment, if when I went to Sanandaj [the capital of Iranian Kurdistan] I had acted with both hands, if I had contacted these people [the Kurds] under the care of mercy, under the auspices of mercy, and the armed bands had been removed from them, those armed bands imposed on them, imposed on them by the evil traitorous regime [of the shah], then perhaps these problems would not have occurred, or would have occurred less....

But we have not yet recognized the goal of Islam. We all talk about the Islamic revolution—ask yourself, what is the goal of Islam? This group, that group, “they curse one another.” [Qur’an, Sura 29, Verse 25] This one contradicts that one, this one calls that one reactionary, this one calls that one deviationist. But we have not yet recognized what Islam demands, what the purpose of Islam is. If the goals are recognized, if we start on the path toward the goal, many of these confrontations will be reduced....

 4. Shari’a: The Codification of Islamic Law

Muhammad Sa’id Al- ‘Ashmawi

Muhammad Sa’id Al-‘Ashmawi (Egypt, born 1932), chief judge of the High Court of Appeals and the High Court of State Security, may well have passed sentence on the Islamic radicals who have waged a campaign against the authoritarian Egyptian state. In the book excerpted here, he condemns the radicals in a different manner, criticizing the theological basis for their calls for an “Islamic state.” His “vigorous” attack[116] on what he calls “political Islam”[117] provoked “intense reactions” when it was published in Egypt in 1987, angering conservatives—including the head of the state-run Islamic university, the Shaykh al-Azhar—and pleasing liberals, even oppositionists who infrequently sympathize with top state officials.[118]

Since the adoption of the Egyptian Constitution in 1971, which states that “the principles of Islamic Law (shari’a) are a principal source of legislation,” the question of the codification of the shari’a has taken on a political dimension. This concerns the ruling as well as the opposition parties, the moderate religious scholars (‘ulama’), as well as preachers who know how to play upon tensions. Because of such politicization, discussion of the law does not rise above the level of political agitation and superficial reflection and feelings. This politicization is to the detriment of serious approaches which seek to be impartial.

Thus, the first Egyptian Congress of Justice organized in Cairo in April, 1986, proposed in one of its recommendations “the elaboration of projects of law drawing from the shari’a and a revision of all laws in effect in order to bring them into conformity with the shari’a.” That recommendation raises many questions. Is it true, as has been said here and there, that the recommendations of the Congress reflect more the opinion of the religious scholars than of the judges, and if so is one speaking of the opinion of all the judges or of only a part of them? Is it a matter of applying the shari’a in a sense that implies the abrogation of all Egyptian laws and their recodification in a specific manner—or is it a matter of maintaining present laws once they have been amended so as to suppress any dispositions contrary to the shari’a ? Was the recommendation adopted on the basis of serious and impartial studies or did it reflect merely the conflicts which trouble Egyptian political life? Finally, should one conclude that our judiciary has renounced the prestigious patrimony it built up during a whole century and which is rightly its pride and that of all Egypt?

Our people—or better still, the entire Arab people—hold a very high opinion of the Egyptian judiciary. They have the right to expect, when it faces a matter as delicate as this, that it does so with the seriousness and serenity which ordinarily characterize its work. They expect to find in its recommendations the rigor and logic it devotes to editing and researching its judgments.

It is with such serenity and rigor that we intend to reflect here on the problems posed by the codification of the shari’a. First, we shall give the term a precise definition. To do so we shall refer to the dispositions of the Qur’an and the prophetic tradition regarding the Prophet (sunna), and then to the Egyptian legislative and constitutional texts in which it is mentioned. By comparing its senses in these two types of norms we shall be able to determine to what degree the two understandings are concordant or contradictory. Only then will we know how to modify or complete our legislation.

 The Term Shari’a in the Qur’an

The term shari’a appears as such only once in the Qur’an: “Men we set thee upon an open way (shari’a) of the Command; therefore follow it” (Sura 45, Verse 18), but one finds there three other terms from the same root (Sura 42, Verse 13; Sura 5, Verse 48; Sura 42, Verse 21). In all these places shari’a signifies not judicial norms but the route or the way. The Qur’anic sense is the one given in all the dictionaries of the Arab language: the verb shari’a signifies to go to water, and the names shar’a and shari’a mean either to give to drink or the road or the slope leading down to the water.[119]

At first shari’a was used in the sense of a path or way of God. To this were integrated the legal rules revealed in the Qur’an; then those which appear in the prophetic verbal traditions (hadith), and later the exegesis, glosses, opinions, personal opinions (ijtihads), religious opinions (fatwas), and judgments—in brief, all that completes and clarifies these fundamental rules in order to constitute Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh) as this has taken shape in history. In the profane sciences, one can use a word in the sense it has acquired in the course of a long history; nothing authorizes us to do so when it is a matter of a Qur’anic term. There any changes of meaning lead inevitably to deforming the sense of the text and thus to corrupting Revelation. Authentic Islamic fundamentalism should always begin by rediscovering the sense had by the Qur’anic term at the time of their revelation, based upon the Qur’an itself and on the ancient sources. To restrain oneself to only their present sense leads to grave danger for Islam and for the whole society.

 The Term Shari’a in Egyptian Law

In Article 7 of the Penal Code of 1937 one finds, “In no case are the dispositions of the present Code to limit the personal rights defined by the shari’a”; moreover, Article 1(a)(2) of the 1948 Civil Code states that in the absence of any applicable legislative decision, the judge will rule according to precedent, or lacking that, according to the principles of the shari’a, or where this is silent the judge will have recourse to natural law and the rules of equity.” That text introduced for the first time in Egyptian legislation the expression “principles of the Islamic shari’a.” The legislation did not clarify what is to be understood by that expression. Nevertheless the preparatory work of the Civil Code shows that it means the combination of principles common to the different schools of Islamic jurisprudence.[120] In other words, in 1948 the legislature chose the usual meaning of the term.

Since then Article 2 of the 1971 Egyptian Constitution (“the principles of the Islamic shari’a are a principal source of legislation”) was modified by the constitutional amendment of May 22, 1980: “The principles of the shari’a are the principle source of legislation.” Although the 1971 Constitution is not accompanied by an explanatory memorandum or a collection of preparatory works permitting one to know what the legislature understood by “principles of the Islamic shari’a,” there is every reason to think that in the constitution this expression has the same meaning as in the Civil Code: in this sense the report of the ad hoc commission charged with preparing the 1980 amendment indicates explicitly that “by this expression the commission has in mind the set of principles common to the school of Islamic jurisprudence.”

It is not necessary to state that there is nothing in the preparatory works, or in similar references, which aid in knowing the intention of the legislator in using the phrase “principles of Islamic shari’a,” which could be considered as contradicting the text. In effect, if the text does not allow us to decide between the two senses of the term shari’a, it is only such documents that allow us to know what was willed by the legislator. It would be purely arbitrary to say that this text makes implicit allusion to the first sense of shari’a. There is no reason why the legislator would make allusion in such legislative texts as the Constitution or the Civil Code to “the way of God.” Such terms come naturally from morality and piety, but have nothing to do with legal language. Furthermore, the word “principles” signifies properly the essential bases on which something is founded and nothing else, whereas the way of God constitutes an indivisible whole which includes at the same time both the foundations and the edifice constructed thereupon. At most one could say that the principles or foundations are moral or cultural rules; that they are not, in any case, legal norms.

Consequently, the expression “principles of the Islamic shari’a” designates without the shadow of a doubt “the set of principles common to different schools of Islamic jurisprudence.”

If, despite that objective demonstration, one continues to think that it designates the only Qur’anic legal norms, we would say that these norms cannot constitute the principles or foundations of the shari’a because they are fashioned in different places and are not general norms. Moreover, they cannot serve as a basis for other norms if they are considered as the totality of the norms. That would be possible only if one understands by this that they constitute the bases from which Islamic jurisprudence deduces and derives its other norms, in which case one returns to our point of departure, namely, that the “principles of the shari’a” designate the totality of the norms common to the different schools of Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh).

This does not dispense us from examining the legal norms mentioned in the Qur’an and comparing them with Egyptian legislation to see to what point they are or are not in conformity and whether or not it is necessary to codify and rework Egyptian legislation in order to remove any lack of conformity.

 Legal Norms in the Qur’an

Of some 6,000 Qur’anic verses, only 200 have a legal aspect, that is, approximately one thirtieth of the Qur’an, including the verses which were abrogated by subsequent ones. This shows that the principal object of the Qur’an is moral in nature: it is concerned to inscribe the fault in the soul of the believer, to elevate his conscience and morality in order that it might be its own proper shari’a in the sense of the way leading to God. Also, even when a Qur’anic law is applicable, this should be in the context of faith and justice, beyond any judicial partiality or deviation. On the other hand, judicial norms being by nature local and temporary, God more often left expressly to humans the work of regulating the details and the freedom to review them with a view to possibly substituting others in function of the needs of each country and epoch. Let us examine these norms.

In civil matters, the Qur’an contains only one normative verse: “God has permitted selling, and forbidden usury” (Sura 2, Verse 275), but it does not specify what should be understood by selling and by usury. Despite this general authorization of selling, the exegetes from the strictest to the moderate, basing themselves on certain hadiths, had prohibited certain forms of selling such as the sale of the entire fruits of a tree (muzabana), a sale before the harvest (muzaqala), the sale of a fixed portion prior to the harvest (muzara’a), etc.

We have shown elsewhere[121] what distinguishes usury which is forbidden by the Qur’an from the regulations concerning interest in Egyptian law: in substance, illicit usury is in reality only a loan at excessive cost. By exploiting the need of the borrower this results in his having to reimburse many times over the cost of the principal and could result in his being enslaved if he proved incapable of paying off the debt. It is reported that the Prophet himself had ordered the enslavement of a man named Sorak because he had not paid off the loan he had contracted.

As that verse was the only one containing an objective norm in civil matters, all provisions regarding relations between people (mu’amalat) had to be worked out by Islamic jurisprudence. That is why the Egyptian legislature was able to indicate in its preparatory work for the Civil Code that most of the dispositions of the Code “could easily be from the different dispositions of schools of Islamic shari’a.” And when in 1981, in the context of projects of Islamization of law, the project of the code of behavior (mu’amalat) intended to replace the actual Civil Code was presented to the general assembly of the Supreme Court of Cassation its report stated: “If our Constitution stipulated that the shari’a is the principal source of legislation, that does not imply that we should reject our Civil Code of 1948 whose elaboration lasted over twenty years and whose solutions, resulting from deep study, are derived in large part from norms of the shari’a. This is pointed out in the explanatory memorandum which, moreover, makes explicit the foundation in Islamic jurisprudence of a number of these dispositions.” Thus that assembly, as true representative of the Egyptian judiciary, decided definitively the question of the codification of the shari’a in civil matters.

There remain nonetheless two problems which merit closer examination: that of interest on debts, which for some constitutes a form of usury prohibited by religious law, and that of insurance contracts which some consider—wrongly in our view—as speculative contracts and hence as illicit. These two questions should be the object of a debate, as open as possible, to which the judges and all religious scholars should contribute, a debate that is really free and limited solely by a frame of authentic free opinion (ijtihad) as described above.

In matters of procedure, the Qur’an has only one verse relative to the proof of debts: “O believers, when you contract a debt one upon another for a stated term, write it down ... with the certification of two male witnesses” (Sura 2, Verse 282). The sense of this verse, limited to the certification of a debt, has been extended by Islamic jurisprudence to all evidence, including that in penal matters. One can legitimately hold then that extension is valid in one specific country and epoch and not in other circumstances. The objective of religious scholars when they have imposed a specific form of evidence in relation to Qur’anic punishments was to restrict as much as possible their application so that the civil punishments could be applied to all crimes, including those subject to a Qur’anic punishment.

In the manner of personal law, all Egyptian legal prescriptions relative to marriage, divorce, and inheritance are taken explicitly from the Qur’an, the prophetic tradition regarding the Prophet (sunna), and some prescriptions of Islamic Law which the legislature has considered to be the most adequate to the needs of society.

In penal manners, the Qur’anic penalties (hudud) strictly speaking are four: theft (amputation of the hand), calumnious accusation of fornication (80 lashes), adultery (100 lashes) and brigandage (execution, crucifixion, banishment or jail). The penalties for apostasy and drinking alcohol are not strictly speaking Qur’anic penalties, as the first is based on the two hadiths and the second was set by ‘Ali ibn Abi Talib [the Prophet’s son-in-law and fourth caliph, reigned 656–661] by analogy with the penalty for the calumnious accusation of fornication.

At any rate, many conditions must be fulfilled in order that these Qur’anic penalties be applied. The most important is that one be in a community of pious and honorable believers who have installed political, economic and social justice. This is necessary so that the judgment rendered in the name of religious law not be utilized for other purposes, and that the chastisements imposed in the name of Islam not be applied to Muslims by unjust governments or by harsh tribunals on the basis of arbitrary arrests or false witness, as has been too often the case throughout Islamic history and even more so in our day.

Contrary to a broadly accepted idea, Islam does not require that society apply systematically the Qur’anic punishments. On the contrary, it enjoins it to show tolerance and clemency. Thus, Muhammad said: “Strive to be merciful one to another in the application of Qur’anic punishments.” Each time society, by tolerance, avoids the application of Qur’anic punishments, it acts according to the spirit of Islam and the request of its Prophet. That same rule specifies that when a judge is presented with a crime subject to a legal punishment he should withhold application of that punishment if any doubt subsists as regards the facts, the witnesses, the victims or the author of the crime, according to the prophetic verbal traditions (hadith): “avoid the application of the legal penalty (hudud) in case of doubt.” Thus it is reported that under the caliphate of ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab [reigned 634–644], a woman came and admitted in the presence of ‘Ali ibn Abi Talib to having committed adultery subject to the legal punishment. ‘Ali said to ‘Umar: “Commander of the believers, this woman does not take account of the gravity of her words.” And they agreed that there was therefore doubt which would withhold the Qur’anic punishment despite her admission.

These Qur’anic punishments are so surrounded by conditions that in practice they are practically inapplicable; moreover, to these general conditions are added particular conditions for each penalty. Take for example theft: the object of theft must be marked by the seal of the owner and be in a well-guarded place, which excludes pilfering, open plundering and pickpocketing; it must have a money value; the robber must not be in great need; finally, for the majority ofjurists the Qur’anic punishment for theft cannot be applied if the robber has some “quasi-ownership” on the goods stolen, as is notably the case with public goods. For the punishment of fornication, there are required four reliable witnesses who have seen the crime with their own eyes from beginning to end and can swear “that a thread could not have passed between the man and the woman”—conditions which have not been satisfied once in the whole history of Islam. As for the punishment for robbery, all schools of Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh) agree that it should not apply if the bandit repents before having been apprehended, in conformity with the end of the verse regarding that punishment: “except for such as repent, before you have power over them” (Sura 5, Verse 34).

More broadly, the majority ofjurists think that the Qur’anic punishments cannot be applied against one who repents after the crime and before the execution of the punishment: an adage says for example “no amputation for the repentant.” This is because for the Prophet these chastisements are purificatory punishments which should be applied only with the consent of the sinner and should be withheld if he repents, that is, if he wishes to escape it. Thus, the Companions came one day to find the Prophet in order to report that a woman guilty of fornication had begun to be stoned but had fled; being caught again the punishments had been inflicted till death. The Prophet then became angry and said: “Why did you not abandon her to her fate?” It is better then not to apply a penalty to a guilty person who does not willingly accept it.

As regards the law of the talon [retribution], the Qur’an refers to it only in the case of injuries, wounds, blows and homicide: “O believers, prescribed for you is retaliation, in the case of murder” (Sura 2, Verse 178). As regards the talon for blows and wounds, it is evoked only in a verse alluding to a Jewish law and not as a rule to be applied to Muslims (“We have prescribed for them [i.e., for the Jews] a life for a life, an eye for an eye, a nose for a nose, an ear for an ear, a tooth for a tooth. Wounds fall under the law of the talon”—Sura 5, Verse 45). The law “an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth” was introduced in Islamic Law by jurists on the basis of the adage “the Law of our predecessors binds us as well except for what was abrogated” and a prophetic verbal tradition (hadith) which alludes to it without mentioning it explicitly. Thus, Islamic thought confuses shari’a—that is to say, the Qur’anic norm—with Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh)—that is to say, what results from the free opinion (ijtihad) ofjurists. As a result it has thought the law “an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth” to be a religious prescription and an integral part of the shari’a. In fact, if that law was a fundamental law which God wished to impose on Muslims it would not have been left to the evaluation ofjurists, but clearly stated in the Qur’an. Further, jurists who cite the adage “the law of our predecessors binds us as well except for what was abrogated” use it in a selective manner. They ignore it in the case of numerous earlier prescriptions which were not abrogated—for example, that which condemns to death one who strikes his parents.

The law of the talon poses another problem: it is not applicable when the victim or those responsible for him pardon the guilty person, whether or not that person has made financial recompense (diya). But to admit that a pardon may annul the penalty is, in our modern societies, extremely dangerous, for one risks thereby encouraging the guilty to put all sorts of pressure on the victim to obtain their pardon and to escape chastisement. It is enough to know a little of penal justice to know the extent to which pressure can be put upon victims in order that they modify or falsify their testimony so that the evidence can be subject to controversy in the judicial process. What will happen if these pressures would make it possible to stop the process itself? Our judicial system authorizes the retraction of an action as a civil matter, but not in a criminal matter for that would threaten the whole society, which is the reason why such a retraction is reserved solely to the public prosecutor. That system is better adapted to actual social conditions and does not contravene shari’a.

Since the Revelation, its four or six penalties (hudud) have never sufficed to stop criminality, which has always taken many forms. Islamic doctrine had to invent another institution, that of civil penalties (ta’zir). Through these, public authority—executive or legislative as the case may be—could designate as criminal any act it judged prejudicial to public security, to the rights of persons, to their goods or to their honor. It could punish such acts by the penalty it considered necessary, including even capital punishment. In our opinion, these civil penalties constitute the heart of the Islamic penal system. This very flexible system allows for the repression of all forms of criminality according as they appear. It can apply itself also to crimes punished by Qur’anic punishment wherever their conditions are not fulfilled. It permits the application of punishment for infractions under the law of the talon even when those culpable have been pardoned by the victim or those responsible for him, as is foreseen in the Egyptian penal code now in force. In other words, our entire penal law depends upon civil penalties and thus does not infringe at all upon shari’a. The penal code differs only in the results to which its free opinion (ijtihad) concludes in conformity with the social conditions of the epoch.

It is thus, in substance, that the issue of the codification of the shari’a must be posed: taking into account the profane as well as the religious points of view. The whole issue of conflict between the penal code and the shari’a is false, for Egyptian civil law, its penal law and its personal statutes are in conformity with the dispositions of shari’a and Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh). But when it comes to a political slogan, a pretext for self-seeking or a springboard to power, what was revealed by God is mixed with what was created by humans. Such a mixture risks destroying not only Islamic jurisprudence but the Egyptian legal system, which has resulted from a century ofjurisprudential and doctrinal development.

Before concluding, we would suggest here some issues directly involved in our subject.

1. Those who accuse the Egyptian legislature of having turned things upside down in 1883 by replacing the provisions of the shari’a by the current legal system should begin by studying more closely the legal system in force in Ottoman Egypt (1517–1883), which they abusively liken to shari’a. During that period, the law, which derived from the sultan, ceased upon his death. If certain provisions remained in vigor, that was by the sole force of custom. The magistrates named by Istanbul were not remunerated, but could place a tax upon trials. Of this they kept a part for themselves and sent the rest to the Minister of Foreign Affairs with a view to assuring the renewal of their appointment—a system designed by nature to seriously corrupt the judiciary. The competence ofjudges was limited to civil affairs. During the entire Ottoman period there were only two known cases of an application of the Qur’anic punishments and in these the principle, “Avoid the application of the legal punishment (hadd) in case of doubt,” was not well understood. As regards civil punishment, the judge could enter in only when there was a conflict between two people. His competence was limited to establishing the facts; the police authority pronounced judgment and carried out its execution. Further, if a criminal endangered the security of the State the judge lost all competence in favor of the police authorities. Judges had no independence, the instructions and charges were not organized, the judgments—whether from the judge or from an entirely different authority—were not provided with reasons and there were neither procedures of appeal nor a system of defense for the accused.

Could one say that the Egyptian Legislature of 1883 wanted to reject the shari’a when it sought to reform a corrupt state in which absolute power was the rule? This it did by elaborating a legal system which was clear, healthy and modern, and founded upon legislative codes over which the Egyptian judiciary has watched for a century. Should one accuse it of having substituted order for disorder, the power of the judiciary for that of the prince, modernity for backwardness?

2. Islamic jurisprudence is certainly general and exhaustive, but it dates from the first centuries of Islam. Since the 4th century A.H. (10th century A.D.), the door of independent opinion (ijtihad) was closed and Islamic thought ceased to enrich itself, to develop and innovate. By contrast, since 1883 in Egypt jurisprudence and legal theory have developed an original and modern outlook which, drawing on the best in Islamic Law, have given it a new completeness, variety, precision and force. That theory and jurisprudence have spread through numerous Arab countries, thus constituting an imposing patrimony which everyone today—people, judges and governments—should protect and not allow to be endangered.

3. Regarding the verse “When news comes to them, be it a matter of security or fear, they broadcast it; if they had referred it to the Messenger and to those in authority among them to ask their advice they would have known if they should trust it, for one refers habitually to their opinion” (Sura 5, Verse 83), exegesis cites this dialogue between the Prophet and Mu’adh ibn Jabal [died 627], his governor in Yemen: “How do you decide litigation between persons?” Muhammad asked him. “By means of the Qur’an,” he responded.... “And if not?” ... “By means of the tradition regarding the Prophet (sunna).” ... “And if not?” ... “By the opinion that I form through my efforts at independent opinion (ijtihad)”

On the basis of this verse and tradition it is said that independent opinion (ijtihad) constitutes an obligation for Islam. This has been surrounded with such restrictions that it has come down to repeating the judgments of the predecessors and sustaining the privileges proper to an elite. Because of the confusion between shari’a and Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh) and between rules relating to cultural practices (‘ibadat) and rules concerning relations between people (mu’amalat), this group has come to constitute itself into a kind of clergy.

Because of such confusion, Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh) lost sight of the fact that independent opinion (ijtihad) could not be practiced in the same way in matters regarding cult and those between people (mu’amalat). As regards the first, being regulated by the foundations of the law (usul)—that is to say, essentially the Qur’an and the tradition regarding the Prophet (sunna)—the only free opinion possible is that of reasoning by analogy on the basis of these laws (usul). As the second was practically absent in these foundations and must govern deeds and situations unknown at the time of the Prophet and the first development of Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh), it is logical, even necessary, that it be the object of a free interpretation (ijtihad). In such cases this must go beyond simple analogy or deduction on the basis of earlier opinions; with a view to the general welfare and in response to social conditions it must be truly creative. Ifjurists had been capable of theorizing the experience of ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab, they would have left us a theory of the temporality of norms. Unfortunately, with but a few exceptions, they did not go beyond a casuist logic.

One finds nonetheless, among some, the beginnings of this type of reflection in this sense. Thus the great Hanifite jurist, [Muhammad Amin] Ibn ‘Abidin [circa 17831836], wrote: “Numerous legal rules change in function according to the times, by reason of the modification of customs, of necessity or of the change in times. If they do not change they would cause difficulties and harm people, thereby restricting the rule of shari’a which directs us to smooth out difficulties and to avoid all prejudice.” A similar observation can be found from [Muhammad] Ibn Qayyim [al-Jawziyya, 1292–1350]: “God the All-Powerful did not limit the pointers and directives ofjustice to but one path, rejecting the others as useless; on the contrary, from this Law it appears clearly that His intention is to establish law and justice; also, when one finds this path one should prescribe to what it decides and declares to be necessary.” On his part, the Hanbalite [Najm al-Din] al-Towfi [died 1316] specifies:

<quote>

If a text implies any damage to the general interest (maslaha), it is the latter which should prevail.—But some say, that is against the text.—On the contrary, it reinforces the text, which was revealed in order to safeguard human welfare.—But, some would say, the text is better situated to know where their welfare lies, because it comes from God or His Prophet.—The text is unchanging, whereas human concerns are changing. To take into consideration that interest is to take into consideration that text in its integrity, and to respect the prophetic verbal traditions (hadith): “You are more in touch with worldly affairs.”

</quote>

Does Egyptian common law, aside from some exceptions, propose anything other than the installation ofjustice in society? Does not the action of the Egyptian judiciary, developed by serious and persevering work, seek to establish justice, law and security? If there is still someone who, after all that, could pretend that Egyptian courts and laws impede shari’a and the government of Divine Revelation, we would refer to what we have said above [in an earlier chapter of ‘Ashmawi’s book] regarding the terms shari’a and hukm [government], and recall the adage of Islamic jurisprudence according to which: “where one finds the common interest there is situated the Law of God.” Politics is the art of being in conformity with the spirit of that Law, and not with its letter; general welfare comes before the letter of the law. Supposing—and this is only a supposition—that there did exist in Egyptian legislation a text contrary to such and such a text or opinion of Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh), would not the opinion cited above justify recourse to a decision in the interest of society—for example, in order to avoid discord or to avoid an ordeal which might not help anyone?

4. In a recent article, a judge wrote: “We should note that when the codes still in force were promulgated it was not specified that they were founded upon the dispositions of shari’a, which shows that there was no such intention on the part of the legislator. But the application of the shari’arequires the existence of an intention for anything related to religion. Hence, we should revise these dispositions which do not seem to contradict the shari’a and then repromulgate the whole Code.”[122]

That position is untenable: if in Islam in matters of cult the proclamation of intention is obligatory for individuals—though not for states and governments—in matters of daily behavior (mu’amalat) only external acts are considered (“God alone knows inner thoughts”); contracts and transfers of property have force without their authors having to make known their intentions. No one has ever pretended that a public official had to declare his intention in order that the laws he promulgates be valid. And how could that be done? Must that intention be proclaimed by the Chief of State or the government, by the Speaker of the People’s Assembly or the presidents of the legislative commissions, or must it be subject to an examination of conscience by members of the legislative assembly? Must one be content with the majority opinion or require unanimity? Must one say that the lack of intention or a doubt in that regard suffices to render the law illicit?

Such proposals would constitute a prohibited innovation (bid’a). We have established, with great effort to overcome all doubt, that there is no contradiction between Egyptian legislation and Islamic Law (shari’a); or if not that it is so small that it can be transcended either on the basis of independent opinion (ijtihad) or because of the general welfare and the need to avoid discord and trouble command one to recognize reality as it is. Would one now present that bid’a pretending that Egyptian legislation, though in conformity with shari’a, does not specify the intention of the legislator and hence that the intention needs to be proclaimed before promulgating that legislation anew? That would mean suppressing the Egyptian laws in order to repromulgate them in a given sense in order that certain persons would have a special right of surveillance or guardianship. Would that not mean dismantling our entire legal and judicial system in order to rebuild them upon new bases and intentions made up from all sorts of pieces which are neither those of the ancients nor those of anyone else? ...

Such political conceptions of religion are extremely dangerous for Islam and for its shari’a. They imply the worst threats to Egypt; they would break in two its legal and judiciary systems, as well as the country itself, and declare an end to contemporary Egyptian Islamic Law, all without this being required by anything in religion or in shari’a.

* Part II— Democracy

 5. The Indonesian Revolution

Muhammad Natsir

Born in Sumatra, Muhammad Natsir (Indonesia, 1908–1993) was among the first Indonesians to receive a European education. He combined this Western training with his Islamic beliefs to create a modernist interpretation of Islam, which he promoted as leader of the modernist wing of the Consultative Congress of Indonesian Muslims (the Masjumi party) during the 1940s and 1940s.[123] After Indonesia regained its independence, Natsir rose to the prime ministership, serving for a year in 1950–1951. Thereafter, through his speeches and interviews, he “became identified as the champion of liberal parliamentary democracy.”[124] In the following essay from 1955, Natsir urges Muslims to accept the secular Indonesian state (analogous to the Kabir and Zafar essays in this volume). In 1958, Natsir appears to have abandoned these views, siding with an Islamic revolutionary movement in Sumatra, serving several years in prison, and emerging with far more rigid theological positions. The younger generation of Indonesian Islamic reformers, represented by Nurcholish Madjid in this volume, viewed Natsir as a recalcitrant member of the old guard.[125]

We fought for an [independent] state and initiated the Revolution on 17 August 1945. But it was not on 17 August 1945 that the struggle for freedom was begun.

The struggle, pitting political force against political force, between the people of Indonesia and the Dutch colonial government is more than nine years old. In a political sense, the struggle began in 1905 [actually 1911—Translator] with the establishment, by Haji Samanhudi [died 1956] and his friends, of the Sarekat Dagang Islam [Islamic Business Association]. The SarekatDagangIslam was followed in 1908 by Budi Utomo [High Endeavor Association].

In 1912 the Partai Sarekat Islam [Islamic Association Party] came into existence—the first-ever mass organization. That was the moment when we began to pit political strength against the imperialists by drawing on the political strength of the common people.

But really, with regard to the fight for Indonesian independence—or, at the very least, for selfdefense against subjugation—it had all begun much earlier than that. One may note down the name of heroes such as Sultan Hasanuddin [sultan of Gowa, 1653–1669], Teungku Cik de Tiro [religious scholar of Aceh, died 1890], Imam Bonjol [Sumatran revivalist, died circa 1837], Diponegoro [Javanese prince, died 1855], Sultan Hidayat [presumably Hidayatullah, sultan of Banjar, reigned 18601862], and others of the great inexhaustible spirit of selfsacrifice.

We know that, in some regions, it was only at the end of the 19th century, or the beginning of the 20th, that the arms of the imperialists were able to subdue popular resistance. In some parts of our homeland—such as Sulawesi, Sumatra and elsewhere—it seems that our people did not quickly lay down their weapons. They were conscious of their weakness with regard to weapons and material resources but they had weapons which were not material, weapons immaterial—as people would now say—that is to say: the weapons of conviction and firmness of purpose in defending themselves against colonialism.

 The Colonial Domination of Man Over Man

With such weapons as were available, the people opposed the great and varied armament of the colonialists. Their non-material strength lay in their conviction of God’s instruction: that they should hold themselves accursed if they were to let themselves be subjugated. Such beliefs as these are rooted in their very flesh and blood. Truly, there is no possible reconciliation between religious faith and colonial domination. The spirit of faith is a spirit opposed to tyranny, “to the exploitation of man by man,” as people say these days. They would feel as though they had not fulfilled the divine command, as though their religion was not yet perfected were they to allow themselves, or their folk, to be exploited by other groups or races. And that was as it ought to have been, for the religion they confessed numbered among its most important teachings, this, that one should oppose every case of the exploitation of man by man in any form whatever.

In its essence the teaching of Islam constitutes a revolution in opposing and wiping out every form of exploitation. Whether the exploitation bears the name of capitalism, imperialism, colonialism, Communism or Fascism—that s a question left to whoever wishes to be concerned with nomenclature. Such then is the spirit of freedom alive and burning in the minds of the Muslims of Indonesia. For centuries this spirit has been the source of strength for our people and it was this spirit too which built up and up and impelled us to proclaim, in the year of 1945, the independence of the Republic of Indonesia.

 The Meekest Nation

The world, on hearing the Proclamation [of Indonesian independence], was astounded and amazed because all of a sudden, our nation took a form other than what had been portrayed from the beginning. [The Dutch] had given the Indonesian people the title “het zachtste volk der aarde”(the softest people in the world)—gentle of spirit in the sense of willing compliance and being content under the rule of the acknowledged masters. But this most gentle folk now, suddenly, has undergone a metamorphosis, a radical change.

If formerly they might have been likened to sheep or goats which only follow, now, suddenly they became like tigers showing such courage and extraordinary valor that they have astounded men in foreign lands. Then there occurred events such as those in Surabaya, Semarang, Bandung and elsewhere through the length and breadth of the Indonesian archipelago. It seemed as though our people had buried deep in their souls a treasury of velour which, at its appointed time, was to burst out. In a condition of utter lack and without arms to oppose the allied armies which were bringing back the Dutch, it was that non-material weapon which rose among the Indonesian people. Raised by the leaders and men at the forefront of the Revolution, it touched a chord in the hearts of the multitude by means of a spiritual call which has often reverberated in the ears of that multitude.

 The Call “Allah-U-Akbar” (God is Great)

We heard the call and the cry on the radio to marshal the hidden energy. Millions of our people, men and women, old and young still recall the appeal of Bung Tomo [Sutomo, revolutionary leader, 1920–1983] through Radio Surabaya [in 1946]. He summoned the theologians, the religious teachers, through the whole of Indonesia with the call “Allah-u-akbar.” We greatly value it, that there should have been a young hero such as Bung Tomo. It was not just that he appeared bravely at the front leading the struggle, but also that he knew what many people don’t often know: that is, he knew where lay the key of strength in this nation of ours. He opened the lock on the hearts of the multitude with the words “Allah-u-akbar. “ He knew where to find friends. He also knew who were the friends who could rouse up energy and stir it to a high pitch. He sought those friends among the spiritual guides, whose names are never seen in newspapers and never inserted in the lists of leaders of political parties. He sought out spiritual guides—the ones called ‘ulama’ and kiayi—in the villages. He called and cried aloud, saying: Let us together open the lock to the hearts and minds of the people with the words “Allah-u-akbar. “ And in that way all the energy desired seethed up and flooded over in abundance. So it was too with material requirements.

The young pemuda [freedom fighters], there being that summons which held the key to their hearts, without hesitation constituted themselves as defensive forces, as barriers to protect their homes and villages, to fortify their homes and villages from the bullets of the enemy. Many of them fell as heroes, knights and martyrs. The women folk too did not want to be left behind; not even the very old were content to sit at home. For that, they received neither wage nor salary; nor were they ordered to go.

The only orders they received came from their own hearts, which had responded to the cry “Allah-u-akbar”’

 Holy Sign

That holy call became a sign for those who gave the call. It was clear to them that there was a motivating force among the Indonesian people which could marshal energy to confront disasters coming from the outside. And this was no mere motivation which could stir and unite people to crush an enemy who wanted to oppress; it was also capable of drawing out energy and power on a large scale such that, if one were skilled enough to direct it, it could build and give content to this nation of ours. Every leader is fortunate who is aware of this, and who knows also how to use this great force. And, on the other hand, sad is the fate of the state if its leaders have not the skill to use this potential, so that it explodes and becomes incendiary, or remains completely unexploited. At present we are searching for the way, and we have these questions to answer:

- What meaning do we wish to give our nation state?

- How do we give meaning to Independence?

Such questions we must answer, in the interests of future generations, the young men and women who will replace us.

 The Great Task

We face a great task and duty in the story of our people. Our nation is writing its history in the setting of world history.

We must answer the questions above together. Giving meaning to Independence: for us this is an action within the framework of expressing thanks and gratitude. We return thanks to God who, in such a short time (namely, just five years) favored us with such a mighty achievement in the form of our own, independent, Indonesia. This Republic of Indonesia of which we have taken possession is, we feel convinced, the gift of God for which we must thank Him.

There is much lacking in this republic of ours. Many are its shortcomings. There is much which we find unsatisfactory. However, with all its blemishes clinging to it, we must accept the Republic with feelings of gratitude and of benediction. For the faithful of Islam the expression of gratitude for a blessing is an obligation.

But it must be borne in mind that expressing thanks for divine favor is not merely being glad and joyful while releasing every instinct for pleasure and luxury. Expressing thanks for divine favor entails acceptance with consciousness of the way things are with all their potential weaknesses and strengths latent within them. Receiving with the intention of making improvements. Improving that which is still not good, strengthening that which is not strong, while making whole that which is still imperfect. That’s what it means to express thanks for divine favor. And it’s definitely not a matter of rejection, or of using scorched-earth policies, after having seen the many blemishes in what you hold in your hands.

Disgruntled people—those who, having received, feel a sense of deprivation—they are not the ones who know how to express thanks. There is but one teaching, one guide—to which we adhere—namely the word of God, the gist of which is:

<quote>

If you know how to show gratitude, I shall multiply many times what you have received. But, if you are thankless, unappreciative and unable to value it, spending your time in complaint and rejecting all of it because it is not enough, know then that my punishment is bitter punishment indeed. (Qur’an, Sura 14, Verse 7)

</quote>

We do not wish to become ungrateful reprobates. Such is the Republic of Indonesia we received, come let us nurture it, strengthen it and cultivate it from within with every good basis for healthy growth hereafter.

Because of that, answering the question, “What is the best way we can improve and perfect the blessing we have received?” is not so difficult for the faithful of Islam. We have been blessed with a homeland of such fertile earth and such good climate. Neither very hot nor very cold. It does not rain in flooding torrents as it does it in other tropical regions. Its heat is not a blazing, burning heat, which dries up and makes the fields of grass into fields of stone and sand. Our nation is a very prosperous land and abounds in natural wealth. Meanwhile, if we contemplate its human resources—again the praise is to the Lord—we would not be shamed, were we to be compared with the peoples of other nations. Our nation has a high culture. The culture referred to does not mean only the fruits of intellectual cleverness; it also refers to fine character and disposition which is pervaded by its internal basis of tasamuh (indulgence, forbearance), a basis of tolerance, people say nowadays. Discord and violent controversy are not one of our qualities.

 Tolerance

In other nations—as in India for example—religious problems between the Hindus and Islam often cause discord and difficult troublesome problems leading to fights and large-scale bloodshed never knowing peace. In our country, things are not like that. This is a positive benefit; something most glorious in the ranks of our people.

The wealth of natural resources remained comparatively undeveloped by the imperialists during those hundreds of years. It’s just some few percent which they took at the end. There is not yet here any large-scale industrialization as there is in the West. Industrialization of a revolutionary kind, which shakes the structure of society, has not yet built up to anything very disturbing in our society.

Feudalism, which distinguished the status of one group from that of another, was not something which reigned unchecked in our homeland. Our people possessed a quality which lived deeply rooted in their very bones, to wit: the quality to which we often refer as gotong-royong [mutual aid]. The conflict between what they call capitalism and the proletariat in our country has not—all praise to God—become basic, as has happened in Western nations since mid-way through last century.

In brief, it can be said we have a homeland still clear of the seeds of that which is capable of causing upset. This is something fresh and new which we want to develop. This is the base of our development. One might even say that a nation possessing the qualities and the geographical and sociological situation which Indonesia has, with a populace of between 75 to 80 million, is a state possessing special gifts, capable of making its own road into the future, consonant with the environment and the climate and the humanity of Indonesia itself.

 Our Own Method

There would be no point were we to go looking for methods which may or may not work well in other countries. There would be no point in our adopting wholesale all those other systems and methods. We can look for our own methods and systems, in accord with our material and our talents, in accord with the mentality of the great part of our people.

For us of the Muslim community, we are permitted to experience it just as it was instilled into his disciples by our Master, the Prophet Muhammad—may the Lord bless him and give him peace—thirteen and a half centuries ago. They also staged a great revolution to raise a very weak community into one of high degree, one which had great capacities. It was, to wit, a saying of the Prophet that, when we recall it today, gets right to the point. The occasion of his utterance was the joyful return of the people from the battles that had culminated in victory; they were glad and rejoicing because they had finally accomplished a difficult task with brilliant results. Said he: “We have just come back from a minor battle, from the lesser struggle” (raja’na mina jihaci’l-asgar)—even though that struggle had resulted in the shedding of blood and the loss of life, even though it had been murderous and utterly destructive. Yet in spite of this, he spoke of it as a small-scale battle, a minor battle—jihcuiasgar. And he went on to say, the community would confront another phase in the development of the revolution, called the jihad akbar, the greater struggle, greater than anything before, in which there would no sound of swords—nor of rifles—in which there would be no killing and being killed, no incendiarism, but which nevertheless would be more difficult than the holy struggles of the past. The struggle—the jihadu’n-nafs—would be a struggle to develop one’s own personality, to build up the identity of the Community, building up national strength and capabilities. This holy struggle would be more difficult than the struggle or battle with just the one slogan: “Kill the enemy—as many as possible.” This battle of the self (jihadu’n-nafs) is a struggle needing an organized plan, perseverance and a farseeing view, constant and enduring patience. Such a holy battle, the struggle to build up personal identity, and the Community, is a long-term struggle, a difficult struggle for those who seriously and earnestly want to carry it through!

It does not seem wrong to compare our struggle at this time to what our Master, the Prophet Muhammad—may the Lord bless him and give him peace—meant by the phrase ofjihad akbar (the greater struggle).

In this regard we give thanks that we have guides in how to build up personality and how to build up society.

 The Prophet Muhammad as a Revolutionary Leader

Muhammad—may the Lord bless him and give him peace—was a revolutionary leader. One of the elements of his revolution was the abolition of every form of the exploitation of man by man and the elimination ofpoverty and misery, as people put it these days.

Every teaching of Islam is, both in content and direction, concerned with the abolition of the exploitation of man by man and the elimination of poverty.

He said: “Poverty and misery are next to godlessness.” So poverty and misery are not to be let loose to rage unchecked around us, as they lead mankind into a state of rebellion against God. Good men may fall from grace, if poverty and misery reign unchecked. If character is not to deteriorate, if demoralization is to be checked, one method of curing it is wipe out poverty and misery. In the practical instruction given by Islam, every single one of us must use his own strengths and powers to increase and multiply production, to increase output so that we can elevate the quality of life of mankind and can mete out, in an orderly and fair way, the riches and the necessary goods. Why, zakat [obligatory Islamic tax] is only a small part of the system, and so too is sadaqa [voluntary charity]. Nonetheless, rampant misery and poverty can be abolished just by zakat and sadaqa, provided that they are administered in an orderly way.

 Freedom from Poverty, Suffering, and Oppression

The whole system put forward as a way of life by Muhammad—the Lord bless him and give him peace—is clear and explicit in its broad outline. That is, it is to create a society which lives in harmony. We, as the community of Islam, are not permitted to allow ourselves to accept poverty and misery. We have been commanded not to forget our fate here on earth. We have been told to use anything and everything about us, by deploying the forces of nature, things of metal, the products of the oceans, and so on to facilitate the harmony of life. God provided all of that for mankind. And all of that can elevate the life of man, so that it becomes a life of harmony and brilliance and man can feel the blessings of divine favor.

 The System of Production

According to the teaching of Islam, capital, or wealth, should not be accumulated without bringing about an increase in production. Gold and silver are not to be stored up just to be looked at and counted over repeatedly; they should be put into the wheels of production, invested in the productive process to increase happiness and the common welfare. God has pronounced His threat to men who accumulate unproductive property, namely on those called yaknizuna’dh-dhahab, that is: people who store up unproductive gold and silver to no useful purpose (Sura 9, Verse 34).

Wealth must not be static; it must be put into circulation so that the unemployed get work and the level of production can meet the needs of society. Or, in other words: while capital must be made productive, it is desirable that the employers or those who command capital should not be motivated exclusively by the profit motive but should give great weight to development and the needs of the community.

 Basic Human Rights

In the search for the good life and the well-ordered community, philosophers and sociologists as well as freedom fighters from all over the world have come to an agreement framed in a charter named “[The Universal Declaration of] Basic Human Rights.” The United Nations has a separate section for drawing up what they call basic rights for mankind. Nearly all the free nations of the world have recognized those basic rights as a conceptual basis to be made into a foundation for the development both of nations and of essential human nature.

Those basic human rights include, among other things, the rights to free speech and the free expression of opinion, the freedom to profess a religion, the right to a decent standard of living, the right to strike when this is necessary—yes, all sorts of rights. The charter of basic human rights is so arranged as to remind men that there should be no person under the exploitation of other men. It reminds each person, himself, that he should refuse to be used as a tool by other men. This is definitely a step in the right direction.

But it is not clear what these basic human rights have achieved. It has not yet been absorbed into the consciousness of each individual exactly what is his right, what is not his right, so that among the communities of the human race, those basic rights have yet to be frilly realized.

Man is instructed to fight for his rights. He must strive to attain his rights. Those who hold those rights will not just acquiesce to be taken over by him to whom the rights properly belong: he will defend that which he believes belongs to him. As a consequence of this being-aware-of-rights and that not-yielding-of-rights there is a clash between the holders and the entitled.

Organized labor says: “We have the right, you refuse to concede it; we shall use the strike weapon.” The employers say: “No, we want to see how strong you are. We are not going to concede even the slightest part of those rights without a struggle!”

And so a fight ensues with rights won and lost, and from the seizing of rights there arises a kind of system usually dubbed, these days, as “the struggle for life”—a snatching of life based on claim and counter claim, the consequence of which is that the strongest emerge on top while the weakest goes to the wall.

In western nations, it is this “struggle for life” outlook which holds sway at the moment, the search for life—even though other people might be crushed in the process.

But, we may ask, is that indeed the only road by which to achieve life and social welfare? The teaching of Islam, in confronting this vexed problem, holds a different outlook. Without in any way diminishing the necessity for each individual to know what his rights are, Islam first and foremost teaches that it is not a matter of “What are my rights?” but, for a Muslim, “What are the obligations which I have to fulfill?” ...

The basis of the Islamic approach to this problem has already been laid down by the great Prophet Muhammad himself—may the Lord bless him and give him peace—when he said, “No man has perfect faith who does not love his brother (man) as he loves himself.” It is on this basis that Islam holds the opinion that the employers’ group and the workers’ group do not constitute two classes each representing particular exclusive interests that conflict with each other and cannot be brought together. Islam considers both employer and worker as factors of industry each having his function, responsibility and share, each of the same importance in the process of producing the commodities which society needs....

The Islamic way of settling problems on the basis of mutual affection and mutual understanding and respect for the interests of the other party is the best way. That is without increasing hatred and enmity as is entailed by the concept of class conflict, which does nothing to reduce the possibility of the new danger in the tyranny of the trade unions. With the achievement of harmonious relations between employers and workers, organizations will change in nature and they will function as executive bodies which care for and elevate the degree of mutual understanding between management and the workers themselves. Thus, they will no longer represent two class heroes which in mutual confrontation are already under the power of mutual suspicion and mutual distrust! ...

Such is the essential teaching of Islam in bringing groups closer together, one stratum with other strata in society. It makes obligation the point of emphasis, that is what each one, individually, has to carry out.

Hence Islam teaches two kinds of obligation, namely fardu ‘ain and fardu kifaya. Fardu ‘ain is individual duty, the duty of the individual towards his God. This cannot be passed on to someone else, just as worship, the fast and the pilgrimage cannot be contracted out wholesale to other people. Next to fardu ‘ain there is fardu kifaya which must be carried out for one’s fellow men, for society.

Each individual must perform his fardu kifaya for the community. These two fardu or duties may not be ignored. Should one be withdrawn, all that remains is 50 percent: it is not whole. In this second type there are included what people now speak of as the social, the economic, and the political. Call it economic, call it political, call it social: it’s all actually [embraced] within Islam.

 Values of Religion

Religion and the profession of religion in Islam have such a close connection to humane values that the estimation of a man’s religious profession is based on what he does and how he does it to fulfill his responsibilities towards humanity. There are warnings in the Qur’an for the man who makes an insincere pretense of religion— called “one who makes a lie of his religion”—even though he bobs up and down [in fake prayer] five times in each 24 hours and fasts through the whole month of Ramadan. He will yet be known as the man who made a lie of his religion if he will not cast the slightest glance to the side to alleviate the plight of the orphans, the poor and destitute. “Do you know who it is who made his religion into a lie?”—so runs the rhetorical question in the Qur’an, which it then goes on to explain and answer itself, namely: “people who do not care for orphans, who do not protect the poor, those who let misery flourish, who feel quite content living to themselves, who give not the slightest regard to beggars.” Those are the people who make a lie of their religion. Such is the teaching of the Qur’an (Sura 107, Verses 1 -4).

The values of the individual and the worth of his religious profession are measured by the attitude he adopts with regard to the community. If we wish to be constructive, we must strive to bring about a society which, structurally, has the qualities of tasamuh [tolerance] and gotong-royong [mutual aid]. The spirit of gotong-royong internally is a fertilizer for the fulfillment offardu kifaya. There is no longer any doubt that such a system fits exactly with the mentality of the Indonesian people. In this Indonesia of ours there is no chance that any system based on the conflict of group with group or class with class will emerge. The system which meshes with the Indonesian national mentality is harmony of life as a fixture, but there is gotong-royong as well. Such is the teaching brought by the Great Leader of the Revolution, the Prophet Muhammad—may the Lord bless him and give him peace.

 Fanaticism

[The Prophet] brought a teaching for the abolition of what is called ta'assub or what people often refer to by the term "fanaticism" (although the expression fanaticism is not an exact translation of ta'assub). But let's use the word fanaticism meaning fanaticism in the broadest sense. Fanaticism in ideas, fanaticism in defending one's race and kin group. In this connection I had better put something forward, because often people assume that Islam is opposed to the very existence of races or nations—in short, they say, Islam repudiates the existence of race, as though those who have embraced Islam have lost their nationhood altogether. Such is not the truth. We can be dutiful Muslims while, at the same time, we sing with joy "Indonesia, my native land" [the Indonesian national anthem]. How are we going to lose our "Indonesianness" seeing that it was God Himself who made us into distinct races and nations such as can be seen at present, all over the surface of the earth. We must be able to be happy and to rejoice in showing to the outside world that this is how we, the people of Indonesia, are: this is our language, this is our culture, this is our hand-drawn batik fabric, these are our vital statistics, such are our carvings, such is our music, and so on.

There's nothing wrong in all that. We are even ordered to make our cultural contribution to the culture of the world at large. As a nation we are a member of the larger family of nations.

There is no need for the Muslim to have to strip himself of his nationality and culture. In the teaching of Islam, it is said that humanity has been made in different groups: different nations and different races. Even their languages vary. This isfitra, or "natural," as people say nowadays. The end of the verse says li't-ta'arafu: so that you might become mutually acquainted the one with the other. How boring it would be were we to see all the people of this world of no more than one skin color. If white, then all white; if black, then all black! In that case, in pursuit of variety—wanting to taste it—we might fly to the moon or to the stars in search of other people.

 Equality of Rights

Therefore, the natural condition or the effective law of God in effect among humankind will stay that way. But let us not feel, just because we have white skins, that we are, at once, superior to the nation whose skin has the color of the sawo fruit so that we feel we have acquired the basic right to take them under our imperial protection. Or, should we by chance have sawo-colored skins, let us not feel ourselves to be superior to people with black skins. That kind of thing is not healthy nationalism. That has evolved into racial conceit, racial arrogance, xenophobia. Such a concept of nationalism is indeed forbidden by Islam. Islam is a system which does away with racial fanaticism, narrow chauvinism—that which Westerners nowadays call racism. That way of thought, which Islam prohibits, is, according to our religious scholars (faqih), ‘asabiya jahiliya.

I want to say, once again, that, far from wanting to wipe out nations and nationhood, Islam has set down the bases for prosperous life on both the national and ethnic levels—on the basis of mutual respect, mutual acquaintance, give and take. If we are the Indonesian nation, take pride, if it pleases, in being Indonesian! But, beware, let us not slide into narrow chauvinism, headed in the direction of fascism or totalitarianism.

Do not rest assured that fascism or totalitarianism (or the rest) will not be able to grow in this our nation. It could quite easily grow. Fascism and the like constitute a mode of thought independent of whether skin color be white or black or ripe sawo, etc. We must be careful that fascism and the like do not grow in this democratic nation of ours which holds to the sovereignty of Almighty God. This is the responsibility of every Muslim.

 Racism is a Monstrous Disease

Racism is acknowledged to be one of the sources of the sicknesses of the world, giving rise to war after war. Chauvinism gives rise to forms of racism which are more dangerous for society, as for example the rise of fascist and totalitarian thought and other examples of the same sort of thing. [Adolf] Hitler [German Nazi leader, 1889–1945] said that the “Herrenvolk” was the master race; the rest were mixed races which could not be left to live their own lives; they needed the domination of the master race.

All of that evolves from ‘asabiya jahiliya.

For those groups who would be happier listening to, or would be quicker to accept, what we are propounding here if it were written in a foreign-language publication—say English—I would like to introduce them to a professor named [Arnold Joseph] Toynbee [1889–1975], one of the most excellent English historians of the present time. He writes in his book, Civilization on Trial, as follows: “The world at present has two diseases for which men have yet to discover the cure. They are racism and alcohol.” In a full and frank analysis, Toynbee declares that racism and alcohol are sources of the world’s commotion. Toynbee goes on to say: “If there is one system which can smash racism and the problem of alcohol, it is Islam alone.”

Toynbee is not a Muslim; he is a Christian. As a scientist he looks at facts as facts. He simply analyzes one state of affairs after another. Such were the words of Toynbee, speaking frankly and honestly.

 6—Accountability, Parliament, and Ljtihad

S.M. Zafar

Pakistan was created in 1947 as a Muslim homeland for South Asians, but its founders disagreed whether the new nation should be organized democratically or theocratically, with secular government or Islamic government, Western civil laws or Islamic shari ‘a law.[126] The debate over these issues was initially settled in favor of the secularists, but the succeeding decades did not dampen the controversy. By 1980, when the following selection was published, the secularist position was largely out of favor, and the military regime was set to impose shari’a law—hence the importance of this work by S.M. Zafar (Pakistan, born 1930). As secretary-general of the defunct Muslim League (Pagara Group), Zafar enjoyed Islamic credentials; as a lawyer and head of the Pakistan Human Rights Organization, Zafar was keenly interested in ensuring the rule of civil law. Zafar argues in this excerpt that an elected parliament is both grounded in Islamic precedent and necessary for holding the government accountable in the modern world.[127]

In the title of this chapter I have combined three topics because there is a very close and deep relation between the three. In Islamic teachings, distinction is commonly made between matters of religion (‘ibadat) and worldly matters (mu’amalat).

“Religious matters” connote the relation between humankind and God, and “worldly matters” connote the relation between humans and [other humans]. Religious matters are generally bilateral; as an analogy, the shortest distance between two points is a straight line. Thus religion brings humankind closer to God. Through religion, humans realize the existence of the authority of God.

In Islam, the details and shape of religious matters are determined. If they are presented properly with complete morals, then it is to be hoped that in society, there will be a majority of people who will be familiar with God’s divinity and authority, and it is hoped that this sort of people, to please God, will try to fulfill His every command.

With respect to religion, the responsibility of the government is to manage and arrange its institutions related to religious matters, that is, the mosques, Halal Consideration Committee [to evaluate permissible Islamic practices], hajj [pilgrimage] policy, the respect of Ramadan [the month of dawn-to-dusk fasting], and so on. But if the government doesn’t do even this much, then all persons must still perform their religious duties. And we all know that several respected scholars, even while living in non-Muslim communities, still fulfilled their religious duties. And they reached a high level of spiritual attainment.

But worldly matters are different from religious matters. This is not a bilateral relationship. Rather, on one side, it is a relation among people, and on the other side, it includes the authority of the rules determined by God. In worldly matters, a person’s responsibility is not as it is in religion. Rather, on the contrary, in worldly matters, responsibility often falls on more than one person, or on a group. In other words, this relation isn’t represented as one line, but rather as a triangle, rectangle, or other various geometric figures. With respect to the laws pertaining to worldly matters, Islam in some places gives full details, and in other places describes them only in brief. And for the application of these laws according to a specific situation, the necessity [of knowing] the specific details always arises. And when the situation itself changes, then of course the specifics of the situation also change. That is, just as when dots are put in various places, new triangles, rectangles, polygons are continually formed, so worldly matters can be construed in multiple forms.

However, one single thing must definitely be remembered: that with respect to worldly matters, one dot is fixed: the commands of God, described in the form of a law.

By way of example, take one small business regulation. There is a command that one must give the correct measurement of goods being sold. This rule has taken on the form of a triangle. Now if goods-sellers don't give the correct measurement then they act against God's command, and they earn God's displeasure. They are responsible on the Day of Judgment. But the issue doesn't end here. The rule is not enforced in action. Goods-buyers are also involved in this matter, and it is their right to receive the correct amount of goods. Even though sellers are answerable to God, [the buyers] don't receive any benefits, and therefore, they have the right to ask in return that the existing God-given government authority should assist them in this matter, and this government should save them from the person who sells them short. And when the government, having acknowledged their rights, makes a law which can save buyers from dishonest sellers, or can punish them, then the triangle becomes complete. Otherwise, a gap is left.

Let's extend this example and see that if the government announces that the weights for measuring goods will be issued with the government's official stamp, then instead of three, four dots appear on the field. The goods buyer, the seller, the government official who issues the correctly calibrated, government stamped weights, and then this command [of God] that goods must be weighed properly. If these dots are connected to one another, then instead of a triangle, then a square or rectangle is formed. At this time, with respect to the government official who is appointed to work on the weights, the law must be made that at the time of the issuance of the weights, [the official] shouldn't do anyone a favor or shortchange anybody. For example, the Electricity Act is a law under which the people who connect electrical meters must follow the special instructions issued, and those who don't follow this are criminal.

We will now extend this example even further. If the government announces that [the business of] manufacturing the weights and stamping them shall be given to a particular company, and the weights issued by this company will be provided by government workers and officials to the shop owners, then a new point appears. Now if we connect all of these dots together, then this time a pentagon is formed. And there will be a separate law made regarding this company. Thus we see that just as new details come before us, it is necessary to make new laws.

These laws are not given in the Qur’an or in hadith [traditions of the Prophet], nor could they be given. Then who will make them? One lone ministry of law itself cannot make so many regulations relating to society’s hundreds and thousands of divisions. And no matter how wise and devout an emperor or sultan is, he can’t keep an eye on all aspects of society. For this work, such an institution is necessary whose members have some connection with worldly matters and in which, after thorough debate, the process of making laws is established—not only so that in this institution every point of view and every school of thought and ideas has the opportunity to be completely and freely expressed, but also so that if the majority within this institution cannot make just laws, then the public can hold this institution accountable, and having removed its members, can install new members in their place. Parliament is the only such institution which can fulfill the above conditions, necessities and demands.

In all of Pakistan’s constitutions, legislative work has been handed over to the Assembly or Parliament. In the present 1973 Constitution too, this capacity has been given to Parliament alone. Moreover, this Constitution was made by a Constitutional Assembly, which was a truly representative institution. When Governor-General Malik Ghulam Muhammad dissolved the Constitutional Assembly in 1954, then a decision of the Supreme Court compelled him to establish a new Constitutional Assembly. Therefore the new Constitutional Assembly was elected and in 1955 it made a Constitution. Likewise, the 1973 Constitution was also made by an officially elected Assembly and was ratified.

Now [we shall] study the various clauses of this constitution. Among them most are such that in order to categorize them, one cannot refer to Qur’an or hadith. For example, in the 1956 Constitution, the federal structure that was created and the way balance was brought about between East and West Pakistan was the result of the particular conditions of Pakistan. To seek precedent for this from the time of the [first] four caliphs or to seek justification in the Qur’an and hadith is useless and impossible. Moreover, we cannot find any precedent in the history of Islam for making rules related to the way the budget should be presented in Parliament, which issues can be debated but not voted upon, if the budget cannot be ratified what effect would this have on the government, and all of the other items and articles [in the Constitution] designed to control the government's right to impose taxes and bring into debate its wrong policies.

The rule that the government can impose a tax on the people only after having had the [tax] law ratified in the representative assembly of the people was accepted 200 years ago and now it has been proven that without representation whatever revenue the government collects would not be a tax, but rather a penalty or fine.

In Pakistan, where there are several reasons for the bad tradition of avoiding taxes, there is also another reason: that Pakistan most of the time has not had a representative government. With respect to zakat [religiously mandated contributions], the question arises whether the government itself can collect zakat from the public or not. On this point, Islamic scholars have different opinions.

In our opinion, however, money like zakat also cannot be collected from the people and its correct expenditure cannot be made until the people's representative assembly approves the corresponding law. And for every revenue that a government must collect from any person because the government wants to spend it for a particular collective purpose, that person has the right to hold the government accountable. Once Hazrat [his excellency] 'Umar Farooq ['Umar ibn al-Khattab, second caliph, 634–644] was asked how his garment was made so long when the fabric he had obtained in the spoils of war were insufficient. Hazrat 'Umar Farooq answered that he had his garment made by adding his son's share. And because of this answer, the questioner had his objection satisfied.

But today, in a country which has a population of more than 70 million, how many questions can every citizen who enters the mosque ask of the responsible person [at the mosque], when that citizen won't know the answer to 99 percent of the questions and will have in turn to ask the secretary of the relevant department, who will not be praying at the mosque. To solve this problem, the present Assembly is arranged so as to reserve a one-week period to answer such questions, during which time the people can call the government and its employees to account. In that period, a detailed system of asking questions is determined, [taking into account] which question is connected with which day and with which department. And permission is also given during this period to ask further questions about previous questions.

In the laws of Islam, the most prominent is the law of accountability. No [school of] Islamic jurisprudence denies that Muslim government is liable to accountability and impeachment. All government agents, judges, and civil servants are accountable for their own actions. [There is the] concept of the Day of Judgment, according to which all people will have to give a complete account of all of their good and bad actions. Its application is not only to religious matters, but to worldly matters as well, and due to the immediacy of worldly matters, this rule also applies to the government.

The Prophet, peace be upon him, says, “Watch out, among you every person is a leader and every person is responsible for their own people, and the greatest leader of the Muslims, who governs all, is also answerable to the people.” AndHazrat ‘Umar says, “If even one goat’s kid is lost on the banks of the Euphrates River, then I am afraid that God will question me about it.” Not only God will question us, but as has been said before, worldly matters are not only between God and people, and [the questioning] must be thorough between people and people also. Consequently, the people should also question the government; parliament is the best means for this, and the thorough interrogation of the government can only be done by a representative assembly.

In addition to the necessity of making general rules and being accountable, there is a very clear necessity of an Assembly in matters of ijtihad [Islamic interpretation]. First of all, we don’t accept that the gate of ijtihad is closed forever. Who closed it? Why was it closed? And how long will it remain closed? These are the kind of questions for which history doesn’t have any clear answer. If the purpose of ijtihad is the application of wisdom and learning, then to say that ijtihad is no more, is a negation of Islam. Admittedly, we understand that in the name of ijtihad permission cannot be given for changing Islam’s teachings and its rules. This is the reason that at the end of the 8th century hijri [late fourteenth century A.D.] and especially at the beginning of the 9th century hijri [early fifteenth century A.D.], Islamic theoreticians became worried that an attempt was being made to change the basic worldly matters of Islam through ijtihad and that this should be stopped somehow. To preserve the community from this kind of ijtihad, these Islamic theoreticians curtailed even their own rights, and prevented themselves and others from practicing ijtihad. Moreover, that time was a period of decline in Islamic history. Therefore, for the benefit of the community, the consensus was reached that ijtihad should be left alone for the time being. But it is true that this attempt is in no way synonymous with permanently closing the gate of ijtihad. Now this is a period of Islamic revival, and it is very necessary that attention should be given to ijtihad. In this connection, we all know about the contribution from ‘Allama [Muhammad] Iqbal [Indian philosopher, 1877–1938; see chapter 27]. He called the decision of the Turkish Assembly ijtihad and he himself participated in ijtihad [to decide] that the burden of the caliphate could be shouldered by a single assembly.

We admit that the conditions of ijtihad are very severe and that Islamic jurisprudence makes it very difficult. The conditions that religious scholars have established for ijtihad are as follows:

1. In addition to the knowledge of Qur’an, a person should be familiar with literature also. He should have complete knowledge of the text of the Qur’an; he should know when every verse was revealed and what the circumstances of its revelation were; he should be well acquainted with the literal meaning of every word in the Qur’an; and besides this, he should know what connotations are hidden within these words.

2. He should have memorized the entire Qur’an.

3. He should have complete mastery of the science of hadith and command of at least 3000 major hadiths.

4. He must be very devout and pious.

5. He must be completely familiar with the science of Islamic jurisprudence (that is, with all five branches offiqh).

In addition to these conditions, Imam [Abu Hamid Muhammad] Ghazzali [1058–1111] and Imam [Fakhr al-Din] Razi [1149–1209] placed strongest emphasis on the intellectual ability of those who practice ijtihad. Of course, in fulfilling the aforementioned conditions, their knowledge increases. Thus it is clear that the conditions of ijtihad are very difficult.

Today, for any citizen to fulfill these conditions is especially difficult, because now, in addition to the aforementioned knowledge, it is also important that the person who practices ijtihad should be familiar with the needs of the current period, and he should know the rules of economics and be familiar with the rules of atomic energy. In addition, he should have complete mastery over problems of sociology and psychology.

These days, one cannot find people who can retain an encyclopedic range of knowledge in their memories. In fact, in every field of knowledge, so much advancement has occurred that it is completely impossible for one person, spending his entire life acquiring knowledge of Qur’an and hadith, to be able to obtain familiarity with and knowledge of other fields. Likewise, the scientist, doctor, or economist is busy in his own field, obtaining mastery and knowledge. Will that person be able to achieve sufficient status in the knowledge of Qur’an and hadith which would give him the right to perform ijtihad? Under these conditions, if there is no institution in which all fields can be combined, then Muslim society will have to survive on guesswork for new laws. But the answers to all of the questions raised by the needs of the present period cannot be answered through guesswork. Therefore, only an Assembly where the religious scholars sit down with the other representatives of the public and hold thorough debate on every issue can make the laws.

Ziauddin Sardar, a research scholar at Shah ‘Abdul ‘Aziz University in Jiddah [Saudi Arabia], wrote a book entitled The Future of Muslim Civilization[128]; in this book, he has made a very important point on the subject of ijtihad. “I reached the conclusion that ijtihadon an individual basis is impossible. However, if the work of ijtihad is handed over to an institution in which there is the opportunity to bring together all fields of knowledge, then ijtihad will be possible and easy.”

This is the only reason that the Islamic scholars of Pakistan have supported a parliamentary system. In 1950 and 1951 the religious scholars [‘ulanui]\ of Pakistan collectively supported the [proposal] that the elected assembly be allowed to pass legislation. When Pakistan’s draft constitution was being prepared in 1955, the whole ‘ukmm’ of Pakistan analyzed [the constitution] on only one point: whether anything in it was against Islam. They presented some recommendations, including one that national elections should be held very soon. However, nobody from that institution rejected the Assembly as a lawmaking body. Likewise, in the popular revolution of 1977, the political parties in favor of a religious approach took part vigorously and strongly pushed for elections. Thus it is correct to say that the people of Pakistan and the Uikmm’ think alike that through election, permanent institutions should be established; that the national government should also be established through elections; that if somehow the government becomes less acceptable, then it can be removed and a new government should be elected.

Quaid-i-Azam [Great Leader] Muhammad Ali Jinnah [1876–1948, the founder of Pakistan] thought differently. Instead, he wanted to make Pakistan a modern democratic state [as distinct from an Islamic state]. Now in Pakistan, in the name of Islam, this experiment is under way, and for this reason it is important that we should decide about the government system with complete faith and security, so there won’t be any lack of practical support.

In Pakistan, democracy has not failed. Rather, since the desire for democracy is now in [the people's] hearts and minds, we can conclude that the powers who oppose democracy and want to stop its progress have failed. But in this situation, we again are standing at the crossroads of democracy and monarchy.

The sort of temperaments that have an inclination toward dictatorship consider parliament their rival and generally view a parliament that has a certain degree of autonomy troublesome for them. [Adolf] Hitler [German Nazi leader, 1889–1945] called parliament a club of idle dreamers. [Benito] Mussolini [Italian fascist leader, 1883–1945] thought of parliament as nothing more than a forum for his own speeches. In Pakistan too, political tensions, quarrels, and disputes have continued to arise regarding the authority of the president and prime minister vis-a-vis the Assembly. It was due to these quarrels that [Pakistani Governor-General] Malik Ghulam Muhammad [1895–1956] dissolved the Constitutional Assembly [in 1954] when a legal document was introduced into this Assembly weakening the powers of the president.

In the 1973 Constitution, there was a specific clause added to the law which weakened the authority of the Assembly and increased the authority of the prime minister, making the latter very powerful. Thus it is clear that parliament plays an important role in limiting the increase in the powers of the current ruler and making him adhere to one [system of] law and keeping the president and prime minister within decided limits. How can this institution be rejected on the grounds that it is un-Islamic? In short, to call un-Islamic the institution which provides a means of accountability and a means of collective ijtihad and which can stand in the way of dictatorship is very unjust to Islam and presents Islam incorrectly. The result of this line of reasoning is that Muslims are frightened of accountability and avoid ijtihad, and Muslims think that a kingdom, monarchy, and even dictatorship are valid styles of Islamic government, even though they are not.

On the contrary, accountability, ijtihad, and democracy are Islam’s true foundation, by means of which Islam establishes a just and equitable society. And as long as the human intellect cannot create any institution better than parliament, there should be no problem in adopting this institution. Moreover, as the great Andalusian Muslim scholar Abu Ishaq Shatibi [died 1388] said, once we distinguish between religious matters (‘ibadat) and local custom (‘adat), every society should adopt only those religious practices which are determined solely by Islam. As for worldly matters, which fall under the category of ‘adat, there is a concession that traditional ways and customs can be adopted on the condition that they should not conflict with the rules of Islam.

We think that parliament is a logical necessity and mandatory for accountability and ijtihad. There is no substitute for this institution in the contemporary era. If we don’t adopt it, there are only two prospects before us. One is this, that as under the communist system, ultimate permanent power will be given to a political party like the Communist Party, and this would be the only party or group in the nation which is responsible for writing the Constitution and laws and applying them. In this situation, no matter what decision the leaders make, obedience becomes compulsory, and freedom of thought and of ideas disappears.

The second prospect is that a single ‘ulama’ council is set up which can perform the work of legislation, relying for the most part on conjecture and occasionally resorting to ijtihad. But this is an extremely dangerous prospect, because in such a situation lie the origins of popishness. Furthermore, [grounds for] confrontation between the people and the ‘ulama’ are generated. ‘Allama Iqbal was strongly opposed to this proposal and he wrote that to give special authority to one group of the ‘ulcmai’ is a grave error. Instead, Hazrat ‘Allama [Iqbal] presented the counter-proposal that the ‘ulcmai’ should be in Parliament as representatives of the people, so long as laws are made in an Assembly where the debate allows total freedom of opinion.

Thus the best and most perfect way is this: the ‘uhmm’ should retain its connection with the people, and [its members] should be sufficiently popular on the strength of their knowledge and wisdom and the power of their character and nature, that they will be voted into the elected Assembly.

 7—Religion and Liberty

Mehdi Bazargan

Born into a devout family of merchants, Mehdi Bazargan (Iran, 1907–1995) was a Frenchtrained engineer, a lay Islamic scholar, and a long-time pro-democracy activist. A deputy prime minister when the nationalists came briefly to power in the early 1950s, Bazargan also participated with Ayatollah Mahmud Taleqani (chapter 3) and others in a reform movement in the early 1960s aimed at democratizing the Shi’i clerical establishment.[129] Bazargan was imprisoned several times during the 1960s and 1970s for his nonviolent opposition to the shah of Iran through groups such as the Liberation Movement of Iran, which he cofounded in 1961, and the Iranian Human Rights Association, which he cofounded in 1977. When the shah was forced out of Iran by revolution in 1979, Imam Ruhollah Khomeini appointed Bazargan as provisional prime minister, but he resigned within a year, complaining that radical clerics were undermining his government. He continued to serve in the Iranian parliament for several years, harassed by his radical opponents, then lived in a sort of political limbo until his death in early 1995, a barely tolerated symbol of opposition to the radical-lslamic government.[130]

<quote>

O Prophet, We have sent you as a witness and a bearer of happy tidings and an admonisher, and to call [men] to God by His leave, and as a lamp resplendent.

<right>

(Qur’an, Sura 33, Verse 45)[131]

</right>

</quote>

 The European Renaissance and the Church

In one of the nights of the month of Ramadan of 1981, we gathered in a friend’s house to break fast and hold vigil. On that occasion, an old friend and colleague of mine, Mr. ‘Ezzatallah Sahabi [Iran, born 1932], delivered a speech on the European origins of the notion of freedom.[132] He argued that the roots of modern liberalism lie in the 17th century, when the feudal governments of Europe were struggling to free themselves from the hegemony of the pope and the [Catholic Christian] church. In those days independent and sovereign nation-states did not exist. Every town or principality was under the tutelage of a lord or noble. These nobles and feudal rulers were, in turn, under the influence of the local priests and the Holy See of Rome. The most chaotic of these countries happened to be Italy. Here a philosopher emerged by the name of [Niccolo] Machiavelli [1469–1527], whose book The Prince outlined the philosophy that came to be known as Machiavellianism.[133]

Pursuant to the liberation of the states from the hegemony of the Catholic church and the pope, free and scientific thought sought to liberate itself from the terrible hegemony of the Inquisition. As a result, the hold of the religious tradition and authority over people’s thoughts and lives was loosened; but it took a toll on the lives of such great scientists as Galileo [Galilei, 1564– 1642]. Investigating minds and blossoming intellects could no longer suffer the rigidity, stagnation, and tyranny of the Catholic clergy.

The next step in the European Renaissance was the religious reformation and Protestantism that was ushered in under the leadership of Martin Luther (1483–1546), John Calvin (1509–1564), and others. Protestants rejected the superstitions and religious restrictions of Catholicism. They aimed to return Christianity to its pristine simplicity, spirituality, and liberty. The same was true of the quest for the freedom of art and culture.[134] The movement culminated in the quest for social and political liberties demanded by the great French Revolution (1789–1799) and other democratic regimes. The forerunners of this movement were [Jean-Jacques] Rousseau [1712–1778], [Francois-Marie] Voltaire [1694–1778], [Charles de Secondat, baron de] Montesquieu [1689–1755], and other Encyclopedists [French philosophers of the eighteenth century], who were generally anti-clerical, atheistic, or agnostic.

The speaker went on to propose that Western democracy and individual liberties, their service to human civilization and progress notwithstanding, have been incapable of responding to human needs, economic problems, and social inequities. Hence the advent of socialism, communism, and existentialism in the wake of nationalism and liberalism, and the indefatigable search for freedom and justice.

 Religious Scholars[135] and Freedom

Let us return now to the original question: whether or not the liberal political and intellectual movement that triggered Europe’s great leap forward was an essentially anti-religious, anti-church, and anti-clerical movement.

We need to first explore the origins of the church’s opposition to freedom. The question is whether this antagonism was due to particular doctrinal and historical circumstances or a result of universal properties of all religions at all times. The answer seems simple enough. Setting aside the question of the truth and authenticity of religion, it seems reasonable to expect that God who, by definition, is omniscient, omnipotent, sovereign, and aware of the good and evil is better qualified to judge what is proper for human beings than human beings themselves. Does this belief leave any other option for believers than unconditional surrender to God's will? Furthermore, the priests and church, considering themselves successors of Jesus and representatives of God—and any religious scholars who consider themselves custodians and guardians of the people of God—would necessarily expect the people to follow and revere them, and to subordinate reason and science to the revealed commandments.

You realize that this doctrine leaves no room for the freedom and will of the people to administer their own affairs and to question—much less reject—the representatives of God who claim immunity from error as successors to the Prophet. Thus it seems that human reason and religious rule are mutually exclusive. Contrary to the Prophet's words—"The government can survive unbelief but not injustice"—it seems that the absolute rule of religious scholars would be necessary for the salvation of society, unless society renounces religion altogether. Consequently, democracy, science, investigation, expertise, and erudition seem to be the necessary results of denouncing religion and the religious scholars, while the acceptance of the sovereignty of God and the stewardship on earth of the church or religious scholars would lead to tyranny, enslavement, inquisition,[136] and violence. Ironically, then, the "heavenly" rule of God on earth would require surveillance, censorship, arrest, and torture. Violence against insiders and outsiders alike would be deemed the very essence ofjustice and charity. In such a society, the minutest criticism, discord, and transgression in matters ritual, administrative, political, and even personal would be considered as a transgression against God and His representatives.

According to the foregoing account, religious governments, not unlike Marxist states, cannot tolerate the freedom of ideas and criticism. Free expression and assembly, as well as strikes or demonstrations would be unthinkable; and the ruling party's judgment and execution would be swift and categorical. Both religious and Marxist governments recognize freedom and rationality only for their docile followers. For everyone else, freedom signifies nothing but corruption, confusion, promiscuity, and denunciation of the ruling ideology and regime.

 Freedom and Love

Not long ago in our country [Iran], parents used to tightly swaddle their infants (this practice may still persist in the countryside). The idea was to keep the baby from causing trouble and courting danger. In my father's household there was an old compassionate woman from the Kerman region by the name of Mirza Baji, may she rest in peace. She would teach us the recitation of the Qur'an and the prayers. She had many children, none of whom survived. After her children grew too old to be swaddled, she told us, she would tie them down with a piece of rope so they would not wander by the side of the pool and drown, or engage in dangerous games while she was away doing chores.

Restrictions, as this anecdote demonstrates, are not necessarily hostile measures. One should not attribute the oppressive rule of the medieval church entirely to ill- intent and enmity. Indeed, many of the fathers of the church seem to have been devout, kind, and innocent of abuse or arrogance. [137] It follows, then, that any religion and religious leadership that considers itself responsible for the realization of divine rule over the people, will of necessity become oblivious to human life, rights, and dignity, and will resort to coercion. This will eventually breed ignorance, slavery, and violence. People, in their turn, will sooner or later free themselves from the yoke of religious tyranny. Sometimes they do so without losing their basic belief in God, but often they end up hating religion along with the religious rulers.

That is why—throughout Western civilization, whether under democracy, fascism, or socialism—the idea of the separation of religion and state and the notion of the secular (that is, non-religious, and in a sense, anti-religious) form of government prevails. The more progressive the ideology, the more anti-religious the government.

 What Divine Religion is Really Like

Now, the question is whether all of God’s emissaries, particularly the founders of Islam, approved of the medieval Christian practices. Are religion and freedom essentially mutually exclusive? Were God’s prophets instructed to instigate bloody revolutions on earth, beheading skeptics, destroying anti-revolutionaries, sowing the seeds of hatred and discord, and swaddling or tying down the youths in the schoolyard of religion, like our late Mirza Baji?

The Qur’an explains the mission of the prophets both directly, through commandments, and indirectly, through the explication of the general divine plan of creation. What we learn from the story of the prophets and our own slogan, “There is no god but God,” is that the mission of the prophets has been to liberate human beings, not to enslave them. But liberation from what and from whom?

First, from the idols or imagined gods, that is, from the illusion of idolatry. Second, from the deception of the devil, or the temptations of the flesh, and in a wider sense, from compulsive worship of worldly goods. Third, from religious imposters, false guardians of temples and religions who propagated idolatry and opposed the prophets. Fourth, from the kings, louts, and possessors of the power and the riches, and the oppressors of the time.

In Suras 7, 10, 11, 14, 21, 23, 26, 27, 29, 37, and others that recount the prophets’ struggles, we frequently find the supreme command, “O people of God, worship none other than God.” Noah stated: “Do not worship anyone but God.” [Sura 11, Verse 26] In suras such as 20 and 28 that speak specifically ofHazrat [his excellency] Moses, God commands Moses and Aaron to say to the pharaoh, “Send the Children of Israel with us (that we may take them to their own territory and nation), and do not oppress them.” ... They were not told to curse or humiliate him but to “speak to him gently, so he may take heed or come to have fear (of God and the consequences of His action).” [Sura 20, Verses 47, 44]

We are told, with regard to Satan: “Did I not commit you, O children of Adam, not to worship Satan who is your acknowledged foe?” (Sura 36, Verse 60) We are commanded to resist the tyrannical temptation of the flesh, and to reject the rule of tyrants: “And do not follow the squanderers.” And: “The patrons of unbelievers are idols [and devils] who lead them from light into darkness. They are the residents of Hell, and will there for ever abide." (Sura 2, Verse 257)

God would not liberate us from the darkness and the tyrants to enslave us at the hand of His prophets and messengers. The Qur'an unequivocally announces: "There is no compulsion in religion." [Sura 2, Verse 256] It even urges the exalted Prophet [that is, Muhammad] not to worry about the derision and rejection of the idolaters and those who oppose him and indulge in sin: "And if your Lord had willed, all the people on the earth would have come to believe, one and all. Are you going to compel the people to believe except by God's dispensation?" (Sura 10, Verses [99–100]) In Sura 33, Verses 45–48, the Prophet's office is defined and limited to serving as witness and example, bearing glad tidings and admonishment, calling to God, and providing a guiding light. It recommends tolerance in the face of harassment of the infidels and the hypocrites and reliance upon God. You see, God Himself abhors the imposition and propagation of religion by force and coercive measures. Nor does he wish the instantaneous destruction of the unbelievers and the hypocrites.

Truly, there is a great difference between God's religion and the religion born of human illusion and ill-intent!

God not only leaves people free to be "either thankful or ungrateful" [Sura 76, Verse 3] and gives a grace period when they sin; He also assists believers and unbelievers alike on their chosen paths.[138]

God's relationship with people is not based on coercion, enslavement, enmity, or violence, but on freedom and love. With regard to virtues we have [the Qur'anic phrase] "God loves"; with regard to vices we have "God does not love." If we have troubles, they are the result of our own desires and deeds: "God did not surely wrong them, they wronged themselves." (Sura 9, Verse 70) Certainly there is accountability, but there is no pressure or coercion.

 Satan and Freedom

You must wonder why God has given us permission to sin, and whether an Islamic government would give us such a permission! You would be even more astounded when you consider that God Himself created Satan. When Lucifer refused to follow God’s will and was expelled from the heaven, God gave him until Judgment Day to try to entice human beings to indulge in rebellion, destruction, and injustice.

The presence and influence of Satan on the human mind constitutes an opposing force or a counter-pole to the power of creation, reason, and prudence. It exposes us to temptation and confusion, that is, it forces us to question and to choose. Free will is a gift that God has endowed upon humanity. The question why humanity is blessed with such a gift cannot be addressed here in the detail it deserves. Suffice it to say that the ultimate reason and effect of this freedom is the realization of humankind’s status as “God’s steward” on earth. Freedom is essential for our creativity and spiritual evolution. Had free will been denied to us we would follow an inevitable path guided by animal instincts. Protected against doubt, we would remain as stationary in our position as ants, horses, and pigeons. Free will and liberty, fraught with weakness, confusion, and concerns as they are, provoke us to concentrate, think, decide, and move. As such, they are the tools of extraordinary evolution and progress among human beings as compared to animals. Reason, perception, will, and morality are all results of free will and liberty.

Freedom is God’s gift to His steward on earth, humankind. Whoever takes away this freedom is guilty of the greatest treason against humankind.[139]

 Religion and Politics

We have stated that the confrontation of the medieval church and the liberation movements led to the separation of religion and politics in the West. This conflict also accounts for the widespread disenchantment of intellectuals and scientists from religion, which has continued well into the 20th century. The situation has been totally different in the Islamic world.

Among Sunni Muslims [the majority sect in Islam] and under the [Sunni] caliphs, government dominated religion and the religious scholars. The caliphs were the religious as well as the temporal leaders of the society. They were the ones who designated leaders of the Friday prayers, governors, and ministers. Judges too were either appointed by the caliphs, or incapable of challenging their rule. The caliphs were commanders in chief, supreme judges, and treasurers. They considered themselves the embodiment of the Qur'anic verse: "O believers, obey God, and obey the Messenger and those in authority among you." (Sura 4, Verse 62) They thus claimed to be absolute sovereigns and autocrats. The farther we get from the early days of Islam, the more we encounter this kind of tyranny. After the "rightful caliphs" [the first four caliphs of Islam], the right of citizens to criticize and disagree with their leader was abrogated.

Among the Shi'i scholars it was different different. As long as they were an oppressed minority, they did not address questions of government and political rule. In the wake of the rebellions against the Umayyad and 'Abbasid caliphs [reigned 661–750 and 750–1258, respectively], and in the course of the gradual independence from the regime of Baghdad, the Sunni and the Shi'i governments in Iran reverted to the ancient regime of absolute monarchy. Although a number of monarchs, such as Mahmud Ghaznavi [971–1030] or the Deylamis [also known as Buyids], Safavis, and Qajars [Persian dynasties, reigned 945–1055, 1502–1736, and 1794–1925, respectively] were religious-minded and ostentatiously righteous, and although they generally held religious scholars in high esteem, religion and politics remained, for all intents and purposes, separate. The leaders of the Shi'i religion were independent of the state and inattentive to social, administrative, and political affairs. They received their tithes and other religious contributions directly from the people and the merchants. Up until the Iranian Constitutional Revolution [1906], religious scholars seldom engaged in juridical functions. A handful of them executed religious penalties within their jurisdiction. However, they largely concerned themselves with education, scholarship, and the issuing of edicts. Since the supreme religious leaders were the recipients of many complaints from the people, they would occasionally protest and lecture the government, or else, they would briefly interfere in the executive functions of the state. Other than these episodic events though, the separation of the religion and politics remained a practical reality. Even in our days, the religious handbooks known as “Explanation of Questions”[140] devote entire chapters to the ritual details of prayers, fasts, and pilgrimages to Mecca, but ignore discussion of morality and education, much less social and political issues.[141] Kings had no right to interfere in the affairs of religion, and religious scholars did not concern themselves with the affairs of government.

Religious scholars had a prominent, if temporary and partial, role in the Constitutional Revolution. They helped draft the constitution and participated in the first terms of parliament, and in the ministries of education and justice. But they soon withdrew. In the struggles after September 11, 1941 [the installation of Muhammad Reza Shah Pahlavi by the British], in the nationalist movement and the nationalization of the oil industry [in 1951], only a handful of religious scholars were enthusiastically engaged. In the wake of the coup d’etat of August 19, 1953, and in the activities of the movement of national resistance, these gentlemen had a limited role and little aspiration for leadership.[142]

After [the religious protests of] June 5, 1963, the “Movement of the Religious Scholars,” with the decisive and unequivocal arrival of Imam [Ruhollah] Khomeini [1902–1989] on the scene of struggle and politics, seized the initiative and leadership of the [1979 Iranian] revolution and the Islamic Republic [instituted in 1979]. Young religious scholars, politically active intellectuals, and revolutionary seminary students were particularly attuned to his message. The separation of religion and state, explicitly rejected in the struggles of nationalists as well as Islamic intellectuals since the 1940s, was condemned and nullified during the [1979] revolution. The doctrine of “Mandate of the Jurisprudent” was explicitly introduced into the constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran as a paramount principle. The religious scholars cast their shadow upon the government.

The “Mandate of the Jurisprudent” or the sovereignty of religious scholars that is now being propagated with the help of the state propaganda, is an important and subtle issue that needs to be scrutinized from religious, legal, historical, social, and political viewpoints. It should be implemented in such a way as not to violate the authenticity of Islam and human freedom, as outlined in the Qur’an and the tradition.

 Religion and the Nation

Let me now turn to the question of the relationship of religion to government and, by implication, the question of Islamic government.

The relationship of God and people has been outlined. We have established that the monotheistic religions and Islam, in particular, have lavished great respect and care on individual rights. They all consider mankind as free, responsible, and autonomous. The question is whether an Islamic government would set certain limits on individual and group freedom; or whether it would sanction unconstrained liberty? If there is to be a measure of constraint and discipline, then how and by whom would it be implemented?

The Qur’an and sunna [the practice of the Prophet] clearly answer this question. With regard to the essence and precepts of religion and the laws of creation, God is the only lawgiver: “There is no rule but that which belongs to God.” From this point of view, the prophets and holy books explicate the evolutionary path and fundamental imperatives that God has laid out for humanity. They inform us of our final destiny and responsibilities. The exalted Prophet did not consult anyone concerning divine commandments. Muslims, the people of the book, the hypocrites, and the idolaters were equally excluded from the sacred realm of revelation: “a Book whose verses are set clear and distinct, which comes from God most wise and all-knowing” (Sura 11, Verse 1); and elsewhere: “So judge between them in the light of what has been revealed by God, and do not follow their whims[…].” (Sura 5, Verse [<verbatim>49</verbatim>]) In a country with an Islamic government, God is the undisputed and absolute sovereign: “Have they taken others beside Him as protectors? It is God who protects; it is He who gives life to the dead, for He has power over every thing. In whatever matter you disagree the ultimate judgment rests with God.” (Sura 42, Verses [9–10]) The world-view and the ideology, the philosophical anthropology, and the constitutional laws—that is, the foundations of the government—should be based on, and inspired by the Book and sunna. Ordinary laws, too, should not contradict those ordinances. It is entirely proper, even necessary, that the parliament of an Islamic country is comprised of people's representatives who are acquainted with the tenets of Islam, and who are God-fearing, reasonable, prudent, and trustworthy; so they legislate in accordance with Islam's fundamental tenets and ultimate goals. (Iran's previous constitution [of 1906] stipulated that five first-tier religious scholars, selected by the religious leadership, should be present to ascertain that the laws were in accordance with religious principles. However, this provision was never implemented.)

But as regards the administration of the country, the text of the Qur'an undeniably proposes that the affairs and governance of the nation be based on shura [consultation]. In Sura Shura (Sura 42), Verses [36–38] and 41–43 describe the commonwealth of the faithful as solidary and cooperative, in keeping with the motto "their affairs (the management of affairs) are settled (by) consultation among them." (Sura 42, Verse 38)[143] Even the Prophet himself, who was the fulcrum of revelation and the beloved of the faithful was ordered to "take counsel with them in the affair" (Sura 3, Verse [<verbatim>159</verbatim>]) even with the rude individuals at the bottom of society who sought pardon upon the exposure of their transgression.

The practice of the Prophet and 'Ali [ibn Abi Talib, the Prophet's son-in-law, reigned 656–661], who consulted their disciples and followers and implemented the majority's opinion, even where it was against their own convictions,[144] is a clear illustration of the Islamic system of government. It signifies the principle of people's participation in their own affairs, their self-determination, and, to use the contemporary parlance, the national sovereignty. The hadith [tradition of the Prophet] that states: "Every one of you is a shepherd (of the community), and all are responsible for their dependents and herd," also expressed a reciprocal social responsibility and public involvement, and in a different manner announced the principle of democracy, "sovereignty of the people over the people" (11 centuries before Europe). Islamic government cannot help but be at once consultative, democratic, and divinely inspired.

Thus, in Islamic government the relations among individuals and the administration of society are predicated upon relative shared freedom and mutual responsibility. The religious duty to “call others to virtue and to warn them against vice,” to stand for justice and truth, presuppose freedom of opinion and criticism. It is the same for [the duty of] guiding the perplexed, educating the ignorant, defending the oppressed, and finally advocating truth, patience, and mercy, which appears throughout the Qur’an, the sunna, and the prayers.[145] In emphasizing the freedom of expression and belief, it is enough to listen to the opinions of others and select the best of them.…[146] Islam permits difference of opinions even within the realm of the tenets of religion, let alone in administrative and governmental issues. Shi’i theology, under the rubric of ijtihad [Islamic interpretation], has left the gate of such debates open until the end of the time and the resurrection of the messiah (may God hasten his rise). This has been the Shi’i position throughout history.

There are two issues that need to be clarified at this juncture: Whether following a religious authority or a “source of imitation” in the Shi’i faith means blind and unquestioning emulation, and more importantly, whether the opponents of Islam and the opponents of Islamic government have the right to express their opinions. Concerning the first issue, it should be stated that, based on the Qur’anic verses and Islamic commandments, the relationship between God and the people is direct and unmediated. The role of the prophets, Imams [in Shi’i theology, the infallible heirs of the Prophet], and infallible saints is merely to call people toward God and to make them responsible before Him.[147] There is no doubt that one should learn from those who are better informed and more virtuous. But this does not mean relinquishing individual responsibility and free will. The Qur’an states: “Do not follow that of which you hast no knowledge. Verily the ear, the eye, the heart, each will be questioned.” (Sura 17, Verse 36) In a similar vein, the Ruler of the Faithful [‘Ali] advises his governor in Egypt: “Never use the excuse that you are just obeying orders with closed eyes. You are personally responsible before God.” Also, the Prophet is quoted as having said: “There is no obedience of a mortal in disobedience of God.” ‘Ali even held his subjects (that is, citizens) responsible for advice and sympathetic criticism of their leaders.

The second issue is more delicate. Unfortunately our Shi’i jurisprudence and religious scholars, having been excluded from governmental affairs in the past, have not elaborated on the principles and rules of Islamic government, or the limits of freedoms such as are discussed these days. Thus it is hard to provide a definitive answer to this question. While religious manuals and books have sometimes discussed these issues ... Shi’i scholars have generally ignored these issues. We have one book, Tanbih al-umma va tanzih al-milla (A Reminder and a Cleansing for the Faithful), by Mr. [Muhammad Husayn] Na’ini [1860–1936], and other lectures and books after September 1941.[148] Furthermore, there is no practical model for a flawless Islamic government, except for the 10 years of the exalted Prophet’s rule in Medina, peace be upon him [622–632]; five years of the tumultuous rule of ‘Ali [656–661]; and the five months’ rule of Imam Hasan [son of ‘Ali, 661], culminating in a peace treaty with Mu’awiya [reigned 661–680]. It is indisputable, though, that the struggles and the mission of all prophets, including those of the last Prophet, involved debating the idolaters and enemies.

They heard their opponents’ arguments calmly and never heaped invectives and threats on them. They tolerated and welcomed debate. This was the practice of the Prophet of Islam, when he was weak in Mecca as well as when he was strong in Medina. The Qur’an commanded him to be kind and tolerant. Verses revealed in Medina bid the Prophet to give refuge to the idolaters who were in a state of war with him, so they would have an opportunity to hear God’s message. If they were not persuaded, then they were to be returned, unharmed, to their homes.[149] The infallible Imams debated a host of critical, even derisive opponents. Nevertheless, they never mistreated or abused them in any way. The leader of the faithful [‘Ali] during his rule waived the oath of allegiance and those who refused it continued to enjoy full civil rights and privileges. He did not banish the “hypocritical” groups, even though he was aware of their conspiracies and enmity. All his battles were defensive. He never initiated a battle. Nor did he ever tire of admonishing his enemies. The extent of freedom of opinion and criticism in the early days of Islam was such that when the second caliph, ‘Umar [ibn al-Khattab, reigned 634–644], asked during a public address, that the faithful correct him if he ever wanders from the straight path, an ordinary citizen rose and told the short-tempered commander: “If you wander from the straight path I will straighten you with my sword!”

Certainly apostasy—that is, the denial of God and departure from the nation of Islam—has a severe penalty, up to and including death. Professor Marcel Boisard, professor of the college of law at Geneva and author of the book LHumanisme de l'Islam (The Humanism of Islam), suggests that the cause of this severity may have had to do with the political aspect of the act, not the religious nature of it.

The most regrettable consequence of wrapping personal opinions and political and administrative decisions in the garb of religiosity and then presenting them as pure Islam is that to oppose these decisions would be to fight with God! In this manner, the inevitable blending of politics and spirituality exposes Islamic society to the tyranny of the medieval church, with the concomitant eclipse of freedom, truth, virtue, progress, health, and prosperity. In the words of the exalted Prophet: "A community in which the rights of the weak cannot be enjoyed without a stuttering tongue (a certain difficulty and fear) will never be cleansed of corruption." ...

Islam—based on the Qur'anic principle, "Some of us should not take others as our guardians"—recognizes no person, whether actual or legal, as an absolute sovereign qualified to usurp the divine rights of human beings to freedom and honor.

The Qur'an declares: "You have indeed a noble example in the Prophet of God." (Sura 33, Verse 21) It is edifying to note his protective attitude and behavior toward individuals, even the Hypocrites. In a dark and inclement night, the Prophet, peace be upon him, while returning from the battle of Tabuk, reached a dangerous precipice. Accidentally (or miraculously!) a flash of lightning revealed a group of the Hypocrites, who were lurking to scare the Prophet's camel and send him hurtling to the bottom of the valley. Although this conspiracy was foiled, the Prophet did not publicize the conspirators' plans and did not seek revenge. He even made the camel driver Huzayfa ibn Yaman, who had witnessed the event, take an oath not to recount the event for as long as he lived. Another tradition has it that the son of 'Abdallah ibn Ubai [died 631], the leader of the Hypocrites, who had caused numerous problems for the Prophet and his companions, came to the Prophet and asked for permission to kill his own father. The Prophet reminded him that he was duty-bound to respect and protect his father at all times. ‘Abdallah, however, continued to conspire against the Prophet until the end of his life. After ‘Abdallah’s death, the Prophet said, “Had God not commanded it, I would not pray on his body.”[150] “You have indeed a noble example in the Prophet of God”!

* Freedom as a Vital Necessity for Government and Religion

Let me reiterate: freedom means freedom to oppose, criticize, and object—even if the criticism is untrue and unjust. Where there is freedom there are opponents and currents that disturb routine stability and normalcy. Otherwise, freedom would be meaningless and useless.

This notion of freedom is hard for many zealous—if sincere—people to digest, as they consider such a freedom unwise and deleterious to the survival of the nascent Islamic Republic [of Iran]. They may even consider it a blunder on their part to have allowed this notion of freedom to prevail in the constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

However, omniscient, compassionate God has not only sanctioned freedom in many affairs, he has made it the very foundation of survival and revival in the world. Let me elaborate on this point.

 Opposition, the Cause of Movement and Life

In general, an object in a given force field will, of necessity, behave in a calculable and predictable way. For any object, whether a stone, a plant, or a human society, force means movement. For example, a piece of metal that is released within earth’s gravitational field will fall in a straight line. Its position and velocity are calculable at every moment. Similarly, the behavior of a human being who is motivated only by the demands of his or her appetite is predictable. However, if in the place of one force, two or more forces are introduced—for example if a powerful magnet is placed in the path of the falling piece of metal—its trajectory and velocity will change. It will, to use a poetic expression, be freed from the slavery of a single cause of motion. The scenario is most intriguing when the affected object has the power to choose its level of susceptibility to the external influences. That is, when it has “free will.” In this case, the person whose choice is not readily predicable and calculable for others—or even for oneself—could be said to possess “free will.”

Therefore, freedom requires, as the case of Satan’s temptations teach us, the existence of an oppositional force, along with a power of choice on behalf of the individual or the society. Opposition promulgates movement and change, which may, in turn, lead to decline or progress, depending on the choice of the agent involved.

Motion and change in the case of inanimate objects, even constructed objects such as machines, lead to erosion and deterioration (in the jargon of thermodynamic theory, the increase of entropy). In other words, inanimate objects aim at final rest and quiet.

However, objects endowed with life, particularly human beings, thrive on movement and opposition. They acquire new capabilities and aptitudes and accumulate experience and virtue because of opposition and change. Movement, a result of need, agitation, and love, is a blessing and a source of survival and evolution, while rigidity is a cause of stasis, decline, and death. Animals and human beings, once they feel need, danger, or attraction, tend to move, willy-nilly, either toward the object of their desire or away from the source of danger. Therefore, without opposition, as a source of motivation or agitation there would be no progress.[151] The oppositional motivator can lead to reform and revival.[152]

Our Islamic Revolution, our nationalist struggles, revivalist Islamic associations and movements, the earlier Constitutional Revolution of Iran—the awakening and activism of the Eastern countries in general after several hundred years of slumber and humiliation—were all the result of the encounter with Western civilization. The wondrous European Renaissance too was a result of conflicts, dissatisfactions, and objections to medieval Christian hegemony.

Similarly, the missions of the prophets were in the past the source of conflicts that revolutionized towns and tribes that were wallowing in the darkness of idolatry and the cesspool of corruption and inequity.

Conflict, one of whose quintessential representations for human beings is Satan, is the cause of a plethora of blessed events, from the natural cycle of life here on earth to the higher cycle of resurrection in the hereafter. The Qur'an frequently compares the colossal events of Judgment Day with seasonal rain and the revival of life on earth. Rain itself is the result of atmospheric disturbances and opposing forces of cold and warm weather systems. The science of meteorology has established, through hourly reports from weather stations, that rain-bearing continental weather fronts are comprised of successive fronts of dense clouds. These clouds are the result of expanding, rising, and condensing warm tropical weather and its collision with the cold and heavy weather systems that flow from the northern regions. The heavy winds occupy the lower areas and push the warm humid weather up.[153]

 The Opponents of Freedom

The opponents of freedom resort to the adage: "A head that does not ache does not need to be wrapped." Their argument goes like this: We know we are on the true path. We believe in Islam and possess good will and proper judgment. What need is there for further inquiry and learning? We can simply devote ourselves, body and soul, to the realization of the true doctrine. The entire nation and its leadership support this endeavor. Why should we let the enemies of God and the republic, the supporters of America, or those who do not follow our line—in short, people of suspicious intent or judgment—to muddy the waters, confuse minds, disturb society, and weaken the government? Such freedom and criticism will provide fodder for foreign radio propaganda which will, in turn, cause our youth to hesitate or deviate from the straight path. It is thus better to remove all the impediments from the path of the revolution and to conduct our affairs quickly and effectively—that is, without the nagging distractions of free expression and opposition.

These gentlemen, even if they are sincere, are deluded and naive about their own monopoly of the truth and about the notion of freedom. Freedom is not a luxury; it is a necessity. When freedom is banished, tyranny will take its place.

In the first place, those whose belief system is based on reason and truth are not afraid of opponents' criticism and propaganda. In the words of Sa'di [Persian poet, 1184–1292], "He who has clear accounts, has no fear of accountants."

Secondly, freedom of expression, opposition, and criticism awakens the negligent and holds back treason, monopoly, and tyranny. If the objections are unjustified, let the accused respond and thus dispel the clouds of suspicion and slander. This will strengthen the national resolve. The Qur'an considers such examinations as the means of separating the good from the bad.[154] Conversely, suppression of freedom is an indication of a fundamental weakness or flaw in the government's intentions or actions. Consider the following Qur'anic debate: a believer in the pharaoh's family reasons with his affluent and powerful kin to listen to the message of Moses: "If he is a liar, his lie will be his own loss; but in case he speaks the truth, some of what he predicts will befall you." (Sura 40, Verse 28) In response, the pharaoh reiterates the argument of all dictators, tyrants, and zealots: "I show you only what I see (is right); and guide you but to the right path." [Sura 40, Verse 29] How can people exercise their religious obligation to call others to virtue and to warn them against vice in an Islamic society, without the freedom of conscience and expression, and in the absence of political and legal security? These are duties that Muslims are recommended to fulfill lest evil-doers dominate them and their prayers remain unanswered.

Thus the survival of a just system and its progress on the path of virtue and excellence is guaranteed by the freedom of expression and legal opposition. The protection of religion against abuse, ignorance, superstition, and deviance, too, requires that the mace of excommunication and compulsion be removed from society and the media. It is necessary to avoid painting a varnish of religiosity and godliness on human affairs, save that which necessarily and authentically belongs to religion. It is also necessary that some room is left for reflection and maneuver in all debates.

We have established, under the rubric of “Religion and Nation,” that God addresses people themselves immediately and directly, without intermediaries. Everyone is directly responsible, and people’s reason, knowledge, thought, perception, reflection, and will are the ultimate arbiter. We have the Qur’anic injunction, “If you do not know, then ask the keepers of (knowledge and) remembrance,” (Sura 21, Verse 7) which indicates that it is proper to inquire, and to augment one’s knowledge. In the meantime, the Qur’an has envisioned, without censure, the existence and expression of disagreements and differences of opinion among the faithful. It recommends the disagreements with the rulers to be referred to the Prophet and to God; which in our days, would mean the body of religious knowledge.[155]

Disagreement becomes unacceptable and disruptive only when it takes place at the executive level and when the responsible managers, instead of harmony and disciplined cooperation, engage in discord and in-fighting, each playing their own tune and doing their own thing. The principle of division of powers and their mutual non-interference and orderly checks and balances pervades Iran’s old and new constitutions, and those of other parliamentary democratic systems. People and their representatives have a right to discuss, investigate, supervise, and decide public affairs within certain limits and without interfering in the progress, rigor, and effective management of the executive affairs as determined by the legislature. And now let me address the questions that were posed earlier:

 The First Question

Has Islam abandoned people to do whatever they please? Is there no responsibility and restraint in this world?

Being free and autonomous is one thing, and being responsible for one's beliefs and actions quite another. God has given us freedom of opinion and action within certain parameters, but He has given us plenty of warning through His messengers and holy books, that rebellion, disbelief, and injustice will have dire results that will follow from our actions both in this life and in the hereafter. The consequences may be heeded and avoided beforehand, or they may be understood only after they have materialized, as stated in Sura 30, Verse [<verbatim>41</verbatim>]: "Corruption has spread over land and sea from what men have done (and do) themselves that (God may let) them taste a little bit of what they have done: They may come back [to the right path]."

God bestows both freedom and guidance concerning the consequences of actions. His mercy is infinite and His vengeance great. Thus freedom exists; so do responsibility and restraint. The choice is ours.

 The Second Question

Should the Islamic government and the religious scholars in the leadership not check crime and treason? Should chaos and license rule?

First, the issue of individual liberty in violation of others' rights has been addressed in the first question. Absolute freedom of choice, as we understand it in the Qur'an, prevails in the relationship of God and man—not in that of society and the individual, where mutual rights and responsibilities are at stake. God may forgive transgression against His laws but, as we know, God cannot forgive people for transgressing against the rights of people. We do not enjoy the same level of freedom in our dealings with other people as we do in our personal relationship with God.

Second, religious scholars, as religious scholars, have no rights or responsibilities save those delegated to them within the democratic system of the Islamic government.

Third, self-defense and the prevention of injustice and corruption in an Islamic society are not only warranted but required. The principle of “neither inflicting nor suffering harm” is paramount in Islam, both on the individual and the societal level. Since everyone is entitled to enjoy a measure of freedom and honor, the freedom of all is necessarily limited. Furthermore, being a beneficiary of social privileges creates mutual responsibilities that the Islamic government, derived from people’s will, is duty-bound to supervise.

The details of this issue and the form of intervention of the state and participation of the people, which should be exercised with utmost justice and mercy, are a separate discussion that should be analyzed under the rubric of Islamic government.

 8—Christian-Muslim Democracy

Dimasangcay A. Pundato

Muslims are a minority of under 10 percent in the Philippines, concentrated largely on the island of Mindanao. The Moro National Liberation Front, the largest organization representing the Muslims, has waged a war of independence since the 1970s. In 1982, the Reformist Group headed by Dimasangcay A. Pundato (Philippines, born 1947) broke from the front, objecting to the undemocratic internal structure of the movement and the socialist leanings of the movement’s leaders, and accepting autonomy rather than independence as the goal of the movement.[156] In the mid-1980s, the Reformist Group joined other pro-democracy forces in peaceful protest against the dictatorship. When the dictatorship fell in 1986, the Reformist Group, along with other Muslim groups such as the United Muslim Democrats of the Philippines, worked with the government to improve the position of Muslims in the Philippines, while the MNLF resumed its war of independence. In the speech and letter published here, Pundato explains his commitment to the democratic process and urges even closer cooperation among Christians and Muslims.

 Making International Politics More Humane

Peace be upon all of you!

Let me recall the peroration of a speech delivered before the 94th American Newspaper Publishers Association Convention in Honolulu, Hawaii, on August 24, 1980:

<quote>

I ask you, publishers of America, to please help us open the eyes of your policymakers. Democracy is still the wave of the future. Help us make it less bloody to ride with the wave.

</quote>

The speech demolished the pretensions of the erstwhile dictator of the Philippines, who had gone to Hawaii with a grand entourage to address that convention.

It was the dictator who was originally the only one invited to explain the situation in the Philippines.

When the organizers of the convention discovered an unfilled time slot in the program, they asked the speaker to address them.

The speaker was then in self-imposed exile in the United States, waging a campaign for freedom and democracy for the Philippines. He was carrying on the tradition of the Filipino intellectuals and propagandists in Spain and Europe towards the end of the 19th century who were fighting for reforms in the Philippines, then a colony of Spain.

The speaker was Raul S. Manglapus [Philippines, born 1918]. That his efforts, together with thousands of Filipino exiles and immigrants to the United States, were efficacious is borne by the fact that the Philippines, after the glorious non-violent People Power Revolution in 1986, is once again a free and democratic republic. Today, as chairman of the Center for Christian-Muslim Democracy, he is the host of this conference.

Similarly, there were Muslim Filipinos waging a campaign for freedom and democracy for the Muslims in the Philippines. I was among the Muslim idealists shuttling between the Philippines and other parts of Asia, the Middle East, and the United States, seeking support for our armed resistance and economic sanctions against the Philippines to hasten the crumbling down of the dictatorship.

As Secretary Manglapus pointed out in one of his speeches in the United States, the Muslims battling the dictatorship were inspired by the Qur’anic precepts on freedom and democracy.

Though the Christian opposition and the Muslim rebels were not formally coordinated along organizational lines, theirs were parallel moves. Their Holy Books, the Bible and the Qur’an, provided the foundation for such commitments.

In 1985, the Reformist Group of the Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF), of which I am Chairman, giving substance to this thesis, entered into a Memorandum of Agreement with the Ninoy Aquino Movement to work jointly for freedom and democracy in the Philippines.

This turned out later to be the first-ever formal agreement forged between a Moro front and a Filipino movement based in the United States.

Earlier in time, however, in 1982, at a meeting in Singapore with the Filipino martyr Ninoy Aquino [1932–1993], we renewed our commitment to support his struggle for the restoration of democracy in the Philippines. That he did not live long enough to see the full flowering of his vision gives us pain, yet we feel consoled that he did not die in vain.

I must modestly admit that our efforts evinced some fruition. A number of structural reforms affecting Muslims were introduced in the 1987 Philippine Constitution. Treatment of, and attitude towards, Muslims have generally improved.

The creation of the Office of Muslim Affairs (OMA) which vastly improved the strengthening of Muslim cultural practices and traditional institutions in the Philippines had somehow provided a sustaining force to further buttress this recognition.

It is under the regime of President Corazon Aquino [1986–1992] that the Muslim Filipinos were able to fully appreciate the realization of one of their aspirations as a people: that of the total implementation of the Code of Muslim Personal Laws of the Philippines, when President Aquino appointed more shari’a [Islamic law] judges and directed the conduct of shari’a training seminars and the administration of the Shari’a Bar Examinations this year.

Even the participation of our country in international Qur’an reading competitions has been expanded. While before, our participation in such assemblies was limited to the one being regularly held in Malaysia, under our present dispensation we are also participating in the Qur’an reading competition in Bangkok, Thailand, and in Jakarta, Indonesia.

More than ever, the conduct of the annual Muslim pilgrimage to Saudi Arabia has been so well co-ordinated. The Department of Foreign Affairs and other agencies of government have been actively involved in this yearly affair.

More, however, has to be done for the Muslims. Thus, under the mandates of the 1987 Constitution, an Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao was organized. Today, the Autonomous Region has gradually but steadily been addressing the administrative needs and development requirements of the region.

In many colleges and universities offering political science courses throughout the world, in scholarly journals, in the popular press, there is a perceptible timidity in articulating how deeply anchored democracy is in Islamic Law.

Even in countries like Pakistan that have adopted the Western manifestation of democracy, that is, relying on suffrage for legitimizing or changing leaders, there is only a minimal resort to the ideological claim that Islam not only allows democracy but in fact prescribes and enjoins it. The silence suggests there is general acceptance that the practice of democracy was an inheritance from its association with Great Britain rather than the carrying out, though in Western form, of an Islamic precept.

The debate in Pakistan that singularly stood out with a touch of Islamic ideology was on the status of women: whether in an Islamic society a woman can be elected Head of State. Those in favor had recourse to Sura 2, Verse 228, of the Glorious Qur’an, that serves as foundation for democracy:

<quote>

And women shall have rights similar to the rights against them, according to what is equitable. Never will I suffer to be lost the work of any of you, be he male or female. To men is allotted what they earn, and to women what they earn.

</quote>

In a brief but masterly discourse in Marawi City, Philippines, on his conferment of an honorary Doctor of Laws at the Mindanao State University on May 6, 1976, Dr. Hassan ‘Abdallah A. Sheikh [born 1934], Saudi Arabian Minister of Education, disproved those disparaging “Islamic law as not fit for ruling and guiding societies.”

He said that “to understand the extent of dignity and freedom granted by Islam to its followers, it would be wise to briefly mention some of the modern articles that comprise the Human Rights Declaration adopted by the United Nations on December 10, 1948.”

Then he cited and explicated verses of the Qur’an and passages from the sunna [practice] of the Prophet to illustrate that the modern call for freedom and dignity was vouchsafed by Islamic law centuries earlier.

Observers must not be taken too much by forms in the assessment of democracy in Islamic countries because democracy is covered by Sura 42, Verse 38, of the Holy Book: “Those ... who (conduct) their affairs by mutual consultation....” Leaders are urged to seek counsel from the wise. This is the essence of SuraAl-Shura [Sura 42], Verse 36, of the Qur’an, and I quote:

<quote>

Pass over (their faults) and ask for (God’s) forgiveness for them, and consult them in affairs (of moment). Then, when those (have) taken a decision, put thy trust in God.

</quote>

Today, when Eastern Europe, the USSR, and China are in the grip of democratic fervor, in many instances toppling communist regimes outright, it seems it is easier to hold that democracy is more germane to them than in Islamic countries or countries with predominantly Muslim populations. The democratic wave is irresistible.

Earlier, some countries in Western Europe and Latin America restored democracy in their system. In celebration and to bear witness to the significance of such a tide, a conference on newly-restored democracy was held in Manila, Philippines, in June 1988.

It is safe to say that over three-fifths, perhaps even four-fifths, of the world's populations are Christians and Muslims. To grasp an idea of how numerous Muslims are, consider that China and the USSR each have at least over 100 million Muslims in their midst.

I think that this conference is the first, or at least one of the first, held to begin seeing in the proper international perspective how powerful, creative and human Christian-Muslim Democracy is.

If political movements and governments are formed by religious values that affirm dignity and freedom, values enshrined in the Holy Books, the Bible and the Qur'an, our world would be a kinder, more generous, progressive, dynamic and peaceful world.

Islam is "Heaven's message to all mankind, Arabs, non-Arabs, wealthy or poor, black or white." And it precisely admits a bond with Christianity, which shares similar principles and roots with it. Thus, the Qur'an in SuraAl-'Imran [Sura 3], Verse 84, states:

<quote>

Say ye: We believe in God, and the revelation given to us, and to Abraham, Ismail, Isaac, Jacob, and the tribes, and that given to Moses and Jesus, and that given to (all) Prophets from their Lord; we make no difference between one another of them; and we bow to God (in Islam).

</quote>

Certainly more research and exchange of views between Christian and Muslim Democrats are in order. Experiments on the juxtaposition of the democratic underpinnings of the two religions are essential. And such experiments are best effected not only in the quiet of the library but in actual maneuvering in the political arena.

Thus, the formation of the United Muslim Democrats of the Philippines was keenly followed by some Christian and Muslim groups in Indonesia.

It is true, Christians in the predominantly Muslim population of Indonesia are not discriminated against in appointments to high civilian and military positions. But the possibility of actually organizing a similar party in Indonesia compelled them to serious thought, and how they plied with questions the Filipinos who attended the religious leaders' conference on national development.

The members of the European community, essentially Christians, are familiar with the Muslim world.

Some have deeply imbibed the Islamic culture—for example, Spain—because of long historical association. Some have fought against it, as in the Crusades. Some have colonized portions of it, and even as de-colonization has become a reality, their links are as firm as ever because millions from former colonies have settled in Europe. I understand there are at least three million in France. There is a vast reservoir of knowledge of the Muslim world and Islam in the European community.

I think, however, that the impetus for the study of Christian-Muslim Democracy as an aid to making international politics more humane and attuned to the raising of the dignity and freedom of the individual is undeniably ardent in this part of the world. But to paraphrase a Christian acceptance of a sad predicament, the intellect and the morale are willing, but the resources are weak.

In the manner of Raul S. Manglapus speaking before the American Newspaper Publishers Association, but admittedly with less eloquence,

<quote>

I ask you, members of the European community: please help us in our endeavor to plumb the depth of Christian-Muslim Democracy. Christian-Muslim Democracy is the Wave of the Future. Help us spread it wide and fast so more may happily ride with the wave.

</quote>

And finally, allow me to close this note with Sura 49, Verse 13, of the Glorious Qur’an, and I quote:

<quote>

Mankind! We created you from a single (pair) of a male and female, and made you into nations and tribes, that ye may know each other, not that ye may despise (each other).

</quote>

Peace be upon you. Thank you.

 Letter to Secretary Manglapus

Dear Secretary Manglapus: Last June 9 [1990], at the conference on “Christian-Muslim Democracy: Wave of the Future,” I was very elated to affirm with Her Excellency, President Corazon C. Aquino, together with Honorable Siegbert Alber, Honorable Gunter Rinsche, Honorable Carlos Robles-Piquer, Honorable Gabriele Sboarina (all of the European Parliament), and Honorable Exequiel B. Javier, Mr. Amado Luis Lagdameo, and yourself, our shared commitment to freedom, justice and democracy.

I decided then to seek membership in the Center for Christian-Muslim Democracy, though not in the manner of Saul who underwent a conversion and became St. Paul, because I needed no conversion as far as dedication to freedom and democracy is concerned.

I, in fact, joined the Muslim armed rebellion when the dictatorship that was toppled in 1986 trampled freedom and democracy underfoot in southern Philippines. And later, when I was based abroad, I signed agreements for a joint struggle against the dictatorship with Christian groups who had similar commitments to democracy and freedom.

The Center, I believe, is the best entity to study and spread the creative force of the ideology of Christian-Muslim democracy.

The MNLF (Moro National Liberation Front) Reformist Group counts at least 16,000 members and a far larger number of sympathizers. I will not be so presumptuous as to aver that by a unilateral decree, all of them would be instant adherents of Christian-Muslim Democracy. While I could claim their loyalty, I must admit I would have to explain to a sizeable portion of them this twin-ideology which I believe would be the most puissant guiding force to lift this country from its general malaise and the quagmire of indirection.

But I know enough of leadership to know of their longing for hope and stability, know enough of their rational capacity to expect that, afforded sufficient enlightenment, they would be as staunch believers of Christian-Muslim Democracy as I am.

And from their eventual advocacy and day-to-day affirmation and living out of the ideology of Christian-Muslim Democracy, I trust the larger Muslim community would be one with them in this inspiring ideology rooted in the Holy Qur’an and the Holy Bible.

Signed, Dimasangcay A. Pundato, June 12, 1991

 9—Participation in Non-Islamic Government

Rachid Ghannouchi

Rachid Ghannouchi (Tunisia, born 1941) received a philosophy degree at the University of Damascus and, after a year of study in France, returned to Tunisia in 1969 as a high school teacher. The following year, Ghannouchi helped to establish a reformist movement that opposed the secular socialism of the ruling party in Tunisia and proffered a modernist interpretation of Islam. This movement, formalized as the Islamic Tendency Movement—now called the Renaissance party—grew to become the leading political opposition in Tunisia, and Ghannouchi its leading figure. After a decade in and out of prison for his political activities, Ghannouchi left Tunisia for Europe in the early 1990s. While similar movements elsewhere in North Africa have turned to armed revolt and antidemocratic rhetoric, Ghannouchi continues to resist radicalization.[157] In this paper, Ghannouchi argues for democratic power-sharing as a nonviolent means to effect a transition to Islamic rule.

 Introduction

This paper attempts to answer the question related to the position of Islam regarding the participation of its followers in establishing or administering a non-Islamic regime.

Prior to attempting to provide an answer to this question certain facts need to be underlined:

First: the fact that a concept for an Islamic government does exist, and that it is the religious duty of Muslims, both individuals and groups, to work for the establishment of such a government.

Second: the fact that such an Islamic government, in the circumstances under discussion, is nonexistent, and that had it been in existence, a Muslim would have no option but to support it and work for the reformation of such elements of corruption as might exist within it.

Third: the fact that the present circumstances do not seem to favor the establishment of an Islamic government. So much effort has been exerted in order to establish such a government, and despite their failure so far, it is the duty of all Muslims to continue the effort and cooperate in order to fulfill God’s commandment and establish justice on earth.

The Holy Qur’an says: “O you who believe! stand out firmly for God, as witnesses to fair dealing, and let not the hatred of others towards you make you swerve to wrong and depart from justice. Be just, that is next to piety, and fear God. For God is well-acquainted with all that you do.” (Sura 5, Verse 8)

In the same sura, Verse 49 reads: “Judge between them by what God has revealed, and follow not their vain desires,” while Verse 44 reads: “Those who do not judge by what God has revealed, they are unbelievers.”

 Exceptional Circumstances

The scope of this discussion does not apply to the normal situation when the Muslim community can establish the system of its intellectual, political, economic, international and other relations on the basis of Islam and in conformity with its faith and cultural heritage—the heritage which continues to be deep-rooted in the hearts and souls of Muslims despite the attempts of Western colonial occupation to undermine its fundamental principles.

The discussion here focuses on the exceptional situation when the community of believers is unable to accomplish its goal of establishing the Islamic government directly. In this case the community is faced with tough options.

Realism and flexibility are among the most important features of Islamic methodology. These features explain the fact that this religion is an eternal way of life that is suitable for all times and all places. Furthermore, the lives of human communities, including the community of Muslims, are in continuous dynamism just like the life of an individual human being. Fluctuations between health and sickness, victory and defeat, success and failure, progress and slipping back, strength and weakness are only natural. Therefore, it is imperative that a religion which came for the purpose of improving the life of all humans wherever and whenever they exist should have the capacity to respond to all emerging situations and forms of development through which the Muslim communities may pass. And in doing so, such a religion would have to draw the main straight lines as well as the bending ones; that is, it would not just be content with drawing the lines for the absolute fundamentals during normal circumstances, but would also define the rules and mechanisms which ought to be followed and observed during exceptional extra-ordinary circumstances. In this way the believers remain in close contact with the fundamentals of the shari’a [religious law] in the situations of both strength and weakness.

 The Fiqh (Jurisprudence) of Requirements and Necessities

The Muslims’ heritage ofjurisprudence is the greatest and richest legal or canonical heritage ever possessed by any single community, so much so that the Muslims can justifiably be called the community ofjurisprudence. The greatness of this jurisprudence stems from the fact that it is founded upon major legislative foundations known as ‘ilm al-usul (the science of fundamentals), which is a great Islamic science.

This science was studied thoroughly and developed over the years by highly talented and authoritative scholars. The apex of this development was reached by Al- Andalusi [Abu Ishaq] Al-Shatibi [died 1388] whose studies and thoughts were complementary to those of his predecessor Imam [Abu ‘Abdallah Muhammad] al-Shafi’i [767- 820]. The learned scholars who dedicated their lives to this important realm of knowledge believed in the greatness of Islam; they thoroughly studied the revelation (Qur’an), the sunna [practice of the Prophet], and the heritage ofjurisprudence. They also took into consideration the various practical experiences and applications ofjurisprudence throughout the centuries together with the sum of knowledge acquired by man during their own time.

Through this collection of the sources of knowledge, and in the light of their understanding of the purposes and objectives of Islam, they formulated a set of fundamentals for legislation whose ultimate goal is to serve the interests of man—the very essence of the message of Islam.

Al-Shatibi says: “From our exploration of the shari’a, we have concluded that it was only set up to serve the interests of man. This is a conclusion no one can dispute, even [Fakhr al-Din] Al-Razi [1149–1209]. Canon laws were made for only one purpose:

<quote>

to serve the interests of humans in this life and the hereafter. God says in the Qur’an: ‘We sent you not but as a mercy for all creatures.’ (Sura 21, Verse 107) ‘God does not wish to place you in difficulty, but to purify you, and to complete His favor to you.’ (Sura 5, Verse 6) ‘In the Law of Equality there is (saving of) life to you.’ (Sura 2, Verse 179)”[158]

</quote>

In his book Al-Muwafaqat, Al-Shatibi details the types of requirements which Messengers were sent to fulfill in the lives of humans. He categorized them into “essential requirements” without which life would be ruined; these requirements include the protection of faith, of life, of progeny, of wealth and of the mind. Then he spoke of the “special requirements” without which man would be in distress and hardship. They include the requirement to enjoy lawful and good things in life. Finally, he spoke of “ameliorative requirements” whose absence would not seriously undermine life. These include the various manners related for instance to eating and drinking etc. The fulfillment of such requirements is ahead at improving the quality of life.[159]

The general inclination in contemporary Islamic political thought is to adopt Al- Shatibi’s concept of the purposes of religion, namely that religion was revealed only to fulfill and protect the needs and interests of mankind in this life and the hereafter, as a general framework for tackling new problems with the Muslim society. Within the framework of this general perspective or purpose of the shari’a, the details of religion find their appropriate place as branches of the fundamentals. Within the same perspective, all new problems in the lives not only of Muslims but of all humanity, can find proper solutions that guarantee the fulfillment of their requirements.

In this way evils can be averted without any need for violating the provisions of God’s divine law, since this law already includes general principles from which new deductions can be made whenever life progresses or changes. Some of these principles apply to standard situations and normal circumstances, while others deal with exceptional situations and extraordinary circumstances. An example to the latter is the principle of “necessities eliminate prohibitions” (necessity knows no law). This principle is a Qur’anic principle. God says:

<quote>

But if one is forced by necessity, without willful disobedience nor transgressing due limits, then is he guiltless. (Sura 2, Verse 173)

</quote>

Similar to this are the principle of balancing between the better and the worse and opting for that which seems to best serve the general interest of the people, and the principle of outcomes or consequences according to which acts are judged on the basis of what they lead to. The decisive criterion in all cases is the fulfillment of the needs of humans and serving their best interests.[160]

 Power-Sharing in a Non-Islamic Government

The general rule in judging the acts of humans is that all actions are permissible unless a prohibition is specified. The prohibition in this case is derived from the commandment to implement the law of God and not to resort to adopting laws other than His. It is therefore a must for all Muslims to do what they can in order to obey God’s commandment and establish His governance. But what if the Muslims are unable to do so? The rule is that we are obliged to do only that which we can: “No soul shall have a burden laid on it greater than it can bear.” (Sura 2, Verse 233)

The Islamic government is one in which:

1. Supreme legislative authority is for the shari’a, that is the revealed law of Islam, which transcends all laws. Within this context, it is the responsibility of scholars to deduce detailed laws and regulations to be used as guidelines by judges. The head of the Islamic state is the leader of the executive body entrusted with the responsibility of implementing such laws and regulations.

1. Political power belongs to the community (umma), which should adopt a form of shura, which is a system of mandatory consultation.

If this kind of government is possible, it is then the duty of the believers to spare no effort in establishing it. However, if this is not possible, what must the community do?

On the basis of the general fundamentals of Islam and its purposes of accomplishing the needs and serving the rest of the public (and these include the protection of faith, souls, wealth and the prevention of evils), it is incumbent upon the community of the faithful to avoid passivism and isolationism. Every Muslim has a responsibility toward the task of establishing the Islamic government. If such a task is not possible, then Muslims must endeavor to accomplish whatever can be accomplished.

Power-sharing in a Muslim or a non-Muslim environment becomes a necessity in order to lay the foundations of the social order. This power-sharing may not necessarily be based on Islamic shari’a law. However, it must be based on an important foundation of the Islamic government, namely shura, or the authority of the umma, so as to prevent the evils of dictatorship, foreign domination, or local anarchy. Such a process of power- sharing may also aim to achieve a national or a humanistic interest such as independence, development, social solidarity, civil liberties, human rights, political pluralism, independence of the judiciary, freedom of the press, or liberty for mosques and Islamic activities.

Can any Muslim community afford to hesitate in participating in the establishment of a secular democratic system if it is unable to establish an Islamic democratic one? The answer is no. It is the religious duty of the Muslims, as individuals and as communities, to contribute to the efforts to establish such a system. In this way, the Muslims would seek the establishment of the government of rationale due to their inability to establish the government of shari’a—as Ibn Khaldun [historian 1332--1406] put it.[161]

 Documented Cases

Several events can be quoted from the Qur’an, the sunna, and Islamic history to prove that Muslims, as individuals or as communities, are permitted to participate in establishing or administering non-Islamic governments in order to achieve good and avoid evil.

In one chapter of the Qur’an we are told the story of Yusuf (Joseph), who was thrown into the well by his brothers and was then rescued, to end up in the Pharaoh’s palace in Egypt where he was subjected to trial and seduction. It is worth noting that this young man, who was imprisoned and mistreated, seized the moment when it was right and expressed readiness to take charge of the most important office in the Pharaoh’s government, believing it was his duty to rescue many nations that were threatened by famine and drought. He did not wait for the Egyptian people to renounce paganism and embrace his monotheist religion so as to form the foundation for an Islamic government.

What that young man had in mind was the fact that religion has come to serve the people and fulfill their essential needs. Yusuf had the conviction that rescuing the people from starvation, and consequently from annihilation, could not wait. He saw that he was able to help, and he did help. Through his effective participation in administering the affairs of the people he performed his other responsibility of calling for Islam and admonishing the people to reform their lives and renounce evils.

The detailed narration of the story of Yusuf in the Qur’an is a clear testimony that his approach is commendable. What happened with Yusuf can happen to Muslims anywhere and at any time. In similar circumstances, Muslims have no option but to participate politically in establishing and administering non-Islamic governments in order to serve the interests of the umma and prevent evils. Failing to do so will lead to undermining these interests and to allowing evils to spread and dominate society.

The second example is that of the Negus (the Emperor of Ethiopia) who lived during the early years of Islam. The Prophet advised some of his companions who were being severely persecuted to migrate to Abyssinia, describing the Negus as “the king in whose country none is wronged.” The presence of the small Muslim community in Abyssinia resulted in the Negus embracing Islam, although he did not effect any amendments to his government in the direction of implementing the shari’a, as such an attempt could have threatened his kingship and endangered the lives of his guests. The story of that noble king has been documented in Islamic history and continues to be narrated to this day. The Prophet instructed his followers to perform a prayer for the king’s soul when the news of his death reached them.

Commenting on this, Ibn Taymiyya [1263–1328] said, “We know definitely that he could not implement the law of the Qur’an in his community because his people would not have permitted him to. Despite that, the Negus and all those who are similar to him found their way to the pleasure of God in eternity although they could not abide by the laws of Islam, and could only rule using that which could be implemented in the given circumstances.”[162]

The third example is that of hilf al-fudul, that is the pact or alliance of al-fudul.[163] This was an agreement among several pre-Islamic Arab tribes to support the wronged, maintain close relations with relatives and take good care of them. The Prophet did witness the signing of the alliance prior to his prophethood, and said afterwards that if he were to be invited to a similar alliance in Islam he would have accepted without reservation. He further stressed that any good and noble contract made injahiliya [the pre-Islamic era] is automatically endorsed by Islam.[164] It is thus concluded that the community of believers may participate in an alliance aimed at preventing injustice and oppression, at serving the interests of mankind, at protecting human rights, at recognizing the authority of the people and at rotating powerholding through a system of elections. The faithful can pursue all these noble objectives even with those who do not share the same faith or ideology.

The fourth example is that of ‘Umar ibn ‘Abd al-‘Aziz [682–720]. This Umayyad caliph, whose rulership did not exceed two years, is considered by historians and scholars to be the fifth guided caliph because of his piety and justice, although more than half a century separated him from the last of the four guided caliphs [the first successors to the Prophet]. Although he was a king who inherited kingship, he was unhappy with the monarchy, and in principle did not approve of it. However. he could not alter the system and was unable to restore the right of the umma in a consultative-style government due to the accumulation of corruption over the years. Nonetheless, he managed to significantly reform many bad practices, and restored justice and fairness. By accepting the monarchy, which he did not approve of, he was able to do many good things, and no one said he was wrong or misguided in his actions.

 Contemporary Considerations

An Islamic government is based on a number of values which if accomplished in their totality, would result in a perfect or near- perfect system. But it may not be possible for all such values to be implemented, and therefore some must suffice in certain circumstances in order for a just government to exist. A just government, even if not Islamic, is considered very close to the Islamic one, because justice is the most important feature of an Islamic government, and it has been said that justice is the law of God.

[‘Abdallah] Ibn ‘Aqil [circa 1294–1367] defined al-siyasa al-shari’a (Islamic administrative policy) as the actions which bring the people closer to good and distance them from evil, even if such actions were not advocated by the Prophet or revealed from the Heavens.

He further explained that describing these actions using the phrase “those that conform with the Islamic law (shar’)” in order to imply that such actions should not contradict the shar’, is justified.

However, if one means by such a phrase that such actions must specifically be mentioned in the Qur’an or the sunna, then this is wrong and can be taken to imply that the companions of the Prophet themselves went wrong. After all, they initiated many new policies and took numerous measures in order to fulfill the needs of the society in response to new developments or changing circumstances.[165]

In contemporary times, numerous examples can be cited to show that Islamic individuals and groups have entered into alliances in order to prevent evil or in order to serve the community within a non-Islamic framework. This is happening despite the fact that many scholars still insist that such measures should not be pursued.[166] With due respect, these scholars make life difficult for the Muslims unnecessarily. Their opinions impose restrictions on a policy which is definitely permissible and lawful, and which is intended to equip the Muslims with the ability to react positively in situations that can be very difficult indeed.

To cite only a few examples of such situations:

First: About one third of the Muslims in the world are minorities in the countries they live in, that is to say they have no hope in the foreseeable future of governing their countries in an Islamic way. Many of these Muslim minorities face threats of exile or annihilation due to ethnic cleansing and other pressures. What options does Islamic jurisprudence have for them? Some people have been suggesting that such minorities should emigrate to countries that have Muslim majorities. If this were possible, and it is normally impossible, what good would it do them? Or is such a suggestion another plot against the Muslims in order to drive them out of their homes? There are those who advise Muslim minorities to isolate themselves and wait, but this too contradicts the very essence of the Islamic message, which encourages the faithful to be positive, active and involved.

The best option for such minorities is to enter into alliances with secular democratic groups. They can then work towards the establishment of a secular democratic government which will respect human rights, ensuring security and freedom of expression and belief—essential requirements of mankind that Islam has come to fulfill.

The accomplishment of such important values in any society will immediately transform it, in the Islamic conception, from dar al-harb, a land of hostility and war against Islam, to a land of peace and tranquillity. Al-Imam Al-Nawawi [1233–1277] defines dar al-harb as the country in which the faithful cannot practice their religious duties freely, and consequently emigrating from it becomes an imperative duty. [167] True democracies are not like this; they guarantee the freedom of worship and belief.

Second: There are many Islamic communities or movements that exist in countries that have Muslim majorities but which happen to be ruled by dictatorships claiming to be Islamic or by dictatorships hostile to Islam. Such Islamic movements may not be able to reform the regime or change it alone. Does the shari’a object to cooperation and alliance between these movements and secular parties that also work and struggle to topple the dictatorships and establish secular democracies that would respect humans and guarantee their liberties? No, not at all.

Third: Similarly, the Islamic groups which exist in Muslim majority countries governed by dictatorships may be able to attract majority support from the public and establish an Islamic government. However, such a transition may incite hostility towards them from within their own country or from other countries, rendering the newly-formed Islamic government susceptible to oppression or other forms of pressures that may end with its collapse.

Is there any reason why such groups cannot agree or coordinate either secular groups in ordeal to isolate the existing oppressive power and establish a secular democracy, postponing the long-term objective of establishing an Islamic government until circumstances permit? Certainly, there is nothing against that.

It should be emphasized that the choice in this case is not between Islamic government and a non-Islamic one, but between dictatorship and democracy.

Fourth: The Islamic groups which exist in countries colonized by foreign powers. Is there any reason why they should not form a united front with the secular groups in order to confront the common enemy of a national alternative, in which the Muslims would have a better life than under the colonial authority? Certainly, there is nothing to prevent them from doing so.

 Conclusion

If the establishment of the Islamic government is the short or long-term goal of every Islamic group in order to implement God’s commandments, the shari’a does take into consideration the possibility that such a goal may not be easily accomplished, and therefore an alternative is provided. Under exceptional circumstances, Islamic groups may forge alliances with non-Islamic groups in order to establish a pluralistic government system in which power is held by the majority party.

Such an alliance may also exist for the purpose of deterring aggression or getting rid of a dictatorship. In all cases, the alliance must not include provisions that would in any way undermine Islam, or impose restrictions on those who work for Islam and who seek to establish its system in the land. [168]

These arguments are based on:

- the principle of supporting that which brings good and suppressing that which produces evil.

- the rule that what an imperative duty is essentially dependent on is imperative in itself.

- the rule of consequences or outcomes.

- the principle of necessity.

What is most important is that a Muslim must remain positive and actively engaged in the effort to implement the revealed laws of God, whether partially or in their totality, depending on circumstances and resources. The essence of God's laws, for which all divine messages were sent, is the establishment ofjustice for mankind.

"We sent aforetime our Messengers with clear signs and sent down with them the Book and the Balance (of right and wrong), that men may stand forth in justice." (Sura 57, Verse 25)

It should however be emphasized that the problem facing the concept of power- sharing does not lie in the difficulty of convincing the Islamists to accept democracy, pluralism and power-sharing. The current general trend in Islamic circles is to adopt power-sharing—even in a secular style government—as a means for achieving mutual goals such as national solidarity, respect for human rights, civil liberties, cultural, social and economic development, and the deterrence of external threats.

The real problem lies in convincing the "other," that is the ruling regimes, of the principle of "the people's sovereignty" and of the right of Islamists—just like other political groups—to form political parties, engage in political activities and compete for power or share in power through democratic means.

The punishment of the Islamic victors in the Tunisian and Algerian elections—which have regrettably been taking place with the consent of Western democracies and the support of local "secular theological elites"[169] that are allied with the oppressive regimes in both countries—provides a decisive evidence that the root of the problem in the Muslim world lies in the hegemony of despotism. Our main task now is to combat despotism in favor of a genuine and true transition to democracy.

 10. Democracy and Shura

Sadek J. Sulaiman

Sadek Jawad Sulaiman (Oman, born 1933), like many Omanis who came of age before the oil era, left his country in the 1950s. He worked as a journalist in Kuwait prior to his return to Oman in 1973. From 1976 until 1983, he worked for Oman's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, where he was director of political affairs (1977–1979) and ambassador to the United States (1979–1983). Since 1983, he has divided his time between Washington and Oman. This chapter was first presented as a talk in August 1996 at the al-Hiwar (Dialogue) Center in Washington, D.C., a discussion group of Arab intellectuals, diplomats, and businessmen. Sulaiman's comparison between the Qur'anic principle of shura and democracy as it has developed in the United States may at first appear unexpected. Sulaiman explains: "Many Arabs understand democracy as a slogan. Only by understanding it in history and practice does its compatibility with shura emerge."[170] In the context of the Gulf states, Sulaiman's argument—that the "logic of shura, like the logic of democracy, does not accept hereditary rule, for wisdom and competence are never the monopoly of any one individual or family"—is bold and innovative.

The subject of this discussion is vital for initiating a change in Arab public life, for the relationship between democracy and shura touches the essence of our national existence (qawmiyya). It determines the quality of our civic experience and the world we would like to leave for future generations. For this reason the subject merits our full attention.

 Democracy

Democracy literally means rule by the people, and this distinguishes it from any pattern of governance not deriving its legitimacy from the people's choice. Americans define democracy in the words of their 16th president, Abraham Lincoln [1809–1865]: "Rule of the people, by the people, for the people." The definition I usually offer is "public participation in decisions affecting public life."

This participation can be either direct or indirect. In direct participation, the people decide the results by a majority vote. They discuss the issue at hand, then reach a decision representing the collective wisdom. Something akin to this happens in "town meetings." A clear example is when people vote on a "proposition"—a term Americans use when an issue that has generated considerable controversy is referred to the public for resolution. Proposition 187 in 1995 in California, denying public services to illegal immigrants, is a notable example of direct participation. Another is the referendum in 1995 by which Canadians in Quebec rejected the separation of their province. With indirect participation, the people do not specifically decide issues but elect people to represent their views and make decisions. The elected representatives perform this task within the written parameters of a constitution.

The American constitutional system is based on indirect participation, and the republican system in American constitutional law is centered on the principle of representation. It is appropriate to note, however, that the dynamism of the media in recent years has generated more direct participation in policy-making and legislating. The influence that media talk shows and opinion polls have on elected officials is unmistakably clear.

Democracy’s core principle is equality, the affirmation that all people are equal. Any discrimination among people on the basis of race, gender, religion, or lineage is inherently invalid. All people are endowed with inalienable human rights. To secure these rights, governments derive their legitimacy from the consent of the governed.

The chief characteristics of the democratic system are:

1. Freedom of speech, whereby citizens are able openly to state their views on public issues without impediment or fear, regardless of whether such views are critical or supportive of the government. In the democratic system, it is important for officials to know how the people feel about policies they adopt and decisions they make.

2. Free elections in which citizens regularly, in accordance with precise and constitutionally protected procedures, elect people they entrust with the affairs of governance. Elections legitimize all levels of representation, from the city council to the presidency of the state.

3. Majority rule and minority rights: In the democratic system, decisions are made by the majority, based on the general conviction that the judgment of the majority is more likely to be right than that of the minority. But majority rule does not give a free hand to the majority to do as it wants. Embedded in the democratic principle is the commitment that certain fundamental citizens’ rights shall not be violated—for example, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, and the free exercise of religion.

4. Political parties in the democratic system play an important role. By means of political parties, people freely associate on the basis of their convictions about how to achieve a fulfilling life for themselves, their family, and their posterity.

5. Separation between the legislative, the executive, and the judiciary, whereby constitutional checks and balances among these three branches of government prevent potential exploitative practices.

6. Constitutional authority is the supreme authority on the validity of any statutory law or executive directive. Constitutional authority means supremacy of the rule of law, not the rule of individuals, in the resolution of any public matter.

7. Freedom of action for individuals and groups, provided they do not infringe on the common good. From this derives the freedom to own property, the freedom to work, the freedom to pursue personal goals, and the freedom to form various associations and corporations.

These elements are common to any bona fide democratic system. They are particularly well articulated in the American constitutional system under which we live and whose characteristics, as a great and unique experience in the formation and evolution of nations, we try to understand.

The essentials of the American democratic experience were present at its origin but expanded in scope and evolved in application over time. For example, even though the principle of equality as a foundational idea was firmly established in the Declaration of Independence in 1776, the right for free men to vote on an equal basis was not granted until 1850. Black males were not allowed to vote until the 15th constitutional amendment in 1870. Females, both free and slave, were not given the right to vote until the 19th constitutional amendment in 1920. Finally, the poll tax was not abolished until the 24th constitutional amendment in 1964.

Thus we see that the American state, one considered an exemplar of democratic systems, although based on a constitution, did not have its constitutionality complete at birth, nor is it complete today. This is because the democratic principle, although recognized as a universal human principle since ancient times, continues to demand better fulfillment in the experiences of all nations. We also see that the democratic principle is one thing and our endeavors to realize its requirements, something else. In this latter sense, there is no such thing as an ideal democratic society. We must distinguish, on the one hand, between societies that uphold the democratic principle and endeavor to attain its fulfillment, and societies whose rulers reject the democratic principle, exercise autocratic rule and privilege, and deny equality as a moral imperative.

 Shura

As a concept and as a principle, shura in Islam does not differ from democracy. Both shura and democracy arise from the central consideration that collective deliberation is more likely to lead to a fair and sound result for the social good than individual preference. Both concepts also assume that majority judgment tends to be more comprehensive and accurate than minority judgment. As principles, shura and democracy proceed from the core idea that all people are equal in rights and responsibilities. Both thereby commit to the rule of the people through application of the law rather than the rule of individuals or a family through autocratic decree. Both affirm that a more comprehensive fulfillment of the principles and values by which humanity prospers cannot be achieved in a non-democratic, non-shura environment.

I do not see shura as rejecting or incompatible with the basic elements of a democratic system. The Qur’an mentions shura as a principle governing the public life of the society of the faithful rather than a specifically ordained system of governance. As such, the more any system constitutionally, institutionally, and practically fulfills the principle of shura—or, for that matter, the democratic principle—the more Islamic that system becomes.

There are cultural specifics rooted in the history of every nation that might justify differences in how the democratic principle is applied, but no Arab or Islamic cultural specifics explain the level of civic degeneration with which we Arabs are afflicted today. It is neither an Arab particularity nor an article of the Islamic faith that freedom of speech be suffocated in our national experience, that our people be denied free elections, that our affairs be conducted without the benefit of consensus, and that peaceful political activity be forbidden to our masses. It is neither Arabic nor Islamic that our nation’s fate should rest in the hands of a few persons unbound by constitutional restraints.

Some people claim that Arabs are not yet ready for democratic or shura governance and that they do not appreciate the democratic principle and values needed to embrace the rule of law, as opposed to the rule of individuals. Such a claim is perverse, unfair, or bad judgment. Any nation that emerged from the civilization of Islam was enjoined to exercise shura. Such nations were nurtured with the principles ofjustice, equality, and human dignity, values which sustain and enhance the human experience. Such nations simply cannot be less qualified to exercise democracy than other nations.

I regard democracy and shura as synonymous in conception and principle, although they may differ in details of application to conform to local custom. They reject any government lacking the legitimacy of free elections, accountability, and the people’s power, through the constitutional process, to impeach the ruler for violation of trust. The logic of shura, like the logic of democracy, does not accept hereditary rule, for wisdom and competence are never the monopoly of any one individual or family. Likewise, shura and democracy both reject government by force, for any rule sustained by coercion is illegitimate. Moreover, both forbid privileges—political, social, economic—claimed on the basis of tribal lineage or social prestige.

Shura and democracy are thus one and the same concept. They prod us to find better and better realizations of the principles ofjustice, equality, and human dignity in our collective socio-political experience. These principles merit implementation in national life across the entire Arab homeland. Let us hope that shura or democracy—the choice of terms makes no difference—will find supporters who aspire to a new Arab renaissance.

* Part III—Rights of Women

 11. Unveiling and Veiling

Nazira Zein-ed-Din

Nazira Zein-ed-Din (Ottoman Lebanon, born circa 1905), the daughter of a high-ranking Lebanese judge, was a theological prodigy. In the summer of 1927, as a young woman, she began to research Islamic teachings on the subject of hijab, the modest clothing required of Muslim women. She was motivated by the contrast between recent incidents in Syria, where women were prevented from leaving their homes without the veil, and Turkey, where secular reformers encouraged women to remove the veil.[171] Zein-ed-Din published her findings—excerpted here—in 1928, arguing that veiling was anachronistic and that Islam, properly understood, treats women as the equals of men, perhaps even their betters. The book was immediately controversial. Within a year, she had published a follow-up volume containing letters of support and vehement criticism, including the accusation that a young woman could not have written such a work.[172] Zein-ed-Din’s subsequent career has been difficult to trace.

 Two Views: One View on the Unveiled World and the Other on the Veiled World

Ladies and gentlemen, in the beginning I compared opposites, the numbers of the veiled and the unveiled. I found that the veiled are not more than a few million Muslims living in towns. Those in the villages of the Islamic world and more than 1700 million in other nations are not veiled. They have rejected the veil that they had previously worn. I have noticed that the nations that have given up the veil are the nations that have advanced in intellectual and material life. Such advancement is not equaled in the veiled nations. The unveiled nations are the ones that have discovered through research and study the secrets of nature and have brought the physical elements under their control, as you see and know. But the veiled nations have not unearthed any secret and have not put any of the physical elements under their control but only sing the songs of a glorious past and ancient tradition. With such singing they sleep in stagnation.

I have seen many intellectuals of the nations where women are still veiled advocating unveiling, but I haven’t seen anyone in the unveiled nations advocating or preferring the veil. That is, I haven’t seen anyone who has tried unveiling and then has preferred the veil. Even if some Westerner in his hypocritical words makes the veil appear in a favorable light, he is only pleased with the beauty of the Oriental veil while at the same time he would reject the veiling of his mother, wife, sisters, and daughters because of the harm in the veil he favors for others.

I cannot imagine that in the advanced nations which have discovered the secrets of nature and harnessed its powers, which have not let anything pass without examining it to the fullest, where the struggle between right and wrong is continuous until right becomes victorious, nations which have produced works on social subjects we view as masterpieces of literature and sociology, have neglected to study veiling and unveiling to understand the benefits and disadvantages. I cannot think that our own ignorance brings us any greater understanding of what honor is than the unveiled nations possess in learning nor that our conduct is superior to theirs, nor that their women going outside unveiled enjoying their freedom is evidence of their lower conduct and corrupt morals.

Yes, I looked into all that and I could not but consider it evidence of their superior education and elevated conduct. When our esteemed ladies who wear the veil go to a Western country, they take off the veil and the men accompanying them do not prevent them from doing this the way they do when they are at home or after they return. This is because we have more faith in the conduct of Westerners than in our own conduct. The conduct of Westerners has been influenced by mingling with women and thus Western men have based their habits and morals on logic and reason looking to benefits and positive results while our conduct and morals are based on our customs whatever they may be.

I shall never forget a conversation between an Eastern man advocating the veil and an unveiled Western woman who enjoyed her freedom and independence. The Easterner said to the Westerner, “Our nature cannot accept your customs. Our customs are more noble than yours and our men support our women. The man according to his right walks in front of his wife but in your country the woman walks in front of the man as if she were the provider.”

The Western woman said, “If you really want to protect your wife please let her go in front of you so that you can watch out for her for the way our men do, rather than letting her walk behind you so that she would misuse her freedom and get hurt.”

The Eastern man paused and said, “Truly, Westerners ground their customs in reason. Reason alone should dictate custom.”

It is not fitting for us to say that we who are only a few million, most of whom are not advanced, are more honorable than the one and a half billion people (in the world), most of whom are more advanced than we are.

It is not honorable for us to deny our shortcomings and believe we are perfect and claim that our customs are the best customs for every time and place. This conceit and false presumption is a barrier to the reform we seek. When the nation feels its shortcomings, that is the first step in its advancement.

It is inconceivable that we claim to be defenders of honor while the veil is our strongest shield. We must understand as everyone else does that honor is rooted in the heart and chastity comes from within and not from a piece of transparent material lowered over the face.

We have to realize, as the advanced unveiled world does, that good behavior and honor come from sound upbringing grounded in noble principles and virtues. We are shortsighted if we think that the veil keeps evil away from women and that those in the rest of the world exceeding one and a half billion are all in the wrong while we are in the right.

 He Who Bears Falsehood to the People Has to Provide Evidence to Them

I have mentioned the above, ladies and gentlemen, fearful that I might be confronted by someone who does not use logic and reasoning to make his points, but relies on untruths concerning the advanced unveiled nations. He may look where vice is but he does not wish to rise up to see where virtue resides. He might have seen their baser women and generalizes from them, subsuming the noble and honorable in his generalization, and hurls accusing arrows of untruths at them even though human beings should not be like flies pouncing on tails (of animals) and ignoring their heads.

He does not dare to lord scientific and industrial knowledge over the unveiled nations because these are tangible matters. Therefore he accuses them of lack of morals and good conduct because these are not tangible. Thus he is overwhelming in this even though his accusation is false.

You know gentlemen, nations are like trees whose rotten fruits fall to the ground and vermin, humans and animals go after them. Those who are wise and advanced look only to the good and ripe fruits, by which the tree is identified.

My antagonist seems to be ignorant of that or is playing the role of the ignorant. He wants to know the tree by the fallen fruits he sees beneath it. Moreover, he does not want to recognize that in every nation, however advanced, there is a lower class overcome by corruption whose morals and conduct have deteriorated because they did not have the chance to be educated and to develop so that they could reach the higher level in the nation.

Gentlemen, we should do our best to see to it that the majority in our nation are able to have an education and the means to develop. Then it would be possible for us to be proud before our nations....

We should not believe everything we hear and take our evidence from falsehood, especially evidence that brings great evil to the nation by obstructing reform and maintaining continual backwardness.

We should abstain from hurling lies and falsehoods at others, which is alien to morality and decent debate and only brings down those who lie. Instead we should subscribe to truth, sound reasoning, unbiased knowledge, and correct behavior. In accordance with the will of God Almighty and the will of His Prophet, may God bless him....

 How Men Should Support Women

Gentlemen, you have heard the response of the Western woman to the Eastern man who was proud to support his woman and to walk in front of her. Yes, let men support women in principle. Every man supports his own wife spending money on her, but he has no authority over any other woman. A verse from the Qur’an was sent by God about this in relation to Sa’d ibn al-Rabi from al-Naqba and his wife Habiba; the words are related specifically to husband and wife. Men should know that authority is limited by the benefit deriving from it. Therefore, men should attain high moral development as God wants and society requires. This would make women strong and self-dependent, for when people have virtue, dignity, and honor they turn away from evil, not out of fear of punishment, nor because of reward, nor because of an immovable obstacle, but because evil is ugly and such a person would not allow herself to engage in lowly acts.

The Prophet, God bless him, said, “I was sent to help you attain the highest morality.” Does not the highest morality come from the soul? Pieces of cloth over faces shall never be a measure of morality.

 The Veil (Niqab) is an Insult to Men and Women

It is not beneficial to men and women that men should just support women physically and financially, nor is it beneficial that man rule over those whom the shari’a [Islamic law] did not give him the right. It greatly harms the two sexes that every man continues to insult his mother, daughter, wife, and sister, suspiciously accusing them of bad morals and keeping them confined to a cage, as the venerable Qasim Amin [Egypt, 1865–1908] said, “With their wings cut off, heads bent down, and eyes closed. For him (man) is freedom and for them (women) enslavement. For him is education and for them ignorance. For him is sound reasoning and for them inferior reasoning. For him is light and open space and for them darkness and imprisonment. For him are orders and for them obedience and patience. For him is everything in the universe and for them part of the whole he has captured.”

May God be merciful to Qasim and bless his pen, about which “The Poet of the Two Countries” has said, “He tears down the ugly and builds the beautiful, returning to the sunna [the practices of the Prophet] of the Drawer. He sheds light even when he writes with the dark water of the night.”

Unfortunately, if the veil (hijab) implies the inability of the woman to protect herself without it, it also reveals that man, however well brought up and in spite of supporting the woman, is a traitor and a thief of honor; his evil should be feared and it is better that the woman escapes from him.

 You, Man, the Supporter

If some women, because of the ignorance into which you have cast them, have not recognized the insult to them and to men by the veil, is it easy for you, the man who has kept himself free seeking perfection and good conduct, to bear this insult that comes to you and to your mother, daughter, wife, and sister?

Does the woman who escapes from you, or approaches you lowering the veil over her face, or turns her back on you, confirm your high status, as she might think and say and you might think and say, or is it a great insult? Does this constitute the woman’s decorum, chastity and modesty? If so, then men should not be without these precious attributes; let them wear veils and let them meet each other and meet women lowering veils over their faces the way women do....

On Man’s Superiority in His Rights to Inheritance, Legal Testimony, Polygamy, and Arbitrariness in Divorce as Evidence Not to His Advantage But Against Him

I noticed in some of the articles written against women and their liberation, as well as against their removal of the veil, that the authors boast of the fact that in his Holy Qur’an, God favored men over women—mind and soul—in three different matters:

<quote>

First, God made a woman entitled to inherit only half of what a man inherits.

Second, God considers her testimony (legally) worth only half of his.

Third, He, the Almighty, allowed a man to marry up to four wives and divorce them at will, without their consent.

</quote>

The authors of these articles conclude from this that the woman is mentally and spiritually inferior. Hence they think that God, the Almighty, decided to favor a man over a woman in these three areas. But as far as I am concerned, I conclude otherwise. I understand the argument to be against men rather than in their favor.

Indeed, I examine Islam through the greatest words of God and the sayings of His Prophet. I then see God enthroned in greatness, freedom, equality, justice, goodness, and perfection. I become so overwhelmed and so elated that I feel my soul about to leave my body. I only wish that those who pretend to protect Islam and raise its banners would look in the same way as I do and see what I see. I wish they did not look at Islam through the narrow vision of commentaries and interpretations which interpret Islam in ways they want to see it. Islam is far beyond that. It is much greater.

God’s permissibility only showed man’s cruel heart, his inability to submit to truth and justice, and his immoral character, acquired from the worst pre-Islamic customs. Such a character, as is well known, is in contradiction with the nature of noble human mentality.

Man subjected to slavery those he deemed weak among women as among men, treating them according to his whims like merchandise or cattle. Had it not been for the viciousness in his mind, his misguided soul and cruel heart, God would not have granted him then such allowances that He disliked and which were meant to vanish with time.

We have thus far seen [in earlier sections of the author's book] what the woman's condition was, under the yoke of man throughout the world in general and in pre- Islamic Arabia in particular, just before the Qur'an was revealed to our Prophet, God bless him and grant him salvation.

God dislikes slavery. He dislikes polygamy and any violation of women's rights. God loathes divorce. His divine throne shakes every time the word is uttered on earth, as I will explain in detail below in a discussion of divorce [not included in this excerpt].

God revealed His holy message all filled with the spirit of freedom, justice and equality among people. He does not differentiate between them for His esteem, except on the basis of their faith in Him. How would then the Almighty condone the enslavement of His human creation in whom He instilled life, and for whom He ordered angels to bow in honor and respect? Did God, we might ask, instill life in the strong who take others into slavery but not in the weak who are enslaved by others? Of course not! God gave life to all. Yet, since the days of Adam, peace be upon him, man has disobeyed God and gone astray.

If Adam himself, who was a prophet, "disobeyed God's order and went astray," what of his male offspring who have realized their strength and became misguided by it? In their arrogant ways, they took into slavery whoever they saw as weak.

God sent His Prophet, peace and salvation be upon him, to mankind in that corrupt land of ignorance. He warned him in these holy words: "If you were rude and arrogant, people would desert you." And as goes one of the Prophet's own sayings: "Teach others, be lenient not harsh, preach but do not alienate anyone."

In his book Al-Islam ruh al-madaniyya [Islam, The Spirit of Civilization], Shaykh [Mustafa] Al-Ghalayini [Ottoman Empire-Lebanon, 1886–1945] wrote: “It was considered wise in Islam not to totally abolish some of the reprehensible traditions such as polygamy, as there were so many difficulties involved.” He also went on to say: “Slavery and harsh treatment of captives are odious acts by Islamic standards. Slavery was considered inherited from the era of savageness. Politically, however, it was not ruled absolutely forbidden in those days.” In fact if all those customs had been entirely abolished by God, several problems would have ensued. The least of these is that men would have broken away from God’s religion and deserted His Prophet. Moreover, not many of His commandments would have been obeyed.

In pre-Islamic Arabia, women as well as male slaves were under the domination of financially powerful men who owned them and enjoyed them at will. These materialistic men used to get as infatuated with their wealth as they were with themselves. A man in those days would own as many as one hundred women and a large number of male slaves. Like property or cattle they were inherited as a part of an estate. How can we then take it for granted that they could be set free from man’s ownership and made equal to him in every way, at the same time, and not in a gradual fashion? God said in the Holy Qur’an, “And if We willed it for them to either kill themselves or leave their land, only a few of them would.” [Sura 4, Verse 66] Thus it was out of God’s wisdom to eliminate some of these reprehensible customs, while leaving traces of them to turn men’s attention to Him so they would not give up His religion and abandon His Prophet.

As for a woman’s legal testimony, should the fact that it is considered worth only half of that of a man’s be grounds for women’s mental inferiority? If so, a nonMuslim’s legal testimony for or against a Muslim is not accepted; can that also be considered evidence for non-Muslims’ mental inferiority? Or was it rather a decision resulting from some unusual circumstances in those days?

In the final analysis, it was no other than God’s kindness to the woman to consider her testimony worth half that of a man’s. The latter interpreted it as a privilege and became satisfied with it. In reality, legal testimony is no other than a bothersome obligation. It is as if God wanted to reassure men and relieve women from such an obligation at the same time. It seems as if testimony were expressly ruled outside a woman’s competence, so that only men would be called upon to testify in courts. There is no reason to believe that God decided that because of a deficiency in the woman’s faith or intelligence. Women possess a great deal of goodness and spiritual righteousness, and as the Prophet’s saying goes, “One good woman is better than a thousand improper men.”

Through God’s wisdom, the persistence of a few traces of those bad customs is a way of soothing the minds of those who practice them. His wisdom is revealed in several ways and verses. In the tradition of His Prophet, God bless him and grant him salvation, there is proof that the dangers in the persistence of such traces of vile traditions are removed. Thus their impact is reduced and they become acceptable rather than offensive.

God knew that people with insight would erase all traces of reprehensible customs, following this way the wisdom implied by those Qur’anic verses and Prophet’s teachings. God was indeed aware that such wisdom was not unknown to His people. Hence he allowed the taking of slaves but was eager for their freedom, in the same way that He was yearning to abolish polygamy and end discrimination between men and women in their rights. This is one of the interpretations suggested by the famous scholar Muhammad ‘Abduh [Egypt, 1849–1905].

Below however is another quotation from [Muhammad] Jamil Bayhum [Lebanon, 1887–1978], the author of Al-Mar’afi al-tarikh wa al-shara’i’ [Woman in History and Religious Legal Systems]:

<quote>

Some commentators have interpreted these opinions as implying a ban on polygamy, because allowing it must depend on fairness in treatment while such indiscriminate justice is highly improbable. But this is in no way an uncommon interpretation as long as laws are subject to considerations of culture and civilization. Just as Christians were somehow able to discover that their religion prohibits polygamy, when it actually did not object to it, it would be easy for Muslims to enact legislation forbidding polygamy, in appreciation of the general world condition, progress and the advancement of women.

</quote>

Indeed that would be easier for Muslims than making laws condoning all the vile sins such as drinking alcohol, prostitution, usury and idolatry, or disapproving of some of God’s ordinances like stoning, requital or other legal punishments. Such laws are constantly being enacted.

Don’t you see that slavery was discontinued in Islamic countries like everywhere else and that punishment is administered to whoever engages in it? Don’t you see that polygamy has become considered evil by enlightened communities around us, and that the great independent Islamic nation of Turkey has banned it and reserves for it the harshest of punishments?

Don’t you see that, through government laws, Islamic countries have made a woman’s legal testimony equal to a man’s both in witnessing legal punishment as well as in other cases? They gave her equal right for inheriting land, and in Turkey, a woman’s right is equal to that of a man for testimony in all cases and transactions, and in inheritance for any kind of property.

By enacting laws to eliminate those vile traditions, the Islamic governments were not in contradiction with God’s message and the teachings of His Prophet. Those governments understood the reasoning behind those teachings. They abolished slavery and ended any discrimination between man and woman. Not only did they interpret the surface meanings of those Qur’anic verses and Prophet s teaching; but also they interpreted their essence in depth in the manner of people with insight and reason.

This is indeed an important and broad subject. To cover it with a presentation of convincing evidence would require lengthy explications that are beyond the scope of my present lecture series. God willing, I shall deal with it in a special lecture.

Nevertheless, I think that we should realize right now the reason which led to the persistence of those reprehensible customs and why they had such an impact on the absolute equality of man and woman and amongst men (as slaves and free men). Perhaps that reason is man's cruelty, his error, arbitrariness, and the evil side in his character prevailing over the good side. That is what led God's wisdom, to permit something reprehensible that He never condoned as fair and just.

Right now, we must realize that this reason for that has nothing to do with a woman's faith or her intelligence. In no way was the inequality between a helpless slave and a powerful free man a result of mental or spiritual deficiency so that inequality between man and woman in the matters mentioned should result from her mental and spiritual deficiency.

If God had truly condoned slavery, polygamy and inequality between man and woman, He would not have made the man accountable for expenditures for the woman's dowry, her support and that of her children's which are equal or greater than what she misses in inheritance. If so, indeed, God would not have established laws leading to the disappearance of slavery and the avoidance of polygamy; and His Prophet would not have preferred females over males in several matters. In fact, here are some of his sayings:

<quote>

When you give to your children, be fair in your giving and give equally. If I personally had a preference to make (in giving to my own), I would prefer giving to my daughters.

Whoever goes to market and buys something to bring back home, especially for the females in his family, will enjoy God’s care, and whoever is in God’s care will be protected from all suffering.

Purchasing a choice gift for members of your family is like giving charity. Priority should go to the females, because bringing joy to a female is like crying humbly in fear and respect of God and whoever cries in fear of God will be spared from the fires of Hell.

</quote>

Therefore if females were deficient in mind and in faith, they would not be worthy of such preferential thoughts by the Prophet of God. He is much beyond preferring stupidity over intelligence, and a lack of faith over an abundance of it. He once also said, “Fear God in your treatment of the weak, slaves and women.”

As for this last piece of advice given by the Prophet of God, we must stand facing Mecca, humbly and in reverence, in order to hear it. He uttered it from his death bed, at a time he was in distress, because he had not completely removed all of the differences between the slaves and the free, and between men and women. He uttered the following final words, his voice stammering, until his very last word:

<quote>

Prayer ... Prayer ... If any slaves are in your possession, do not burden them with what they are unable to do. God. God ... of Women. They are in your hands.... You took them with God’s trust.

</quote>

He uttered these words and passed away. Peace be upon you, o Prophet of God, peace be upon you, o beloved of God. Peace be upon you, Lord of the first and last prophets. Peace be upon you the day you were born, the day you died, and the day you will be resurrected.

 12. Politics and the Muslim Woman

Benazir Bhutto

Benazir Bhutto (Pakistan, born 1953), twice prime minister of Pakistan (1988–1990 and 1993–1996), is known more for her political activities than for her religious scholarship. Following the overthrow and execution of her father, Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, Benazir Bhutto adopted the leadership of his Pakistani People’s Party and opposed the Islamic regime of General Zia-ul-Haq. She spent years in jail, under house arrest, and in exile. As a political leader in an Islamic country, Bhutto has naturally been sensitive to charges that Islam prohibits women from holding such positions.[173] In the speech excerpted here, from her period of exile, she argues that Islamic law does not treat women as inferior to men or incapable of leadership.[174]

I think one of the first things that we must appreciate about the religion of Islam is that there is no one interpretation to it. Islam has certain religious aspects and has some aspects which relate to relations between man and man in society. Just as we have different religious sects in Islam, upholding different religious views—whether it is the Shi’is, the Sunnis, the Malakis, the Hanafis, the Barelwis[175]—so, too, we have different interpretations with regard to the more secular aspects of the duties incumbent upon the Muslim.

I would describe Islam in two main categories: reactionary Islam and progressive Islam. We can have a reactionary interpretation of Islam which tries to uphold the status quo, or we can have a progressive interpretation of Islam which tries to move with a changing world, which believes in human dignity, which believes in consensus, and which believes in giving women their due right.

I know that some authors have speculated that women in Islamic countries can never achieve self- actualization or a degree of assertiveness unless they look at this from a non-Islamic point of view. I don't agree with that at all. I believe that Islam within it provides justice and equality for women, and I think that those aspects of Islam which have been highlighted by the mullas [religious scholars] do not do a service to our religion. When I use the term mullas, please don't try to think of them in the same terms as the clergy. Christianity has a clergy. Islam does not have a clergy. The relationship between a Muslim and God is direct. There is no need for somebody to intervene. The mullas try to intervene. The mullas give their own interpretation. But I think there are growing movements, as more and more people in Muslim countries, both men and women, achieve education and begin to examine the Qur'an in the light of their education, they are beginning not to agree with the mullas on their orthodox or reactionary version of Islam.

Let us start with the story of the Fall. Unlike Christianity, it is not Eve who tempts Adam into tasting the apple and being responsible for original sin. According to Islam—and I mention this because I believe that Islam is an egalitarian religion—both Adam and Eve are tempted, both are warned, both do not heed the warning, and therefore the Fall occurs.

As far as opportunity is concerned, in Islam there is equal opportunity for both men and women. I refer to the Sura Ya Sin [Sura 36, Verses 34–35], which says: "We produce orchids and date gardens and vines, and we cause springs to gush forth, that they may enjoy the fruits of it." God does not give fruits, orchids, or the fruit of the soil just for men to enjoy or men to plow; he gives it for both men and women. What, in terms of income and opportunity, is available, is available to both man and woman. Sura an-Nisa [Sura 4, Verse 32]: "To men is allotted what they earn, and to women what they earn."

As regards the law of inheritance, some scholars make a great degree of the fact that inheritance law gives twice the amount to a son, and half the amount to a daughter [Sura 4, Verse 11]. Well, maybe if you look at it in isolation, but not if you look at it in the whole aspect, because it is made abundantly clear that the woman's share is for the use of the woman alone. A man gets two-thirds. One-third—the equivalent of the woman's—is for his own use. The addition one-third that a man gets is to provide provision for his wife and children. This is the obligation on the man. He gets that extra share so that he can provide for the family, the wife and the children. The wife is not responsible for the welfare of the husband, nor is she responsible for the welfare of the children. The wife is not even responsible for suckling her own child. If she chooses not to suckle her child, she does not have to. If she chooses to suckle her child, it is for the husband to provide her with the provisions....

But when it is the case, for instance, of parents, then the Qur'an says, "For parents, a sixth share of the inheritance to each if the deceased left children." [Sura 4, Verse 11] It does not say that the father must get double and the woman must get half.... It goes on again to make an equal application when it says, "If the man or woman, who has left neither ascendants nor descendants, but has left a brother and a sister, each one of the two gets a sixth. If more than two brothers and sisters, they shall share [one third of the estate after payment of legacies and debts]." [Sura 4, Verse 12] ... On the whole, the Qur'an proves that it has a balanced outlook whether it refers to men or to women.

As far as forgiveness and reward are concerned, similar conditions are set down for both men and for women. I refer to Sura "The Clan" [Sura 33, Verse 35]: "Men who surrender unto God, and women who surrender, and men who believe, and women who believe, and men who speak the truth, and women who speak the truth, and men who persevere in righteousness, and women who persevere, and men who are humble, and women who are humble, and men who give alms, and women who give alms, and men who fast, and women who fast, and men who guard their modesty, and women who guard their modesty, and men who remember God much, and women who remember, God has prepared for them forgiveness and a vast reward." There are no special considerations set out for the male sex to show that in the eyes of God they are deserving of special considerations.

In Sura “Repentance” [Sura 9, Verse 71], again emphasis is laid on equal advice to men and women: “The believing man and the believing woman, all loyalty to one another, they enjoin noble deeds and forbid dishonor. They perform prayer and say the alms, and obey God and His Messenger. On them will God have mercy.” If it is a matter of entering paradise, again Sura Luqman [Sura 31, Verse 8] says: “If any do righteousness”—be they male or female—“and have faith, they will enter paradise.” As regards theft, if you look at the Sura “Tablespread” [Sura 5, Verse 38]: “As for the thief, both male and female, cut off their hand.”

Now this doesn’t have to do with Muslim women, but I would like to add at this juncture that within Islam there are two kinds of interpretations: One is the rigid interpretation, and one is a conceptual interpretation. Thus, in the rigid or mulla-istic sense, “Cut off their hand” would mean “Cut offtheir hand” even today. But in the conceptual analysis of Islam, “Cut offtheir hand” would mean “Adopt those means which will prevent thievery occurring again.” And again, these means may change with the advance of society. It may involve psychiatric help, it may involve having them kept in a separate home, but the main idea is whether you look at it rigidly, “Cut off their hand,” or whether you look at it conceptually, “Do not provide the means for them to do that theft again.”

When it is adultery, again: “The adulterer and adulteress, give them a hundred stripes.” [Sura 24, Verse 2] That is Sura “Light.” Again I would say that there is the rigid interpretation and the conceptual interpretation, and I think that most progressive Muslims believe in the conceptual interpretation because they believe Islam is a dynamic religion for all times and ages.

In behavior toward parents, in the Sura “Israelites” [Sura 17, Verses 23–24] it again says, “Be kind to parents [...] and out of kindness lower to them the wing of humility and say, ‘My Lord, bestow on them your mercy, even as they cherished me in childhood.’” The reference is both to men and women. And that is the predominant theme of the Qur’an. The references are to men and women. The references are not to men as being characteristic of certain qualities and separate qualities for women. It is not a reference to the male sex as being endowed with some superior attributes and to the woman as being endowed with inferior attributes. The attributes are the same. Both are the creatures of God. Both have certain rights. Both have certain duties. Both have certain obligations. If they want to go to Heaven, they have to behave in a special manner. If they want to do good in this earth, they have to give alms to the needy, they have to help orphans—the behavior is applicable to both men and women. It is not religion which makes the difference. The difference comes from man-made law. It comes from the fact that soon after the Prophet died, it was not the Islam of the Prophet that remained. What took place was the emergence or the reassertiveness of the patriarchal society, and religion was taken over to justify the norms of the tribal society, rather than the point that the Prophet had made in replacing the tribal society with a religion that aimed to cut across narrow loyalties and sought to create a new community, or umma, on the basis of Islam and the message of God.

Now there are certain interpretations within the Qur’an Sharif [the Holy Qur’an] which are extremely ambiguous. Some people interpret them in favor of the conservatives; some people interpret them in favor of the reactionaries. One of these occurs in Sura “The Romans” [Sura 30, Verse 21]: “He created from you helpmates from your self that you might find rest in them.” This is an interpretation that progressives will give: Because it says, “He created from you,” it does not say, “He created from men.” “He created from you” means He created from mankind, or the human race, help-mates. But then other interpretations are given which claim what it said is, God created out of you, out of man, mates that you might find rest in them. And the conservatives use this to say that women were created for men to find rest. Or rather, that they were created to be in the service of man rather than being equal to man.

Arabic is a very complex language. It is a language that many Muslims don’t even understand, because Islam is not only in the Arab countries, but has spread far and beyond. These scholars and these mullas usually argue on these points. One mulla will say that God created women for rest and therefore women are to be used by men. Another one will say no, He created them from amongst yourself. So it depends very much on the matter of interpretation. But which way should interpretation go? Should it go against the basic grain of the entire message of the religion, or should it be in consonance with the basic message of that religion? When the basic message of Islam was for justice and for equality, when it came as a religion to liberate mankind from superstition and ignorance, to provide education and improvements, then I think it is quite clear for modern Islamic thinkers that it is a religion which did not provide for discrimination and ought to be interpreted in the light of its main thematic message, rather than to make ambiguous statements go against the basic theme of the message.

There are many other aspects of Islam which are taken up, again, to provide controversy on whether men and women are equal or not. One of these is the law of evidence. Now the law of evidence: in one specific part of the Qur'an, it is said that if you are going to take a loan or a debt, two men are needed or four women. Now this "two men are needed or four women" has been changed by certain societies, including Pakistan under the present military ruler [Mohammad Zia-ii-Haq, 1924–1988], to mean that the worth of a woman is half that of a man, and that if a woman is killed, compensation will be paid that is half that of a man; and if in a court of law there is evidence, then the woman's evidence will be worth half that of the man. There is no justification for this whatsoever because if the evidence of a woman is worth half that of a man, it would have been clearly stated in the Qur'an. It would not have been related to debts or loans, it would have said that in matters pertaining to legal affairs the evidence of a woman will be half that of a man, or it would have said that in the matter of murder the compensation will be half that of a man. Instead, in terms of compensation, the Qur'an Sharif goes on to say that if you can have retributions, a slave for a slave, a free man for a free man, a woman for a woman, or if the parties agree, they can come to an agreement on blood money or they can set a slave free [Sura 4, Verse 92]. Now the Qur'an says, "set a slave free." It doesn't say that if a woman is murdered set half a slave free. The Qur'an itself makes no distinction at all. It is man and it is the mullas who claim to be the clergy of Islam—and no clergy exist in Islam—who make these discriminations and who give the wrong impression of our religion not only to the outside world but to Muslims ourselves.

The law of evidence, which some Muslim countries following reactionary paths have adopted, conveniently forgets that the first witness to Islam was a woman, and that was the Prophet’s wife, Khadija [died 619]. The only witness to the martyrdom of the third caliph ‘Uthman [reigned 644–656] was his wife, Nila. So when women themselves have been accepted in early Islam as sole witnesses, then what right do those people have, who come much later, to declare that women are worth only half a man’s evidence and that if they are killed, their compensation should be half.

The other aspect that is pointed out that women are discriminated against is the question of inheritance, which I have already dealt with. I don’t think I’ll say more on that.

The third is the right of divorce and polygamy. It is often said that Islam provides for four wives for a man. But in my interpretation of this, and in the interpretation of many other Muslims, that is simply not true.

What the Qur’an does say, and I quote: “Marry as many women as you wish, wives two or three or four. If you fear not to treat them equally, marry only one. […] I doubt you will be able to be just between your wives, even if you try.” [Sura 4, Verses 3 and 129] So if God Himself and His message says that He doubts that you can be equal, I don’t know how any man can turn around and say that “God has given me this right to get married more than once.”

… The Prophet Muhammad, throughout the life of his first wife, Khadija, never married again. The Prophet’s son-in-law, and who was more or less like an adopted son, Hazrat ‘Ali [circa 596–661], during the lifetime of his first wife, Bibi [Madame] Fatima [circa 605–633], never married more than once. The marriages that took place later were more out of necessity of warfare, widows, or even of tribal connections. Thus to say that a man could be allowed to marry four times, at will, is not something that you can find a strong argument for in the Qur’an.

And if you look at Muslim society, it is not often that the vast Muslim population goes on marrying two, three, four [wives]. It is something that is related just to the privileged class. They can afford to do that. And they didn't, as the caliphate ruled and the Muslim empire ruled, they didn't just marry two, three, or four women, they went on to keep harems with hundreds of concubines. None of that had anything to do with Islam, either.

A woman in Islam, when she marries, does not take her husband's name. That is again something that has come about more as a matter of exposure to other customs or traditions. A woman in Islam is an identity in her own right. She is not an extension first of her father and then an extension of her husband. She asserts herself from the moment she is born; she is a person with the characteristics she develops, and she keeps her own name. The ideal of identity is just being appreciated in the West, where many people are beginning to keep their own name.

Aside from these provisions from the Qur'an Sharif, which I have been drawing your attention to, I would like to say that within Islamic history there are very strong roles for women. For instance, the Prophet's wife, Bibi Khadija, was a woman of independent means. She had her own business, she traded, she dealt with society at large, she employed the Prophet Muhammad, peace be upon him, when he was a young boy, and subsequently, Bibi Khadija herself sent a proposal [of marriage] to the Prophet. So she is the very image of somebody who is independent, assertive, and does not conform to the passive description of women in Muslim societies that we have grown accustomed to hearing about. Bibi Khadija was fifteen years older than the Prophet, and she was also known, not only as the wife of the Prophet, but as the Mother of all believers.

Bibi Khadija is a symbol, one can say, for all the sects of Islam. Within the two major sects of Shi'ism and Sunnism, both sects provide for [other] powerful role models for women. The Shi'ite sect provides for Bibi Fatima, the daughter of the Prophet, who from a very small age saw the humiliation that her father faced in spreading his message. When he was taunted, when things were thrown at him, it was Bibi Fatima who was by his side. When they had to face confinement and exile, she, along with her mother, was with him. Hers is a figure of endurance. It is not only a figure of endurance, but after the death of the Prophet, hers is also a figure fighting politically for what she considers is her usurped right—usurpation in terms of the caliphate going to Abu Bakr [reigned 632–634] instead of going to Hazrat ‘Ali, and also usurpation in what she considers to be her property seized unlawfully by the caliphate. So she is a woman who does not accept what has happened to her after the death of the Prophet. She goes to the Helpers, she speaks to them of her plight, and she adopts a political role until her death.

Within the Sunni version there is Bibi ‘A’isha [wife of the Prophet, circa 614–678], who is also put forward as a politically astute woman, who, after the death of the Prophet, was responsible for many of the Traditions that have been handed down to us, who was the one who proposed the caliphate of Hazrat ‘Uthman, and held out the shirt of the Prophet Muhammad, and said that, “Even before this shirt has decayed, you have to ordain someone like Hazrat ‘Uthman.” She made her views known. She was an extremely bold person. Not only did she make her views known; when she opposed something, she went to the battlefield and fought against it.

So when we have such powerful role models of women—of the mother, Bibi Khadija; of the daughter, Bibi Fatima; of the wife, Bibi ‘A’isha—then one must ask, why is it that today in Muslim countries, one does not see that much of women? One does not hear that much of women. Why is it that women are secluded? Why is it that women are subject to social control? Why is that women are not given their due share of property? ... It has got nothing to do with the religion, but it has got very much to do with material or man-made considerations....

I have tried to show you Islam as being a very liberal religion toward women, as giving women their own identity, giving women the right to choose their husbands: If they are not happy with their spouse they don’t have to keep him. When the divorce law [the nuptial agreement between a man and woman] is written, it is a contract of how you live together; you can write in that contract that “I want the right to divorce you”; you can write in that contract that “in the event of divorce I want to be maintained according to the style that I am accustomed to.”

All these considerations are there, and yet women are backward, and they are backward not because Islam has made them backward, but because the societies that they live in are societies which have upheld the privileged class and which have subsisted on a policy of discrimination against a wide segment of the population....

Before I conclude on this aspect of the powerful role within Islam of women, I would like to quote from the Qur'an, the Sura "The Ant" [Sura 27, Verse 23]: "I found a woman ruling over them, and she has been given abundance of all things, and hers is a mighty throne." It is not Islam which is averse to women rulers, I think—it is men.

 13. A Feminist Interpretation of Women's Rights in Islam

Fatima Mernissi

Fatima Mernissi (Morocco, born 1940), "one of the best known Arab-Muslim feminists," was part of the first generation of Moroccan women to be granted access to higher education. She studied at the Mohammed V University in Rabat and went on to receive her doctorate in sociology in the United States in 1973. She returned to Morocco to teach at her alma mater and currently works at a research institute in Rabat. "She is a recognized public figure in her own country," and her work has been translated into several European languages.[176] According to a fellow academic, Mernissi is the first Muslim woman in the Middle East to succeed "in extricating herself from the issue of cultural loyalty and betrayal" that plagues so many Muslim feminists torn between their double identities.[177] According to a fellow African Muslim, Mernissi represents "the aspirations of women who, while remaining Muslims, wish to live in modernity."[178] One of the recurring themes of Mernissi's work is the mistreatment of women in Islamic societies. In this excerpt, Mernissi argues that the Qur'an and other Islamic sources have been systematically misinterpreted on the subject of the position of women.

“Can a woman be a leader of Muslims?” I asked my grocer, who, like most grocers in Morocco, is a true “barometer” of public opinion.

“I take refuge in God!” he exclaimed, shocked, despite the friendly relations between us. Aghast at the idea, he almost dropped the half-dozen eggs I had come to buy.

“May God protect us from the catastrophes of the times!” mumbled a customer who was buying olives, as he made as if to spit. My grocer is a fanatic about cleanliness, and not even denouncing a heresy justifies dirtying the floor in his view.

A second customer, a schoolteacher whom I vaguely knew from the newsstand, stood slowly caressing his wet mint leaves, and then hit me with a hadith [tradition of the Prophet] that he knew would be fatal: “Those who entrust their affairs to a woman will never know prosperity!” Silence fell on the scene. There was nothing I could say. In a Muslim theocracy, a hadith is no small matter. The hadith collections are works that record in minute detail what the Prophet said and did. They constitute, along with the Qur’an (the book revealed by God), both the source of law and the standard for distinguishing the true from the false, the permitted from the forbidden—they have shaped Muslim ethics and values.

I discreetly left the grocery store without another word. What could I have said to counterbalance the force of that political aphorism, which is as implacable as it is popular?

Silenced, defeated, and furious, I suddenly felt the urgent need to inform myself about this hadith and to search out the texts where it is mentioned, to understand better its extraordinary power over the ordinary citizens of a modern state.

A glance at the latest Moroccan election statistics supports the “prediction” uttered in the grocery store. Although the constitution gives women the right to vote and be elected, political reality grants them only the former. In the legislative elections of 1977, the eight women who stood for election found no favor with the six and a half million voters, of whom three million were women. At the opening of Parliament, there was not one woman present, and the men were settled among their male peers as usual, just as in the cafes. Six years later, in the municipal elections of 1983, 307 women were bold enough to stand as candidates, and almost three and a half million women voters went to the polls. Only 36 women won election, as against 65,502 men![179]

To interpret the relationship between the massive participation of women voters and the small number of women elected as a sign of stagnation and backwardness would be in accordance with the usual stereotypes applied to the Arab world. However, it would be more insightful to see it as a reflection of changing times and the intensity of the conflicts between the aspirations of women, who take the constitution of their country seriously, and the resistance of men, who imagine, despite the laws in force, that power is necessarily male. This makes me want to shed light on those obscure zones of resistance, those entrenched attitudes, in order to understand the symbolic—even explosive—significance of that act which elsewhere in the world is an ordinary event: a woman’s vote. For this reason, my misadventure in a neighborhood grocery store had more than symbolic importance for me. Revealing the misogynistic attitude of my neighbors, it indicated to me the path I should follow to better understand it—a study of the religious texts that everybody knows but no one really probes, with the exception of the authorities on the subject: the mullas [religious scholars] and imams [prayer leaders].

Going through the religious literature is no small task. First of all, one is overwhelmed by the number of volumes, and one immediately understands why the average Muslim can never know as much as an imam. [Muhammad ibn Isma’il] Al-Bukhari’s [810–870] prestigious collection of traditions, Al-Sahih (The Authentic), is in four volumes with an abstruse commentary by one [Muhammad ibn ‘Abd al-Hadi] al-Sindi [died 1726], who is extremely sparing with his comments.[180] Now, without a very good commentary a non-expert will have difficulty reading a religious text of the ninth century.... This is because, for each hadith, it is necessary to check the identity of the Companion of the Prophet who uttered it, and in what circumstances and with what objective in mind, as well as the chain of people who passed it along—and there are more fraudulent traditions than authentic ones. For each hadith, al-Bukhari gives the results of his investigation. If he speaks of X or Y, you have to check which Companion is being referred to, what battle is being discussed, in order to make sense of the dialogue or scene that is being transcribed. In addition, al-Bukhari doesn’t use just one informant; there are dozens of them in the dozens of volumes. You must be careful not to go astray. The smallest mistake about the informant can cost you months of work.

What is the best way of making this check? First of all, you should make contact with the experts in religious science (faqihs) in your city. According to moral teaching and the traditional conventions, if you contact afaqih for information about the sources of a hadith or a Qur’anic verse, he must assist you. Knowledge is to be shared, according to the promise of the Prophet himself. Fath al-bari by [Ibn Hajar] al-‘Asqalani (he died in year 852 of the hejira [1372–1449 A.D.]) was recommended to me by several people I consulted. It consists of 17 volumes that one can consult in libraries during their opening hours. But the vastness of the task and the rather limited reading time is enough to discourage most researchers.

The schoolteacher in the grocery store was right: the hadith “those who entrust their affairs to a woman will never know prosperity” was there in al-‘Asqalani’s 13th volume, where he quotes al-Bukhari’s Sahih, that is, those traditions that al-Bukhari classified as authentic after a rigorous process of selection, verifications, and counter-verifications.[181] Al-Bukhari’s work has been one of the most highly respected references for 12 centuries. This hadith is the sledgehammer argument used by those who want to exclude women from politics. One also finds it in the work of other authorities known for their scholarly rigor, such as Ahmad ibn Hanbal [780855], the author of the Musnad and founder of the Hanbali school, one of the four great schools ofjurisprudence of the Sunni Muslim world.[182]

This hadith is so important that it is practically impossible to discuss the question of women's political rights without referring to it, debating it, and taking a position on it....

According to al-Bukhari, it is supposed to have been Abu Bakra [died circa 671] who heard the Prophet say: "Those who entrust their affairs to a woman will never know prosperity." Since this hadith is included in the Sahih—those thousands of authentic hadith accepted by the meticulous al-Bukhari—it is a priori considered true and therefore unassailable without proof to the contrary, since we are here in scientific terrain. So nothing bars me, as a Muslim woman, from making a double investigation—historical and methodological—of this hadith and its author, and especially of the conditions in which it was first put to use. Who uttered this hadith, where, when, why, and to whom?

Abu Bakra was a Companion who had known the Prophet during his lifetime and who spent enough time in his company to be able to report the hadith that he is supposed to have spoken. According to him, the Prophet pronounced this hadith when he learned that the Persians had named a woman to rule them. "When Kisra died, the Prophet, intrigued by the news, asked: 'And who has replaced him in command?' The answer was: 'They have entrusted power to his daughter.'"[183] It was at that moment, according to Abu Bakra, that the Prophet is supposed to have made the observation about women.

In 628 A.D., at the time of those interminable wars between the Romans and the Persians, Heraclius, the Roman emperor, had invaded the Persian realm, occupied Ctesiphon, which was situated very near the Sassanid capital, and Khusraw Pavis, the Persian king, had been assassinated. Perhaps it was this event that Abu Bakra alluded to. Actually, after the death of the son of Khusraw, there was a period of instability between 629 and 632 A.D., and various claimants to the throne of the Sassanid empire emerged, including two women.[184] Could this be the incident that led the Prophet to pronounce the hadith against women? Al-Bukhari does not go that far; he just reports the words of Abu Bakra—that is, the content of the hadith itself—and the reference to a woman having taken power among the Persians. To find out more about Abu Bakra, we must turn to the huge work of Ibn Hajar al-‘Asqalani.

In the 17 volumes of the Fath al-bari, al-‘Asqalani does a line-by-line commentary on al-Bukhari. For each hadith of the Sahih, al-‘Asqalani gives us the historical clarification: the political events that served as background, a description of the battles, the identity of the conflicting parties, the identity of the transmitters and their opinions, and finally the debates concerning their reliability—everything needed to satisfy the curiosity of the researcher.

On what occasion did Abu Bakra recall these words of the Prophet, and why did he feel the need to recount them? Abu Bakra must have had a fabulous memory, because he recalled them a quarter of a century after the death of the Prophet, at the time that the caliph ‘Ali [reigned 656–661] retook Basra after having defeated ‘A’isha [wife of the Prophet, circa 614–678] at the Battle of the Camel.[185]

Before occupying Basra, ‘A’isha went on pilgrimage to Mecca, where she learned the news of the assassination of ‘Uthman [caliph, 644–656] at Medina and the naming of ‘Ali as the fourth caliph. It was while she was in Mecca that she decided to take command of the army that was challenging the choice of ‘Ali. Days and days of indecision then followed. Should she go to Kufa or Basra? She needed to have an important city with enough malcontents to aid her cause and let her set up her headquarters. After numerous contacts, negotiations, and discussions, she chose Basra. Abu Bakra was one of the notables of that city and, like all of them, in a difficult position. Should he take up arms against ‘Ali, the cousin of the Prophet and the caliph, challenged maybe but legitimate, or should he take up arms against ‘A’isha, the “lover of the Beloved of God” and the “wife of the Prophet on earth and in paradise”?[186] If one realizes, moreover, that he had become a notable in that Iraqi city, which was not his native city, one can better understand the extent of his unease.

It can be said that Islam brought him good fortune. Before being converted, Abu Bakra had the hard, humiliating life of a slave in the city of Ta'if, where only the aristocracy had the right to high office. In year 8 A.H. (630 A.D.) the Prophet decided that it was time for him to undertake the conquest of Ta'if. He had just conquered Mecca, making a triumphal entry into that city, and now felt himself strong enough to subdue the inhabitants of Ta'if, who were still resisting Islam. But they put up a strong defense. The Prophet camped outside the city and besieged the citadel for 18 days. In vain. The chief tribe that controlled the city, the Banu Tamim, and their allies were entrenched in the fort and used bows and arrows against the attackers, causing casualties among Muhammad's army. Twelve of his men were killed, causing him distress, as he had hoped to win without losses. Each soldier was a Companion; he knew their families; this was not an anonymous army. He decided to lift the siege and depart. But before doing so, he sent messengers to proclaim around the fort and the besieged city that all slaves who left the citadel and joined his ranks would be freed.[187] A dozen slaves answered his call, and Abu Bakra was one of them. The Prophet declared them free men, despite the protests of their masters, and after their conversion to Islam they became the brothers and equals of all.[188] In this way, Abu Bakra found both Islam and freedom.

And then we see him a few years later, a notable in an Iraqi city, the incarnation of Muhammad's dream—that all the poor, the humiliated of the world, could accede to power and wealth. The rapid rise of this one Companion summarizes very well what Islam meant for a man like Abu Bakra, who would never have been able to imagine leaving his native city as a free man and especially changing his social status so quickly: "You, the Arabs, were in an unspeakable state of degradation, powerlessness, and profligacy. The Islam of God and Muhammad saved you and led you to where you are now."[189] In fact, since his conversion Abu Bakra had scaled the social ladder at a dizzying pace: "Abu Bakra was very pious and remained so throughout his life. His children were among the notables of Basra as a result of their fortune and their erudition."[190] ...

So why was he led to dig into his memory and make the prodigious effort of recalling the words that the Prophet was supposed to have uttered 25 years before? The first detail to be noted—and it is far from being negligible—is that Abu Bakra recalled his hadith after the Battle of the Camel. At that time, ‘A’isha’s situation was scarcely enviable. She was politically wiped out: 13,000 of her supporters had fallen on the field of battle.[191] ‘Ali had retaken the city of Basra, and all those who had not chosen to join ‘Ali’s clan had to justify their action. This can explain why a man like Abu Bakra needed to recall opportune traditions, his record being far from satisfactory, as he had refused to take part in the civil war. Not only did he refrain from taking part, but, like many of the Companions who had opted for nonparticipation, he had made his position known officially. ‘A’isha, who often used to accompany the Prophet on military expeditions, knew the procedure for the negotiations that took place before the military occupation of a city and had conducted matters correctly. Before besieging the city, she had sent messengers with letters to all the notables of the city, explaining to them the reasons that had impelled her to rebel against ‘Ali, her intentions, and the objectives that she wanted to attain, and finally inviting them to support her.[192] It was a true campaign of information and persuasion, a preliminary military tactic in which the Prophet excelled. And ‘A’isha was going to use the mosque as the meeting place for a public discussion to inform the population before occupying the city. Abu Bakra was thus contacted from the beginning in his capacity as a notable of the city.[193]

‘A’isha did not take this course of action only because of faithfulness to Muhammad’s methods. There was a more important reason. This was the first time since the death of the Prophet that the Muslims found themselves on opposite sides in a conflict. This was the situation that Muhammad had described as the worst possible for Islam:fitna, civil war, which turned the weapons of the Muslims inward instead of directing them, as God wished, outward, in order to conquer and dominate the world. So ‘A’isha had to explain her uprising against ‘Ali. She reproached him for not having brought the murderers of ‘Uthman, the assassinated third caliph, to justice. Some of those who had besieged ‘Uthman and whose identity was known were in ‘Ali’s army as military leaders. Many Muslims must have thought as ‘A’isha did, because a large part of the city of Basra welcomed her, giving her men and weapons. After driving out the governor who represented ‘Ali, ‘A’isha set up her headquarters in Basra, and with her two allies, Talha [ibn ‘Ubayd Allah al-Taymi, died 656] and al-Zubair [ibn al-‘Awwam, seventh century], members of the Quraysh tribe like herself, she continued her campaign of information, negotiation, and persuasion through individual interviews and speeches in the mosques, pressing the crowds to support her against the “unjust” caliph. It was year 36 A.H. (656 A.D.), and public opinion was divided: should one obey an “unjust” caliph (who did not punish the killers of ‘Uthman), or should one rebel against him and support ‘A’isha, even if that rebellion led to civil disorder?

For those who held the first opinion, the gravest danger that the Muslim nation could face was not that of being ruled by an unjust leader, but rather of falling into civil war. Let us not forget that the word “Islam” means “submission.” If the leader was challenged, the fundamental principle of Islam as order was in danger. The others thought that the lack ofjustice in the Muslim chief of state was more serious than civil war. A Muslim must not turn his back when he sees his leader commit injustices and reprehensible acts (munkar): “The Prophet said: ‘If people see munkar and they do not try to remedy it, they incur divine punishment.’” Another version of this hadith is: “Let him who sees a situation in which munkar is being perpetrated endeavor to change it.”[194] This was the argument of the group that assassinated Anwar Sadat [1918–1981] of Egypt, and is representative of the very prolific literature of the Muslim extremists of today.[195]

At Basra in year 36 the dilemma that confronted a Muslim—whether to obey an unjust caliph or to take up arms against him—was not just being posed in the circles of the ruling elite. The mosques were veritable plenary assemblies where the leaders came to discuss with the people they governed the decisions to be taken in the conflict between ‘A’isha and ‘Ali, and it must be pointed out (after reading the minutes of those meetings) that the people spoke up and demanded to be informed about what was going on. The ordinary people did not even know what the quarrel was about; for those citizens the important problem was the absence of democracy. It seemed mad to them to get involved without knowing the motives that were driving the leaders and the conflicts that divided them. They gave as the reason for their refusal to get involved on either side the lack of democracy in the selection of the caliph. In one of the debates that took place at the Basra mosque when ‘A’isha’s partners were invited by the people to explain their motives, a young man who did not belong to the elite made a speech that illuminated a whole area that was not very clear in the dynamics of Islam at the beginning and is often “forgotten” today—the nondemocratic dimension of Islam, which was noted and felt as such by the ordinary people. This young man took the floor in the Basra mosque, an act that would cost him his life, and addressing the allies and representatives of ‘A’isha who were pushing him toward subversion, said to them:

<quote>

It is true that youMuhajirun [the original migrants from Mecca] [196] were the first to respond to the Prophet’s call. You had the privilege of becoming Muslims before all the others. But everyone had that privilege later and everyone converted to Islam. Then, after the death of the Prophet, you selected a man from among you without consulting us [the common people, who were not part of the elite]. After his death, you got together and you named another [caliph], still without asking our advice.... You chose ‘Uthman, you swore your allegiance to him, still without consulting us. You became displeased with his behavior, and you decided to declare war without consulting us. You decided, still without consulting us, to select ‘Ali and swear allegiance to him. So what are you blaming him for now? Why have you decided to fight him? Has he committed an illegal act? Has he done something reprehensible? Explain to us what is going on. We must be convinced if we are to decide to take part in this war. So what is going on? Why are you fighting?[197]

</quote>

Thus the decision not to participate in this civil war was not an exceptional one, limited to a few members of the elite. The mosques were full of people who found it absurd to follow leaders who wanted to lead the community into tearing each other to pieces. Abu Bakra was not in any way an exception.

When he was contacted by ‘A’isha, Abu Bakra made known his response to her: he was againstfitna. He is supposed to have said to her (according to the way he told it after the battle):

<quote>

It is true that you are our umm [mother, alluding to her title of “Mother of Believers,” which the Prophet bestowed on his wives during his last years]; it is true that as such you have rights over us. But I heard the Prophet say: “Those who entrust power [mulk] to a woman will never know prosperity.”[198]

</quote>

Although, as we have just seen, many of the Companions and inhabitants of Basra chose neutrality in the conflict, only Abu Bakra justified it by the fact that one of the parties was a woman.

According to al-Tabari’s account, Basra, after ‘A’isha’s defeat, lived through many days of understandable anxiety. Was ‘Ali going to take revenge on those who had not supported him, one of whom was Abu Bakra? “In the end ‘Ali proclaimed a general amnesty.... All those who threw down their arms, he announced on the day of the battle, and those who returned to their homes would be spared.”[199] “‘Ali spent some days on the battlefield; he buried the dead of both sides and said a common funeral prayer for them before returning to the city.”[200]

Nevertheless, everything was not quite so simple, if we take the example of Abu Musa al-Ash’ari [614–662], another Muslim pacifist who had refused to get involved in a civil war that he regarded as senseless. Abu Musa al-Ash’ari lost both position and fortune. However, it is true that the situations of Abu Musa and Abu Bakra are not comparable, except for their refusal to get involved. Abu Bakra’s support was solicited by ‘A’isha, the losing party, while that of Abu Musa was sought by ‘Ali, the victor. Abu Musa was none other than a governor in ‘Ali’s service, his representative, and the symbol of the Muslim state as the head of the Iraqi town of Kufa. ‘Ali, before proceeding to Basra, then occupied by ‘A’isha, sent emissaries to Abu Musa demanding that he mobilize the people and urgently send him troops and weapons. Not only did Abu Musa personally choose not to obey his caliph, but he also thought himself obligated to “consult with” the population he governed. He decided to involve the people, whom he called together in the mosque for information and discussion, and to enlighten them about the position of the Prophet on the subject of civil war. Abu Musa recited to them the hadith condemning fitna, and ordered them to disobey the caliph and not answer his call to enlist. For him, the duty of a Muslim in the case offitna was absolute opposition to any participation. He recited many hadith at the Kufa mosque, all of them againstfitna—against civil war plain and simple. It was not a question of the sex of the leader![201] Al-Bukhari assembled all hadith on the subject of civil war in a chapter entitled “Al-Fitna”; among them was Abu Bakra’s hadith—the only one to give as a reason for neutrality the gender of one of the opponents.[202]

What is surprising to the modern reader who leafs through the chronicles of that famous Battle of the Camel is the respect that the people, whatever their position toward the war, showed to ‘A’isha. Very rare were the occasions on which she was insulted—and even then it was never by one of the political leaders, but by some of the ordinary people.[203] The historians recall that only the Shi’i chroniclers (the pro-‘Ali ones) find fault with ‘A’isha. Why, then, did Abu Bakra distinguish himself by a completely unprecedented misogynistic attitude?

Abu Musa al-Ash’ari was dismissed from his post and banished from Kufa by ‘Ali. He was replaced by a governor who was less of a pacifist, and above all more tractable.[204] If this happened to Abu Musa, the situation of other “pacifists” who were less highly placed was very delicate indeed. It would seem providential to also remember having heard a hadith that intimated an order not to participate in a war if a woman was at the head of the army.

Abu Bakra also remembered other hadith just as providential at critical moments. After the assassination of ‘Ali, Mu’awiya [ibn Abi Sufyan] the Umayyad [circa 605–680] could only legitimately claim the caliphate if Hasan [624–669], the son of ‘Ali and thus his successor, declared in writing that he renounced his rights. And this he did under pressure and bargaining that were more or less acknowledged.[205] It was at this moment that Abu Bakra recalled a hadith that could not have been more pertinent, under political circumstances that had unforeseen repercussions. He is supposed to have heard the Prophet say that “Hasan [the son of ‘Ali] will be the man of reconciliation."[206] Hasan would have been a very small baby when the Prophet, his grandfather (through his daughter Fatima), would have said that! Abu Bakra had a truly astonishing memory for politically opportune hadith which curiously—and most effectively—fitted into the stream of history.

Once the historical context of a hadith was clarified, it was time to go on to its critical evaluation by applying to it one of the methodological rules that the religious scholars had defined as principles of the process of verification.[207] The first of these rules was to consider "this religion as a science," in the tradition of Imam Malik ibn Anas (born in year 93 A.H. [710–796 A.D.]), who was considered, with [Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad] Shafi'i [767–820] and Abu Hanifa [circa 699–767], one of "the three most famous imams in Islam because of their contribution to the elaboration of the knowledge that enables the believer to distinguish the permitted from the forbidden."[208] Malik ibn Anas never ceased saying:

<quote>

This religion is a science, so pay attention to those from whom you learn it. I had the good fortune to be born [in Medina] at a time when 70 persons [Companions] who could recite hadith were still alive. They used to go to the mosque and start speaking: The Prophet said so and so. I did not collect any of the hadith that they recounted, not because these people were not trustworthy, but because I saw that they were dealing in matters for which they were not qualified.[209]

</quote>

According to him, it was not enough just to have lived at the time of the Prophet in order to become a source of hadith. It was also necessary to have a certain background that qualified you to speak: "Ignorant persons must be disregarded." How could they be considered sources of knowledge when they did not have the necessary intellectual capacity? But ignorance and intellectual capacity were not the only criteria for evaluating the narrators of hadith. The most important criteria were moral.

According to Malik, some persons could not under any circumstances transmit a hadith:

<quote>

Knowledge [al-‘lm] cannot be received from a mentally deficient person, nor from someone who is in the grip of passion and who might incite bid’a [innovation], nor from a liar who recounts anything at all to people.... And finally one should not receive knowledge from a shaykh, even a respected and very pious one, if he has not mastered the learning that he is supposed to transmit.[210]

</quote>

Malik directs suspicion at the transmitters, emphasizes the necessity for Muslims to be on their guard, and even advises us to take the daily behavior of sources into consideration as a criterion for their reliability:

<quote>

There are some people whom I rejected as narrators of hadith, not because they lied in their role as men of science by recounting false hadith that the Prophet did not say, but just simply because I saw them lying in their relations with people, in their daily relationships that had nothing to do with religion.[211]

</quote>

If we apply this rule to Abu Bakra, he would have to be immediately eliminated, since one of the biographies of him tells us that he was convicted of and flogged for false testimony by the caliph ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab [reigned 634–644].[212] This happened during a very serious case that ‘Umar punished by execution—a case involving zina [fornication], an illicit sex act. In order to end the sexual licentiousness and promiscuity that existed in pre-Islamic Arabia and in an effort to control paternity, Islam condemned all sexual relations outside marriage or ownership as zina, encouraging women and men to marry and labeling celibacy as the open door to temptations of all kinds. It gave men the right to have several wives and to divorce them easily and replace them by others, provided that it was all within the framework of Muslim marriage.

‘Umar, the second caliph of a new community still under the influence of pre-Islamic customs, had to act rapidly and severely to see that a key idea of Islam, the patriarchal family, became rooted in the minds of believers. Capital punishment for zina would only be applied if four witnesses testified to having seen the adultery with their own eyes and at the same time. These were conditions so difficult to prove that it made this punishment more a deterrent than a realistic threat. It was necessary, moreover, to avoid having enmities and slanders lead to the condemnation of innocent persons. If there were only three witnesses who saw the accused in flagrante delicto, their testimony was not valid. In addition, any witness who slandered someone by accusing him of the crime of zina would incur the punishment for slander—he would be flogged for false testimony.[213]

Now this was what happened in the case of Abu Bakra. He was one of the four witnesses who came before ‘Umar to officially make the accusation of zina against a well-known person, a Companion and a prominent political man, al-Mughira ibn Shu’ba [died 670]. The four witnesses testified before ‘Umar that they had seen al-Mughira ibn Shu’ba in the act of fornication. ‘Umar began his investigation, and one of the four witnesses then admitted that he was not really sure of having seen everything. The doubt on the part of one of the witnesses made the others subject to punishment by flogging for slander, and Abu Bakra was flogged.

If one follows the principles of Malik forfiqh [Islamic jurisprudence], Abu Bakra must be rejected as a source of hadith by every good, well-informed Malikite Muslim.

To close this investigation, let us take a brief look at the attitude of the religious scholars of the first centuries toward that misogynistic hadith that is presented to us today as sacred, unassailable truth. Even though it was collected as sahih (authentic) by al-Bukhari and others, that hadith was hotly contested and debated by many. The scholars did not agree on the weight to give that hadith on women and politics. Assuredly there were some who used it as an argument for excluding women from decision making. But there were others who found that argument unfounded and unconvincing. Al-Tabari was one of those religious authorities who took a position against it, not finding it a sufficient basis for depriving women of their power of decision making and for justifying their exclusion from politics.[214]

After having tried to set straight the historical record—the line of transmitters and witnesses who gave their account of a troubled historical epoch—I can only advise redoubled vigilance when, taking the sacred as an argument, someone hurls at the believer as basic truth a political axiom so terrible and with such grave historical consequences as the one we have been investigating. Nevertheless, we will see that this “misogynistic” hadith, although it is exemplary, is not a unique case.

Throughout my childhood I had a very ambivalent relationship with the Qur’an. It was taught to us in a Qur’anic school in a particularly ferocious manner. But to my childish mind only the highly fanciful Islam of my illiterate grandmother, Lalla Yasmina, opened the door for me to a poetic religion.... This dual attitude that I had toward the sacred text was going to remain with me. Depending on how it is used, the sacred text can be a threshold for escape or an insurmountable barrier. It can be that rare music that leads to dreaming or simply a dispiriting routine. It all depends on the person who invokes it. However, for me, the older I grew, the fainter the music became. In secondary school the history of religion course was studded with traditions. Many of them from appropriate pages of al-Bukhari, which the teacher recited to us, made me feel extremely ill at ease: “The Prophet said that the dog, the ass, and woman interrupt prayer if they pass in front of the believer, interposing themselves between him and the qibla [the direction of Mecca].”[215] ...

By lumping [woman] in with two familiar animals, the author of the hadith inevitably makes her a being who belongs to the animal kingdom. It is enough for a woman to appear in the field of vision for contact with the qibla—that is, the divine—to be disturbed. Like the dog and the ass, she destroys the symbolic relation with the divine by her presence. One has to interrupt one’s prayer and begin again.

Arab civilization being a civilization of the written word, the only point of view we have on this question is that of Abu Hurayra [died 678]. According to [Shams al-Din] Ibn Marzuq [1311–1379], when someone invoked in front of ‘A’isha the hadith that said that the three causes of interruption of prayer were dogs, asses, and women, she answered them: “You compare us now to asses and dogs. In the name of God, I have seen the Prophet saying his prayers while I was there, lying on the bed between him and the qibla. And in order not to disturb him, I didn’t move.”[216] The believers used to come to ‘A’isha for verification of what they had heard, confident of her judgment, not only because of her closeness to the Prophet, but because of her own abilities:

<quote>

I have seen groups of the most eminent companions of the Prophet ask her questions concerning the fara’id [the daily duties of the Muslim, the rituals, etc.], and Ibn ‘Ata’ said: “‘A’isha was, among all the people, the one who had the most knowledge offiqh, the one who was the most educated and, compared to those who surrounded her, the one whose judgment was the best.”[217]

</quote>

Despite her words of caution, the influence of Abu Hurayra has nevertheless infiltrated the most prestigious religious texts, among them the Sahih of al-Bukhari, who apparently did not always feel obliged to insert the corrections provided by ‘A’isha. The subject of many of these hadith is the “polluting” essence of femaleness.

To understand the importance for Islam of that aspect of femaleness, evoking disturbance and sullying, we would do well to look at the personality of Abu Hurayra, who, as it were, gave it legal force. Without wanting to play the role of psychoanalytical detective, I can say that the fate of Abu Hurayra and his ambivalence toward women are wrapped up in the story of his name. Abu Hurayra, meaning literally “Father of the Little Female Cat,” had previously been called “Servant of the Sun” (‘Abd al-Shams).[218] The Prophet decided to change that name, which had a very strong sense of idolatry about it. “Servant of the Sun” was originally from Yemen, that part of Arabia where not only the sun, a female star in Arabic, was worshipped, but where women also ruled in public and private life. Yemen was the land of the Queen of Sheba, Bilqis [tenth century B.C.], that queen who fascinated King Solomon [reigned 962–922 B.C.], who ruled over a happy kingdom, and who put her mark on Arab memory, since she appears in the Qur’an:

<quote>

[Hud-hud] said: “I have found (a thing) that thou apprehendest not, and I come unto thee from Sheba with sure tidings.”

Lo! I found a woman ruling over them, and she hath been given (abundance) of all things, and hers is a mighty throne.

I found her and her people worshipping the sun instead of God.... (Sura 27, Verses 22–24)

</quote>

Abu Hurayra came from the Yemeni tribe of the Daws.[219] At the age of 30 the man named “Servant of the Sun” was converted to Islam. The Prophet gave him the name ‘Abdallah (Servant of God) and nick-named him Abu Hurayra (Father of the Little Female Cat) because he used to walk around with a little female cat that he adored.[220] But Abu Hurayra was not happy with this nickname, for he did not like the trace of femininity in it: “Abu Hurayra said: ‘Don’t call me Abu Hurayra. The Prophet nicknamed me Abu Hirr [Father of the Male Cat], and the male is better than the female.’”[221] He had another reason to feel sensitive about this subject of femininity—he did not have a very masculine job. In a Medina that was in a state of full-blown economic development, where the Medinese, especially the Jews, made an art of agriculture, and the immigrant Meccans continued their commercial activities and managed to combine them with military expeditions, Abu Hurayra preferred, according to his own comments, to be in the company of the Prophet. He served him and sometimes “helped out in the women’s apartments.”[222] This fact might clear up the mystery about his hatred of women, and also of female cats, the two seeming to be strangely linked in his mind.

He had such a fixation about female cats and women that he recalled that the Prophet had pronounced a hadith concerning the two creatures—and in which the female cat comes off much better than the woman. But ‘A’isha contradicted him, a Companion recounted:

<quote>

We were with ‘A’isha, and Abu Hurayra was with us. ‘A’isha said to him: “Father of the Little Cat, is it you who said that you heard the Prophet declare that a woman went to hell because she starved a little female cat and didn’t give it anything to drink?”

“I did hear the Prophet say that,” responded Father of the Little Cat.

“A believer is too valuable in the eyes of God,” retorted ‘A’isha, “for Him to torture that person because of a cat.... Father of the Little Cat, the next time you undertake to repeat the words of the Prophet, watch out what you recount.”[223]

</quote>

It is not surprising that Abu Hurayra attacked ‘A’isha in return for that. She might be “The Mother of the Believers” and “The Lover of the Lover of God,” but she contradicted him too often. One day he lost patience and defended himself against an attack by ‘A’isha. When she said to him, “Abu Hurayra, you relate hadith that you never heard,” he replied sharply, “O Mother, all I did was collect hadith, while you were too busy with make-up and your mirror.”[224]

One of the constant themes of conflict in Islam from the very beginning is what to do about menstrual periods and the sex act. Are periods the source of sullying? ‘A’isha and the other wives of the Prophet never lost any opportunity to insist that the Prophet did not have the phobic attitude of pre-Islamic Arabia on that subject. Did the Prophet purify himself after making love during the holy month of Ramadan? “I heard Abu Hurayra recount that he whom the dawn finds sullied (janaban, referring to sullying by the sex act) may not fast.”[225] Upon hearing this new law decreed by Abu Hurayra, the Companions hastened to the wives of the Prophet to reassure themselves about it: “They posed the question to Umm Salama [wife of the Prophet, circa 596–682] and ‘A’isha.... They responded: ‘The Prophet used to spend the night sullied without making any ritual of purification, and in the morning he fasted.’”[226] The Companions, greatly perplexed, returned to Abu Hurayra:

<quote>

“Ah, so. They said that?” he responded.

“Yes, they said that,” repeated the Companions, feeling more and more troubled, because Ramadan is one of the five pillars of Islam. Abu Hurayra then confessed, under pressure, that he had not heard it directly from the Prophet, but from someone else. He reconsidered what he had said, and later it was learned that just before his death he completely retracted his words.[227]

</quote>

Abu Hurayra was not the only one to report hadith about the purification ritual, and this was a real bone of contention between ‘A’isha and the Companions. “[‘Abdallah] ibn ‘Umar [died 693] ordered women who were doing the purification ritual to undo their braids [before touching their hair with wet hands].” ‘A’isha is supposed to have responded when someone reported to her the teaching that he was propounding: “That’s strange.... Why, when he was about it, didn’t he order them to shave their heads? When I used to wash myself with the Prophet, we purified ourselves with the same bucket of water. I passed my wet hand over my braids three times, and I never undid them!”[228] ‘A’isha insisted on these corrections because she was conscious of the implications of what was being said. Pre-Islamic Arabia regarded sexuality, and the menstruating woman in particular, as a source of pollution, as a pole of negative forces. This theory about pollution expressed a vision of femaleness that was conveyed through a whole system of superstitions and beliefs that Muhammad wanted to condemn. He saw it as, on the one hand, the essence of the jahiliya [pre-Islamic era], and, on the other hand, the essence of the beliefs of the Jewish community of Medina.

The religious scholars who took part in the debate on the subject of pollution, recorded at length in the religious literature, came down on the side of ‘A’isha. Their argument was that her version of the hadith seemed to agree more with the attitude of the Prophet, who tried by all means to “struggle against superstition in all its forms.”[229]

This was not a matter that interested only the imams. The caliphs were also greatly concerned about it: “Mu’awiya ibn Abi Sufyan [reigned 661–680] asked Umm Habiba, the wife of the Prophet [circa 588–680], if the Prophet—may God pray for him—had ever prayed in the garments in which he had made love. She said yes, he had, because he saw nothing bad in it.”[230] Imam al-Nasa’i explains to us why he laid such stress on the subject of menstruation in his chapter on the purification ritual. The Prophet, he said, wanted to react against the phobic behavior of the Jewish population of Medina, who declared a woman who was having her period unclean: “He ordered them [the male believers who had asked him questions on this subject] to eat with their wives, drink with them, share their bed, and do everything with them that they wanted except copulate.”[231]

The books offiqh devote whole chapters to the purification rituals that every Muslim must carry out five times a day before praying. It is undeniable that Islam has an attitude bordering on anxiety about bodily cleanliness, which induces in many people an almost neurotic strictness. Our religious education begins with attention focused on the body, its secretions, its fluids, its orifices, which the child must learn to constantly observe and control. The sex act imposes a more elaborate ritual for the grown man and woman, and after menstruating the woman must wash her entire body according to a precise ritual. Islam stresses the fact that sex and menstruation are really extraordinary (in the literal meaning of the word) events, but they do not make the woman a negative pole that “annihilates” in some way the presence of the divine and upsets its order. But apparently the Prophet’s message, 14 centuries later, has still not been absorbed into customs throughout the Muslim world, if I judge by the occasions when I was refused admittance at the doors of mosques in Penang, Malaysia, in Baghdad, Iraq, and in Kairouan, Tunisia.

According to the meticulous al-Nasa’i, Maymuna [circa 593–672], one of the wives of the Prophet (he had nine at the time, that concerns us here, the last years of his life in Medina), said: “It happened that the Prophet recited the Qur’an with his head on the knee of one of us while she was having her period. It also happened that one of us brought his prayer rug to the mosque and laid it down while she was having her period.”[232] Already at the time that Imam al-Nasa’i was writing (he was born in year 214 or 215 A.H., 830 A.D.), the scholars suspected that there was a message there that was disturbing the misogyny ingrained in the peoples of the Arab Mediterranean area, before and after the Prophet, and they made great efforts not to betray that very disturbing aspect of the Prophet’s message. These religious scholars, who saw in misogyny the danger of betrayal of the Prophet, doubled their precautions and did a thorough investigation of the sex life of the Prophet by listening to the reports of his wives, the only credible sources on this subject. They accumulated details about his life at home as well as in the mosque. Ibn Sa’d devoted a chapter of his book to the layout of the Prophet’s house. This chapter, as we shall soon see, is extremely important for the clarification of a key dimension of Islam: the total revolution it represented vis-a-vis the Judeo-Christian tradition and the pre-Islamic period with regard to women. However, very quickly the misogynistic trend reasserted itself among the religious scholars and gained the upper hand. We will see the resurgence in many hadith of that superstitious fear of femaleness that the Prophet wanted to eradicate.

One can read among al-Bukhari’s “authentic” hadith the following one: “Three things bring bad luck: house, woman, and horse.”[233] Al-Bukhari did not include other versions of this hadith, although the rule was to give one or more contradictory versions in order to show readers conflicting points of view, and thus to permit them to be sufficiently well informed to decide for themselves about practices that were the subject of dispute. However, there is no trace in al-Bukhari of ‘A’isha’s refutation of this hadith:

<quote>

They told ‘A’isha that Abu Hurayra was asserting that the Messenger of God said: “Three things bring bad luck: house, woman, and horse.” ‘A’isha responded: “Abu Hurayra learned his lessons very badly. He came into our house when the Prophet was in the middle of a sentence. He only heard the end of it. What the Prophet said was: ‘May God refute the Jews; they say three things bring bad luck: house, woman, and horse.’”[234]

</quote>

Not only did al-Bukhari not include this correction, but he treated the hadith as if there was no question about it. He cited it three times, each time with a different transmission chain. This procedure generally strengthens a hadith and gives the impression of consensus concerning it. No mention was made of the dispute between ‘A’isha and Abu Hurayra on this subject. Worse yet, al-Bukhari followed this misogynistic hadith with another along the same lines which reflected the same vision of femaleness as a pole of destruction and ill luck: “The Prophet said: ‘I do not leave after me any cause of trouble more fatal to man than women.’”[235] The source of this hadith is ‘Abdallah ibn ‘Umar (the son of ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab, the second caliph), who was known for his rare asceticism and for nights interrupted by prayers and purifications.[236] ‘Abdallah was a source very highly valued by Bukhari. He was the author of another famous hadith, in which he throws women into hell: “‘Abdallah ibn ‘Umar said: ‘The Prophet said: “I took a look at paradise, and I noted that the majority of the people there were poor people. I took a look at hell, and I noted that there women were the majority.”’”[237]

What conclusion must one draw from this? That even the authentic hadith must be vigilantly examined with a magnifying glass? That is our right, Malik ibn Anas tells us. Al-Bukhari, like all religious scholars, began his work of collecting by asking for God’s help and acknowledging that only He is infallible. It is our tradition to question everything and everybody, especially the religious scholars and imams. And it is more than ever necessary for us to disinter our true tradition from the centuries of oblivion that have managed to obscure it. But we must also guard against falling into generalizations and saying that all the imams were and are misogynistic. That is not true today and was not true yesterday. The example of this is Imam Zarkashi, who, luckily for us, recorded in writing all of ‘A’isha’s objections.

Imam Zarkashi was of Turkish origin, but born in Egypt in the middle of the 14th century A.D. (year 745 A.H.). Like all the scholars of his time, he traveled throughout the Muslim world in search of knowledge. He specialized in religious knowledge and left behind no less than 30 compendiums. Many of these are lost to modern researchers, and we know only their titles. Among those that have come down to us is a book devoted to ‘A’isha’s contribution to Islam, her contribution as a source of religious knowledge. The book begins as follows:

<quote>

‘A’isha is the Mother of the Believers.... She is the lover of the Messenger of God.... She lived with him for eight years and five months; she was 18 years old at the time of the death of the Prophet.... She lived to be 65 years old. We are indebted to her for 1,210 hadiths.[238]

</quote>

And he explains:

<quote>

This book is devoted to her particular contribution in this field, especially the points on which she disagreed with others, the points to which she supplied added information, the points on which she was in complete disagreement with the religious scholars of her time .... I have entitled this book Collection of ‘A’isha’s Corrections to the Statements of the Companions.[239]

</quote>

This book remained in manuscript form until 1939. [Jamal al-Din] Al-Afghani [1838–1897] discovered it while doing research for his biography of ‘A’isha in the al-Dahiriya Library of Damascus, Syria. Why did Imam Zarkashi, one of the greatest scholars of the Shafi’i school of his time, undertake his work on ‘A’isha? A work that, by all accounts, he must have considered extremely important, since he dedicated his book to the Judge of Judges (qadi al-qudat)—the equivalent of the Minister of Justice today, the supreme authority in religious matters in a Muslim city. Because, he says, “the Prophet recognized ‘A’isha’s importance to such an extent that he said: ‘Draw a part of your religion from little al-humayra [red woman].’”[240] One of the Prophet’s favorite pet names for ‘A’isha was al-humayra, referring to her very white skin made radiant by a light sunburn, something rather rare in the Hijaz, the northern part of Arabia.[241]

‘A’isha disputed many of Abu Hurayra’s hadith and declared to whoever wanted to hear it: “He is not a good listener, and when he is asked a question, he gives wrong answers.”[242] ‘A’isha could take the liberty of criticizing him because she had an excellent memory: “I never saw anyone who had so much knowledge about religion, poetry, and medicine as ‘A’isha.”[243] Abu Hurayra knew how to rile her. “But who has heard about that from Abu al-Qasim [the Prophet’s surname]?” she exclaimed when someone recounted to her another of Abu Hurayra’s traditions, this time describing what the Prophet did after making love.[244]

It is not wasted effort for us to tarry over the personality of Abu Hurayra, the author of hadith that saturate the daily life of every modern Muslim woman. He has been the source of an enormous amount of commentary in the religious literature. But he was and still is the object of controversy, and there is far from being unanimity on him as a reliable source. The most recent book about him, jointly published by a Lebanese and an Iraqi firm, is a tribute written by one of his admirers who devotes not less than 500 pages to defending him. ‘Abd al-Mun’im Salih al-‘Ali gave his book a rather eloquent title: In Defense of Abu Hurayra.[245] It was obviously a success, since a new edition was published in 1983. The author begins by asserting that “the Zionists and their allies and supporters have found another weapon against Islam; it is to introduce doubt about the narrators of traditions ... and especially about those who were the source of many hadith.”[246] This gives an idea of the intensity of the controversy surrounding Abu Hurayra. What is certain is that Abu Hurayra, long before Zionism, was attacked by Companions of his own generation. He had a very dubious reputation from the beginning, and al-Bukhari was aware of it, since he reports that “people said that Abu Hurayra recounts too many hadith.”[247] ‘Abd al-Mun’im, to his credit, cites all the incidents in which he was strongly challenged, including by those other than ‘A’isha. He assures us that ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab, the second orthodox caliph, did not say that “the worst liar among the narrators of hadith is Abu Hurayra.”[248] He disputes the claim that ‘Umar threatened to exile him, to send him back to his native Yemen, if he continued to recount hadith.[249]

‘Umar, who enjoyed an unparalleled influence on the Prophet and the Muslim community of yesterday (and still does today) because of his prestige as a man of politics, his boldness in military matters, his strong personality, and his horror of lying, avoided recounting hadith. He was terrified at the idea of not being accurate. For that reason, ‘Umar was one of those Companions who preferred to rely on their own judgment rather than trust their memory, which they considered dangerously fallible.[250] He was very irritated by the facile manner in which Abu Hurayra reeled off hadith: “‘Umar al-Khattab,” we can read in al-‘Asqalani’s biography of him, “is supposed to have remarked as follows about Abu Hurayra: ‘We have many things to say, but we are afraid to say them, and that man there has no restraint.’”[251]

For the pious Companion the fallibility of memory was an occasion for meditating on the fragility of existence in the face of the flowing river of time, which steals not only youth, but especially memory. ‘Umar ibn Hasin [seventh century], another Companion who was conscious of the treacherousness of memory, said:

<quote>

If I wanted to, I could recite traditions about the Prophet for two days without stopping. What keeps me from doing it is that I have seen some of the Companions of the Messenger of God who heard exactly what I myself heard, who saw what I saw, and those men recounted hadith. Those traditions are not exactly what we heard. And I am afraid of hallucinating, as they hallucinate.[252]

</quote>

The Arabic word is yushba, literally “to hallucinate,” that is, to see a reality that does not exist but that has the appearance of reality.

Abu Hurayra, on the contrary, for the three years that he spent in the company of the Prophet, would accomplish the tour de force of recalling 5,300 hadith.[253] Al- Bukhari listed 800 experts who cited him as their source.[254] Here is how Abu Hurayra explains his excellent memory: “I said to the Prophet: ‘I listen attentively, I take in many of your ideas, but I forget many.’”[255] Then the Prophet is supposed to have told him to spread out his cloak while he was speaking to him, and afterwards to pick it up at the end of the session. “And this is the reason that I no longer forgot anything.”[256] Telling the story of the cloak was not the best way to be convincing in a religion like Islam, which has a horror of mysteries of all sorts, where Muhammad resisted the pressure of his contemporaries to perform miracles and magical acts, and where the religious scholars became well-versed from very early on in an exaggerated pragmatism.

Abu Hurayra also gave another explanation that was a bit more realistic than the first. The other Companions, he said, put their energy into business matters and spent their time in the bazaars drawing up contracts and increasing their fortunes, while he had nothing else to do but follow the Prophet everywhere.[257] ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab, who was well known for his physical vigor and who awoke the city every day to say the dawn prayer, disliked lazy people who loafed around without any definite occupation. He summoned Abu Hurayra on one occasion to offer him a job. To his great surprise, Abu Hurayra declined the offer. ‘Umar, who did not consider such things a joking matter, said to him:

<quote>

“You refuse to work? Better people than you have begged for work.”

“Who are those people who are better than me?” inquired Abu Hurayra.

“Joseph, the son of Jacob, for example,” said ‘Umar to put an end to a conversation that was getting out of hand.

“He,” said Abu Hurayra flippantly, “was a prophet, the son of a prophet, and I am Abu Hurayra, son of Umayma [his mother].”[258]

</quote>

With this anecdote we come back to our point of departure, the relationship of “Father of the Little Female Cat” to femaleness and to the very mysterious and dangerous link between the sacred and women. All the monotheistic religions are shot through by the conflict between the divine and the feminine, but none more so than Islam, which has opted for the occultation of the feminine, at least symbolically, by trying to veil it, to hide it, to mask it. Islam as sexual practice unfolds with a very special theatricality since it is acted out in a scene where the hijab [veil] occupies a central position. This almost phobic attitude toward women is all the more surprising since we have seen that the Prophet has encouraged his adherents to renounce it as representative of the jahiliya and its superstitions. This leads me to ask: Is it possible that Islam’s message had only a limited and superficial effect on deeply superstitious seventh-century Arabs who failed to integrate its novel approaches to the world and to women? Is it possible that the hijab, the attempt to veil women, that is claimed today to be basic to Muslim identity, is nothing but the expression of the persistence of the pre-Islamic mentality, the jahiliya mentality that Islam was supposed to annihilate?

 14. Qur’an and Woman

Amina Wadud-Muhsin

Muslims number more than 3 million in the United States and constitute one of the country’s fastest-growing religious groups. African-Americans, comprising a third of this Islamic community—most of the rest are immigrants from Islamic countries and their descendants—have traditionally practiced heterodox forms of Islam not recognized as “Islamic” by Muslim scholars in other countries. Since Malcolm X’s (1925–1965) famous pilgrimage in 1964, however, many African-American Muslims have adopted more orthodox Islamic practices. At the same time, African-American Muslims have brought their own historical experiences to bear on their Islamic faith. [259] A leading representative of this approach is Amina Wadud-Muhsin (United States, born 1952), a professor at Virginia Commonwealth University in Richmond, Virginia. Wadud-Muhsin combines gendered readings of the Qur’an with the experience of African-American women to argue that Islamic injunctions must be interpreted in relation to specific historical circumstances.

 Introduction: How Perceptions of Woman Influence Interpretation of the Qur’an

My objective in undertaking this research was to make a “reading” of the Qur’an that would be meaningful to women living in the modern era. By “reading” I mean the process of reviewing the words and their context in order to derive an understanding of the text. Every “reading” reflects, in part, the intentions of the text, as well as the “prior text”[260] of the one who makes the “reading.” Although each “reading” is unique, the understanding of various readers of a single text will converge on many points.

In this “Introduction” I will give the background to this work. In particular, I will look at how the perception of woman influences the interpretations of the Qur’an’s position on women. I will give an overview of my own perspective of woman and of the methods of interpretation I used in analyzing the Qur’an which have led to some new conclusions.

No method of Qur’anic exegesis is fully objective. Each exegete makes some subjective choices. Some details of their interpretations reflect their subjective choices and not necessarily the intent of the text. Yet, often, no distinction is made between text and interpretation. I put interpretations of woman in the Qur’an into three categories: “traditional,” reactive, and holistic.

The first category of Qur’anic interpretation I call “traditional.” Traditional tafasir (exegetical works) give interpretations of the entire Qur’an, whether from the modern or classical periods, with certain objectives in mind. Those objectives could be legal, esoteric, grammatical, rhetorical, or historical. Although these objectives may lead to differences in the tafasir, one similarity in these works is their atomistic methodology. They begin with the first verse of the first chapter and proceed to the second verse of the first chapter—one verse at a time—until the end of the Book. Little or no effort is made to recognize themes and to discuss the relationship of the Qur’an to itself, thematically. A brief mention of one verse’s relation to another verse may be rendered but these are haphazard with no underlying hermeneutical principle applied. A methodology for linking similar Qur’anic ideas, syntactical structures, principles, or themes together is almost non-existent.[261]

However, what concerns me most about “traditional” tafasir is that they were exclusively written by males. This means that men and men’s experiences were included and women and women’s experiences were either excluded or interpreted through the male vision, perspective, desire, or needs of woman.[262] In the final analysis, the creation of the basic paradigms through which we examine and discuss the Qur’an and Qur’anic interpretation were generated without the participation and firsthand representation of women. Their voicelessness during critical periods of development in Qur’anic interpretation has not gone unnoticed, but it has been mistakenly equated with voicelessness in the text itself.

The second category of Qur’anic interpretation concerned with the issue of woman consists primarily of modern scholars’ reactions to severe handicaps for woman as an individual and as a member of society which have been attributed to the text. In this category are many women and/or persons opposed to the Qur’anic message (or more precisely, to Islam) altogether. They use the poor status of women in Muslim societies as justification for their “reactions.” These reactions have also failed to draw a distinction between the interpretation and the text.[263]

The objectives sought and methods used, often come from feminist ideals and rationales. Although they are often concerned with valid issues, the absence of a comprehensive analysis of the Qur’an sometimes causes them to vindicate the position of women on grounds entirely incongruous with the Qur’anic position on woman. This shortcoming must be overcome in order to make use of a most effective tool for the liberation of Muslim women: demonstrating the link between that liberation and this primary source of Islamic ideology and theology.

The interpretations which reconsider the whole method of Qur’anic exegesis with regard to various modern social, moral, economic, and political concerns —including the issue of woman—represent the final category. It is in this category that I place this work. This category is relatively new, and there has been no substantial consideration of the particular issue of woman in the light of the entire Qur’an and its major principles.

I propose to make a “reading” of the Qur’an from within the female experience and without the stereotypes which have been the framework for many of the male interpretations. In the final analysis, this reading will confront some of the conclusions drawn on this subject. Because I am analyzing the text and not the interpretations of that text, my treatment of this issue differs from many of the existing works on this topic.

* Methodology: A Hermeneutical Model

A hermeneutical model is concerned with three aspects of the text, in order to support its conclusions: (1) the context in which the text was written (in the case of the Qur’an, in which it was revealed); (2) the grammatical composition of the text (how it says what it says); and (3) the whole text, its Weltanschauung or world-view. Often, differences of opinion can be traced to variations in emphasis between these three aspects.

I argue against some conventional interpretations, especially about certain words used in the Qur’an to discuss and fulfill universal guidance. I render some discussions, heretofore considered as gendered, into neutral terms. Other discussions, heretofore considered as universal, I render specific on the basis of their limitations and on the expression in terms specific to seventh-century Arabia. Some historical information with regard to occasions of revelation and the general period of revelation was considered here.

Thus, I attempt to use the method of Qur’anic interpretation proposed by Fazlur Rahman [Pakistan-United States, 1919–1988]. He suggests that all Qur’anic passages, revealed as they were in a specific time in history and within certain general and particular circumstances, were given expression relative to those circumstances. However, the message is not limited to that time or those circumstances historically. A reader must understand the implications of the Qur’anic expressions during the time in which they were expressed in order to determine their proper meaning. That meaning gives the intention of the rulings or principles in the particular verse.

Believers from another circumstance must make practical applications in accordance with how that original intention is reflected or manifested in the new environments. In modern times this is what is meant by the “spirit” of the Qur’an. To get at that “spirit,” however, there must be some comprehensible and organized hermeneutical model.[264]

The initial question behind my research was, why does the Qur’an specify males and females on some occasions (like “Believing males and Believing females”— masculine plural followed by feminine plural forms), while on other occasions it uses a more generic (“Oh you who believe …”—masculine plural) form? From my perspective on the Qur’an, every usage of the masculine plural form is intended to include males and females, equally, unless it includes specific indication for its exclusive application to males.

The plural in Arabic is used to denote three or more rational beings. Thus the following Arabic sentences:

A. Al-tullab fi al-ghurfa (masculine plural noun) means

(1) three or more students in the room—including at least one male

(2) three or more exclusively male students in the room.

B. Al-talibat fi al-ghurfa (feminine plural form) means

(1) three or more female students in the room.

As there is no form exclusively for males, the only way to determine if the masculine plural form (al-tullab fi al-ghurfa [A]) is exclusively for males (2) would be through some specific indication in the text. Thus:

C. Al-tullab wa al-talibat fi al-ghurfa indicates that the use of the masculine plural (al-tullab) refers exclusively to males since the inclusion of the female plural form distinguishes the female students present.[265]

All the verses which contained any reference to women, separately or together with men, were analyzed with the traditional method of tafsir al-Qur’an bi al-Qur’an (interpretation of the Qur’an based on the Qur’an itself). However, I elaborated these particular terms of this method. Each verse was analyzed: (1) in its context; (2) in the context of discussions on similar topics in the Qur’an; (3) in the light of similar language and syntactical structures used elsewhere in the Qur’an; (4) in the light of overriding Qur’anic principles; and (5) within the context of the Qur’anic Weltanschauung, or world-view.

* Language and Prior Text

One unique element for reading and understanding any text is the prior text of the individual reader: the language and cultural context in which the text is read. It is inescapable and represents, on the one hand, the rich varieties that naturally occur between readers, and, on the other hand, the uniqueness of each.

Prior text adds considerably to the perspective and conclusions of the interpretation. It exposes the individuality of the exegete. This is neither good nor bad in and of itself. However, when one individual reader with a particular world-view and specific prior text asserts that his or her reading is the only possible or permissible one, it prevents readers in different contexts from coming to terms with their own relationship to the text.

To avoid the potential of relativism, there is continuity and permanence in the Qur’anic text itself as exemplified even through various readings by their points of convergence. However, in order for the Qur’an to achieve its objective to act as a catalyst affecting behavior in society, each social context must understand the fundamental and unchangeable principles of that text, and then implement them in their own unique reflection. It is not the text or its principles that change, but the capacity and particularity of the understanding and reflection of the principles of the text within a community of people.

Thus, each individual reader interacts with the text. However, the assertion that there is only one interpretation of the Qur’an limits the extent of the text. The Qur’an must be flexible enough to accommodate innumerable cultural situations because of its claims to be universally beneficial to those who believe.[266] Therefore, to force it to have a single cultural perspective —even the cultural perspective of the original community of the Prophet— severely limits its application and contradicts the stated universal purpose of the Book itself.

* The Prior Text of Gender-Specific Languages

The significance of masculine and feminine forms, whether used distinctively or to make generic indications, was an important part of my analysis. Perspectives on gender, particularly on the understanding of what constitutes feminine or masculine behavior, and the roles of men and women in society, are based on one’s cultural context. Gender-specific languages, such as Arabic, create a particular prior text for the speakers of that language. Everything is classified male or female. English, Malay, and other languages do not share this prior text with Arabic. This results in a distinction between the various readings of the Qur’an. This distinction becomes apparent in the interpretation of the text and the conclusions drawn from the function of the text with regard to gender.

With regard to Arabic, the language of the Qur’an, I approach the text from the outside. This frees me to make observations which are not imprisoned in the context of a gender-distinct language.

<quote>

There exists a very strong, but one-sided and thus untrustworthy, idea that in order better to understand a foreign culture, one must enter into it, forgetting one’s own, and view the world through the eyes of this foreign culture. This idea, as I have said, is one-sided. Of course, a certain entry as a living being into a foreign culture, the possibility of seeing the world through its eyes, is a necessary part of the process of understanding it; but if this were the only aspect of this understanding, it would merely be duplication and would not entail anything new or enriching. Creative understanding does not renounce itself, its own place in time, its own culture; and it forgets nothing. In order to understand, it is immensely important for the person who understands to be located outside the object of his or her creative understanding—in time, in space, and in culture.[267] (Emphasis mine.)

</quote>

A new look at Qur’anic language with regard to gender is especially necessary in the light of the absence of an Arabic neuter. Although each word in Arabic is designated as masculine or feminine, it does not follow that each use of masculine or feminine persons is necessarily restricted to the mentioned gender—from the perspective of universal Qur’anic guidance.[268] A divine text must overcome the natural restrictions of the language of human communication. Those who argue that the Qur’an cannot be translated believe that there is some necessary correlation between Arabic and the message itself. I will demonstrate that gender distinction, an inherent flaw, necessary for human communication in the Arabic, is overcome by the text in order to fulfill its intention of universal guidance.

* Perspectives on Women

“Most men have at one time or another heard, or perhaps even believed, that women are ‘inferior’ and ‘unequal’ to men.”[269] I worked against the back-drop of common prejudices and attitudes among Muslims towards women which have not only affected the position of women in Muslim societies but also affected the interpretation of the position of women in the Qur’an. One such belief is that there are essential distinctions between men and women reflected in creation, capacity and function in society, accessibility to guidance (particularly to Qur’anic guidance), and in the rewards due to them in the Hereafter.

Although there are distinctions between women and men, I argue that they are not of their essential natures. More importantly, I argue against the values that have been attributed to these distinctions. Such attributed values describe women as weak, inferior, inherently evil, intellectually incapable, and spiritually lacking. These evaluations have been used to claim that women are unsuitable for performing certain tasks, or for functioning in some ways in society.

The woman has been restricted to functions related to her biology. The man, on the other hand, is evaluated as superior to and more significant than woman, an inherent leader and caretaker, with extensive capacity to perform tasks that the woman cannot. Consequently, men are more human, enjoying completely the choice of movement, employment, and social, political and economic participation on the basis of human individuality, motivation, and opportunity This is actually an institutionalized compensation for the reverse situation.

<quote>

Woman alone gives birth to children, nurses them, and is their primary nurturer in their early formative years. Moreover, the social and economic roles that commonly have been defined as the province of the male have never been performed exclusively by men. Subconsciously, men are aware of this fact.... The male has never had an exclusive social or economic role that woman could not participate in too....

Awareness of woman’s monopoly was psychologically repressed and overshadowed by institutionalizing and socially legitimating male values that had the effect of creating self-fulfilling prophecies.[270] (Emphasis mine.)

</quote>

* Distinctions Between Men and Women

The Qur’an acknowledges the anatomical distinction between male and female. It also acknowledges that members of each gender function in a manner which reflects the well-defined distinctions held by the culture to which those members belong. These distinctions are an important part of how cultures function. For this reason, it would be unwise if the Qur’an failed to acknowledge and, in fact, sympathize with culturally determined, functional distinctions.

<quote>

As they are divided, so genders are also interwoven differently in each culture and time. They can rule separate territories and rarely intertwine, or they can be knotted like the lines in the Book of Kells. Sometimes no basket can be plaited, no fire kindled, without the collaboration of two sets of hands. Each culture brings the genders together in its unique way.[271]

</quote>

The Qur’an does not attempt to annihilate the differences between men and women or to erase the significance of functional gender distinctions which help every society to run smoothly and fulfill its needs. In fact, compatible mutually supportive functional relationships between men and women can be seen as part of the goal of the Qur’an with regard to society.[272] However, the Qur’an does not propose or support a singular role or single definition of a set of roles, exclusively, for each gender across every culture.

The Qur’an acknowledges that men and women function as individuals and in society. However, there is no detailed prescription set on how to Junction, culturally. Such a specification would be an imposition that would reduce the Qur’an from a universal text to a culturally specific text—a claim that many have erroneously made. What the Qur’an proposes is transcendental in time and space.[273]

Gender distinctions and distinct gender functions contribute to the perceptions of morally appropriate behavior in a given society. Since the Qur’an is moral guidance, it must relate to the perceptions of morality—no matter how gender- specified—which are held by individuals in various societies. Yet, the mere fact that the Qur’an was revealed in seventh-century Arabia when the Arabs held certain perceptions and misconceptions about women and were involved in certain specific lewd practices against them resulted in some injunctions specific to that culture.

Some prevailing practices were so bad they had to be prohibited explicitly and immediately: infanticide, sexual abuse of slave girls, denial of inheritance to women, zihar,[274] to name a few of the most common. Other practices had to be modified: polygamy, unconstrained divorce, conjugal violence, and concubinage, for example. With regard to some practices, the Qur’an seems to have remained neutral: social patriarchy, marital patriarchy, economic hierarchy, the division of labor between males and females within a particular family.

Some women activists today openly question this neutrality. Why didn’t the Qur’an just explicitly prohibit these practices? If the evolution of the text and its overall objective is consumed under one—albeit important—aspect of social interaction, say consciousness-raising with regard to women, then the Qur’an is made subservient to that aspect, rather than the other way around. There is an essential acknowledgment of the relationship between men and women as they function in society, but it is not the sole nor primary objective of the text.

In addition, certain practices encouraged by the Qur’an may be restricted to that society which practiced them, but the Qur’an is “not confined to, or exhausted by, (one) society and its history....”[275] Therefore, each new Islamic society must understand the principles intended by the particulars. Those principles are eternal and can be applied in various social contexts.

For example, in Arabia at the time of the revelation, women of wealthy and powerful tribes were veiled and secluded as an indication of protection. The Qur’an acknowledges the virtue of modesty and demonstrates it through the prevailing practices. The principle of modesty is important—not the veiling and seclusion which were manifestations particular to that context. These were culturally and economically determined demonstrations of modesty.[276] Modesty is not a privilege of the economically advantaged only: all believing women deserve the utmost respect and protection of their modesty—however it is observed in various societies.

Modesty is beneficial for maintaining a certain moral fiber in various cultures and should therefore be maintained—but on the basis of faith: not economics, politics or other forms of access and coercion. This is perhaps why Yusuf Ali [1872–1952] translates Sura 24, Verse 31 “what (must ordinarily) appear”[277] (with regard to uncovered parts), to indicate that (ordinarily) there are culturally determined guidelines for modesty.

This method of restricting the particulars to a specific context, extracting the principles intended by the Qur’an through that particular, and then applying those principles to other particulars in various cultural contexts, forms a major variation from previous exegetical methodologies. The movement from principles to particulars can only be done by the members of whatever particular context a principle is to be applied. Therefore, interpretation of the Qur’an can never be final....

 Rights and Roles of Women: Some Controversies

* Woman is Not Just Biology

Because woman’s primary distinction is on the basis of her childbearing ability, it is seen as her primary function. The use of “primary” has had negative connotations in that it has been held to imply that women can only be mothers. Therefore, women’s entire upbringing must be to cultivate devoted wives and ideal mothers in preparation for this function.

There is no term in the Qur’an which indicates that childbearing is “primary” to a woman. No indication is given that mothering is her exclusive role. It demonstrates the fact that a woman (though certainly not all women) is the exclusive human capable of bearing children. This capacity is essential to the continuation of human existence. This function becomes primary only with regard to the continuity of the human race. In other words, since only the woman can bear children, it is of primary importance that she does.

Although it does not restrict the female to functioning as a mother, the Qur’an is emphatic about the reverence, sympathy, and responsibility due to the female procreator. “O humankind ... have taqwa[278] towards God in Whom you claim your rights of one another, and (have taqwa) towards the wombs (that bore you).” (Sura 4, Verse 1) This verse is often interpreted as indicating respect for women in general.[279] I specify this verse as indicating respect for the needed procreative capacity of women. I do not diminish respect from women as a class, but I do specify, from the Qur’anic perspective, the significance of the function of child-bearing, which is exclusively performed by women.[280] The reverence given to the fulfillment of this function helps explain how the Qufan explicitly delineates a function for males which creates a balance in human relations.[281]

No other function is similarly exclusive to one gender or the other. This brings to mind the popular misconception that since only males have had the responsibility of risala,[282] it indicates something special about that class. Both men and women have been included in divine communication as the recipients of wahy,[283] but there is no Qur’anic example of a woman with the responsibility of risala. However, all those chosen for this responsibility were exceptional.

This is not a biological association with males representing their primary function and expressing a universal norm for all men. In fact, given the difficulty they have faced in getting others to accept the message when these exceptional men have come from poor classes, the likelihood of failure for the message might have been greater if women, who are given so little regard in most societies, were selected to deliver the message. It is strategy for effectiveness, not a statement of divine preference.[284]

Besides the two functions discussed above, every other function has real or potential participation by both males and females. However, there is still a wide range of functional distinctions between individuals considered in the Qur’an. The questions that must be asked then are: What is the value of the functional distinctions between individuals? Do these functional distinctions and the values placed on them delineate specific values for males and females in society? Are these values intra-Qur’anic or extra-Qur’anic?

In particular, several verses from the Qur’an have frequently been used to support the claims of the inherent superiority of males over females. These verses contain two terms which have been used to indicate value in the functional distinctions between individuals and groups on earth. I will review these terms, how they have been used in the Qur’an, and in the overall context of Qur’anic justice.

The first term is daraja (plural: darajat), “step, degree or level.” A daraja exists not only on earth between people but also between the Hereafter and earth,[285] between levels in Heaven and in Hell. The other term, faddala, is often used in conjunction with darajat. I have translated faddala “to prefer,” with a verbal noun (tafdil) meaning “preference.” Often the preference given is spoken of in terms offadl, which I translate as (God’s) “benevolence.”

* Daraja

An individual or group can earn or be granted a daraja over another. The Qur’an specifies, for example, that by striving in the way of God with one’s wealth and one’s person (Sura 4, Verse 95) or by immigrating for God (Sura 9, Verse 20), one can obtain a daraja. However, most often the daraja is obtained through an unspecified category of doing “good” deeds (Suras 20, Verse 75; 6, Verse 132; 46, Verse 19).

Distinguishing between individuals or groups on the basis of “deeds” involves problems with regard to the value of women in society and as individuals. Although the Qur’an distinguishes on the basis of deeds, it does not set values for particular deeds. This leaves each social system to determine the value of different kinds of deeds at will. They have always done this and “every society has distinguished men’s work from women’s work.”[286] The problem is that “Men’s work is usually regarded as more valuable than women’s work, no matter how arbitrary the division of labor.”[287]

On the one hand, the Qur’an supports distinctions on the basis of deeds, but on the other hand, it does not determine the actual value of specific deeds. This leads to the interpretation that the Qur’an supports values of deeds as determined by individual societies. Actually, the Qur’an’s neutrality allows for the natural variations that exist.

With regard to the daraja obtained through deeds, however, the Qur’an has stipulated several points which should affect evaluation in society. First, all deeds performed with taqwa are more valuable. Second, “Unto men a fortune from that which they have earned and unto women a fortune from that which they have earned.” (Sura 4, Verse 32) The deeds may be different, but recompense is given based on what one does. It does not matter how the deeds are divided between the males and the females in a particular social context.

Another implication of a “fortune from what one earns” is that whenever anyone performs tasks normally attributed to the other gender in addition to his or her own normal tasks, he or she will earn an additional reward. For example, Moses meets two women from Madyan, where ordinarily the males tended the animals. However, because there was no able-bodied male in the family to perform this task according to the norm (the father being an old man), the women were required to be extraordinarily useful.

There is no indication that these women were immoral in their performance of this task, because fulfilling the tasks needed for survival takes precedence over socially determined roles. Similarly, in post-slavery America, the Black female was given employment instead of the Black male. In many families, she became the sole supporter. This necessity, in addition to her fulfillment of the ordinary tasks of bearing and rearing children, should have given her more. A flexible perspective on the fulfillment of necessity would have benefited her. Instead, she was subject to a double burden and, often, violence at home from a husband who felt displaced.

Each social context divides the labor between the male and the female in such a way as to allow for the optimal function of that society. The Qur’an does not divide the labor and establish a monolithic order for every social system which completely disregards the natural variations in society. On the contrary, it acknowledges the need for variations when it states that the human race is divided “into nations and tribes that you might know one another.” (Sura 49, Verse 13) Then it gives each group, and each member of the group—the males and the females—recompense in accordance to deeds performed.

This is an important social universal in the Qur’an. It allows and encourages each individual social context to determine its functional distinctions between members, but applies a single system of equitable recompense which can be adopted in every social context. This is also one reason why certain social systems have remained stagnant in their consideration of the potential roles of women. The Qur’an does not specifically determine the roles, and the individual nations have not considered all the possibilities.

As for the daraja which is “given” by God, it is even more illusive than the daraja for unspecified deeds. There is a distinction on the basis of knowledge: “God will exalt those who believe among you, and those who have knowledge, to high ranks [darajat].” (Sura 58, Verse 11) “We raised by grades [darajat] (of mercy) whom We will, and over all endued with knowledge there is one more knowing.” (Sura 12, Verse 76)

There are also social and economic distinctions: “We have apportioned among them their livelihood in the life of the world, and raised some of them above others in ranks [darajat] that some of them may take labor from others; and the mercy of God is better than (the wealth) that they amass.” (Sura 43, Verse 32)[288] It is also clear, however, that wealth is not a “real” distinguishing characteristic, but a functional distinction apparent to humankind and valued within society.

The daraja given by God serves another significant function—to test the inhabitants of the earth: “He it is Who has placed you as viceroys of the earth and has exalted some of you in ranks [darajat] above others, that He may try you by (the test of) that which He has given you.” (Sura 6, Verse 165)

Finally, it is necessary to discuss the one verse which distinguishes a daraja between men and women:

<quote>

Women who are divorced shall wait, keeping themselves apart, three (monthly) courses. And it is not lawful for them that they conceal that which God has created in their wombs if they believe in God and the Last Day. And their husbands would do better to take them back in that case if they desire a reconciliation. And [(the rights) due to the women are similar to (the rights) against them, (or responsibilities they owe) with regard to] the ma’ruf, and men have a degree [daraja] above them (feminine plural). God is Mighty, Wise. (Sura 2, Verse 228)

</quote>

This verse has been taken to mean that a daraja exists between all men and all women, in every context. However, the context of the discussion is clearly with regard to divorce: men have an advantage over women. In the Qur’an the advantage men have is that of being individually able to pronounce divorce against their wives without arbitration or assistance. Divorce is granted to a woman, on the other hand, only after intervention of an authority (for example, a judge).

Considering the details given, daraja in this verse must be restricted to the subject at hand.[289] To attribute an unrestricted value to one gender over another contradicts the equity established throughout the Qur’an with regard to the individual: each nafs [soul] shall have in accordance to what it earns. Yet, the verse is presumed to state what men have believed and wanted others to believe: that society operates hierarchically with the male on top. Finally, this verse states: “[(the rights) due to the women are similar to (the rights) against them, (or responsibilities they owe) with regard to] the ma’ruf. The term ma’ruf occurs in other instances with regard to the treatment of women in society. [Muhammad Marmaduke] Pickthall [Britain, 1875–1936] translates it as “kindness,” but its implications are much wider than that. It is a passive participle of the verbal root “to know,” and as such indicates something “obvious,” “well known,” or “conventionally accepted.”[290] However, with regard to treatment, it also has dimensions of equitable, courteous and beneficial.[291]

In this verse (Sura 2, Verse 228), it precedes the daraja statement to indicate its precedence. In other words, the basis for equitable treatment is conventionally agreed upon in society. With regard to this, the rights and the responsibilities of the woman and the man are the same. Again, the expression places a limitation rather than a universal perspective on this issue because convention is relative to time and place.

* Faddala

As with daraja, the Qur’an states explicitly that God has preferred [faddala] some of creation over others. Like daraja, this preference is also discussed in specific terms. First, humankind is preferred over the rest of creation (Sura 17, Verse 70). Then, occasionally, one group of people have been preferred over another.[292] Finally, some of the prophets are preferred over others (Suras 2, Verse 253; 6, Verse 86; 17, Verse 55). It is interesting to note, however, that “preference” is not absolute. Although the Qur’an states that some prophets are preferred over others, it also states that no distinction is made between them (Sura 2, Verse 285). This indicates that, in the Qur’anic usage, preference is relative.

Like daraja, faddala is also given to test the one to whom it is given. Unlike daraja, however, faddala cannot be earned by performing certain deeds. It can only be given by God, Who has it and grants it to whom He wishes and in the form He wishes. Others do not have it and cannot give it. They can only be recipients of His fadl.

With regard to faddala, men and women, the following verse is central:

<quote>

Men are [qawwamuna ‘ala] women, [on the basis] of what God has [preferred] (faddala) some of them over others, and [on the basis] of what they spend of their property (for the support of women). So good women are [qanitat],[293] guarding in secret that which God has guarded. As for those from whom you fear [nushuz], admonish them, banish them to beds apart, and scourge them. Then, if they obey you, seek not a way against them. (Sura 4, Verse 34)

</quote>

Needless to say, this verse covers a great deal more than just preference. This is classically viewed as the single most important verse with regard to the relationship between men and women: “men are qawwamuna ‘ala women.” Before discussing this, however, I want to point out that this correlation is determined on the basis of two things: (1) what “preference” has been given, and (2) “what they spend of their property (for support of women),” that is, a socioeconomic norm and ideal.

The translation I have inserted, “on the basis of,” comes from the bi[294] used in this verse. In a sentence, it implies that the characteristics or contents before bi are determined “on the basis” of what comes after bi. In this verse it means that men are qawwamuna ‘ala women only if the following two conditions exist. The first condition is “preference,” and the other is that they support the women from their means. “If either condition fails, then the man is not ‘qawwam’ over that woman.”[295]

My first concern then isfaddala. The verse says the position between men and women is based on “what” God has preferred. With regard to material preference, there is only one Qur’anic reference which specifies that God has determined for men a portion greater than for women: inheritance.[296] The share for a male is twice that for the female (Sura 4, Verse 7) within a single family. The absolute inheritance for all men will not always be more than that for all women. The exact amount left depends on the family’s wealth in the first place. In addition, if Sura 4, Verse 34 refers to a preference demonstrated in inheritance, then such a materialistic preference is also not absolute. This connection is often favored because the other condition for qiwama is that “they spend of their property (for the support of women).” Thus, there is a reciprocity between privileges and responsibilities. Men have the responsibility of paying out of their wealth for the support of women, and they are consequently granted a double share of inheritance.

However, it cannot be overlooked that “many men interpret the above passage” as an unconditional indication of the preference of men over women. They assert that “men were created by God superior to women (in strength and reason).”

<quote>

However, this interpretation ... is (i) unwarranted and (ii) inconsistent with other Islamic teachings.... [T]he interpretation is unwarranted because there is no reference in the passage to male physical or intellectual superiority. [297]

</quote>

Faddala cannot be unconditional because Sura 4, Verse 34 does not read “they (masculine plural) are preferred over them (feminine plural).” It reads “ba’d(some) of them over ba’d (others).” The use of ba’d relates to what obviously has been observed in the human context. All men do not excel over all women in all manners.

Some men excel over some women in some manners. Likewise, some women excel over some men in some manners.[298] So, whatever God has preferred, it is still not absolute.

If “what” God has preferred is restricted to the material (and specifically inheritance), then the extent and nature of the preference is explained by the Qur’an. Even if “what” God has preferred is more than just the preference given in inheritance, it is, nevertheless, still restricted to “some of them” over “some others” by the wording in this context:

<quote>

Men are “qawwamun” over women in matters where God gave some of the men more than some of the women, and in what the men spend of their money, then clearly men as a class are not “qawwamun” over women as a class.[299]

</quote>

However, further understanding of this distinction requires further explanation of qawwamuna ‘ala. What does it mean, and what are the parameters of its application?

As for the meaning, Pickthall translates this as “in charge of.” [Abu’l Qasim Mahmud] Al-Zamakhshari [1075–1144][300] says it means that “men are in charge of the affairs of women.” [Abul A’la] Mawdudi [1903–1979][301] says, “Men are the managers of the affairs of women because God has made the one superior to the other....” Azizah al-Hibri [Lebanon, born 1943] objects to any translation which implies that men are protectors or maintainers because “the basic notion here is one of moral guidance and caring”[302] and also because:

<quote>

only under extreme conditions (for example, insanity) does the Muslim woman lose her right to self-determination…. Yet men have used this passage to exercise absolute authority over women. They also use it to argue for the male’s divinely ordained and inherent superiority.[303]

</quote>

Some questions beg asking concerning the parameters of application: Are all men qawwamuna ‘ala all women? Is it restricted to the family, such that the men of a family are qawwamuna ‘ala the women of that family? Or, is it even more restricted, to the marital tie such that only husbands are qawwamuna ‘ala wives? All of these possibilities have been given.

Generally, an individual scholar[304] who considers faddala an unconditional preference of males over females does not restrict qiwama to the family relationship but applies it to society at large. Men, the superior beings, are qawwamuna ‘ala women, the dependent, inferior beings.

Sayyid Qutb,[305] whose discussion I will consider at length, considers qiwama an issue of concern for the family within society. He restricts Sura 4, Verse 34, in some ways, then, to the relationship between the husband and the wife. He believes that providing for the females gives the male the privilege of being qawwamuna ‘ala the female.

He gives qiwama a decided dimension of material maintenance. The rationale behind restricting this verse to the context of husband and wife is partly due to the fact that the remainder of the verse discusses other details of concern to the marital relationship.

In addition, the following verse uses the dual, indicating that it is concerned with the context between the two: the husband and wife. However, preceding verses discuss terms of relations between male members of society and female members of society.

I apply this verse to society at large but not on the basis of inherent superiority of men over women, or of God's preference of men over women. Rather, I extend the functional relationship which Sayyid Qutb proposes between the husband and the wife towards the collective good concerning the relationship between men and women in society at large. My main consideration is the responsibility and right of women to bear children.

Sayyid Qutb says, "The man and the woman are both from God's creation and God ... never intends to oppress anyone from His creation."[306] Both the man and the woman are members of the most significant institution of society, the family. The family is initiated by marriage between one man and one woman. Within the family, each member has certain responsibilities. For obvious biological reasons, a primary responsibility for the woman is childbearing.

The child-bearing responsibility is of grave importance: human existence depends upon it. This responsibility requires a great deal of physical strength, stamina, intelligence, and deep personal commitment.[307] Yet, while this responsibility is so obvious and important, what is the responsibility of the male in this family and society at large? For simple balance and justice in creation, and to avoid oppression, his responsibility must be equally significant to the continuation of the human race. The Qur'an establishes his responsibility as qiwama: seeing to it that the woman is not burdened with additional responsibilities which jeopardize that primary demanding responsibility that only she can fulfill.

Ideally, everything she needs to fulfill her primary responsibility comfortably should be supplied in society, by the male: this means physical protection as well as material sustenance. Otherwise, "it would be a serious oppression against the woman."[308]

This ideal scenario establishes an equitable and mutually dependent relationship. However, it does not allow for many of today's realities. What happens in societies experiencing a population overload, such as China and India? What happens in capitalistic societies like America, where a single income is no longer sufficient to maintain a reasonably comfortable life-style? What happens when a woman is barren? Does she still deserve qiwama like other women? What happens to the balance of responsibility when the man cannot provide materially, as was often the case during slavery and post-slavery U.S.?

All of these issues cannot be resolved if we look narrowly at verse Sura 4, Verse 34. Therefore, the Qur'an must eternally be reviewed with regard to human exchange and mutual responsibility between males and females. This verse establishes an ideal obligation for men with regard to women to create a balanced and shared society. This responsibility is neither biological nor inherent, but it is valuable. An attitude inclined towards responsibility must be cultivated. It is easy enough to see the cases in which it has not been acquired.

However, such an attitude should not be restricted to mere material qiwama. In broader terms, it should apply to the spiritual, moral, intellectual, and psychological dimensions as well. Such a perspective on qiwama will allow men to truly fulfill their khilafa (trusteeship) on the earth, as ordained by God upon human creation. Such an attitude will overcome the competitive and hierarchical thinking which destroys rather than nurtures.

Men are encouraged to fulfill their trusteeship of the earth—especially in relationships with women, the child-bearers and traditional caretakers. What women have learned through bearing and caring for children, men can begin to experience, starting with their attitudes to and treatment of women.

 15. Islam and the 1995 Beijing World Conference on Women

Muhammad Shahrour

Muhammad Shahrour (Syria, born 1938) attended primary and secondary school in Damascus. When he was nineteen, he went to Moscow to study engineering. Although not a Marxist, Shahrour was fascinated by Marxist theory and practice, which played a role in shaping his writing on Islamic themes.[309] Shahrour returned to Syria in 1964 but left again in 1968 to study for his master's and doctoral degrees in soil mechanics and foundation engineering at the University College, Dublin, Ireland. He became a faculty member at the University of Damascus on his return to Syria in 1972 and a partner in a successful civil engineering firm. His first book, Al-Kitab wa-l-Qur'an: qira'a mu'asira [The Book and the Qur'an: A Contemporary Reading], more than 800 pages long and nearly half a month's salary for an educated professional in Syria, became a best-seller throughout the Arab world following its publication in 1990.[310] Using modern linguistics and frequent metaphors and analogies drawn from engineering and the sciences, Shahrour argues that the Qur'an should be read and interpreted, not through the prism of centuries of jurisprudence, but as if "the Prophet just died and informed us of this Book."[311] The essay translated here, originally prepared in response to written questions posed by the editor of a Kuwaiti newspaper, defends the right of Muslim women to participate in the Fourth United Nations Conference on Women, held at Beijing, China, in 1995. More self-contained than Shahrour's books,[312] it shows how he invokes and interprets Qur'anic texts to address contemporary social and religious themes.

I certainly see the need for convening conferences like this one because the issues concern both men and women. Human rights are abused in many countries, and tyranny and political despotism are primary oppressors. From a purely historical perspective, women fall under two forms of oppression. First, like men, they are politically, economically, and socially subjugated; second, they live in a male-oriented society. A quick glance at world statistics shows us that women possess 1/1000th of the world's aggregate wealth and receive 10 percent of the world's total wages despite comprising 50 percent of the world's population. This situation prevails in many countries regardless of people's religion. As Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya (1292–1350) wrote, "Wherever justice exists, the rule of God is found."

God is the Lord of all peoples, and all peoples are our brothers in religion and equal to us as God's creations. The cause of justice is served when a conference is convened in Beijing or elsewhere for the purpose of fighting oppression and despotism. Indeed, such a conference promotes justice. The desire for justice is shared by all peoples and open discussion is the principal means of communication among people. Justice and Islam are the basis of this search; violence, oppression, injustice, and despotism are deviations which we are obliged to oppose whether these deviations exist between peoples, individuals, or men and women.

For this reason, separate conferences for women, men, and children would only be opposed by a person of limited vision, a person who is unaware of the information revolution which has occurred in the last half of the 20th century, shortening distances and making the world a small village. Such a person has not realized that the era of concealing information from people with iron curtains has passed, and the time of forbidding people to read, listen and view has vanished forever. The information revolution has given us something important—knowledge. It has helped us move to a new level of awareness, expressing opinions, taking stands, and respecting other opinions.

The Beijing world conference on women embodies the stage of expressing opinion publicly, listening to other opinions, and acknowledging their existence. This positive outcome is not in any way alien to our beliefs as Muslims. We will never forget the slogan—political, intellectual, and social—with which the Prophet Muhammad confronted the polytheists: “Don’t block the way between me and my people.” People’s convictions are not generated by violence and coercion, but by peaceful and open dialogue. Open dialogues do not frighten us as Muslims. Fear is created by a lack of self-confidence and by weak suppositions which cannot be sustained in dialogues with others. We, by the grace of God, possess the self-confidence which enables us to face others without shrinking or questioning motives.

Accepting all participant groups in this conference, no matter how diverse their beliefs, orientations, and perspective, should happen as a matter of principle. This is precisely what I alluded to in my comment on the freedom of opinion and respecting the views of others.

The participation of organizations of sexual deviants and prostitutes in the debates over women’s issues—and I refer to debates only—is certainly legitimate. The conference is not able to pass binding resolutions or take measures for resolving the problems of women in any way.

I am speaking of a world conference of women which has 50,000 participants. There will be sexual deviants and prostitutes among them—they might even have organizations—but the conference is not a gathering of prostitutes in either purpose or form. Lust, prostitution and sexual deviancy are as old as history. They will exist in the future. We carry the banner of a true living religion, believing in the coexistence of good and evil, with an unbreakable bond between them. God has tied them together with the phenomenon of death in his wisdom-giving revelation: “Every soul shall have a taste of death, and We test you by evil and by good by way of trial. To Us must ye return.” (Qur’an, Sura 21, Verse 35) In other words, as long as there is life and death, good and evil will evolve together. This requires us to abandon the idea that a day will come when all people on earth will become believers, everyone will become atheists, or all women will become virtuous.

Conference recommendations are one thing, and resolutions are something else. There is an important issue here which we must not overlook. There are high ideals, commandments, and general moral laws that tie people together. These high ideals, commandments, and moral laws do not yield to debate in conferences and votes in assemblies, irrespective of religious, political, or national beliefs.

I don’t believe that people at the conference wish to subject the issues of false testimony or parental abuse to discussion or vote. These issues do not require deliberation. The role of religious moral principles is evident in such matters, and these religious principles are more basic than political or economic ones.

Respected, remarkable women are taking part in the Beijing conference. I see the need for Muslim women to take part alongside them, so that they will be able to object by reasonable argument to those recommendations which violate moral law and high ideals. It is the right of Muslim women to voice such opposition at these conferences.

When I emphasize high ideals and moral laws as basic to the contemporary Islamic positions, I point implicitly to the need to refrain from making jurisprudential (fiqh) rulings the basis for argument. There are two reasons the jurisprudential rulings, especially those related to women, are not an appropriate basis. First, Muslims disagree among themselves about them. Second, jurisprudential ruling bears the historical stamp of the era in which it was created and the society in which it was shaped. These rulings have been forged in the context of political despotism on the one hand, and male authority on the other. A clear case specific to women is mut’a marriage [among Shi’i Muslims, a temporary, contractual marriage], which some Muslims accept and others do not.

I believe that it is legitimate to continue developing jurisprudential rulings (fiqh) but not the core of Islamic jurisprudence, the divine revelation (alshar’), in matters relating to women’s status. I also believe that the development of Islamic jurisprudence should include matters related to men and to society as a whole in accordance with the following premises.

1. Distinguishing between divinely sanctioned (halal) and the divinely prohibited (haram), the humanly permissible (masmuh) and the humanly forbidden (mamnu’), and believing that Islam is a religion compatible with human nature. The basic tenet of Islam is that everything not specifically prohibited is permitted.

2. The only authority for divine prohibitions (tahrim) is God, although humankind may allow or disallow. Consider God’s statement, “Fight those who believe not in God nor the Last Day, nor hold that forbidden which hath been forbidden by God and His Messenger.” (Qur’an, Sura 9, Verse 29)

The order to fight in this verse is based on two assumptions. The first [as is clear from the verse’s Arabic wording—Translator] is that fighting involves two sides. The second is that the other non-Muslim side is the aggressor. This assumption is derived from God’s saying, “If anyone commits aggression against you, then fight him back in exactly the same way.” (Qur’an, Sura 2, Verse 194) The command is invoked against those who “do not believe in God and in the Last Day,” that is, the atheists who are not concerned with what God and His Prophet have divinely forbidden. A last important observation is in “that which God and His Messenger have forbidden.” God’s forbidding and the Prophet’s forbidding are interconnected. This means that the Prophet forbids that which God forbids. If the Prophet could forbid on his own, the passage would say, “What God forbids and what His Messenger forbids.” The Qur’an [Sura 66, Verse 1] confirms this statement: “O Prophet! Why holdest thou to be forbidden that which God has made lawful to thee.” No one has the right to forbid that which God has declared divinely lawful. We understand from this that the Prophet allowed and disallowed various things, but did not make lawful the divinely forbidden or forbid the divinely sanctioned. There are good examples in the Prophet’s conduct and sayings. If everything that Muhammad did and said was divinely inspired, it would imply that the Prophet had been transformed into a preprogrammed robot, and robots aren’t suitable examples for humanity.

Then came the Companions of the Prophet. All that they did and said represents human judgment and does not relate to the divinely sanctioned or forbidden. As such, their actions and words have historical relevance in terms of laying down rules and regulations for their societies without crossing into the realm of the divinely sanctioned and forbidden. Let us illustrate this with a hypothetical example:

If the Prophet had lived in the time of the automobile and had commanded people to keep to the right side of the road when driving, then driving on the right would have become—according to jurisprudential principles—an Islamic law. Australia, for example, where driving is on the left, would have been deemed in violation of Islamic law, and we don't see this interpretation as correct.

3. Islamic revelation began with Noah and ended with Muhammad. One of the goals of Qur'anic stories is to give a clear picture of this development. All messengers and prophets were Muslims. But Islam embodies the capacity to evolve through legislation and morality. This provides a backbone for Islamic belief and practice. It does not mean that evolution contradicts verses from the wisdom-giving revelation. Rather, the seal of Muhammad's revelation means the achievement of universality with Islam and humankind may adopt such customs not specifically mentioned in the revelation. People are required, however, to remain within the boundaries set forth in revelation. By this process, Islamic jurisprudence develops continuously.

4. The ways in which humankind acquires knowledge in the 20th century influence how it reads and understands divine revelation. For example, now that we know more about procreation, we understand the basic distinctions between genitor and father, genetrix and mother, distinctions that the revelation made, even though most of the first jurists did not. Recognizing these distinctions gives us new perspectives on jurisprudence, adding to our adjustment of earlier rulings related to such things as inheritance and adoption, while adhering to the text and essence of the revealed verses. What has happened here is that our understanding of these verses has changed in accordance with changes in our objective knowledge.

In this manner, we understand how the course of human history and the development of universal knowledge about humanity and its environment is the only phenomenon that reveals and authenticates the content of the Qur’an. Its authenticity does not depend on knowledge specific to any given era, generation, or individual.

* Part IV—Rights of Non-muslims

 16. Minorities in a Democracy

Humayun Kabir

The partition of the British colonies in South Asia in 1947 left 100 million Muslims in the newly independent nation of India, but Muslim Indians comprise only 12 percent of the population of India. The Muslims of India are therefore keenly interested in protection of the rights of minorities.[313] This theme is prominent in the work of Humayun Kabir (India, 1906–1969), one of the premier political and intellectual leaders of the Muslim community of India. Born and raised in the West Bengal region and educated both in India and at Oxford University, Kabir supported the Indian nationalist movement and opposed Islamic demands for partition. After independence, he served in the Indian parliament for more than a decade, held a series of cabinet posts, and represented India at a variety of United Nations educational programs.[314] At the same time, he wrote and lectured on Islam, developing a modernist and humanist interpretation that emphasized religious tolerance and cross-cultural communication.

Many think that the diversity of India and consequent multiplicity of centers of power is a source of weakness for the country. I have always held the contrary view. I feel that the greater the number of centers of power in a people—provided the centers of power are held in some kind of a balance with one another, and there is harmony among them—the stronger the country. Where you have a completely homogeneous, monolithic society, the chances of survival of that society or community are always less than those of a heterogeneous society in which there are many centers of power, many ways of expression. The reason for this is easy to understand. Since society is changing, circumstances are changing, a monolithic society may not be able to react to a new situation with complete success. But if there is a heterogeneous society, one element or other in that heterogeneous society may respond to the new situation, and help to preserve the community as a whole. Diversity of response and distribution of power are therefore sources of strength, not causes of weakness. The history of India is itself a shining example of this fact. More monolithic societies have disappeared, but the more, shall I say, democratic form of Indian society lives. In spite of the fact that there was no political democracy here, the distribution of power in a number of centers, the existence of different types of communities within what one may call a loose federal social framework, has enabled India to survive. Wherever society shows such diversity, wherever different groups exist side by side, the chances of survival of the entire community are greater.

Now how does this link up with our problem today? Today, there is a common citizenship in India. Power has to be exercised in terms of common programs and common attitudes and common ideals. At the same time there are groups based on the fact of language or religion or political beliefs or economic interests. I would suggest for your consideration that if these groups are rigid and unchangeable, especially at the level of political action, it would create a problem for this country. I have always been against political parties based on religion, political parties based on caste, not because there is anything intrinsically evil in any of them, but because in the modern world, in the kind of society in which we function, this type of attachment of a political program to a group based on birth—which is comparatively rigid and inalienable, which cannot be changed easily—creates difficulties for society as well as the group itself.

One other interesting phenomenon has to be remembered in this context. Wherever group consciousness is strong, it is the minority which suffers most. If group consciousness can be diffused and dispersed, the minorities get many privileges, many advantages, which they would not get, if group consciousness became strong. Majorities are in any case in a position of advantage. I think it should be one of the aims of every minority group to see that the group consciousness of the majority becomes diffused. This can be done only if right issues are selected. If groups are constituted on grounds other than rigid and inalienable factors like religion, caste, tribe, or language, we can change or modify more easily the composition and number of the groups within society.

Even rigid groups may change under the pressure of events, but in their case the changes are far more difficult to effect. Proselytization on a large scale is almost impossible in the modern world. And therefore for any religious group to think that it will convert all the members of some other religious group to its own religion is not practical politics today. Languages can also spread, but here also the experience of history shows that linguistic boundaries are one of the most rigid things in the world. The political boundaries of Europe have changed again and again during the last four or five hundred years, but the linguistic boundaries of Europe have hardly changed. Even political suppression has not been able to stifle the linguistic minorities. If persecution could kill a language, Polish would have been killed many years ago. No language can be killed by persecution without exterminating the people speaking the language. Similarly, we cannot easily change tribal or caste organizations. All such groups suffer from a lack of flexibility. In the modern world, where politics is expanding its scope and where political power is impinging on almost every sphere of life, we have to be specially careful of the way in which interests are organized into groups. If a minority group is based on considerations which cannot be easily changed, it will ultimately be the minority itself which will suffer.

On the other hand, if groups are formed on considerations which are flexible, it will make for greater mobility among groups and therefore ultimately for greater cohesion within the community. Persons from any part of the country or belonging to any birth group can come and join such organizations on the basis of their political belief or economic affiliation. I know that economic classes also have a certain degree of rigidity, but the degree of rigidity in economic stratification is far less than that in a caste or religious or linguistic structure. Similarly, cultural groups show greater flexibility than groups based on the fact of birth. If groups are formed on the basis of cultural ideals, there again the ease in movement from one group to another would be far greater than where there are water-tight compartments based on religion, language or caste.

The greatest danger to national unity arises where a group seeks to combine all these rigid elements. Where a unit based on birth includes all the factors like religion, language, caste, and tribe and links them up with political, economic and cultural affiliations, such a group would seek to repel all other groups and have hardly any cross associations with them. On the other hand, when individuals belong to different groups for different purposes, and there are many cross currents which cut across group loyalties, we have a better balanced and healthier national community. In fact, the more cross associations we have, the better for everyone concerned and the better for the health of a democracy.

I would like to return to the point that the essence of democracy lies in the distribution of power in a number of different centers. Such distribution of power can be on the basis of community groups; it can also be on the basis of interest. I have just suggested that where the distribution is on the basis of community groups, based on the fact of birth, there are dangers to social unity. But having said this, I would also say that groups based on birth cannot be completely overlooked in our national context. We have to face facts as they are, especially in a country like India. Some people resent the existence of linguistic or religious or caste groups and would like to eliminate them. We may disapprove, but the linguistic groups will remain. We may dislike it, but the religious groups will also remain. All that we can do is to see that they do not become too rigid, that all these diversities do not tend to ossify, that they do not tend to combine in a way so that the same group is characterized by all these differences. That would be the greatest danger, but having recognized the danger, we may say that the multiplicity of groups also serves a function in modern democracy in India....

The problem of group relations goes very far back in history. The concept of the secular State is something which is relatively novel. In the days before the dawn of history, the same individual was simultaneously prophet, priest and king. There was no distinction between what we call religious and secular functions. We find this among the Aryans in India and we find it among the Aryans in Europe. This was equally true of the non-Aryan groups who lived in different areas of the world and some of whom developed great and rich civilizations of their own. Anthropology tells us that in almost every social group, the prophet, the priest and the king were rolled into one for a very long time.

It is interesting to note that perhaps the first conscious attempt to differentiate the religious from the secular functions is found in a saying of Jesus Christ. Many of you remember his famous statement: “Render unto Caesar that which belongs to Caesar and render unto God that which belongs to God.” I do not remember the exact words, but this is the sense of what Jesus said. Christ thus did attempt to make a distinction between a person’s religious loyalties and his obligations in the political field. As far as I recollect, this is perhaps the first recognition of a distinction between religious and political loyalties. It would thus be fair to say that we have the origin of the secular State in this famous statement.

Theoretically, the secular State emerged as late as the time of Jesus, but in practice, the rudiments of the secular State had appeared long before. This was perhaps inevitable. Whenever men professing different faiths were brought under one rule—as in the Persian or the Babylonian Empire, the Assyrian Empire or some of the Empires in India—men following one faith had to make allowances for people professing other faiths. Where men followed different customs, and yet lived within the same territory, it was inevitable that accommodation among them should grow. Without such adjustments the State would break up. Theoretically, the State accepted one particular religion and the king was the defender of that faith. To some extent, this idea persists even today. Practice however differed sharply from theory. Normal men and women want to lead a life of cooperation and friendship with their neighbors and hence some kind of accommodation was established from very early times. That theory still lags behind practice is obvious, when we see that a kingdom like the United Kingdom—very progressive in many ways—still describes its ruler as the Defender of the Faith. A person who does not belong to the Anglican Church cannot be ruler of England. In practice, if not in theory, we find similar restrictions in other parts of the world. Some of you will remember that only seven years ago, when Mr. [John F.] Kennedy [1917–1963] was seeking election to the office of the President of the USA, it was for a long time debated whether he would be elected because of his religious faith. While in practice the idea of a secular State has steadily gained acceptance, in theory it remained for a long time unrecognized and is still unrecognized in large areas of the world.

The practical recognition of the secular State dates back fairly early in India. We have the early division of the people into the Buddhists and the Hindus. Some may object that there were perhaps no Hindus at the time. It has been argued seriously that the idea of the Hindu as such is a comparatively recent development. In any case, there were in ancient India the six orthodox Schools and there were the heterodox Schools like the Buddhists and the Jains.

We find in both the great Mauryan Empire in the north [321–185 B.C.] and the Vijaya Empire in the south [fifth century B.C.-65 A.D.] a great deal of toleration of all faiths. It will perhaps amuse some of you to hear of the way in which the principle of toleration operated in South India. In the Vijaya Empire, the kings were mostly Hindus and the queens were generally Buddhists. The kings extended protection and patronage to the Brahmanical priests. The queens extended equal protection and patronage to the Buddhist Sramanas and Bhikshus. As long as this balance was maintained and support given to the Brahmins and the Brahmanical faith as well as to the Buddhists and the Buddhist faith, the Vijaya Empire flourished. When at a later stage, one of the kings started persecuting the Buddhists, the decay of the Empire began. We have parallels in northern India as well, in the pre-Muslim and the Muslim period. The idea of the secular State thus goes back fairly far in Indian history, certainly to the times of Chandragupta Maurya [reigned 321–297 B.C.] and to the times of the great kings of Amaravati and Vijayapuri.

A new situation arose when Muslims first established their rule in India. In the beginning, Muslim political thinking, like the political thinking of almost all nations of the world of the time, recognized no distinction between religion and the State. In fact, every religion then claimed the total allegiance of man. This was true of Christianity, this was true of all the different forms of the Hindu faith, this was true of Islam. In the early days of Islam, the man who was the khalifa [caliph] was not only the secular but also the religious head of the State. It was claimed that no one should be selected as the khalifa unless he was capable of exercising also the religious leadership of the community. This was of course pure theory. Practice began to differ within a few decades. After the death of the Prophet, even when Abu Bakr Siddiqi was elected the khalifa [reigned 632–634], there were some protests. There were some followers of ‘Ali [son-in-law of the Prophet, circa 596–661] who said that ‘Ali should have been the first khalifa and not Abu Bakr. ‘Ali himself repudiated them and accepted Abu Bakr as the khalifa but the voice of dissension had already risen. The same problem arose with greater intensity at the time of the election of ‘Umar [ibn al-Khattab, reigned 634–644]. These two elections were however generally welcome but dissensions became much more bitter at the time of the election of ‘Uthman [reigned 644–656] and ‘Ali himself [reigned 656–661]. Many of you remember the story of Karbala and the martyrdom of Husayn [younger son of ‘Ali, 626–680]. Mu’awiya [ibn Abi Sufyan, circa 605–680] had raised the banner of revolt against the election of Hasan [elder son of ‘Ali, 624–669] and declared that he should be elected the khalifa. There was a compromise by which Mu’awiya was accepted but it was also laid down that after his death, Hasan and Husayn in that order should be elected the khalifa. Mu’awiya’s son Yazid [circa 642–683] repudiated the agreement and the conflict was resolved by the fighting in Karbala leading to the martyrdom of Hussain. The opposition to Mu’awiya and Yazid was mainly on religious grounds, so that theoretically there was still the demand that the State shall be a religious State and there shall be no distinction between secular and religious duties, obligations and rights.

The situation changed as the Muslim empire spread rapidly through large areas of Asia and many different peoples were brought within its fold. Many practical problems arose and Muslim political thinking had to find a place for non-Muslim subjects in a Muslim State. Their existence was recognized in theory by introducing a novel idea, the idea of dhimmi. Dhimmi means the protected people, who had to pay a special tax, the jizya, because they took no share in guarding the State. Muslims were required to bear arms in defense of the State and were exempted from this tax, but those who were not required to bear arms, or purchased exemption, had to pay the tax. They had thus no obligation to defend the country but enjoyed the security guaranteed by the State and were required to pay a special tax instead. This is the notorious, famous, infamous, whichever way you put it, jizya. Jizya was thus nothing but a kind of polltax by which a person purchased the right of not being called to arms. Some modern States have the system of draft, by which every adult male has to undergo military training for a specified period. A citizen can however get out of the draft in certain ways. In a sense, the jizya was an anticipation of these devices for it provided a mode of payment through which a man could escape the draft, but it had an invidious character as it applied only to non-Muslims.

New considerations came into the picture when the Muslims came to India. Whatever may have been the theory, the men who ruled India found that unless there was accommodation among the different religious communities who lived in the country and a great deal of toleration by the ruler, their rule would not last. History has proved again and again that one cannot rule by might alone. Such rule may last for a while but if the entire people are determined to overthrow a foreign yoke, such foreign rule cannot last very long. Some of these early Muslim rulers in India soon discovered that whatever may be said in theory, in practice they had to accommodate their subjects in many ways. If they sometimes oppressed their Hindu subjects, they oppressed their Muslim subjects with equal gusto. ‘Ala’uddin Khalji’s [reigned 1296–1316] is a name which readily comes to one’s mind in this context. He put a tax on all the nobles and made no distinction between a Hindu noble and a Muslim noble. Nobles could not inter-marry without his permission. Nobles could not keep retainers beyond a certain number. ‘Ala’uddin was concerned not with religion nor mainly with the interest of this group or that group. He was interested primarily in maintaining his own power. Whoever challenged his power was immediately curbed and punished. A good deal of the persecution in this period may be explained in terms of this desire to maintain one’s own authority. When the ruler felt secure, he tried to give good administration to the people. He recognized that contented subjects were his best protection. Throughout the Pathan period, religious and political toleration grew steadily.

I would like to draw your attention to another interesting feature of the spread of Islam in India. It is noteworthy that the largest concentration of Muslims is not in the capital cities but in the distant regions and in certain special areas. There is a very heavy concentration in East Bengal which is far from Delhi. We find similar heavy concentration in Kerala which hardly ever came under Muslim rule. We find fairly heavy concentration in certain selected areas of Madras. The continuous influx of new groups of Muslims added to the Muslim population of the Punjab but even then the Punjab always had a sizable non-Muslim population. The explanation which has been offered for this fact is that by and large the spread of Islam in India, as in other parts of the world, was due to the teachings of the Sufis and the Saints and not the political power of the rulers. In the case of Indonesia, those of you who are students of Indonesian history will remember that Indonesia was never conquered by Muslims and it was Arab traders who took Islam to Indonesia. Similarly it was Arab traders who brought Islam to Kerala and Muslim merchants and Sufis who brought it to Sylhet and Chittagong.

We may point to find another interesting pattern in the growth of Islam within India. Wherever the Arabs went, there was a greater cultural assimilation and far greater give and take between the different communities than in areas where Islam was taken by the newly converted Turkish rulers. It was largely these Turks who dominated the political and military fields in North India. Wherever they took Islam, there was a certain amount of persecution, but wherever the Arabs brought Islam, there was on the whole greater accommodation. We thus find that the number of Muslims was greater in the areas under Arab influence, in the areas where Sufis and Saints and Fakirs taught. In these areas the religion generally spread as a revolutionary and liberating force.

We do not always remember today that when Islam first appeared on the stage of world history, it came as a great liberal and democratic movement. It was a revolt of the intellectual as well as a revolt of the underprivileged. It brought a message of equality and fraternity for all sections of the people, and transcended the barriers created by race, color and language. [George] Bernard Shaw [Irish author, 1856–1950] in one of his books has said that the most severe test of race and color equality is the test of marriage. In every other type of contact between different communities, one can cheat. You can once in the year be together in a great religious congregation and fraternize. Once in a year you can dine together, once in a year you can join in a pilgrimage to Kaba or Kashi. The test of marriage is very different. Bernard Shaw points out that this is the test which Islam has passed with credit. Islam did largely break down the barriers of color and the barriers of race. In fact, almost all the human barriers came down once people accepted Islam. This was one reason why large numbers of the underprivileged everywhere accepted and still accept Islam.

Another reason for the rapid spread of Islam was the opening up of opportunity for vast sections of the people. It is again an interesting fact of history that till the advent of Islam, most religions had made education a preserve of the select few. In ancient Egypt and indeed in almost all parts of the world, knowledge was recognized as power and because knowledge was and is power, knowledge was the prerogative of a privileged class. It was Islam which broke that barrier down and made knowledge accessible and indeed obligatory on a universal scale. In practice there was however a great gap between what was laid down and what was actually carried out. It is one of the ironies of history that in India at least, Islam which has declared that it is an obligation for every man and woman to acquire learning, the Muslims are one of the most backward communities so far as education is concerned. This holds for men as well as women, though for women the position is even worse.

For the reasons indicated above, the Muslim population increased rapidly in India. So long as the ruler was either a Muslim or a Hindu, the position was comparatively simple. In Muslim political thought, apart from States where both the ruler and the ruled were Muslims, lawgivers had allowed for two kinds of situation, a situation in which there is a Muslim ruler and a large number of non-Muslim subjects and also the situation in which there is a non-Muslim ruler and Muslim subjects. But Muslim political thought had not provided for the situation which has developed in India today, the situation in which Muslims are citizens in a secular State. In this situation, they are neither the sole rulers nor merely the ruled. We can put it in another way and say that they are rulers and ruled simultaneously. As a citizen of India, a Muslim shares in the sovereignty of the people. As a citizen of India, he is subject to the laws of the State like any other citizen professing any religion. In a democratic State, every citizen has a share in sovereignty and therefore we have in India today this unique situation, a situation which has never before faced Muslim people anywhere in the world. They are not merely ruled, but neither are they merely rulers. They are rulers and the ruled at the same time. Further they are not rulers by themselves, they are rulers in association with people of many different religions.

Considered from this point of view, the situation in India today presents a great challenge and also a great opportunity to Muslims and other Indians. We have a recognition of this fact in the Indian Constitution. It is one of the first instances where we have a self-confessed secular State which explicitly recognizes that the State cannot prosper and perhaps cannot even survive without adherence to the secular principle. Here we have to remember another fact. There are some people in India and elsewhere who think that secularism is a concession to the different minority groups. In one sense it certainly is. Over 85 percent of the total population of India belong broadly to what we call the Hindu faith. All the other minorities together number less than 15 percent. If therefore the majority community of India had wished, there was nothing to prevent them from declaring India as a Hindu State or a Brahmanical State. But the framers of the Indian Constitution had great political foresight. They had the wisdom to see that in the peculiar circumstances of India and the scientific developments of the modern world, the concept of a religious State would not work. I will explain this in a moment.

Let us assume that some party comes to power in India which is militantly religious. In the Indian context, such a party can only be a Hindu party. Even if the Muslims become militantly religious, they form only 11 or 12 percent of the population and cannot have a decisive say in the political affairs of the country. Christians with less than two percent will have even less influence. Sikhs, they are less than one percent, will also not make much of an impact. If there can be any militant religious party it can be only a Hindu party. Supposing such a party comes into power and declares that India would not be a secular State, but a State following a particular religion, the Hindu religion, the question would immediately arise: which Hindu religion? Those of you who are familiar with Indian religious thought know that the Hindu faith itself is a great confederation of different beliefs and different religious systems. You have within the Hindu fold people who believe in one God and one God alone, who are as strict monotheists as Muslims or Sikhs or the staunchest Unitarians in the Christian Church. You have also Hindus who believe in three Gods or believe in a thousand Gods. There is in fact a saying that for the 300 million Indian people there are 330 million gods. You have also atheists who are perfectly good Hindus, for there have been Rishis or Saints who professed atheism and are still recognized as Rishis.

If therefore India decided to be a religious State, the question would immediately arise: Will it be Vaishnava? Will it be Saiva? Will it be Lingait? Will it be Jaina? What will be the faith and in which form? The unity of India would probably be shattered again as it has been shattered so often in the past. We have in our past history the record of Kings changing their faith and asking their people to change their faiths. Vaishnava temples were converted into Saiva temples, and vice-versa. In fact you find similar phenomena throughout the world. Not only in India but everywhere in Asia, Europe and Africa. With the change of faith by the King, there was a change of character, a change of beliefs and of religious worship of the people but in the end it led nowhere.

This is not the only difficulty a non-secular religious State would face in India. There would be differences on the basis of caste as well. Caste has no doubt lost ground in recent times. It has lost ground primarily because of industrialization and improvement in means of transport and communication. Certainly ideas have also played a part and we have to remember with gratitude the reformers from Buddha [sixth-fifth centuries B.C.] to [Rabindranath] Tagore [1861–1941] and [Mahatma Mohandas K.] Gandhi [1869–1948]. But a far more important part has been played by the fact of industrialization and improvement in the means of transport and communication. When you are in a country bus in India, probably 50 people are put in a bus which is meant to hold only 30. Questions about caste or untouchability become completely irrelevant in such a situation. The conductor or the driver of the bus will have no sympathy at all if you say: I do not want to sit next to that man. He will in all likelihood ask you to get down and put two more men in your place. Transport and communication, industrialization and urbanization along with the anonymity which towns give are breaking down caste barriers. But if the secular ideal ever breaks down, some of the old ideas would re-affirm themselves, and the result would be that Indian unity will itself be threatened.

A secular State is therefore necessary in India not in the interest of the minorities alone—they also would certainly gain, there is no doubt about it—but it is in the interest of all the people of India including the majority community. That is why in our Constitution we find a guarantee of equal rights and opportunities for every citizen regardless of caste, religion, sex, language or race. The entire list of the differences which distinguish and divide human beings, they are all as far as one can reckon mentioned in the Constitution and it is said: All these distinctions shall be overlooked and as Indian citizens they shall have equal rights and equal opportunities. The highest office is open to any person of any religious profession. Representation in the legislatures, in trade and industry is equally open to all. In fact the Universal Declaration of Human Rights has to a very large extent been incorporated in the Indian Constitution....

While the relations between Hindus and Muslims in India are friendly in normal times, we find time and again outbreaks of violence that result in destruction and death. There must be a reason for this and this can only be some flaw in the attitude of religious toleration which both communities accept as the normal mode of life. For Hindus, this flaw can be traced to caste exclusiveness, which leads to a lack of regard for men of other religious faiths. Indifference and even contempt for men of other religions is perhaps a natural corollary to untouchability within the Hindu social fold. This indifference or contempt may not be conscious or deliberate and there may also be cases where in fact there is no feeling of contempt or hatred, but those who suffer from the effects of untouchability do not make any distinction between conscious and unconscious motives or their absence. For them, the fact of discrimination in everyday life is enough to rouse their resentment and lead to feelings of anger and hatred which break out whenever an opportunity offers.

For historical and political reasons, Muslims feel this sense of discrimination more acutely than members of other Indian communities. It is true that there has been a small Christian community in the country for some two thousand years. It is however small in number and for centuries remained confined to a narrow corner of the land. In addition, Indian Christians never exercised political power and did not therefore pose any challenge to the majority community. Muslims have on the other hand been spread throughout the subcontinent from the day of their first appearance in India. Their number, their distribution and above all their exercise of military and political power made the problem of untouchability between them and the Hindus one full of explosive possibilities.

There is a parallel flaw in the Muslim attitude to other religions. Islam categorically declares that there must be no compulsion in religion and each individual must be left free to follow the faith of his choice. While Muslims thus recognize that there are many religions in the world, there is one basic difference between Hinduism and Islam in their attitude to this diversity. For Hindus, the diverse ways of worship have arisen because of different human needs and all have equal validity. For Muslims, the diversity has arisen because of human failing which has led to the distortion of a single pristine truth. According to Islam, all religions were initially the same, but in course of time became distorted by custom and circumstance. It was to rectify these distortions that prophets appeared in succession in different parts of the world, but no prophet preached a new religion. Thus the Prophet Muhammad was not the originator of Islam, but only the last in a long line of prophets who had all taught an identical faith. Any deviation from this original religion is therefore for Muslims a deviation from Truth.

When these two religious attitudes met in India, there was an attempt at reconciliation from both sides. Hindus have for centuries recognized the validity of different professions and practices in the sphere of religion. Within Hinduism itself, there is the widest variety of faiths and customs. A place has been found in the Hindu pantheon for even those who rebelled against traditional Hinduism. Thus, the Buddha is regarded today as one of the Hindu Avatars. Christ and Muhammad have also found places of honor in the Hindu mind. Similarly, Muslims have condemned compulsion in religion and admitted that different religions must be given due respect. The accommodation achieved in India between Hindus and Muslims is seen in the many instances where Hindus worship at Muslim shrines and Muslims pay homage to Hindu religious teachers and saints.

In spite of such accommodation, the psychological separation between Hindus and Muslims has not however been overcome. Social and political factors have contributed to this, but a major reason is the difference in religious outlook mentioned above. Among orthodox Muslims, there are many who look upon all nonMuslims, particularly Hindus, as kafirs or unbelievers. Among Hindus, there are many who look upon Muslims as mlechhas or unclean. For Hindus, such an attitude was in the past partially a defense reaction to protect the Hindu community against the political power and religious proselytization of Muslims. After the advent of the British, superiority in education and economic position strengthened such feelings. Among Muslims, political pride and a sense of religious superiority led to the same attitude. This was reinforced by a defense reaction after they lost their economic and political advantages under British rule. The root cause for Hindu-Muslim conflicts in India therefore derives from this attitude of exclusiveness. Because of this Muslims look upon Hindus as kafirs and Hindus return the compliment by looking upon Muslims as mlechhas.

In order to create the psychological atmosphere where the two communities can develop a sense of national identity while retaining their special group characteristics, it is necessary to bring about a change of attitude among both Hindus and Muslims. In the case of Hindus, what is needed is a change in the snobbery born out of caste exclusiveness. Due to industrialization and urbanization, the process of break-up of caste has already begun. As education spreads, the process is bound to be accelerated, though one has to admit that in recent years caste has had an unexpected lease of life given to it by political forces. The democratic process of elections has in certain cases led to an ossification of caste and this is most marked where elections are in small constituencies. With larger areas and greater mixture of population, the governing power of caste is bound to diminish and ultimately disappear. In fact, we already see the beginning of a new type of social grouping where Hindus and Muslims belonging to the same economic class or educational background tend to draw nearer to one another than to their co-religionists in different social categories. This applies even more to Hindus of different castes.

Among Muslims also, the process of change has begun in the recognition of the philosophic and other truths embedded in Hindu, Buddhist or Christian thought. This recognition has however to be linked up with the Muslim religious belief that prophets have been sent to every country in every age. While Muslim religious thought insists that true religion is one and only one, it also recognizes that this pristine truth has been sent to every people in every age in a form acceptable to them. This has introduced a respect for diversity of faith, but such respect finds easy and wide acceptance only when the people following different faiths claim to be the followers of a recognized prophet. That is why we find throughout the Muslim world a distinction between those who are called the people of the Book and others. According to orthodox Muslim thought, a Christian or a Jew has deviated from the pristine teaching of true religion, but nevertheless he has a position of privilege among nonMuslims and is entitled to special consideration. The clearest evidence of this is found in the law which permits marriage between Muslims and followers of a Book but forbids a Muslim to marry a non-believer.

Once therefore it is accepted that Hindus are ahl al-kitab or people of the Book, it would remove one of the major psychological barriers between the two communities. A book is given to a people through a prophet and according to the Qur’an, prophets were sent to every country in every age. It is further stated that no apostle has been sent except to teach in the language of his people so that they might easily understand him. Many such prophets were sent before the Prophet Muhammad, some of whom are mentioned in the Qur’an and others not. The Qur’an does not give their number but according to an authentic tradition [of the Prophet], it was almost two hundred thousand.

The Qur’an also lays down the criteria of a kitab or a revealed Book. A revealed Book conveys the message of God and is not the composition of any man. It preaches the unity of God as well as the responsibility of man for his actions. The criterion easily fits in with the Vedas and the Gita. Both, according to Hindu tradition, are apaurusheya, i.e., not the handiwork of man but of divine origin. The Qur’an insists on the unity of Godhead and claims that this is the basis of all true religion. The Rig Veda also proclaims, “He is one, though sages call Him by many names.” The Atharva Veda declares that renown and glory, force and happiness, splendor, food and nourishment belong to him who only thinks of God as “One without a second.... He is the Sole, the simple One, the One alone.” One could easily imagine that these passages were taken from the Qur’an.

In the light of the Qur’anic declaration that prophets have been sent to every country in every age to preach in the language of its people, it seems certain that there must have been many prophets in India. Surely when so many prophets were sent to Palestine within a few hundred years, a vast country with so ancient a history as India could not be denied that privilege. In fact we find in the Indian tradition conceptions which fit in with the concepts of revelation and prophethood. The description of the Vedas as shruti or heard fits in with the Qur’anic concept of revelation where the prophet hears what is revealed to him. Similarly, the concept of avatar in Hinduism appears as an Indian version of the concept of prophet in Islam. A prophet is a man on whom God’s message descends. Avatar from the root meaning of the word could mean exactly the same thing. It is a matter for interpretation whether the avatar is regarded as an incarnation of God or a vehicle through whom God’s message is revealed. The role that Christianity has ascribed to Christ is an interesting commentary on this and shows how easily these two interpretations can merge.

The Qur’an states that only some prophets are mentioned but the majority remain unnamed. Among the names that are explicitly mentioned, there is at least one which could refer to an Indian prophet. In Sura 21 [Verse 85; also Sura 38, Verse 48] there is a reference to “Dhu’l Kifl.” This can be roughly translated as Prince of Kufl and could very well refer to the Buddha who was Prince of Kapilavastu [sixth-fifth century B.C.]. There is no “p” in Arabic so that “p” sounds are converted either to “f or “b.” Similarly, Dhu’l-Qurnain [Sira 18, Verses 83–98] mentioned in the Qur’an has been differently identified by Sir Syed Ahmad [Khan, 1817–1898] with Chehwang-te, the Chinese emperor-sage [Xuan Di, reigned 74–48 B.C.], with Alexander [Macedonian emperor, 356–323 B.C.] by Abdullah Yusuf Ali [1872–1952], and with Cyrus [Persian emperor, circa 590–529 B.C.] by Maulana [Abu al-Kalam] Azad [1888–1958].

It may be argued that whatever may have been the religion of the Vedas, Hinduism today is not monotheistic and has many idols. Such an argument admits by implication the claim of the Vedas to be a revealed Book. At the most it could therefore be said that the pristine purity of Vedic faith has been distorted. It may be pointed out that a similar development has taken place in Christianity as well. There are pictures and images of Mary and Jesus in most Christian churches. In spite of this, Christians are recognized as ahl al-kitab. On the same basis, Hindus should also be regarded as people of the Book.

Images came to the Christian churches at a later date. This is equally true of Hinduism. As far as is known, idol worship was introduced into India in the wake of Alexander’s invasion. Even in early Buddhism, there is no image of the Buddha. It is only after the Greeks came to India and brought their statuary that we get the first life-like images of the Buddha. Hinduism borrowed image worship from the later phases of Buddhism. It is interesting to note that the word “but” [idol] in Persian as well as in Urdu is a corruption of Budh or Buddha, indicating the close connection between the representation of the Buddha and idol worship. Finally, even in traditional Hinduism of today, the fact that the idol is discarded and thrown into a river after the religious ceremony proves that the idol is not the object of worship but only a symbol to help the devotee to concentrate.

There are Arabic scholars who hold that the term kafir was restricted only to certain idolatrous tribes in Arabia and cannot be applied to those who claim to have a Book. Hindus claim to have a Book and there is no reason to dispute that claim. The description they give of their religion as Sanatan Dharma or the perennial faith has a close affinity to the Muslim conception of Islam as the one faith that has persisted through the ages. If in spite of modification and changes, Jews and Christians are recognized as ahl al-kitab or people of the Book, is there any reason to deny that title to Hindus?

 17. Universalism in Islam

Chandra Muzaffar

Since the late 1960s, Malaysia has witnessed tensions and occasionally open conflict between the Muslim community, which comprises a slight majority, and non-Muslim Chinese and South Asians. This communalism has taken both ethnic and religious forms because of the combination of ethnicity (Malay) and religion (Islam) in the identity of Bumiputra (literally, son of the soil).[315] Chandra Muzaffar (Malaysia, born 1947), a political scientist and civic activist, has analyzed Malay communalism in his academic work and combated it in his civic work, in particular, the multicommunal, pro-democracy organization Aliran Kesedaran Negara (National Awareness Movement), which he founded in the late 1970s and led until the early 1990s. In the 1990s, Muzaffar founded an international organization, the Just World Trust, which seeks to promote similar ideals globally, and coauthored a declaration on human rights that was adopted by more than two hundred Asian and Pacific nongovernmental organizations. Muzaffar has been harassed by the Malaysian government for his criticism of its undemocratic practices.[316]

The Universalism of Islam is an open proclamation to everyone—Muslim and non-Muslim alike—that communalism is totally alien to the spirit and philosophy of Islam.

This proclamation is particularly relevant in a society like ours. It is unfortunate that over the decades Islam in Malaysia has come to be seen in communal perspectives. “Communal” in this context does not mean mere association with a particular community. It is perhaps unavoidable that in a situation where all Malays are Muslims, Islam will be perceived as a Malay religion by both Malays and non-Malays. As long as there is sufficient awareness that Islam does not belong exclusively to the Malays and that there are millions upon millions of non-Malays who are also Muslims, no one can say that such a perception is in itself communal.[317]

What makes the prevailing attitude towards Islam communal is the tendency to link the religion with what I shall call Malayism and Bumiputraism when it is apparent that both the premises of these two almost identical “isms” and their implications have nothing to do with Islam. By Malayism I mean that whole philosophy that argues that, as the indigenous community, the Malays have certain political, economic and cultural rights that distinguish them from the non-indigenous communities [primarily Chinese and South Asians]. Bumiputraism rests upon the same premise except that it also encompasses indigenous non-Malay, non-Muslim communities whose interests may, at certain points, conflict with those of the Malays.[318] A clear instance would be the political pre-eminence of the Malays, which is not just pre-eminence in relation to the non-indigenous communities but also pre-eminence in relation to the non-Malay, non-Muslim indigenous communities.[319]

Since both Malayism and Bumiputraism are founded upon the notion of an indigenous people, let us consider this factor from the point of view of Islam. The Islamic party of Malaysia (PAS [Partai Islam Se-Malaysia, or Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party]) has all along demanded the “restoration of Malay sovereignty” primarily because of the indigenous status of the community.[320] What is important to us is that its demand has invariably been presented in the name of Islam. Even a cursory analysis of PAS’s philosophy will reveal that its insistence upon Malay political pre-eminence, Malay economic pre-eminence and Malay cultural pre-eminence have been articulated as a way of protecting the integrity of Islam.[321]

Now Islam does not recognize an indigenous/non-indigenous dichotomy as the basis of any social system. If terms like indigenous (Bumiputra) and non-indigenous (non-Bumiputra) are used merely as descriptions of categories within the population which have emerged as a result of the evolution of the Malaysian nation, it would not be altogether antithetical to Islamic principles. For then the categories concerned would be of historical rather than social relevance. But since the PAS argument is that public life should be conducted on the basis of an indigenous/non-indigenous dichotomy one would be right in describing it as an un-Islamic stance. There are three important reasons for saying so. Firstly, it is seldom realized that by distinguishing the indigenous community from the non-indigenous communities one is, in fact, dividing the Muslims since there are Muslims who are non-Bumiputras just as there are Bumiputras who are non-Muslims. Islamic teachings are opposed to any covert or overt attempt to divide Muslims. This is borne out by the importance attached to the very well-known principle in Islam that “the Believers are but a single Brotherhood, so make peace and reconciliation between your two contending brothers” (Qur’an, Sura Al-Hujurat [Sura 49], Verse 10).[322] Lest this idea of Muslim unity be misunderstood it must be stressed that Islam does not advocate an obscurantist sort of unity without considering the ethical foundations of that unity. As proof, it is stated in the Qur’an that “God will not leave the Believers in the state in which ye are now until He separates what is evil from what is good.” (Sura Al-‘Imran [Sura 3], Verse 179) Dividing non-indigenous Muslims from indigenous Muslims in matters relating to politics, economics, education and culture is certainly not a case of separating evil from good! Secondly, even if all Bumiputras were Muslims and all non-Bumiputras non-Muslims, it would still be wrong to differentiate between the two groups in employment, education, and other similar areas where the paramount consideration should be the welfare of the human being. The Qur’an itself prohibits such discrimination (Sura Al-Baqara [Sura 2], Verse 272). The constitution of Medina formulated by Prophet Muhammad (may peace be upon him) provided equal rights and responsibilities to Muslims and non-Muslims alike.[323] Illustrious caliphs in early Islam like Abu Bakr [reigned 632–634], ‘Umar [reigned 634–644], and ‘Ali [reigned 656–661] took great pains to ensure that their non-Muslim citizens were well looked after. According to the 8th century Hanafi jurist Abu Yusuf, the second caliph ‘Umar even fixed special pensions for the non-Muslims living in Damascus.[324] Thirdly, by placing the whole Bumiputra/non-Bumiputra dichotomy at the center of things one has, in a sense, elevated ethnicity and ancestry to a level which is repugnant to genuine Islamic values. One of the hadiths (sayings of Prophet Muhammad) reminds mankind that “there is no pride whatsoever in ancestry; there is no merit in an Arab as against a non-Arab nor in a non-Arab as against an Arab.”[325] What is at the kernel of Islam is not ethnicity or ancestry but the unity of God. And the one most significant implication of that unity is the unity of the whole of mankind. The Qur’an for instance, observes,

<quote>

O mankind! We created you from a single pair of a male and a female, and made you into nations and tribes, that ye may know each other, not that ye may despise each other. Verily, the most honored of you in the sight of God is he who is the most righteous of you. (Sura Hujurat [Sura 49], Verse 13)

</quote>

This concept of unity is in fact linked to the idea of equality within the human community as suggested in SuraAl- Imam [Sura 3], Verse 195. [326] In other words, the very endeavor to sustain and strengthen ethnic dichotomies like the indigenous/non-indigenous distinction amounts to a denunciation of the central principle of Islam itself—the principle of the unity of God or towhid.

Obviously then, PAS cannot justify Bumiputraism by using or misusing Islam. Of course it is not just PAS that advocates Bumiputraism. It is, as we know, the whole basis of public policy formulation. However, in all fairness to the UMNO-led [United Malays National Organization] government which is responsible for this, it must be recognized that it does not justify Bumiputraism in the name of Islam.[327]

That Bumiputraism cannot be defended from an Islamic point of view is something that very few Muslims in Malaysia are aware of. Even where there is some awareness, there doesn’t seem to be a willingness to articulate such a view in public. This is true of almost all Muslim groups in the country, including those who argue that PAS is un-Islamic and that they represent pure, pristine Islam. That is why I have never believed for one moment that the tremendous interest in Islam manifested in recent years by educated youths and others who are part of the urban environment reflects the emergence of a genuine Islamic consciousness.[328] To establish this point, I shall undertake a brief analysis of the so-called “rising tide of Islam” of the 1970s. I hope to show that Islam in Malaysia is still clothed in communal garb; that Muslims in Malaysia have yet to understand what the universal spirit of Islam means in reality.

It is no mere coincidence that this “Islamic tide” has risen in the 1970s. For the 1970s has seen the emergence of the Malay community as a significant component of the urban environment, especially the Kuala Lumpur environment.[329] It is estimated that by 1980, 32 percent of the urban population would be Malay.[330] In a society where ethnic consciousness is pervasive, Malays who have just become part of a largely non-Malay milieu are bound to develop an awareness of their ethnic background which may not have been there when they were amongst their own ethnic kind in the rural areas. One can argue that even in societies where ethnic consciousness is not as pervasive, a first-generation community in a somewhat alien setting is expected to manifest a similar psychological response. A sense of insecurity, a feeling of suspicion, of distrust, are some of the accompanying elements of this increased ethnic awareness. Islam provides a useful channel for the expression of this awareness since it touches the life of an ordinary Malay in a thousand different ways. No other cultural symbol of the Malay community can be as effective. The Malay language expresses only one dimension of Malay identity and besides, since 1970, it has become increasingly the language of social communication of non-Malays as well.[331] It cannot therefore be used as an avenue for expressing “Malayness.” But Islam on the other hand, as it is understood here, can be used as the rationale for dressing in a certain way, staying away from certain groups, avoiding certain places and, most of all, adhering to certain beliefs and ideas. More specifically, this explains why some Muslim women in colleges and universities, firms and factories—more than their counterparts in the padi-fields and rubber small-holdings—are so concerned about dressing in the “proper Islamic way,” about avoiding male company, about staying away from cinemas and so on. It also explains, I suppose, why there is so much concern among certain Muslim circles in the cities about whether “tanggung halal” [that which is permissible] signs displayed in some non-Muslim eating shops are genuine or not.[332]

What all this shows is that as a reaction to the non-Malay, non-Muslim dominated urban environment, certain segments of the urban Malay community are seeking to carve out a distinctive identity, establish a separate ethnic presence. As I have tried to explain, this search is not the outcome of a sudden realization of what it is to be a Muslim in terms of dress or social intercourse; rather it stems from a feeling of deep insecurity that compels the individual concerned to protect his “Malayness.” This is why he chooses only those elements from Islam which will help him maintain his separateness, his distinctiveness. After all, an Islamic identity is much more than dress forms or modes of social intercourse. Is not a Muslim also defined on the basis of his commitment to truth and justice, his readiness to fight oppression and corruption, his willingness to help the poor, the weak, his capacity for charity, for kindness? There are numerous verses in the Qur’an that support such an idea of a Muslim identity. One such verse says,

<quote>

And show him the two highways? But he hath made no haste on the path that is steep, and what will explain to thee the path that is steep? It is freeing the bondman; or the giving of food in a day of privation, to the orphan with claims of relationship, or to the indigent down in the dust. Then will he be of those who believe and enjoin patience (constancy and self-restraint), and enjoin deeds of kindness and compassion. Such are the Companions of the Right Hand. (Sura Al-Balad [Sura 90], Verses 10–18)

</quote>

Another verse says,

<quote>

Seest thou one who denies the Judgment (to come)? Then such as the (man) who repulses the orphan (with harshness). And encourages not the feeding of the indigent. So woe to the worshippers who are neglectful of their prayers. Those who (want but) to be seen (of man) but refuse (to supply) (even) neighborly needs. (Sura AlMa’un [Sura 107], Verses 1–7)

</quote>

Of course, defining the identity of a Muslim in terms of his kindness to the poor will not serve the purpose of maintaining a separate identity since kindness like compassion is a sentiment, a value, which any human being, Muslim or non-Muslim, Malay or non-Malay, is capable of. If, on the other hand, one emphasizes dress or food or various rituals which are specific and exclusive to the religion, one would be highlighting forms and practices which others cannot share. Thus, one would be able to sustain a Muslim/non-

Muslim dichotomy which at the emotional-psychological level equals a Malay/non-Malay, a Bumiputra/non-Bumiputra dichotomy.

So far, I have shown that the interest in Islam in the 1970s is closely aligned to the crystallization of ethnic consciousness in a new urban environment. Insecurity has been suggested as one of the propelling forces behind this consciousness. There is, however, another psychological force which is also at work at the same time—a force which superficially at least appears to contradict the feeling of insecurity we have just analyzed. The political climate of the 1970s with its emphasis upon Malay interests and aspirations in the economy, in politics, and in the cultural life of the nation has bestowed various Malay groups with a sense of confidence about the legitimacy of their demands.[333] Confidence of this sort derived from an overall political situation where the Malay position is undoubtedly strong and powerful can, of course, co-exist quite happily with insecurity generated by a specific urban environment where the Malay position is neither strong nor powerful as yet. It is because there is this confidence that Malay groups are more vocal than ever before in demanding an Islamic administration based upon the Qur’an and the sunna (the way of the Prophet), Islamic laws, an Islamic economic system, an Islamic education system, indeed, a total Islamic society.[334] There are a number of things about these demands which must be noted. Firstly, as I have mentioned, the stronger Malay political position—an ethnic phenomenon—is at the root of these demands. Secondly, like the obsession with dress and rituals, the interest in Islamic laws cannot possibly evoke any empathy from the non-Muslims since Islamic laws are also, on the whole, very specific to the religion. It would have been different if the concern was with fighting exploitation or ensuring self-reliance—goals which are highly cherished in Islam—since they have an appeal that transcends religious boundaries. The emphasis given to Islamic laws and Islamic administration only helps to underline the differences that exist between Muslims and non-Muslims and, by implication, Malays and non-Malays. In that sense, it reveals the true character of the whole agitation for an Islamic state. Thirdly, if it were a genuine Islamic movement inspired by a genuine Islamic consciousness there would have been an increasing endeavor to study and analyze the structure and content of an Islamic society in Malaysia. This is particularly important in our context because the non-Muslim segment is a little more than half of the total population. How this large number of non-Muslims would fit into an Islamic society, what their rights and roles would be, what responsibilities they would share with the Muslims, how they would relate to an Islamic legislature or judicial system—all these and a number of other issues should have been debated and discussed in depth and detail. The fact is there has been no such effort. This lack of interest in the position and status of the non-Muslims among the so-called “Champions of Islam” of the 1970s is no different from the total lack of concern for the non-Muslims and non-Malays exhibited by PAS in the 1950s and 1960s. It is because there isn’t this concern, that no Muslim group in the country has taken up cudgels on behalf of the non- Muslim poor. Yet, the humanitarian ideals which lie at the heart of Islam, the noble examples of the Prophet Muhammad (may peace be upon him) and the great caliphs which I had alluded to earlier, would demand such a response.

Once again, this negative attitude of various Muslim groups exposes the real nature of their political struggle. It is just another way of preserving Malayism. To understand this better, one has to compare the situation here with the attitudes that prevailed among Islamic groups in Indonesia from the 1930s right up to the 1960s. In spite of a smaller non-Muslim population, leaders of the Masyumi [party] in particular, like Muhammad Natsir [1908–1993], spent so much time and effort elucidating the rights and responsibilities of non-Muslims in the Islamic state they envisaged for Indonesia.[335] One of their more important intellectual commitments was the quest for common principles that could unite Muslims and non-Muslims—a commitment which conforms with Qur’anic ideals.[336] In this connection, no Muslim group in Malaysia has ever bothered to embark upon such a mission, though, at the level of social philosophy, there are many outstanding similarities between Islam and aspects of Chinese culture and Hindu thought.[337] The reason is, of course, obvious. It is because Islam is seen from a communal angle—not a universal perspective. Finally, one would have thought that those who seek to establish an Islamic state would first examine critically the ideas, beliefs and attitudes of the Muslim community itself, in order to discover if these are elements which need to be jettisoned in the endeavor to create a genuine Islamic spirit. Apart from the occasional blast at some insignificant ritual like Mandi Safar or puja ceremonies,[338] Muslim groups have maintained an embarrassing silence in relation to more fundamental ideas and attitudes within Malay society. These are ideas and attitudes which need to be rectified in the interest of Islam. One such important idea which I have already analyzed is the whole notion of Bumiputraism. If the post-1970 Muslim movement was genuinely Islamic it would have at least attempted to show Muslims how a concept based upon ethnicity and ancestry—or upon residence and territory if you like—does not synchronize with Islamic values. The willingness to live with Bumiputraism, and worse still, defend it at times, shows that the real spirit of Islam has not crystallized. After all, Islam is a religion which has even questioned nationalism—let alone the perpetuation of communal dichotomies within a nation. Muhammad Iqbal [1877–1938], one of the greatest Muslims of this century, argued that territorial or racial nationalism was foreign to the spirit of Islam. As one writer on Iqbal put it,

<quote>

He [Iqbal] was convinced now that it would be a tragically retrograde step if the Muslim World began to try to remedy its frustrations by replacing the global Islamic sentiment by aggressive nationalism of the Western type. He conceived of Islam as a universal religion which envisaged all humanity as a unity. But the Islam of his time had become narrow, rigid and static. He conceived of life as evolutionary and dynamic. He came to the conclusion that a fossilized religious dogmatism could not generate an outlook that would lead 25 to the self-realization of individuals and communities.[339]

</quote>

It is this universal character of Islam, its conception of humanity as a unity, that we have attempted to present in this book. For this purpose we have chosen four illustrious names from Islamic history [Jalal al-Din Rumi (1207–1273), Shah Wali Allah Dihlawi (1702–1762), Abul Kalam Azad (1888–1958), and Ameer Ali (18491928)].... ALIRAN hopes that through the writings of these great thinkers the Malaysian public will achieve a deeper understanding of Islam. Because the views they have espoused are hardly known in our country, we can expect a number of our readers to express some misgivings.

But whatever their misgivings, it is our fervent prayer that they will go on looking for the truth in a sincere and rational manner. For in this quest for truth lies the future of Islam.

 18. Religious Liberty

Mohamed Talbi

Mohamed Talbi (Tunisia, born 1921) received his doctorate in history from the Sorbonne in 1968. Now a professor emeritus at the University of Tunis, Talbi began teaching there in the late 1950s and served as dean of Arts and Sciences in the late 1960s. In his retirement, Talbi has turned from his professional focus on medieval Islamic history to an enthusiastic participation in interreligious dialogue. His contributions to a variety of European and North American conferences and journals argue that Islam allows freedom of religion and that the traditional death penalty for apostasy involves a misreading of the Qur'an.

 From Old Relations to a New Context

Religious liberty, as a common human concern and international preoccupation, is relatively new. In the old ages the problem was irrelevant. During antiquity all people felt it natural to worship the deities of their city. It was the job of these deities to protect the house and to look after the family and the welfare of the state. The deities of Carthage were by nature the enemies of the deities of Rome. In that context refusal to worship the deities of the city was disloyalty to the state.

The situation was almost the same inside the biblical tradition. In the Bible Yahweh acts as the Jews' God. He constantly warns His people not to worship any other deity and to obey His law. This people, with one God, is also a physical entity—the twelve tribes descended from Abraham by Isaac and Jacob with a land, Palestine. The Jewish community is an ideal prototype of unity: it obeys the law of blood, place, and religion. Judaism is the perfect prototype of an ethnically homogeneous community rooted in religion and shaped into a land and a state. To speak of religious liberty in such a case is absurd. There is no choice other than sticking to the state-community, or leaving it. Jews who convert to another religion cease ipso facto to belong to their state-community. So their conversion is felt as betrayal, and as such it warrants the penalty of death. If we dwelt on the case of the Jewish community as a prototype, it is because that case is not without similarity to the classical Islamic umma [community] as it has been shaped by traditional theology.

For historical reasons the situation changed with the appearance of Christian preaching. From the beginning this preaching was not linked with the state, and Jesus' people, the Jewish community, rejected the call. Jesus ordered his disciples "to render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's, and unto God the things which are God's." (Gospel of Matthew, Chapter 22, Verse 21) This revolutionary attempt to dissociate state from religion, and to ensure freedom of individual conscience, failed. The time was not yet ripe. Consequently the Roman state considered the first Christians to be disloyal subjects, because of their refusal to pay honor to the deities of their city and of their social group. Accordingly, they were treated as rebels. The right to self-determination and to religious liberty was denied them. They could not act freely in accordance with conscience.

To condense much history: church and state soon found that they needed each other. Intolerance of the dominant social or religious group soon asserted itself everywhere with internal and external wars, and many forms of discrimination and persecution. Of course the Islamic world, though relatively tolerant, was not an exception. As everywhere else, human rights have been violated or ignored. But that does not mean, as we shall see, that Islam as such authorizes violation of these fundamental rights.

Now, to avoid looking on the dark side of things, we have to add that our common past was not entirely ugly and somber. We can also cite eras of tolerance, respect, comprehension, and dialogue. Nevertheless, not until the 19th century do we see the right to freethinking claimed. Political liberalism and the philosophical studies were then in vogue, and in fact what was claimed was not the right to think freely, but the right not to believe. So religious liberty became a synonym of secularism, agnosticism, and atheism. Consequently, a stubborn fight has been waged against religious liberty because of misidentification. To deal with the subject honestly and dispassionately, we must free ourselves from this false conception.

It must be admitted that religious liberty is today rooted in our social life. Since the Declaration of the Human Rights in 1945, this concept has emerged as an essential part of international law.

On the other hand, we live in a pluralistic world destined to be increasingly so. I wrote elsewhere that each human has the right to be different and already our planet is too small for our ambitions and dreams. In this new world, which is in rapid gestation, there is no more room for exclusiveness. We have to accept each other as we are. Diversity is the law of our time. Today, by virtue of expanding and sophisticated mass media, every human is truly the neighbor of every human.

In our Islamic countries we have been, since the beginning, in the habit of living side- by- side with communities of different faiths. It has not always been easy—as past and recent events could document. But only recently have we begun to be confronted with secularism. It is now our turn to experience from within the growth of agnosticism and atheism. We have to be conscious of this overwhelming change in our societies and, accordingly, exercise our theological thinking in this new and unprecedented context.

But first, and before going any further, what is religious liberty? Is it only the right to be an unbeliever? One may indeed say that religious liberty is but one aspect of the question—and from my point of view the negative one. In fact, religious liberty is basically the right to decide for one’s self, without any kind of pressure, fear, or anxiety; the right to believe or not to believe; the right to assume with full consciousness one’s destiny; the right, of course, to rid oneself of superstitions inherited from the Dark Ages; but also the right to espouse the faith of one’s choice, to worship and to bear witness freely. Is this definition in harmony with the Qur’an’s basic teachings?

 Qur’an: The Basic Principles

Religious liberty is founded, from a Qur’anic perspective, first and foremost, on the divinely ordered nature of the human. The human is not a being among many others. Among the whole range of creatures only humans have duties and obligations. They are an exceptional being. They cannot be reduced to their body, because humans, before everything else, are a spirit, a spirit given the power to conceive the Absolute and to ascend to God. If humans have this exceptional power and this privileged position inside the Creation, it is because God “breathed into them something of His spirit.” (Qur’an, Sura 32, Verse 9) Of course humans, like all living animals, are matter. They have a body created “from sounding clay, from mud molded into shape” (Sura 15, Verse 28). But they received the Spirit. They have two sides: a lower side—their clay—and a higher side—the Spirit of God. This higher side, comments A. Yusuf Ali [1872–1952], “if rightly used, would give man superiority over other creatures.”

Humankind’s privileged position inside the order of Creation is illustrated in the Qur’an in the scene where we see the angels receiving the order to prostrate themselves before Adam (Sura 15, Verse 29; Sura 38, Verse 72), the heavenly prototype of humankind. In a way, and provided we keep humans in their place as creature, we may say as Muslims—in harmony with Abraham’s other spiritual descendants, Jews and Christians—that God created humans in His image. A hadith, saying of the Prophet, although questioned, authorizes this statement. So we can say that on the level of the Spirit, all persons, whatsoever may be their physical or intellectual abilities and aptitudes, are really equal. They have the same “breath” of God in them, and by virtue of this “breath” they have the ability to ascend to Him and to respond freely to His call. Consequently they have the same dignity and sacredness, and because of this dignity and sacredness they are equally and fully entitled to enjoy the right to self-determination on earth and for the hereafter. So from a Qur’anic perspective we may say that human rights are rooted in what every human is by nature, and this is by virtue of God’s plan and creation. Thus the cornerstone of all human rights is religious liberty.

From a Muslim perspective humans are not the mere fruit of “hazard and necessity.” Their creation obeys a plan and a purpose. Through the “breath” they have received the faculty to be at one with God; and their response, to have meaning, must be free. The teachings of the Qur’an are clear: Humans are privileged beings with “spiritual favors” (Sura 17, Verse 70); they had not been “created in jest” (Sura 23, Verse 115); they have a mission and they are God’s “Viceregent on Earth” (Sura 2, Verse 30). They proceed from God with a mission to fulfill, their destiny is ultimately to return to Him. “Whoso do right, do it for their own soul; and whoso do wrong, do so to its detriment. Then to your Lord will you all be brought back.” (Sura 45, Verse 15)

It is necessary that all persons may choose their way freely and without coercion. All persons must conscientiously fulfill their own destiny. The Qur’an states clearly that compulsion is incompatible with religion.

<quote>

There should be no compulsion in religion. Truth stands out clear from Error. Whosoever rejects Evil and believes in God hath grasped the most trust-worthy hand-hold, that never breaks. God is All-Hearing, All-Knowing. (Sura 2, Verse 256)

</quote>

To my best knowledge, among all the other revealed texts, only the Qur’an stresses religious liberty so unambiguously. The reason is that faith, to be true and reliable, must be a voluntary act. In this connect it is worthwhile to underline that the quoted verse was used to reprove some Jews and Christians, newly converted to Islam in Medina, who were willing to convert their children also to their new faith. So it is clearly stressed that faith is an individual concern and commitment, and that even parents must refrain from interfering with it. Faith, as stressed in the basic text of Islam in clear and indisputable words, is a voluntary act born out of conviction and freedom.

In fact, even God refrains from subduing against His will. This too is clearly expressed in the Qur’an. Faith is a free gift, God’s gift. Humans can accept or refuse it. They have the faculty to open their heart and their reason to God’s gift. Guidance (hudan) has been sent to them. They are warmly invited to listen to God’s call. God warns them in clear and non-ambiguous terms. As it is underlined in the quoted verse stressing human freedom: “Truth stands out clear from Error.” It is up to human to make their choice. The human condition—and that is the price of human dignity and sacredness—is not without something tragic in it. Humans can be misled. They are able to make the wrong choice and to stray from the right path.

In a word, they have the capacity to resist God’s call, and this capacity is the criterion of their true freedom. Even the Messenger whose mission is properly to convey God’s call and message is helpless in such a situation. He is clearly and firmly warned to respect human freedom and God’s mystery. “If it had been thy Lord’s will, all who are on the earth would have believed, all of them. Wilt thou then compel mankind, against their will, to believe!” (Sura 10, Verse 99) A. Yusuf Ali, in his translation of the Qur’an, comments on that verse in this way:

<quote>

Men of faith must not be impatient or angry if they have to contend against Unfaith, and most important of all, they must guard against the temptation of forcing Faith, that is, imposing it on others by physical compulsion, or any other forms of compulsion such as social pressure, or inducements held out by wealth or position, or other adventitious advantages. Forced faith is no faith.

</quote>

The Apostle’s mission—and all the more ours—is strictly restricted to advise, warn, convey a message, and admonish without compelling. He is ordered: “Admonish, for thou art but an admonisher. Thou hast no authority to compel them” (Sura 88, Verses 21–22). In other words, God has set humans truly and tragically free. What He wants is, in full consciousness and freedom, willing and obedient response to His call—and that is the very meaning of the Arabic word “Islam.”

I do not mean that we should adopt an attitude of abandon and indifference. In fact, we have to avoid extremes. We have, of course, to refrain from interfering in the inner life of another, as I have stressed. It is time to add that we must avoid also being indifferent or careless about one another. We must convey God’s message. This obligation of faith also needs stressing.

We are tempted today to shut ourselves up and to live comfortably wrapped in our own thoughts, indifferent to our neighbors. But this is not God’s purpose. God Himself sets the example. He is nearer to humankind “than humans’ own jugular vein” (Sura 50, Verse 16) and He knows better than we do our inmost desires, and what these desires “whisper” (tuwaswisu) to us (Sura 50, Verse 16). So He stands by us, and He speaks unceasingly to each of us, warning and promising with a divine pedagogy that fits all persons of different social and intellectual classes, using images, symbols, and words that He only may use with total sovereignty.

And God urges us to follow His example, and to turn our steps towards all our brothers in humanity, beyond all kinds of frontiers, the confessional ones included.

<quote>

O mankind! We created you from a male and a female; and We have made you into nations and tribes that you may know each other. Verily, the most honorable among you, in the sight of God, are those who are the most righteous of you. And God is All-Knowing, All-Aware. (Sura 49, Verse 13)

</quote>

A. Yusuf Ali comments:

<quote>

This is addressed to all mankind, and not only to the Muslim brotherhood, though it is understood that in a perfect world the two would be synonymous. As it is, mankind is descended from one pair of parents. Their tribes, races, and nations are convenient labels by which we may know certain differing characteristics. Before God they are all one, and he gets most honor who is most righteous.

</quote>

In other words humans are not created for solitariness and impervious individuality. They are created for community, relationship, and dialogue. Their fulfillment is in their reconciliation both to God and to people. We have to find the way, in each case, to realize this double reconciliation, without betraying God and without damaging the inner life of the other. To do so, we have to listen to God's advice:

<quote>

Do not argue with the People of the Book unless it is in the most courteous manner, except for those of them who do wrong. And say: "We believe in the Revelation which has come down to us and in that which came down to you. Our God and your God is one, and to Him we submit." (Sura 29, Verse 46)

</quote>

The Arabic word used in this verse, and rendered in the translation by the verb "to submit," is "Muslimun"—"Muslims." To be a true Muslim is to live in courteous dialogue with peoples of other faiths and ideologies, and ultimately to submit to God. We must show concern to our neighbors. We have duties to them, and we are not islands of loneliness. The attitude of respectful courtesy recommended by the Qur'an must be expanded to embrace all mankind, believers and unbelievers, except for those who "do wrong"—the unjust and violent, who resort deliberately to fist or argument. In such a case it is better to avoid so-called dialogue.

In short, from my Muslim perspective, our duty is to bear witness courteously and respectfully for the inner liberty of our neighbors and for their sacredness. We must also be ready to give them an honest hearing. We have to remember, as Muslims, that a hadith of our Prophet states: "The believer is unceasingly in search of wisdom, wherever he finds it he grasps it." Another saying adds: "Look for science everywhere, even as far as in China.” And, finally, it is up to God to judge, for we, as limited human beings, know only in part. Let us quote:

<quote>

To each among you, have We prescribed a Law and an Open Way. And if God had enforced His Will, He would have made of you all one people. But His plan is to test you in what He hath given you. So strive as in a race in all virtues. The goal of you all is to God. Then will He inform you of that wherein you differed. (Sura 5, Verse 51)

Say: “O God! Creator of the heavens and the earth! Knower of all that is hidden and open! It is thou that wilt judge between Thy Servants in those matters about which they have differed.” (Sura 39, Verse 46)

</quote>

 Beyond the Limits Imposed by Traditional Theology

Though all Muslims are bound by the Qur’an’s basic teachings, Muslim traditional theology, for historical reasons, in my opinion, does not always reflect the spirit of the Qur’an. I’ll cite briefly two important cases: the case of the dhimmis—the confessional minorities in the medieval Islamic empire—and the case of apostates.

Let us start with the dhimmis. If the doors of many countries have been opened by force or jihad [religious struggle], to pave the way for Islam, Islam itself has never been imposed by compulsion. From this point of view the teachings of the Qur’an have been observed. They protected the dhimmis against the most unbearable forms of religious intolerance. In particular, with two or three exceptions, the dhimmis have never been prevented from following the religion of their choice, from worshipping, or organizing their communities in accordance with their own law. Their situation has even been improved by Islamic conquest. They enjoyed long periods of tolerance and real prosperity, often holding high positions in the administration, in the court, and in economic activities.

But it is a fact that they suffered, from time to time, here and there, from discrimination. Things worsened after the reign of al-Mutawakkil (847- 861). Discrimination, especially in dress, was openly humiliating. The oppression culminated in Egypt during the reign of al-Hakim (966–1021), who may not have been sane.

In the medieval context of wars, hostilities, and treacheries, discrimination or open oppression has always been prompted, or strongly backed, by the theologians. We have to remember that it was not then a virtue—according to the medieval mentality wherever—to consider all human beings as equal. How, then, to consider equal truth and error, true believers and heretics!

So in appraising the past we must always take circumstances into account. Above all, we must strive to avoid the same situations and errors. In any case, the Qur'an's basic teachings lay down a clear line of conduct. They teach us to respect the dignity and freedom of one another. In a world where giant holocausts have been perpetrated, where human rights are still manipulated or blandly ignored, our modern Muslim theologians must denounce all forms of discriminations as crimes strictly and explicitly condemned by the Qur'an.

On the other hand, we must consider the case of the apostate. In this field, too, traditional theology did not stick to the spirit of the Qur'an; rather, it abridged the liberty to choose one's religion.

According to this theology, though conversion to Islam must be, and is in fact, without coercion, it is practically impossible, once inside Islam, to get out of it. Conversion from Islam to another religion is considered treason, and the apostate is subject to the death penalty. For their interpretation, the traditional theologians rely on the precedent of the first caliph of Islam, Abu Bakr ([reigned] 632–634), who energetically fought the tribes that rejected his authority after the Prophet’s death, and refused to pay him the alms taxes. He likened their rebellion to apostasy. Also, they cite the authority of this hadith: “Anyone who changes religion must be put to death.”

During the history of Islam, I am not aware of any historical or current application of the law condemning the apostate to death. However, during the 1970s, in Egypt, the Islamists narrowly failed to enforce this law against Copts who converted to Islam, generally to marry Muslim women, and then, if the marriage failed, returned to their Coptic religion. Recently some Tunisian atheists have expressed their concern about this law.

So the case of the apostate in Islam, though mostly theoretical, needs to be cleared up. First, the hadith upon which the theologians assert the death penalty is always more or less mixed, in the books of hadith, with rebellion and highway robbery. The cases of “apostates” killed during the Prophet’s life or shortly after his death are without exception those persons who, as a consequence of their “apostasy,” turned their weapons against the Muslims, whose community was at that time small and vulnerable. The penalty of death appears in these circumstances as an act of self-defense. It is undoubtedly for that reason that the Hanafi School offiqh [Islamic jurisprudence] does not condemn to death the woman apostate, “because women, contrary to men, are not fit for war.”

On the other hand, the hadith authorizing the penalty of death is not technically mutawatir [epistemologically in the clear], and consequently it is not, according to the traditional system of hadith, binding. And above all, from a modern point of view, this hadith can and must be questioned. In my opinion, we have many good reasons to consider it a forgery.

It may been forged under the influence of Leviticus, Chapter 24, Verse 16, and Deuteronomy, Chapter 13, Verses 2–19, where the Israelites were ordered to stone the apostate to death.

In any case, the hadith in question is at variance with the teachings of the Qur’an, where there is no mention of the death penalty required against the apostate. During the life of the Prophet apostasy presented itself at various times, and several verses [of the Qur’an] deal with it. In all, without exception, punishment of the apostate who persists in rejection of Islam is left to God’s judgment and to the afterlife. The cases mentioned in the Qur’an and by the commentators concern, on the one hand, individuals and tribes who become turncoats, and, on the other hand, persons attracted by the “Peoples of the Book,” Jews and Christians, to their faith (Sura 2, Verse 109; Sura 3, Verses 99–100). Taking into account the special situation, the Qur’an argues, warns, or recommends the attitude to take, without ever threatening death.

* 1. The Qur’an Argues

From a Muslim perspective, the Qur’an recognizes all previous revelations, authenticates and perfects them.

<quote>

Say: “We believe in God, and in what has been revealed to us, and what was revealed to Abraham, Ishmael, Jacob, and the Tribes, and in that which was given to Moses, Jesus, and the Prophets, from their Lord. We make no distinction between anyone of them, and to God we submit (Muslimun).” (Sura 3, Verse 84)

</quote>

It does not follow that one is permitted, at the convenience of the moment, to change religion as one changes a coat. Such behavior denotes lack of true faith. It is for this reason that the following verse insists on the universal meaning of Islam, a call directed to all of mankind: “If anyone desires a religion other than Islam, never will it be accepted of him; and in the Hereafter he will be among the losers." (Sura 3, Verse 85)

Accordingly, apostates are warned: those who choose apostasy, after being sincerely convinced that Islam is the Truth, are unjust, and as such they are bereaved of God's guidance, with all the consequences that follow for their salvation. "How shall God guide those who reject faith after they accepted it, and bore witness that the Apostle was true, and that clear signs had come to them? But God guides not a people unjust." (Sura 3, Verse 86; see too the following Verses 87–91)

On the other hand, the Qur'an denounces "Peoples of the Book" who exert pressure on Muslims to induce them to retract. There is no doubt that polemics between the emerging Islam and the old religions were sharp. In this atmosphere the Qur'an urges people who espouse Islam to stick firmly to their new faith until their death; to close their ranks, to refuse to listen to those who strive to render them apostates, and to keep out of their trap. They are also reminded of their former state of disunion, when they were "on the brink of the Pit of Fire"; and they are exhorted to ensure their final salvation:

<quote>

Say, "O People of the Book: Why obstruct ye those who believe, from the Path of God, seeking to make it crooked, while ye were yourselves witness thereof? But God is not unmindful of all that ye do."

O ye who believe! If you obey a faction of those who have been given the Book, they will turn your back into disbelievers after you have believed.

And how would you disbelieve, while to you are rehearsed the signs of God, and His Messenger is among you? And he who holds fast to God is indeed guided to the Right Path.

O ye who believe! Fear God as He should be feared, and die not except in the state of Islam.

And hold fast, all together, by the Rope of God, and be not divided, and remember God’s favor on you: for ye were enemies, and He joined your Hearts in love, so that by His Grace, ye became brethren; and ye were on the brink of the Pit of Fire, and He saved you from it. Thus doth God make His Signs clear to you, that ye may be guided.

Let there arise out of you a Community inviting to all that is good, enjoining what is right, and forbidding what is wrong. They are the ones to attain felicity. (Sura 3, Verses 99–104)

</quote>

Thus, unceasingly and by all means, the Qur’an strives to raise new Muslims’ spirit, in order to prevent them from falling into apostasy. The argumentation is only moral. The Qur’an goes on: It is “from selfish envy” that “quite a number of the People of the Book wish they could turn you back to infidelity” (Sura 2, Verse 109; see too Sura 3, Verse 149); you have not to fear them. “God is you Protector, and He is the best of helpers, soon shall He cast terror into the hearts of the unbelievers” (Sura 3, Verses 150–151); “your real friends are God, His Messenger, and the believers ... therefore take not for friends those who take your religion for a mockery or sport.” (Sura 5, Verses 58–60) And, finally, those who in spite of all this counsel allow themselves to be tempted by apostasy, are forewarned: If they desert the Cause, the Cause will not fail. Others will bring it to a head.

<quote>

O ye who believe! If any from among you turn back from their faith, soon will God produce a people whom He will love as they will love Him, lowly with the Believers, mighty against the Rejecters, striving in the way of God, and never afraid of the reproaches of a fault finder. That is the grace of God, which He will bestow on whom He pleaseth. And God is Bountiful, All-Knowing. (Sura 5, Verse 57; see too Sura 47, Verse 38)

</quote>

Finally, the apostates are given this notice: they “will not injure God in the least, but He will make their deeds of no effect.” (Sura 47, Verse 32)

* 2. The Qur’an Warns

The young Muslim community is thus given many reasons to stick to the new religion. Members are also warned that their salvation depends on their not departing from their faith. They are urged to follow the true spirit of Islam, which is defined in two ways: First, they will love God and God will love them; second, they will be humble among their brethren, but they will not fear wrong-doers and they will not consort with them. If by fear, weakness, or time-serving, they fall into apostasy, the loss will be theirs and punishment will be hard in the Hereafter. “And if any of you turn back from their faith, and die in unbelief, their works will bear no fruit in this life. And in the Hereafter they will be companions of the Fire, and will abide therein.” (Sura 2, Verse 217) The apostates lay themselves open to “the curse of God, of His angels, and of all mankind” (Sura 3, Verse 87), except for “those who repent thereafter, and amend, for God is Oft-Forgiving, Most Merciful.” (Sura 3, Verses 8991). They will “taste the penalty for rejecting faith” (Sura 3, Verse 106; see too Verse 140). Such people are entirely in the hands of Evil (Sura 47, Verse 25). They secretly plot with enemies (Sura 47, Verses 26–27), and “they obstruct the way to God.” (Sura 47, Verses 32, 34) As a result “God will not forgive them.” (Sura 47, Verse 34)

* 3. The Qur’an Advises

How to deal with obstinate and ill-disposed apostates? How to treat those who try to draw them into their camp, or to manipulate them? Let us underline once more that there is no mention in the Qur’an of any kind of penalty, including death. To use the Arab technical word, we say that there is no specific hadd [limitation] in this matter.

On the contrary, Muslims are advised to “forgive and overlook till God accomplishes His purpose, for God hath power over all things.” (Sura 2, Verse 109) In other words, no punishment on earth. The case does not answer to the Law. The debate is between God and the apostate’s conscience, and it is not our role to interfere in it.

Muslims are authorized to take up arms in only one case, self-defense, when they are attacked and their faith seriously jeopardized. In such a case “fighting” (al-qital) is “prescribed” (kutiba), even if they “dislike it” (kurhun lakum) (Sura 2, Verse 194). To summarize—Muslims are urged not to yield, when their conscience is at stake, and to take up arms against “those who will not cease fighting you until they turn you back from your faith, if they can.” (Sura 2, Verse 217)

 Conclusion

It is thus evident that religious liberty, with all its ramifications, is not new inside Islam. The Qur’an deals at length with it. In the core of this problem we meet the ticklish subject of apostasy. We have seen that the Qur’an argues, warns, advises, but never resorts to the sword. The reason is that argument is meaningless in matters of faith. In our pluralistic world our theologians must take that into account.

We can never underline enough that religious liberty is not an act of charity or a tolerant concession to mislead persons. It is a fundamental right for everyone. To claim it for myselfj implies ipso facto that I am disposed to claim it for my neighbor too.

Religious liberty is not the equivalent of atheism. My right, and my duty also, is to bear witness, by fair means, of my own faith, and to convey God’s call. Ultimately it is up to each person to respond or not to respond to this call.

From a Muslim perspective, and on the basis of the Qur’an’s teachings, religious liberty is fundamentally and ultimately an act of respect for God’s Sovereignty and for the mystery of His plan for humankind, who have been given the terrible privilege of building on their own responsibility, their destiny on earth and for the hereafter. Finally, to respect human freedom is to respect God’s plan.

To be a True Muslim is to submit to this plan. It is, in the literal sense of the word, to put one’s self, voluntarily and freely, with confidence and love, in the hands of God.

 19—The Medina Document

Ali Bulay

Ali Bulay (Turkey, born 1951) is a leading figure among the growing group of Muslim intellectuals in Turkey. His first book, published in the late 1970s, achieved the status of “a kind of manifesto of the Muslim intellectuals.”[340] Bulay argues that Islam represents a viable alternative to Western political systems that solves many of the social and political ills associated with the West, but only if Muslim intellectuals undertake a systematic analysis of Islam’s applicability to modern problems. His more recent work has attempted to supply some of this analysis[341] and begun to focus on the issue of pluralism, particularly ethnic and religious pluralism. Bulay’s basis for analysis is the Medina Document, a contract signed by the Prophet Muhammad, Jews, and polytheists granting Muslims the right to rule in the Arabian city and at the same time protecting the rights of other groups.

With the hijra [the exodus of the Muslims from Mecca to Medina in 622] and subsequent developments, there were three main social groups in Medina: Muslims, Jews and the Polytheist Arabs.

The Muslim group consisted of refugees from Mecca and the Ansar [literally “helpers,” these were Medinans who accepted Islam]. The Ansar were composed of the Aws [tribe] and the Khazraj [tribe]. This kind of social structure was alien to the ancient traditions of the whole Arabian peninsula. In traditional tribal life social organization depended on blood and kinship ties, while in Medina, for the first time, people from totally divergent geographical, ethnic and cultural backgrounds gathered and identified themselves as a distinct social group. Later the Roman Suhayl, the Persian Salman and the Kurdish Gavan would be added to this group. Indeed, the second article of the Medina Document [translated and discussed in this chapter] would designate this social group as “an umma [community] distinct from other people” on a religious and legal basis.

Yet, of course, Medina did not consist only of Muslims. There were its ancient inhabitants: Jews and the Arabs who did not accept Islam. Hazrat [his excellency] Muhammad (peace be upon him) faced the important problem of reconciling and unifying these social groups, of discovering the formula for co-existence.[342] But how was he going to do it?

It now appears that Hazrat Muhammad started out by tracing the social, religious and demographic composition of Medina. For this purpose, he had a population census taken, an undertaking quite strange for its time. Can we say that, in addition to the [pioneering] Medina Document, we encounter the first census here, where the inhabitants of the town were recorded one by one (man, woman, child, the old) in a notebook? Whatever the answer, there is no doubt that the act was “new and strange” for Arabs. According to a report from Huzayfa [ibn al-Yaman, companion of the Prophet]: “God’s Messenger said to us: ‘Bring me the names of (each of) the people who chose Islam as their religion and those who became Muslims.’ And we wrote down and brought 1500 names to him.”[343]

From the census they found that 10,000 people lived in Medina, of which 1,500 were Muslims, 4,000 were Jews and 4,500 were Polytheist Arabs. The Prophet took another step and determined the physical city boundaries of Medina by marking its four corners. In this way he specified the land included in a “city-state,” which was to be designated as the “protected area (harem) remaining within the Medina (Yathrib) valley” in article 39 of the Medina Document.

Naturally Muslims were pleased with this undertaking, and the Jews also seemed pleased with this social and political organization. Only the Mushriks (Polytheists) of Medina were disturbed. They perceived a potential threat,[344] which is not difficult to understand. Since the Prophet and his followers had had to migrate [from Mecca to Medina] due to unbearable pressures exerted by the Polytheists of Mecca, it is unthinkable that he would be on good terms with other unbelievers. Moreover, right after the hijra, news had started to arrive from Mecca that the Quraish [tribe of Mecca] would continue chasing them and was planning an attack on Medina soon.

In the event of such a struggle, what would the position of the Polytheists of Medina be? Would not the Quraish blame them, asking why they accepted Muhammad? Might not a conflict arise between them and the Muslims even before such an attack? There was a de facto possibility. How was co-existence possible in such a conjuncture?

Hazrat Muhammad was preoccupied with the settlement of the migrant Meccans and their adaptation to the new environment, while on the other hand he was trying to gain the confidence of the Jews and the Polytheist Arabs. He declared that his aim was not to establish an absolute rule over Medina, but to assure the security of his religious community as well as the necessary conditions for the propagation of the new religion. In fact, even in the [earlier Qur’anic] revelations of Mecca, a political principle had been adopted stating, “To you your religion, to me my religion.” (Sura 109, Verse 6) However, the Quraish, refusing this multireligious pluralist project, had blocked the spread of the religious message and tortured those who wanted to become Muslims.

Because of these factors, one would not expect the Prophet to change the strategy he had been following. Under these conditions, his life in Medina would implement the Meccan revelations on the social, legal, and institutional levels. It would transform the vision of Mecca into practice in Medina; and this was what happened. In other words, he demonstrated, to every one and every community, possible ways of co-existing through the realization of a pluralist social project based on religious and legal autonomy. Of course, the religious message would be propagated; but no one would be coerced to convert through force and pressure; those who converted would meet no opposition, as they had in Mecca.

When they first arrived in Medina, the Ansar of Medina and the chiefs of the families (naqib) from Mecca gathered in a big meeting.... The first 23 articles of the Medina Document, decided upon in this meeting, established the social and legal relationships of the new Muslim group in written decrees.

After the completion of the work, Hazrat Muhammad, peace be upon him, consulted the representatives of the non-Muslim social groups, just as he had consulted the Muslim leaders. All of them agreed upon the basic principles constituting the foundations of a new “city- state” in a gathering in the house of Anas [ibn Malik, Companion of the Prophet, 710–796]. The “constitution” of this new state was recorded in writing and this is the Document that we hold in our hands now.

Now let us take a closer look at the decrees of the Document in order to render the subject more comprehensible:

 The Medina Document[345]

In the name of God, the compassionate, the merciful.

1. This book (document) has been prepared by Muhammad the Prophet of God, on behalf of the believers of Quraysh [the emigrants from Mecca] and Yathrib [Medina], the Muslims and those who have joined them, and those fighting along with them.

2. Surely, they form an umma (group) apart from the rest of humankind.

3. The migrants of Quraysh shall defray the cost of bloodshed among themselves as has been the custom and shall join in ransoming their war prisoners according to the proper and approved principles ofjustice among the believers.

4. The Banu ‘Awf shall continue to pay the costs of their bloodshed as they have been accustomed, and each group shall participate in ransoming their war prisoners according to the proper and approved principles ofjustice among the believers.

5. The Banu’l-Harith shall continue to pay the costs of their bloodshed as they have been accustomed, and each group shall participate in ransoming their war prisoners according to the proper and approved principles ofjustice among the believers.

6. The Banu Sa’ida shall continue to pay the costs of their bloodshed as they have been accustomed to and each group shall participate in ransoming their war prisoners according to the proper and approved principles ofjustice among the believers.

7. The Banu Jusham shall continue to pay the costs of their bloodshed as they have been accustomed to and each group shall participate in ransoming their war prisoners according to the proper and approved principles ofjustice among the believers.

8. The Banu’n-Najjar shall continue to pay the costs of their bloodshed as they have been accustomed to and each group shall participate in ransoming their war prisoners according to the proper and approved principles ofjustice among the believers.

9. The Banu ‘Amr ibn ‘Awf shall continue to pay the costs of their bloodshed as they have been accustomed to and each group shall participate in ransoming their war prisoners according to the proper and approved principles ofjustice among the believers.

10. The Banu’n-Nabit shall continue to pay the costs of their bloodshed as they have been accustomed to and each group shall participate in ransoming their war prisoners according to the proper and approved principles ofjustice among the believers.

11. The Banu’l-Aws shall continue to pay the costs of their bloodshed as they have been accustomed to and each group shall participate in ransoming their war prisoners according to the proper and approved principles ofjustice among the believers.

12. The Muslims shall not leave anyone among them under financial burden (in this situation), and shall pay the debts thereof arising from ransoms for war prisoners and costs of bloodshed, according to the proper and approved principles.

12B. No Muslim shall oppose the mawla (person with whom a contractual brotherhood has been established) of another Muslim. (According to another reading: No Muslim may enter into an agreement with the mawla of another Muslim, so as to harm the latter.)

13. All God-fearing Muslims shall be against the person who intends to commit an aggressive and unjust act among them, or who aims to infringe one’s right or to cause turmoil among believers. And even if this person is the offspring of one of them, they shall all raise their hands against him.

14. No Muslim shall kill another Muslim for the sake of an unbeliever and shall assist an unbeliever at the expense of a Muslim.

15. God’s possession (protection and assurance) is one; (a protection acknowledged by the least important of the Muslims) applies to them all. This is because a Muslim is the mawla (brother) of another, apart from rest of the people.

16. Among Jews, those who submit to us shall receive our assistance and protection; they shall not be oppressed, nor shall we give assistance to their enemies.

17. Peace is one among Muslims. No Muslim, in a war fought in the path of God, may agree to a peace accord by excluding other believers. This peace shall only be made among them (Muslims) according to the principles of generalizability and justice.

18. All those (military) groups joining us in war shall be relieved in turn.

19. Muslims shall take revenge for each other of the blood shed for (the sake of) God.

20. Surely, God-fearing Muslims follow the best and the straightest path.

20B. No polytheist may protect the life and property of one of the Quraish and can intervene with a believer in this matter (may not prevent an attack on the Quraish).

21. If it is proven with certainty that one person has killed a Muslim and the guardian (defender) of the victim does not grant a pardon, rules of retaliation shall operate; in this case all Muslims shall be against him. It is only halal (right) for them to act in compliance (with this rule).

22. It is not halal (right) for any Muslim believing in God and the Day of Judgment, accepting the contents of this sheet (document), to assist a murderer and to provide protection for him; whoever helps him and provides protection shall receive the curse and wrath of God on the Day of Judgment, when financial compensation or sacrifice shall no longer be accepted.

23. Any issue over which you are divided shall be taken to God and Muhammad.

24. Jews along with Muslims shall bear (their own) war expenses during war.

25. The Jews of Banu’Awf, together with Muslims[346] constitute an umma (group). The religion of the Jews is for themselves, the religion of Muslims for themselves. This includes both their mawla and themselves personally.

25B. But whoever performs an unjust action or commits a crime shall harm solely himself and members of his family.

26. The Jews of Banu’n-Najjar shall have the same (rights) as the Jews of Banu ‘Awf.

27. The Jews of Banu’l-Harith shall have the same (rights) as the Jews of Banu ‘Awf.

28. The Jews of Banu Sa’ida shall have the same (rights) as the Jews of Banu ‘Awf.

29. The Jews of Banu Jusham shall have the same (rights) as the Jews of Banu ‘Awf.

30. The Jews of Banu’l-Aws shall have the same (rights) as the Jews of Banu ‘Awf.

31. The Jews of Banu Tha’laba shall have the same (rights) as the Jews of Banu ‘Awf. But whoever performs an unjust action or commits a crime shall harm solely himself and members of his family.

32. The Jafna (family) is a branch of the Tha’laba [tribe] and because of this they shall be considered as the Tha’laba.

33. Banu’sh-Shutaiba shall have the same (rights) as the Jews of Banu ‘Awf. (The rules) shall be obeyed absolutely; no one shall break them.

34. The mawla of the Tha’laba shall be considered as Tha’laba themselves.

35. Those who have taken refuge with the Jews (bitana) shall be considered as Jews themselves.

36. Among them (Jews) none may go (on a military campaign with the Muslims) without the permission of Muhammad.

36B. It shall not be forbidden to take revenge of a wound. Surely if a person happens to kill another, both he and his family shall be responsible as a consequence, otherwise there shall be injustice (meaning any person not obeying this rule shall have been unjust). God is with those who best obey this Document.

37. (In case of war) Jews bear their expenses and the Muslims theirs. Surely they shall cooperate among themselves, in opposing those who wage war against the people designated on this sheet (document). There shall be benevolence and good behavior between them. (The rules) shall be obeyed absolutely; no one shall break them.

37B. No one may commit a crime against his ally; surely the oppressed shall receive help.

38. Jews along with Muslims shall bear the expenses of wars fought together.

39. On behalf of a person designated by this sheet (document), the Yathrib valley (j’awf) constitutes a harem (protected) territory.

40. Any person under protection (jar) is like the protector himself; he shall not be oppressed nor shall he commit any crime.

41. Excepting those with permission to give protection, no one may be given the right to protection.

42. All cases of murder and fighting that occur among the people designated in this sheet (Document) shall be taken to God and His Messenger Muhammad. God is with those who best obey this Document.

43. Neither the Quraish nor those assisting them shall receive protection.

44. There shall be cooperation among them (Muslims and Jews) against those who invade the Yathrib.

45. If they (the Jews) are invited (by the Muslims) to adhere to a peace agreement or to take part in a peace agreement, they shall either directly sign it or participate in it. If they (the Jews) suggest the same things (to the Muslims), they shall have the same rights from the Muslims; excepting cases of war over religious issues.

45B. Each group is responsible for the area belonging to it (with regards to its defense and other needs).

46. The Jews of al-Aws, meaning their mawla and themselves, shall have the same rights agreed upon on this sheet (document), with strict and complete obedience from the people designated on this sheet (document). (The rules) shall be obeyed absolutely; no one shall break them. God is with those who best and truly observe the rules described on this sheet (document).

47. This book (document) shall not protect the perpetrator of an unjust act or a crime from punishment. Whoever goes to war shall have security and whoever remains in Medina shall also have security; except those who commit an unjust act or a crime. God and His Messenger Muhammad shall protect those who observe (this sheet) with complete loyalty and care.

 Constitutive Principles Implicit in the Articles

According to [Muhammad] Hamidullah [born 1908], “This constitution carries the title and privilege of being not only the first Islamic state constitution but also the first constitution on earth announced by a state.”[347] The Italian historian [Leone] Caetani [1869–1935] calls it a “document” without using the term “constitution” and adds, “The document is a book of the Prophet Muhammad so that it is not anyone else but Muhammad himself who wrote (or who had it written). Others, meaning Muslims, Jews and Polytheists, have adopted it.”[348] It should not be deduced from these words of Caetani that the Prophet dictated to others a text prepared by himself, or that he made them sign it by default. Information from [Malik ibn] Anas [Companion of the Prophet, 710–796] and other sources indicates that the Document took shape as a result of negotiations and as a product of social consensus.

And this is the true interpretation, because it is unimaginable that a person who snuck out of Mecca in the middle of the night to migrate to Medina would be able to impose the text of an agreement that serves his own purposes and interests on people stronger both militarily and numerically. It should be remembered that his [the Prophet’s] supporters made up only 15 percent of the total city population. No, this does not make sense.

One of the main factors contributing to the acceptance of this social contract was the chaotic and insecure condition of Medina, which was worn out by 120 years of wars and conflicts. It is as if Medina awaited its savior. It could not, by itself and through the existing social forces, find a political and social formulation for peace and stability. Because of war Medina stagnated economically, and it appeared to be generating even more new conflicts. At just such a critical period a stranger showed all groups how to coexist in partnership, inviting everyone to exist on legal foundations, according to the principle of “you are what you are.”

The fact that terms like “wounding,” “killing,” “costs of bloodshed,” “ransom for freedom” are uttered frequently in the text reflects the normal condition of a society shaken and worn out by long years of internal strife. The urgent problem of the day was to end the conflicts and to find a formulation for the co-existence of all sides according to the principles ofjustice and righteousness. In this respect, the Document is epochal. Its historical nature and the small number of the people signing it are insignificant with respect to its constitutive principles.

The second important point is the fact that such a project enabled everyone to be accepted by each other as a natural reality without resorting to domination, the legalization of respect for each other’s ways of living and thinking, and protection under the law.

Another point to be noted is this: The Medina Document proposes a social project not based on “domination” but on “participation” by all social groups. According to the project offered by the Document, Muslims will live as free people in the direction indicated by God and Hazrat Muhammad, in safety, and will propagate their religion. The same rights apply to the Jews and others.

Here we underline the first constitutive principle that can be drawn from the Document:

<quote>

A righteous and just, law-respecting ideal project aiming for true peace and stability among people cannot but be based on a contract among different groups (religious, legal, philosophical, political, etc.). During the preparation of the contract, the members or the representatives of the social groups should be present, the articles of the contract (basic principles) should be decided in a free environment, involving discussions and negotiations of the different parties involved....

</quote>

Since the groups in the social scene are heterogeneous, each article should reflect a common interest and should be settled democratically. Every common interest constitutes an article of the covenant, and every article concerning points of disagreement is left to the groups themselves. Commonalities belong to the sphere of the covenant; differences belong to the autonomous sphere. This is a rich diversity within unity, or a real pluralism.

The second constitutive principle is the selection of the concept of participation as the starting point, rather than domination, because a totalitarian or unitarian political structure cannot allow for diversities. The Medina Document cites Muslims and Jews tribe by tribe (one by one). It deals with the Polytheists in a different article (Article 20B). Immigrants, the Ansar, Banu ‘Awf, Banu’l-Harith, Banu Sa’ida, Banu Jusham, Banu’n-Najjar, Banu ‘Amr ibn ‘Awf, Banu’n-Nabit, Banu’l-Aws (Articles 1–11); and again, among the Jews, the tribes Banu ‘Awf, Banu’n-Najjar, Banu’l-Harith, Banu Sa’ida, Banu Jusham, Banu’l-Aws, Banu Tha’laba, Jafna, Banu’sh-Shutaiba (Articles 25–33) and their mawla—all are cited one by one.

Mawla [brothers] are a tribe, family or group connected to or in contract with another tribe without having a blood or kinship relationship to it. In other words, each social group that becomes a party to the contract by affixing its name and signature represents the other groups connected to it while acknowledging equivalent rights and responsibilities for them. However Article 20B adopts special decrees for the Polytheists, supported by Article 43. This is in order to prevent the Polytheists of Medina from establishing any political or military relationships with the Polytheists of Mecca. Actually, the Polytheists of Medina did not intend to ally with the Meccans; in fact, they feared its consequences. Yet, they too, like the others, wanted to have all the rights and freedoms permitted within the City, as described in Article 39. The Document guarantees the right to demand these rights as well. Consequently, we know that after the battles of Badr and Uhud fought against the Meccans, the Polytheist parties to the contract continued to live in Medina without serious conflicts occurring between them and the Muslims.

The mentioning of the tribes one by one is in order to acknowledge the identities of the religious and ethnic collectivities existing in the society. The tribal leaders probably demanded this in particular.

The conclusion to be drawn here is this: each religious and ethnic group enjoys complete cultural and legal autonomy. In other words, in such areas as religion, lawmaking, judiciary, education, trade, culture, art, and the organization of daily life, each group will remain as it is and will express itself through the cultural and legal criteria it defines. The guarantee of this religious and legal autonomy is Article 25, which declares: “The religion of the Jews is for themselves, the religion of Muslims for themselves. This includes both their mawla and themselves personally.”

The decree demanding that possible conflicts should be taken to Hazrat Muhammad, in Article 42, was proposed by the Jews and the Polytheists, as we know both from the Qur’an and the hadith [traditions of the Prophet] as well as from other sources. For reasons mentioned above, the chaotic conditions in Medina had disrupted the trust between tribes. With this specific article, the groups agree to carry the case to a “higher judiciary authority” whenever they cannot solve the conflicts among themselves. This higher judiciary authority is Hazrat Muhammad, being trustworthy, impartial and an outsider to Medina. The Qur’an granted to the Prophet the authority to handle their cases, if he was willing to do so (Sura 5, Verse 42). As a result, the Prophet left them free to choose every time they consulted him, asking them, “How do you want me to decide, according to the Qur’an or the Torah?” In this arrangement, the Prophet did not act as a “judge” but as a “referee.” It should be added that the practice of resolving the cases of non-Muslims or leaving them with their own courts and laws has formed part of the dhimmi [minority groups] law since then, lasting until the final days of the Ottomans [reigned 1281–1924].

Another constitutive principle emerges here: in a pluralist society, several legal systems, not necessarily one single system, may coexist. Of course if conflicts arise among groups due to contradictions between laws—which are expected to arise—in these cases either the Court ofMazalim [Injustice] extends its authority to decide the case, as was the case historically; or higher courts formed by the legal representatives of all legal communities may be established. In my opinion, the best solution is to leave the injured party free to choose among legal systems; this is possible from the perspective of Islamic law.

The 23rd article of the Document makes the Prophet the absolute ruler of the Muslim social group. This is natural, since the Muslims have agreed to follow him from the beginning by giving allegiance to him. This is an attitude consistent with the basic Islamic assumption of not separating religious practice, belief and law from each other. The constitutive principle behind these decrees underlines the fact that Islam is a religion binding only on the Muslims.

Those who claim that the Islamic model is totalitarian are not sufficiently aware of this fact. If the people have the right to freely choose their religion, their laws and ways of living must of necessity be consistent with their beliefs and ideas. In this sense, Islamic religion and law binds Muslims; it does not include or bind others, nor does it expect others to behave according to this law. In factHazrat ‘Umar [second caliph, reigned 634–644] was not pleased to see a non-Muslim female slave covering her head, saying that covering the head is a decree relevant for those who accept Islam in its entirety.

On the other hand, the Document transcends all religious and social groups with its objective rulings. In other words, Muslims, Jews and Polytheists cannot break its general guidelines. In this sense, the Document, erected as a result of mutual agreement, stands above the Qur’an, the Torah and the established customs.

Articles 4 and 11 endorse the autonomy of the social groups. According to these, the tribes shall compensate for bloodshed, as was customary, and shall ransom war prisoners. They will settle their financial liabilities among themselves, where these will be determined through mutual agreements (Articles 3, 12, and 37). However, the guilty will not be protected by tribal ties of blood and kinship, as they were in the old system; when someone commits a crime, the individuals of the tribe will not be held responsible. Thus the crime and the punishment will become individualized (Articles 22 and 31B). This was a revolution by itself. In this new structure, where the guilty and the criminal are not protected—no matter which group they belong to—the consolidation ofjustice and safety is raised to the status of a common and collective responsibility; the parties—individuals within a bloc—being held responsible to each other (Articles 12, 13, 21). Following this, Article 12B concedes the possibility of individuals making contracts with mawla of other individuals, separately. As I understand it, this and other decrees take the right of granting visas away from the state and accord it directly to individuals and groups.

Other articles of the Document can be briefly summarized as follows: The concept of country and defended frontiers were introduced by Article 39, an innovation in those historical circumstances. The tribal structure based upon blood and kinship ties was thus transcended, as people gathered around a higher political association ordered in groups (or legal collectivities), and any kind of conflict and violation of law among families and tribes of Medina was prohibited. The term haram used in the Document means defended frontier, and refers to the territorial integrity of a political union. The term corresponding to this political union in the Document is umma (Articles 2, 25). In this sense umma is the political union consisting of Muslims, Jews and Polytheists. This union is a social project which does not discriminate on the basis of race, language, religion, sect and ethnic origins (Articles 1, 2, 16 and 25), since it is founded upon religious, cultural and legal autonomy.

In relationships among individuals and groups, universally transcendent ideals agreed by all and basic ethical principles rule (Article 47). Still, in order for these to operate, a written legal text regulating the entirety of social relationships is needed. Because of this, the Document presents itself as “book” (Articles 1, 47) or “sheet” (Articles 22, 39, 42, 46, etc.), two terms which connote a sense of obligation in the traditional culture of the day. The Qur’an, too, defines itself as “the book” and states that various books and sheets were revealed to past prophets.[349]

While the Document demands full obedience to the rule of law, binding everyone (Articles 37, 37B), the act of war has been removed from the realm of single individuals and tribes and has been passed to the central government (Articles 17, 18). War will be announced by a decision of the central government reached through consent. One of the most important reasons for war can be to form a front of solidarity against external attacks. In such a war of defense, the parties to the agreement undertake mutual financial and military responsibilities, fighting all together (Articles 15, 18, 19, 24). However, common responsibility does not exist in wars fought in the name of religion (Article 45). Accordingly, if Muslims happen to be warring with others—outside Medina—for religion, the Jews and the Polytheists of Medina do not have to join them. The battles of Badr and Uhud took place outside of Medina, because of this article.

Justice in social life, the organization of legal procedures and the judiciary will be taken care of by delegating these powers to the central authority and not to the judgments and initiatives of individuals (Article 13).

While the Document transfers power to the central authority (the state?) in judiciary, defense, and the proclamation of war—legislation, culture, science, arts, economy, education, health and other services are left to civil society. Through other reports from the Prophet, we know that the government is restricted to such areas as taxing, judiciary, and defense; whereas other areas remain with civil society.

Other conclusions can be drawn from the general decrees of the Document, yet this is not the proper place. The importance of the Document for us lies in the fact that it was written as a result of negotiations and deliberations among three different religious and social groups in year 622, and put into practice.

Personally, I believe that some constitutive principles can be reached by generalization and abstraction from the decrees of the Document, and that these principles can, in the last analysis, support a possible pluralist project. Islamic law, when considered apart from the Qur'an, the hadith, and the specific local-historical experience of Muslims, carries decrees that support and extend such a project. In our region [the Middle East], where the Arab-Israeli war of many years, the recent Azeri-Armenian war, the feuding religious communities in Lebanon, the ethnic predicament in the Balkans, the Kurdish problem, et cetera, exist, we need pluralist projects allowing the co-existence of all religious, ethnic and political groups based on partnership, choice, and participation.

 The Possible Project of Living Together

What is the best form of government? ... One of the miraculous works of the Prophet, the Medina Document, is a historical and concrete example [of how to answer this question]. The document concerned is not an artificial utopia or a theoretical political exercise. It has entered written history as a legal document employed systematically and concretely from 622 to 632.

The principles of this legal document establish the framework of political unity, and the meanings they bestow upon the concepts of politics and power are still important today.

Briefly defined, the Medina Document is the legal manuscript for political unity. The general framework of this document presents itself as a social project [for Islamic intellectuals today].

First of all, the document defines the parties entered into the contract (the Muslims, the Jews, and non-believers) as distinct “ummas” (Medina Document, Articles 2 and 25). Here, umma, as a technical term, corresponds to a political unit. If the term had meant the political unit of the Muslims in the traditional sense, the Jews and the non-believers in Article 25 would have been accepted as Muslims; and this is inconceivable....

When we look at the issue of power from the perspective of the Muslims—who are, like others, naturally sociable,[350] who have to live together and enter into political organization—the question under what conditions they become powerful becomes important. The answer to this question lies in the totality of meaning bestowed by Islam as a religion on life in general. And no doubt, for any Muslim the meaning of life is living according to God’s satisfaction and worshipping him. For a Muslim, there is no nobler and more legitimate meaning of life. Muslims learn how to live in accordance with God’s pleasure from the holy shari’a, promulgated and concretely shown to them by the Prophet. Shari’a is the manuscript of Divine Law, and the sum total of the principles and laws of living in accordance with the divine will.

For a Muslim, the desire to live according to the divine legal order of Islam never diminishes. On the contrary, as he enters more and more into the universe of knowledge of the religion to which he belongs, this desire increases. Besides this, the second big task of a Muslim is to promulgate to others the truths of the religion, which he accepts as the source of all Truth. A Muslim can never avoid or neglect this duty.... If a Muslim can fulfill this dual mission within the social organization he finds himself in, he is powerful.

The final objective of the difficult struggle that filled the lives of all prophets and the final Prophet Muhammad, peace be upon him, was to make possible the free milieu, the conducive social environment where this mission can realize itself. What Muslims understand offreedom is nothing but the eradication of the obstacles that prevent them from living their religion completely and promulgating it to others....

The fact that the Prophet migrated to the free environment of Medina and suggested to other religious-ethnic groups that they sign a contract based on these two demands is the first step showing that political power can be configured outside the central ideology. If a central ideology is not to be imposed on groups belonging to different religions and beliefs, if they are given the freedom to choose their religion and ideology, and if there is no interference with the lifestyles that correspond to their choice, then the concrete guarantee of this lies not in a singular, but in a pluralistic legal system.

In this respect, Islam gives preeminence to the principle that law cannot be separated from religion. According to this principle, if there is no official religion or ideology represented by the governing apparatus and imposed from the top down, then it would be contradictory for the same apparatus to impose an official and single legal system. As a natural extension, if there is no coercion in the choice of religion (Qur’an, Sura 2, Verse 256), then there should be no pressure and compulsion on the laws embraced by different religions, philosophical beliefs, or ideologies. A person who chooses this or that religion, chooses, at the same time, the legal system which is a manifestation of that particular religion. Leaving people free to choose their religion, yet creating obstacles in their choice of a legal system—and that is precisely what the modern [secular] state is doing—means interference with the essence of religion. Any interference with religion divides the personality of the believer and makes him culturally schizophrenic. Witness the widespread schizophrenia we see in every realm of life today....

As long as they do not enter into war with Muslims (Qur’an, Sura 60, Verses 8–9), those who belong to different religions and beliefs can lead their lives according to their own religious and legal systems.[351] Just like those non-believers who entered into a contract with the Prophet in Medina, those who do not want to be Muslims— they can be Jewish, Christian, secular, atheist and so on—choose their own religion, world view, ideology or some other thought system, and declare what kind of a legal system they foresee in accordance with their religion or secular system.

Within the framework of the Medina Document, those who choose a religion and a legal system and declare their choices compose a legal group, and these groups are accepted as parties to the establishment of political unity.

In this model we propose, political power is internalized by the contractors in terms of choice of religion and declaration of a legal system. Politics in this model is understood as a technique or art of governance that makes the organization of the parties possible....

In this respect, realms of activities such as legislation, culture, education, science, economy, health and the like, are left to the legal groups and the governing apparatus is limited to the executive. Since the executive branch undertakes common and indivisible services at the material, routine, and technical level, financial resources (taxes) and a certain amount of legislation will be necessary. Each of the parties, proportional to their financial means and population potential, will participate in the expenses. The legislative assemblies within the executive domain (village, town, province, region, nation) will consist of members elected by the legal groups.

Since the founding principles which establish the model of political unity are based on the free selection by the groups of their religion and legal systems, there will be no need for ghettos or religious and ethnic purification. As historical experience demonstrates to us [discussed in an earlier section], where there are no reasons for the organization of ghettos and for mass purifications, people show a great desire to live together.

The productive debate[352] that began when the Medina Document came onto the current agenda leads to a reconsideration of certain basic assumptions and concepts that appear to have enjoyed universal consensus. The Document has a potential richness which makes it conducive to bringing new dimensions to the concepts of politics, power, and state. In addition, one should add that the Document, which was implemented by the Prophet, peace be upon him, is not independent of the Qur’an and something outside of it. Rather, as part of the Prophet’s sunna [practices], it is a manifestation of the Qur’an and a practical model of the Qur’an’s lifegiving and redeeming principles.

If the totality of the relationships between pro-found contemporary problems and the founding principles of the legal document signed by distinct social groups 1400 years ago are read correctly, then we can conceive of the state as something beyond an apparatus controlling every aspect of life.

This blueprint of an alternative social project—which requires maturation through widespread and continual discussions—contributes to the solution of the problem by reducing the state to executive activity and limiting the executive to the provision of common and indivisible services. However, what opens the door to real pluralism is the fact that individuals and groups can define their own identities and choose their own religion and legal systems. Experience shows that unless the realms of economy, culture, science, education, art, health, communication and so on are taken away from the control of the centralized state and transferred to groups with different religions and identities, real pluralism cannot be envisioned. The precondition for such a revolutionary design is to bring the singular quality of law to an end and to leave this realm, among others, to the discretion of legal groups.

What material form government should take, based on the principles discussed above, is an issue that ought to be determined by the legal groups that are the founders of political unity. In this respect, the fact that this political organization is based on participation from the bottom up, rather than on singular sovereignty, distinguishes it from other forms of government.

Finally, one further reason why we emphasize the Medina Document is the necessity to transcend modernity itself. The Medina Document is the source of a blueprint that may be an alternative to a modern state that is becoming more totalitarian, overtly and covertly, through raw or sophisticated methods and means. Whoever deals with the “state” or “modernity” realizes immediately that one has to deal with both.

 20—The Downhill Path and Defense, Not Surrender

Rusmir Mahmutcehajic

Rusmir Mahmutcehajic (Yugoslavia-Bosnia, born 1948), a professor of electrical engineering, served in several cabinet posts in the first years of Bosnia-Herzegovina’s independence from Yugoslavia, 1991–1993. During this period, Bosnia’s Serb and Croat minorities—supported by the neighboring countries of Serbia (the dominant remaining segment of Yugoslavia) and Croatia—embarked on secessionist campaigns that involved the “ethnic cleansing” of Bosnian Muslims, who comprise almost 40 percent of the nation’s population, in areas under Serb and Croat control. The mass eviction, pillage, rape, and murder of Muslims drove the Bosnian government to adopt an increasingly strident Islamic identity. Mahmutcehajic and other Bosnian Muslims objected to this response as inconsistent with Bosnia’s destiny of “unity within diversity.”[353] As he explains in the second excerpt here, Mahmutcehajic protested by resigning from the cabinet in 1993 and has turned to the historical study of Islam in Bosnia, particularly its Sufi traditions. While Mahmutcehajic defends multicultural pluralism, he appears to identify “democracy” with its most virulent, xenophobic expressions, as exemplified for Mahmutcehajic by contemporary Serbia and Croatia.

 The Downward Path

* 1.

Speaking in 1924 about the book D’Orient et Occident [On East and West] by Rene Guenon [French author, 1886–1951], Leon Daudet [French author, 18671942] indicates, inter alia, the possibility of summarizing Guenon’s statement as follows:

<quote>

Since the time of Encyclopaedists [eighteenth century], and even earlier—since the Reformation [sixteenth century]—the West has been brought into a state of intellectual anarchy, which is true inhumanity. Civilization, on which the West prides itself so greatly, relies on a sum of material and industrial achievements which multiply the chances of war and invasion; these are built on a very fragile moral and intellectual base, and on no metaphysical base whatsoever. The West is in greater danger from within, through feeble-mindedness, than from the outside, where it has to be admitted that its situation is not totally safe either....

</quote>

Since Bosnia is “the West’s soft underbelly,” it inevitably suffers from the effects of this “intellectual anarchy,” this “multiplication of chances for war and invasion,” this “danger from within,” et cetera, in that it relies on solutions and solvers from outside that are alien to the true nature of Bosnia’s expression of unity in diversity.

In spite of Bosnia’s vast and indisputable inner power, Bosnian politics still has not found its path. Yet this path, which leads in the opposite direction to today’s long downhill slope, must exist. But how can it be found without the courage to face up to and fight one’s own weaknesses, which hold one back first from understanding and then from acting?

* 2.

Today, when the greater part of Bosnia is under military occupation and outside the control of the Bosnian authorities, we must return to the contradictory plans from which the conflicts and the anti-Bosnian on-slaught arose. Bosnia’s awareness of herself as a country has emerged from the long course of history, turning gradually to a memory and a prophecy of a state. When the Croat and Serb peoples tied their ethnic identities to plans for statehood, Bosnia became an arena for efforts to extend the Croat and Serb states. The response to these claims was an increased awareness of Bosnia’s statehood, which because of Bosnia’s personality, could not possibly be the same as the states being planned around it. Serbia launched a full- scale onslaught on Bosnia, intending to absorb Bosnia into its own state, and destroying everything that stood in its way. According to the Croat national plan, part of Bosnia was needed to round out the boundaries of the hypothesized Croatian nationstate. Thus Bosnia, as a single entity, found itself under attack by twin schemes for Greater States, which had taken to heart the world’s cynical deviation from transcendent principles. Bosnia’s unity in diversity is founded in religious tradition, and is thus seen as outdated. It is closer to the transcendent origins ofjustice, therefore it is seen as a potential threat to the Supreme God of Western civilization: global stability based on modern-day secularism.

* 3.

The shape of nationalist rule in Serbia and Croatia, the source of their anti-Bosnian claims, is only a reflection of the present shape of power in the modern world. Bosnia cannot oppose them if she remains a mere reflection of the governmental systems of her enemies. Bosnian statehood, which is at present fighting for its survival, is also grappling with the question of the foundations of its governmental system and the direction of its development. This indicates a need to re- examine the entire structure of power, in order to assess whether changes for the better or for the worse have taken place.

In the modern world, many would claim that only two forms of rule can be discerned—democracy and dictatorship. In order to determine how the Bosnian power structure reflects the opinion of the majority—starting from the principle that any people gets the government it deserves—we should first point to two essential features of the power hierarchy to which both democracy and dictatorship belong.

* 4.

Plato [Greek philosopher, circa 427–347 B.C.], in his Politea—which can be translated as “State” or “System of State”—poses the question: What is the ideal form of rule? Although many of his conclusions can be disputed in detail, they generally correspond to solutions which have arisen throughout history. For the purposes of this overview, it is important to determine the full distance between the ideal concept and the lowest reality to which it can degenerate. According to Plato, this goes from aristocracy (the rule of the best)—which for him is the ideal form of rule—through timocracy, oligarchy, and democracy to tyranny. To express Plato’s idea in modern political jargon, the terms used nowadays would be theocracy for aristocracy, and dictatorship or demagogy for tyranny; the remaining two forms of rule can be disregarded for the purposes of clarity. These forms of rule were in most cases oligarchic, expressed as various forms of rule by a monarch and his nobility or an elite. Such forms of rule could in principle be called autocracies, since they recognize transcendent principles, regardless of how far they may be violated in practice. They are, in any case, less principled than theocracy, which is a higher-order system of rule. Principled autocracy is constantly in danger of becoming a de facto unprincipled dictatorship. The next step in the process of degeneration from principled autocracy is democracy, in which, according to Plato, the dominant concepts are those of freedom and equality. Democracy, by its very nature, is a forerunner of dictatorship or demagogy. (Whether modern advocates of democracy like it or not, history since the Plato’s time has at least not proved him wrong.) Since the course of degeneration is not straight down a slippery slope, but oscillates around an underlying trend, apparent deviations from what Plato describes are possible, so that chaos may be interrupted by principled autocracy, which is always less evil than the dangers of demagogy.

* 5.

As for Bosnia and its neighbors, a somewhat primitive principled autocracy in communist Yugoslavia was followed by formal democracy—a transition phase before the establishing of unprincipled autocracies in Belgrade and Zagreb, whose course was one of obvious degeneration into dictatorship and demagogy. Their aim was to have the same degeneration, preferably at an even faster rate, take place in Bosnia, because this would enable them to draw a long-desired borderline between “Serbdom” and “Croatdom” in the shape of two nation-states, whose appearance would mean the disappearance of Bosnia. Preserving Bosnian rule within a democratic frame-work was therefore the best way of opposing the aggressive and hostile claims of her neighbors. Guiding the Bosnian people through a “narrow gate” [Qur’an, Sura 7, Verse 40; Bible, Gospel of Matthew, Chapter 7, Verses 13–14] with a “steep uphill path” to follow [Qur’an, Sura 90, Verses 11–12] should lead to a common weal manifested through transcendent principles-a fact that the best amongst us realize. This is how to safeguard the sources of power to oppose the destruction of Bosnia. It demands, however, discipline plus a thorough and hard-headed examination and restriction of low-level freedoms as conditions for the struggle against total destruction, which is exacerbated by the power of self-degeneration. As a condition for staying true to their original goals, Bosnia’s forces need to be able to recognize the various forms of rule, both at grass-roots and national level. The schemes of destruction launched against Bosnia tend nowadays to be labeled “fascist.” Thus a complex phenomenon manifested in a certain system of rule is simply given the external label of “utterly evil,” without recognizing or analyzing the essential features of what we call “fascist” or “nazi.” Such a recognition and analysis requires an insight into the position of each ruling system on a scale which determines its position vis- a-vis others, its direction of change, and its relative relationship to the modalities of political reality or its absolute relationship towards systems based on principles.

* 6.

The three most representative forms of fascist ideology—in Italy in the 1920s, in Germany at the beginning of the 1930s, and in Spain by their end—appeared in conditions of social upheaval and turmoil. Although they reflect distortions of individual consciousness and society which are to be found throughout the history of mankind, their links with the geopolitical concepts and the extraordinary technological and organizational possibilities of the modern world indicate the need for further study.

Bosnia is today in a state of social upheaval, and the turmoil that is now in its third year shows no sign of coming to an end. The tide of fascism in Serbia and amongst Serbs throughout the South Slav region has prompted the growth and build-up of fascism in neighboring countries, primarily in Croatia and among the Croats. Bosnia therefore found herself caught between, and finally in, the two fascist maelstroms. Both have tried, whether consciously or sub-consciously, to generate fascisms among the peoples they see as an obstacle to their imperialist goals. For fascism amongst Bosnian Muslims could never gain enough power to threaten Serb and Croat fascism. However, its existence is of great importance, since it justifies the crimes perpetrated by Serb and Croat fascists against Bosnian Muslims. The military and economic power at the disposal of the Serb and Croat fascists and their expectations of world support all favor the Greater Serb and Greater Croat grand plans. Bosnian Muslims, therefore, find themselves pushed from both sides, directly and indirectly, into nationalist exclusivity and a fascism of their own. Such a possibility reared its ugly head with the first signs of Greater Serb and Greater Croat designs for the destruction of Bosnia. Bosnian Muslims were offered, as a reward for giving up a united Bosnia and Herzegovina, a hypothetical “Muslim state,” an “Islamic jamahiriya” [republic], the “tutelage of certain distant countries,” and so on. At the same time, both in public and in secret, the very people who made these offers also made allegations against Bosnian Muslims to the members of the ruling elite, allegations about what they themselves had forced then Muslims into, by which means they hoped to justify their military attacks against Bosnia and Herzegovina. But the politics of the Bosnian Muslims successfully managed to outmaneuver the tactics of their enemies.

Since the ambitions of the Greater Serb and Greater Croat nationalists to break up Bosnia and Herzegovina as an integral state will never go away, the danger of a potential Bosnian Muslim (or simply “Muslim”) fascism will not disappear either. It is therefore of great political importance to be ever-vigilant in unmasking all forms of fascist consciousness amongst Bosnian Muslims and its manifestations in the political life of our country.

* 7.

The first characteristic of fascism is the adulation of the collective, usually personified as the state, at the expense of the individual. This leads one to despise and persecute all forms of liberalism, rationalism, democracy, promoting instead the sovereignty of an individual identified with one political party, one race and one state. Political decisions and discussions in such conditions take on a mystic tone, while destruction, persecution and murder become a framework which supports the Messianic role of the individual and those loyal to him. There is no collective decision-making and consequently public performances aim at promoting the illusion that this is precisely what the people wants and that it firmly supports the individual’s every act. The able are suppressed and withdraw, while the incapable and the power- hungry enter the political stage. Empty apologies for the leader take the place of discussion and advice, creating the illusion that the majority is on his side. This environment of chaos and social dramatics enable the ruler to turn the desperate expectations of the majority into a cheap source of assumed support. What is gained is simply support in the struggle against the “enemy of the people and the country,” who tends to be anyone disloyal to the leader. In such an atmosphere, a utopian vision of a new world order replaces the active management of state and society. Those in his entourage counter any justifiable criticism of the political actions of the “leader,” assuming they accept the evidence, with the words: “Everything considered, he simply has no alternative.”

Today there are many who, betraying their unconscious support of a nascent Bosnian Muslim fascism, speak of a “political reality” in which a united Bosnia and Herzegovina is an impossibility. As an alternative they offer—to be frank, without the necessary courage and determination—a “Muslim state.” Thus they indirectly conceal the obviously less-than-perfect abilities of our leaders to defend the state they have been entrusted with. For with their appeal to Realpolitik they aim to spread the falsehood that the present situation is our inescapable destiny, and that salvaging what we can from it is our best option....

 Defense, Not Surrender: An Interview

The book Living Bosnia was published after my decision to withdraw from all areas of the governmental activities. I believe that all I do can only be explained by my allegiance to Bosnia and my implacable hostility to its destroyers. These thugs and criminals fabricated a cunning scheme to raze Bosnia to the ground. Part of this plan was to inveigle forces within Bosnia into believing that Bosnia is not an organic unity, but a mechanistic assembly of several components; and once certain organic elements of Bosnia’s unity have accepted that they are just parts in some mechanism, it will not be difficult to set them against each other in such a way that they are forced to split up into separate but dead components. Bosnian Muslims are the focus of this plan. According to this evil scheme, they must be prompted to withdraw to their own “ethno-religious space,” thus providing their own evidence for the impossibility of Bosnia. In this they must be made to believe that in accepting the lie about the impossibility of Bosnia, they are not accepting the impossibility of their own existence. Yet it is obvious that in so doing they are working directly against themselves and their own existence. The pressures from outside and the plots from within are aimed at inciting the break-up or dissolution of Bosnia—which the warriors of the anti-Bosnian onslaught see as their ideal. This dangerous trick is intended to incite Bosnian Muslims into forgetting about her Serbs or Croats, and anything that does not transparently belong to their religion, people or politics. Their hopes are to be focused on imaginary rescuers from outside, intervention from heaven, the mercy and charity of the world’s mighty, and so on. Their determination to organize for the purposes of their own defense should be constantly weakened, and what is closest to them should be made the most distant; they should be fed false hopes and prevented from looking ahead and being concerned about their future. Wherever our enemies have put their plan into action, they have done an effective job of destroying Bosnia and her Muslims. Our answer to their plan should be to reverse the sequence: first our own duty, then that of the world; first think of the traitors and the criminals in our midst, and only then of the enemy without; first organize ourselves, and only then disorganize our enemies; first use up our own resources and only then beg for alms, and so on. This is how, from the very outset, I saw the enemy's strategy of destroying Bosnia and our response to it. As early as 1990 I pointed this out in my political writings, trying to explain this evil deception. However, it is obvious that there are some today whose lack of insight into the course of history and inability to see ahead have led them to side with our enemy's trickery, thus allying themselves with the campaign against Bosnia and the Bosnians. The scope of enemy operations does not end at the front line where they do battle with our soldiers. Enemy action is not only spent on destroying everything in our territories that their jackboots have marched over. The enemy is not satisfied with raining lethal missiles at a distance down on our cities. His intention is to affect and undermine, by means of well-planned and shrewdly-organized actions, our politics and opinions as a whole, in order to assist him in achieving his final goal—the destruction of Bosnia and her Muslims. You must be familiar, I expect, with how often my views have been falsified and misinterpreted. The sheer amount of lies about myself and my words has confused even my friends. In the attitude of our enemies to what I have said or written, I have seen a confirmation of their fears lest their plans be revealed. This made me happy, not worried. But I am unhappy and worried at all the distorted views and inability to see deception which are expressed amongst us. In order to point out these deceptions even more directly, some of my friends suggested publishing a selection of my texts and interviews that came into existence before I decided to withdraw from national politics. And so that's why Oslobodenje's Ljubljana office published my book Living Bosnia: Political Essays & Interviews.[354] ...

Bosnia nowadays is still seen by neighboring states only as a space for them to expand into. But then they come up against strong resistance from Bosnia's unity in diversity. The external anti-Bosnian forces need to destroy this unity, in order to use the rubble of Bosnia as material for the building of new states unlike any that have ever existed in this region. These plans are neither feeble-minded or simplistic. They are skillfully thought through. They are often backed by powerful high priests of evil, chosen by nationalist politics as the “most prestigious and leading intellectuals of our race.” After four years of war and the two or three years preceding it, it is quite possible to reconstruct the key elements of the secret plans for the destruction of Bosnia. They almost certainly have the following features: firstly, their starting point is the fact that three separate elements exist in Bosnia: Muslim, Croat and Serb; the future of the latter two should be joined to Croatia and Serbia, while the Muslim element should be depicted as something dangerous, whose nature makes it unfit to be part of European civilization. These plans mean that Bosnian Muslims have to be depicted as carriers of noxious ambitions and ideologies, thus setting them against the whole of Western sensibilities and politics. But portraying them in this light is not enough to guarantee their destruction. Pseudo-Islamic fanaticism, displays of rhetoric, exclusivity under the veil of religion, and so on, should also be fomented amongst them. This will be perceived as a peril threatening both Bosnia’s Croats and Bosnia’s Serbs with humiliation and destruction. This will inevitably result in the “legitimate right of the Bosnian Croats and Bosnian Serbs to ask for assistance and support from Croatia and Serbia, who have both the right and the moral obligation to lend such assistance.” The enemy plan as described above aims to reduce the totality of Bosnia and Herzegovina’s culture, history and statehood to that of her Muslims; and the more convincingly her Muslims can be portrayed as “Islamic radicals”—a label for pseudo-Islam, instigated and cherished by Islam’s enemies—the easier her enemy’s final goal will be to attain. This is the strategy by which the enemies of Bosnia aim to destroy all the bridges between Bosnia’s individual elements and rip out the threads that bind them into a unity. When the bridges and the threads within Bosnia’s unity grow few and far between and the break-up of Bosnia is clear for all to see, then the question of global stability will be raised in world politics. All in all, Serbia and Croatia seem to play a much more significant role in the protection of global stability than the survival of Bosnian Muslims and the Bosnia-Herzegovinian state. The Bosnian Muslims as a political concept, are, according to the plotters of Bosnia’s destruction, a potential threat to global stability; their allegiance to Islam (or rather pseudo-Islam) should, their enemies claim, justify their eventual destruction for the sake of world stability....

So why did I decide to withdraw from the Government? When I did not manage to convince the people I was working with on strengthening and defending the Bosnian political process about what I saw as essential, it was only logical for me to withdraw from that process. I felt it was my moral obligation to express my disagreement and refuse to participate further in such a political set-up. Power is perhaps the worst vice of all. All who aspire to it speak about goodness, justice and beauty, and so on as goals, with power only an indispensable means to these ends. When they get this power, many of them completely forget the goals which justified their ambitions. Power itself becomes their supreme good. They worship it as if it were a god. All those who do not praise and support them are their opponents and enemies. Their obsession with power clouds their reason. When I no longer had a contribution to make through my belief in a tree Bosnia as unity in diversity, I refused to participate in the structure of power just for the sake of power. And I thank God for having being able to resist power as a vice and having stayed faithful to my beliefs.

* Part V—Freedom of Thought

 21—Humanity and Islam

‘Ali Shari’ati

<quote>

‘Ali Shari’ati (Iran, 1933–1977) may be one of the most popular figures in Iran today. During the Iranian Revolution of 1979, his photograph and his writings appeared throughout the country, and the subsequent cold shoulder he received from the clerical leaders of the Islamic Republic of Iran may have served to improve his reputation. Shari’ati was born and raised in northeastern Iran, the son of a religious scholar but educated in secular schools, including the Sorbonne, where he received his doctorate. Upon his return to Iran, Shari’ati launched a career as a lecturer—first at the University of Mashhad, then at the Hosseiniyeh Ershad in Tehran, a religious educational institution, where he built a large following, especially among university students, for his critique of oppressive political and religious establishments. After being tolerated by the Pahlavi regime for several years, he was imprisoned in 1973, and the Hosseiniyeh was shut down. Soon after his release from prison, he died in London. The following lecture from around 1969 defends the concept of free will in Islam.[355]

</quote>

Ladies and Gentlemen: Today I want to talk about humankind.[356] At present, humankind is more enigmatic and more unknown than any other period. And ever since the end of the 19th century, scientists, writers, and thinkers have each evaluated humankind in various ways. Yes, humankind's position today is shakier than any other period in history.

My basic thesis is that today's humankind is generally incarcerated within several prisons, and naturally it becomes a true human being only if it can liberate itself from these deterministic conditions. What are these determinisms and how can humankind free itself from their grip? Before I can answer these inquiries, I must define humankind.

A friend of mine who was doing some research on the Qur'an, once stated that there are two words for humankind in the Qur'an: bashar and insan. For instance, sometimes the Qur'an states, "I am a bashar like you" (Sura 18, Verse 110) and at other times it states, "Insan was created impatient." (Sura 17, Verse 11) Thus, by using bashar, the Qur'an is talking about the two-footed creature that emerged at the end of the evolutionary chain of which there are two billion on earth now. On the other hand, insan is that unusual and enigmatic being that has a special definition that does not apply to any other phenomena in nature. So, there are two kinds of humans; one who is the subject-matter of poets, philosophers, and religion, and another that is the subject-matter of biology. Further, the first kind, bashar, is that particular being that contains physiological, biological, and psychological characteristics which are shared by all humans, regardless of whether they are black, white, yellow, Western, religious or non-religious; it is based upon physical laws that medicine, physiology, psychology, and so forth have discovered. Meanwhile, humankind in its second connotation consists of the truth of being insan, possessing exceptional characteristics which cause each member of the human race to attain certain degrees of insaniyat [humanness, humanity]. Accordingly, we are all bashar but not necessarily insan. Thus, from among all humans, everyone is as much bashar as the rest, but there are some who have attained insaniyat, and there are others who are in the process of becoming an insan; either little or to an exalting degree.

Bashar is a “being” while insan is a “becoming.” Insan differs from bashar and all other natural phenomena such as animals, trees, et cetera, because it is a “becoming.” Take, for instance, the termites. If we inspect their buildings in Africa, we notice that ever since a million years ago they have been building the same thing over and over again. Thus, a termite is (exists), no matter how many more years it is going to live on earth; it will always have an immutable definition. The same is true of other creatures, including bashar. A science fiction writer has written about this type of human in the account of a scientist from earth who went to Mars:

<quote>

While walking on the streets of Mars, the scientist found out that there was a conference in one of the universities about a Martian scientist who had traveled to earth. He attended the conference. The Martian scientist went behind the lectern and said: “The theory about life on earth was confirmed. The latest findings show that there is life, one of which is called bashar. Of course, I cannot exactly define what bashar looks like since you don’t have the slightest inkling of it in your heads. In short, it looks like a kheek [sheepskin bag] that contains two holes and four little [feet] and hands. They crawl hither and thither on earth with such an amazingly wild struggle unseen anywhere in the firmament. Bashars have a lust for killing one another. Sometimes large groups of them (who are unrelated to the other parts of the earth) get armed with modern weaponry, leave their houses and jobs and attack one another. At first, I thought all was done for obtaining food, but later I noticed they just killed one another and left. Bashar has a history of self-mortification and suicide. And all its energy goes towards killing one another without reason. They don’t need each other’s flesh and blood since their staples come from other sources. After massacring one another they leave with pride and invent epics. For collecting food they use their little hands. They do not eat all their aromatic and delicious fruits, they take them home and set them on fire and boil them and consequently they become sick and plead doctors to pull them out of their stomachs. This is why doctors are very rich and respectable on earth. While bashar has dominated the earth, they have lunacies unseen in any other animal!”

</quote>

Although it is embarrassing, this is an accurate description of what we mean by bashar. When we study human history—I mean the history of human stupidities—it is longer and consistently more interesting than the history of his understandings. This bashar is a monkey that has not evolved since time immemorial. Its weapons, clothing, and food all have changed but its characteristics are very much the same. There is no difference between Genghis Khan [Mongol monarch, 1162–1227] ruling over the wild tribes, the great emperors ruling over the great civilized societies, and those individuals who are at the present reigning over the great civilized civilizations. Of course, the only difference is that Genghis was honestly saying that he had come to kill, while today’s civilized leaders assert that they want to make peace. And so, it is the mode of talking and explanation which has evolved; otherwise, lying, disparity, murder, and looting have intensified. This is bashar.

But humankind in its essence, as an exalted truth, consists of ideal and sublime qualities that we must strive to attain. Namely, they are the types of characteristics that do not exist in bashar ... and the aim of humanity is to become insan. Mind you that becoming insan is not a stationary event, rather, it is a perpetual process of becoming and an everlasting evolution towards infinity.

The Qur’anic verse “To God we belong, and to Him we return” (Sura 2, Verse 156)[357] is a philosophy of anthropology. Unlike Sufism, which claims that man reaches God and imagines Him to be stationary, the word “ilaihi” [in this verse] means “towards Him” rather than “in Him.” For instance, [Abu’l-Mughith] Hallaj [Persian mystic executed for heresy, 857–922] claimed that he reached God, and he implied that God was a fixed point. God is infinite, everlasting, and absolute. Thus humankind’s journey towards Him is perpetual and eternal; there is no pause. This is the connotation of becoming an insan.

Insan has three characteristics: (a) self-consciousness, (b) the ability to make choices; and, (c) the ability to create. All of humankind’s other characteristics derive from these three. We are, therefore, insan relative to the degree of our self-consciousness and our creativities. Accordingly, when the characteristics of an ideal insan is clarified, we must try to identify the factors that hinder humankind in its becoming, and by removing them we can pursue our inherent and instinctive movement in the process of becoming an insan.

[Rene] Descartes [French philosopher, 1596–1650] once said, “I think, therefore I am.” He doubted everything but his own existence. And he built his whole philosophical work upon this doubt. A second statement was made by [Andre] Gide [French intellectual, 1869–1951], “I feel, therefore I am,” and a third by [Albert] Camus [French intellectual, 1913–1960], “I revolt, therefore I am.” All these assertions are correct, but the most exalting becoming, peculiar to humankind, is referred to by Camus.

So long as Adam was in Heaven and had not sinned he was not an insan, he was an angel. In Heaven, he was just a consumer. Once he ate the fruit of wisdom, vision, and rebellion, he was kicked out. He descended to earth to struggle in order to shoulder his own life, just like parents who kick their child out; this is an indication that children have to accept responsibility for their own life. This is on a par with [Jean-Paul] Sartre’s [French philosopher, 1905–1980] “ delaissement,” which means “left on its own.” In other words, humans, unlike animals—which are guided by their instincts and do not choose their own lives—have to bear responsibility for their own life. This is insan, who has attained consciousness by revolting against Heaven, and even God. This is a new creation in the universe, capable of attaining salvation by obeying God and praying to Him through choice. And so, the praying of an unaware individual who can’t revolt, just like an animal, is useless. What is expected, then, is the obedience of someone who has sinned. And insan is the only creature in nature who can choose (and disobedience is indicative of the ability to choose). This is what Camus meant by revolt; either against a social order or against one's own nature; while Descartes' "I think, therefore I am" and Gide's "I feel, therefore I am" confirm the "is-ness" of humankind rather than its "becoming." To summarize what I have said so far:

1. Insan is a conscious creature, that is, the only creature in all of nature who has attained self-consciousness, which I define as "perceiving one's quality and nature, perceiving the quality and the nature of the universe, and perceiving one's relationship with the universe." We are insan to the extent that we are conscious of these three principles.

1. Humankind is a chooser, that is, the only being who is not only capable of revolting against nature and the order which is ruling over it, but can revolt against its own natural, physical, and psychological needs. Humans can choose things which have neither been imposed on them by nature, nor is their body fit to choose them. This is the most sublime aspect of insaniyat. Accomplishing such tasks is peculiar to God alone. Animals are mere machines whose instincts push them to all directions. For instance, exactly once a year the sexual urges in a sheep emerge; this is a compulsion and the animal has no choice. Once the appetite is gone the animal forgets its love. This is a deterministic characteristic in a sheep.

It is only humans who can revolt, contrary to the demands of their nature. Despite their selfishness, they can commit suicide, and despite their natural instincts which call on them to protect their life and body, they sacrifice themselves for others. Or, despite all the natural characteristics which call them to a comfortable life, they can revolt, sin, or resort to asceticism and piousness. These are indications that humankind is the only being who can choose.

1. Humans are creatures who create; from the smallest to the largest thing is the manifestation of God's power in their nature. Unlike some who define the human as an animal who makes tools, it is only humans who can make things that go beyond tools.

Humans' creativity emerges when their needs evolve to the point that what their wants are does not exist in nature. This is indicative of the fact that humankind was created. So long as humans are contented with what nature offers them, they are a natural animal pursuing what nature provides them. If, however, they reach a point when nature alone cannot satisfy them, their needs and feelings evolve beyond the totality of nature's powers, creativities, and possibilities. This is the point at which, as [Martin] Heidegger [German philosopher, 1889–1976] stated, "humankind feels lonesome" because it feels that it does not belong here, and realizes that its genius is different than its materialistic nature and that humans are different from other animals. They feel that they are attracted towards ideals which do not exist in nature. Thus they want to fly, but nature did not give them wings; they begin to build a ship, plane, satellite, or space- ship.

Technology is the totality of humankind's creativity by which it tries to harness the forces of nature which are not within its easy reach. For instance, although oil is in the ground, humans cannot extract it with the possibilities that nature has provided for them. Thus, the petroleum industry offers new possibilities which nature withheld from them.

Humankind's second creation is of a different kind; it is the artistic creation which is one of the Divine's manifestations of humankind's soul, and the definition of humankind as a "tool-making animal" falls apart here. Art, just like technology, is the manifestation of humankind's creative aptitude in nature. Technology is the creation of humankind so that it can reach the things that already exist in nature, while art is the creativity of humankind so that it can have the things that it needs, but that do not exist in nature; it is an extra-natural activity. So, constructiveness and ingenuity are two of humankind's characteristics which are the third dimension of the human soul.

In short, humans are a three-dimensional being with three aptitudes; they are conscious of themselves and the world, they can choose, and they can create. All these attributes belong to the Lord and human-kind is in the likeness of Him. Since I do not want to create a partner for God, by “likeness” I mean humans are creatures who are capable, unlike nature, of utilizing and nourishing God’s sublime attributes in themselves and of continuing to evolve. The famous saying of the Prophet Muhammad—“Adapt your character to that of God”—tells us that we must assimilate the Lord’s attributes. That is, insan—not bashar—becomes God’s vicegerent on earth; the latter is the vicegerent of monkeys as well as the extension of their evolution. It is only insan who can revolt, choose, gain consciousness, and create in a relative way (God creates in the absolute sense).

At the present, these “choosers” are incarcerated within several determinisms—prisons—that prevent them from gaining self-consciousness, making choices, and creating. Unfortunately the grandest tragedy facing humans today is that, to the extent that various ideologies do away with their needs and bestow relative selfconsciousness upon them and give power and evolution to their societies, to the same extent they leave the “self out and send humans to oblivion. How can such ideologies forget humankind? Some of these ideologies are as follows:

Materialism. Materialism recognizes humankind to be composed of material essence. With this definition it imprisons humans within the evolutionary frame limited to being matter. If this is the case, it is impossible for them to evolve beyond the capacity of the matter’s dimensions itself.

Naturalism. This is another victimizer of humankind which burgeoned from the 18th century to the beginning of the 19th century. Naturalism believes that originality belongs to a living being, though without consciousness, which is called nature, and humankind is one of its products. Thus, I am free, I can choose, and I can feel because of nature’s will. As we can see, humans’ freedom is once again limited to the possibilities which nature has bestowed upon their disposition and aptitude....

Existentialism. Although the existentialism of Sartre, Heidegger, and [S0ren] Kierkegaard [Danish philosopher, 1813–1855] is non-theistic, it believes that humankind's makeup is different and contrary to all other creatures in nature; this is especially true of Sartre's. But it is surprising since Sartre does not believe in God and metaphysics, yet he separates humankind from all other creatures in nature. He believes that animals' total essence appeared first but humankind's essence emerged later. Why does he say this? "Because," he states, "when we remove God, we have to fit humankind into material nature," and consequently we sacrifice it. Therefore, in order not to sacrifice humankind, Sartre resorts to this line of reasoning: "In animals essence precedes existence, while in humans existence precedes essence." For instance, if I ask a carpenter, "What are you making?" he would respond, "A chair." "What is a chair?" I ask. He continues, "A chair has four legs, a seat," and so on. Such descriptions are the essence of the chair, although it is not in existence yet.

However, according to Sartre, humankind is unlike a chair. Its existence emerged first. But what is it now? Nothing! We do not know yet! Humankind's "how-ness and who-ness" will emerge later; they depend upon human will. Thus, according to existentialism humans shape their own essence any way they wish. This is why Sartre believes that if we strip humans of their volition and choice they will no longer remain insan. Sartre is scared, and justly so, since, if we take materialism and naturalism as foundations, as we do today, we incarcerate humankind in petrified molds.

Pantheism. Despite the fact that Pantheism is a theistic idealism, it, too, sacrifices humankind. Pantheism (providential determinism) exists among some Muslim sects, Indians, Sufis, and Catholics. For instance, Catholics believe that God determined humans' fate before they came to this world. Here again, humankind is sacrificed by predestination. As Hafiz [Persian poet, circa 1325–1390] said:

<quote>

Since the destiny was determined without our presence,

Don’t carp if it is a bit disagreeable.

</quote>

That is, when we were being created, no one asked our opinion; God made us the way He pleased. And later He let us loose on earth. Another poet parodied Hafiz, “Don’t find fault if all of it displeases thee!” This is determinism; what can we do? Even objecting is considered wrong! It is like Camus’s objection. They asked him:

<quote>

QUESTION: Who are you protesting against?

CAMUS: God.

QUESTION: Do you believe in God?

CAMUS: No!

QUESTION: ... Then who are you protesting against? You do not seem to believe in any responsible force in the universe, yet you are protesting.

CAMUS: Yes, I am protesting. I am protesting against no one, yet I am protesting![358]

</quote>

This is like throwing punches in the air. When God’s will does not take human choice and will into account, then humankind is not responsible. And when humans have no responsibility, they are not insan.

Historicism. This school believes that humankind is the product of history. The Iranian, Islamic, and Shi’ite histories have molded my personality. “If I were living during the French revolution, instead of my actual position in history, I would have had a different language, sentiment, and characteristics.” So, human characteristics fall in the hands of a will that is called Historicism. How do I make a choice then? Any way history wishes for me. Accordingly, if I am a Muslim and I speak Persian, it is due to the will of history; that is, by the same token that nature chooses the color of our skin, history chooses the color of our soul.

Sociologism. This school believes that social environment and social order are the shapers of humankind. If I am generous it is due to my feudalistic order, and if I am brave it is due to the tribal environment under which I was reared. Further, it is believed that the social order, composed of social relations, productive order, ownership order, the tools of production, and the bureaucracy of the ruler—which all make up my society—are all factors that shape my personality any way they want.

There is no “individual” or a “chooser” in sociologism; so, there is no insan, since the latter is capable of saying, “I,” or, “I chose this for such and thus reasons....”

Biologism. This school tries to elevate humankind a little from its petrified and materialistic frame. This is an indication that 20th-century scientists can no longer understand and explain humankind through their dry and narrow materialistic definitions of the 17th, 18th, and the 19th centuries. Biologism consists of the originality of the totality of the physiological characteristics that, in a complex and developed amalgam, make up the human.

Although biologism looks at humankind as more exalted than a common natural or material phenomenon, it still negates humans as conscious and free beings. When I am a victim of my own unconscious and biological forces, then I am no longer an “I.” For instance, biology believes fat people are kind, or thin people are intelligent. Thus it appears that intelligence is related to body weight and kindness is related to biological makeup and so on.[359]

I am not negating naturalism, sociologism, or historicism; I accept them all, but I believe that humans are capable of choice. This being—humankind—throughout its evolutionary process is a natural, historical, and material phenomenon; it is shaped by its environment. When people live, for instance, in a tribe, it is not because they chose this mode of living (no one has). The fact that these individuals live in a tent, migrating from place to place, is due to a particular social and productive order which made them tent-dwellers. Or, the natural order forces some people to hunt, fish, and live in jungles. When villagers become city-dwellers their traditions, morality, and morale also change, and such changes are not due to their choice, rather they are due to the prevailing productive system which required a change of characteristics in them. In short, humankind is what nature, history, and society make of it, and if we change the environment humankind will also change....

What I am saying is that humans, throughout their evolutionary processes—their transformation from bashar to insan—liberates themselves from such determinism. For instance, the originality of geography was so popular in the 19th century that one of its harbingers, Ibn Khaldun [Tunisian historian, 1332–1406], proposed that the form of societies changed relative to their geographic conditions. Of course, he was right then, but it is not so today. Today, to the extent that humans evolve, to that extent they can free themselves from such determinism.

Well, how can humans ... free themselves from naturalism? This is easier to understand because in this century we are just beginning to free ourselves from naturalism.[360] Today, industry and the new civilization are freeing humans from naturalism more than any other time in the past. People who live in the African Sahara are capable—despite the natural conditions imposed upon them—of creating modern living conditions on par with North Americans' for themselves. Or take the earth's gravity, which is another determinism. Gravity was so natural to us that we thought it was part of our bodies. But today we are no longer a slave to gravity. In addition, we are no longer bound to the style of climatic (regional) agriculture. In the past, humans had to live where there was river, jungle, water, and so forth, otherwise they would die. Today, however they can live in a desert and build themselves a great civilization. How do humans free themselves from determinism? By becoming familiar with nature's determinism and the laws which rule over nature and their effects upon themselves. The way to study these is science. Familiarity with nature or science has made it possible for humans to create technology which has one aim; to save humans from nature's determinism. Those who attack technology as an agent which has metamorphosed and sacrificed humankind have a point. But the same technology can also save humankind. In the past, in order to have food and clothing, humans had to work 10–12 hours a day. This was a natural determinism. However, technology stepped up the rate of production and consequently working hours were reduced. Today, if we are witnessing individuals who are working longer hours than the pre-technological period, it is because the bourgeoisie keeps creating more consumption and consequently production must be stepped up.

How can we save ourselves from the prison of history? If humans can (with the aid of science) discover the laws and the variables that reign over history, and if we can find out how such variables affect our thinking processes, our wills, our sentiments and our morals, we can certainly save ourselves from historical determinism. At the present there are societies in Asia, Africa, and Latin America that have covered several historical cycles in one leap without having had to go through each separate stage. Historically, societies must pass through certain stages. But to the extent that such societies find historical self-consciousness and their free-thinkers become familiar with their particular historical epoch and its makeup, to that extent these societies can skip several cycles. We are now witnessing societies which were tentdwellers or slaves, but suddenly, by revolting against history, they leaped to the bourgeois stage. This is the process of getting rid of society by knowing the determinism of history, movement of history, and the discovery of the deterministic laws of history.

With regards to sociological determinism we know that in the past individuals grew relative to their societal demands. However, today, to the extent that sociology grows and discovers social and class relations and understands political philosophy and governance and becomes socially aware, to that extent, as [Karl] Jaspers [German philosopher, 1883–1969] states, “Men who are shaped by their societies become the builders of societies.” In the past, a tent-dwelling and a feudal community or a backward village did not have the slightest doubt about its religions, traditions, or governments. These were held to be as sacred, immutable, and selfevident as the sun. It never entered the minds of these people that it was possible to live differently, or that they could revolt against their own beliefs. But today’s humans can consciously choose as well as reject their religion.

Religion is one of those factors that society either offers or imposes upon its members. But today it is different. The productive, economic, and ownership orders as well as traditions, social and class relations, rights and family privileges, and social groups, relative to today’s self-conscious humans, are all unlike the past, when they were held to be immutable, everlasting, sacred, and Heavenly facts. Rather, they are phenomena which humans can think about, change, reform, choose, and negate. All these revolutions, changes, and reforms bear witness to the fact that today’s humans have freed themselves from the prison of society. Humans accomplished this task by studying sociology and comparative studies of different social orders. Science can help them to completely free themselves.

 One’s Self

The last prison, one’s self, is the worst of all, since it is the one that has rendered humankind the most helpless prisoner. It is surprising that now, more than any other time in history, although humans have been able to save themselves from the aforementioned prisons, they are more helpless than ever in the face of this last prison. And it is the existence of this prison which has rendered the others vain and futile. Why have today’s humans, who have freed themselves from the prison of nature, history and society, reached this absurdity? Today’s humans, though they are more knowledgeable and capable than any other time in history, know less than ever what to do. Why can’t humans leave their cell? It is too hard. In the past, the aforementioned prisons placed four walls around my existence and I was aware of my own incarceration. For instance, when humans were primitive, they were aware of the existence of a river or a jungle next to them; they had to become a fisherman or a hunter. They felt the presence of such determinism in the past, but with respect to this last one there is no wall around human existence. It is a prison that I carry within myself. This is why becoming self-conscious and familiar with this prison is the hardest task of all. Here, the prison and the prisoner are the same; that is, the disease and the patient have merged together. This is why getting rid of the malaise is so arduous!

Another problem is that humans can break out of the prison of history, nature, or an existing social order with the help of science. But, unfortunately, they cannot extricate themselves from the prison of the self by seeking help from science, since the latter is the possession of the prisoner. This is why the “self does not feel that it has buried a free “I” in it. Rather, the self feels that, as an absolute being, it must free itself from the prison of nature, society, and history; it can free itself but it reaches futility. At this point I would like to present general principles: (a) at first, all humans have needs; (b) they fulfill their needs and embrace comfort; (c) comfort terminates in futility; (d) futility ends up in rebellion; and (e) rebellion ends up in ascetism and subjectivity. These principles have been true ever since Adam. Today’s hippie-ism, existentialism, our past aristocracy which ended up in Sufism, the Indochinese aristocracy which terminated in Sufism and nirvana (negating the material life), and the new bourgeoisie which has ended up in negating the material life, confirm the veracity of my generalizations.

Humans value their material ideals so long as they have not accomplished them. Once they have them, they reach futility. Thus human ideals must be so lofty that they cannot reach a dead end; if they do they will end in futility. And it is obvious that prisoners of their own determinism—even if they conquer nature—will still be “armed but helpless.” Jean Izoulet [French author, 1854–1929] states that, “A writer wrote about a prince who wallowed in gold and riches, yet suffered from an incurable inner sickness. The France of today is like this prince.” But I believe that it is today’s humankind that is like that prince; it is more helpless than ever.

In the middle of the large Rotterdam square in Holland there is an interesting statue whose parts are all displaced. For instance, its neck has slipped a bit to one side, its arms have popped out of their joints, and so on. The whole thing is distorted in such a way that viewers think it is about to collapse. But the statue is made of stone. The sculptor wanted to personify post-World War II humankind, the humans of our age who have become as strong as rock, but more than ever in danger of being annihilated. Why? Because freedom from the earlier prisons have left him with a great deal of unprecedented power, so much that they are able to bombard Mars and guide an intricate machine into outer space, yet so weak that if you add an extra $12.00 to their salary they will work for you against their boss!

Once I heard that slavery is still popular in some parts of Africa; people capture the primitive tribes and sell them somewhere else. But I have seen slavery with my own eyes in the West. At Cambridge and the Sorbonne the best human brains are being auctioned off. The entrepreneurs from America, Europe, Russia, and elsewhere all come to buy the talented students. They all offer attractive prices, a car, a chauffeur, and whatnot. Finally, students choose the best offer. Why? Because they are slaves. The company wants these students to save society from the prison of nature or history while they themselves are helpless beings and slaves of their own selves. The difficulty is that, since this last prison is part of humankind’s own dimensions, it cannot rebel against itself.

As you see, it is not possible to get out of this last prison with the aid of science. How is it possible then? With love. What is love? I don’t mean Sufi and theosophic love and whatnot, which are different kinds of prisons. By love I mean an Almighty force (beyond my rational and discretionary faculties) in the very depth of my being that can blow me apart and help me to rebel against my self. Since the prison is inside me, my insides must be set aflame. How? Why fire? Why can’t I liberate myself from this prison by utilizing my rational faculties? [Vilfredo] Pareto [Italian philosopher and social scientist, 1848–1923] believes that problems can be divided into three categories: (1) logical acts like living, receiving a salary, putting clothes on, thinking, studying, and whatnot; (2) illogical acts carried out by crazies and screwballs; and (3) alogical acts that belong to neither of the two former categories. Logic consists of discovering causalities so that I can employ them in my needs. But sometimes humans destroy all their worldly belongings and ambitions for something more exalting. For instance, they may set themselves on fire (without anything in return) so that their society can be saved.[361] This is not a logical act. The roots of such act go to morality. Love consists of a power which invites me to go against my profits and well-being and sacrifice myself for others and the ideals that I hold so dear.

If I don’t lie to you, it is because I don’t want you to lie to me in the bazaar. Or, I don’t write bad checks because I want to establish good credit. These are called discretionary virtues, business based upon rationality and logic. On the other hand, when I tell a truth that I know will cost my life or belongings, my “ insaniyat” will emerge and my “I” will stand tall. Which insan ? The one (that was buried in the dungeon of my own self a while ago) and is now walking towards becoming an insan under the sun of faith and love.

[Friedrich] Nietzsche [1844–1900] was a great philosopher and genius.... But in his youth he was an arrogant man who said, “Force is genuine, truth belongs to the powerful,” and so on. However, in his old age he changed to a kind humanist, so much so that he did a strange thing. The same man who believed that helping others was a sign of weakness and weak men should be forgotten,[362] one day, while he was passing through the streets he saw an overturned cart. The loaded cart had fallen on the horse and the cart driver was trying to get the horse up on its feet by flogging the animal ruthlessly. The horse would jump periodically under the heavy lashes but would again collapse under the burden with a broken leg. Nietzsche was angered and asked the cart driver not to beat the horse. He advised the man that he should empty the cart first, but the man did not pay attention and continued beating the animal. Finally, Nietzsche grabbed the collar of the driver, who turned around and kicked Nietzsche so hard that he went home and died. This story may strike us as contradictory. In the “I” of every human there are two dimensions: one that becomes excited at the beauty and grandeur ofNietzsche’s soul that sacrificed himself in order to help an animal, and the other that mocks such a stupid incident in which a genius died in order to keep a horse alive. This act is neither logical nor illogical; it is alogical, beyond logical analysis. This is ethics and love. When we love someone in order to be loved, or when we are kind to someone so that we can receive a favor, we are businesspeople. Love consists of giving up everything for the sake of a goal and asking nothing in return. This requires one to make a great choice. What is that choice? To choose to die—or some other objective—so another can live and some ideals can be realized.

After a logical stage, the fourth stage is to sacrifice oneself. At this point humans enter the stage of “ithar” [self-sacrificing generosity], a word that does not exist in any other language. Here, humans choose someone else over themselves, in other words, they sacrifice themselves for others. It is obvious that from among the two deaths—another person’s and their own—they have chosen their own death. This may be the end of one’s life, profit, fame, happiness, comfort, bread, and whatnot.

Thus all humans can free themselves from the last prison—which is frightening and contains invisible walls—through the power of ithar. It is a love which, beyond rationality and logic, invites us to negate and rebel against ourselves in order to work towards a goal or for the sake of others. It is in this stage that a free human is born, and this is the most exalting level of becoming an insan.

Humans as liberators, creators, and conscious choosers can free themselves from the prison of nature and history with the aid of science. They can free themselves from their social order with the aid of sociology. But in order to free themselves from the prison of their selves, as [Sarvepalli] Radhakrishnan [Indian philosopher, 1888–1975] states, “They need religion and love.”

We humans have been invited to this world with a duty and a responsibility to devise a plot. What plot? A scheme in which humankind, God, and love are involved to initiate a new creation and a new insan. This is what I mean by human responsibility.

 22—Extremism

YusufAl-Qaradawi

Yusuf Al-Qaradawi (Egypt-Qatar, born 1926), dean of the law school at the University of Qatar, wrote the following essay in 1981 as an attempt to undermine rising Islamic extremism, especially in his home country of Egypt. In particular, Al-Qaradawi's work is an extended critique of a small radical organization, the Society of Excoriation and Exodus, which kidnapped and killed an Egyptian religious official in 1977. Al-Qaradawi argues that, while extremist religious practices are allowed in Islam, they may not be forced on others.

Logicians argue that one cannot pass a judgment on something unless one has a clear conception of it, because the unknown and the undefined cannot be judged. Therefore, we first have to determine what "religious extremism" means before we can condemn or applaud it. We can do so by considering its reality and its most distinguishing characteristics. Literally, extremism means being situated at the farthest possible point from the center. Figuratively, it indicates a similar remoteness in religion and thought, as well as behavior. One of the main consequences of extremism is exposure to danger and insecurity.[363] Islam, therefore, recommends moderation and balance in everything: in belief, worship, conduct, and legislation. This is the straightforward path that God, the most exalted, calls al-sirat al-mustaqim [the straight path], one distinct from all the others which are followed by those who earn God's anger and those who go astray. Moderation, or balance, is not only a general characteristic of Islam, it is a fundamental landmark. The Qur'an says: "Thus have we made of you an umma [community] justly balanced, that you might be witnesses over the nations, and the Messenger a witness over yourselves." (Sura 2, Verse 143) As such, the Muslim umma is a nation ofjustice and moderation; it witnesses every deviation from the "straightforward path" in this life and in the hereafter. Islamic texts call upon Muslims to exercise moderation and to reject and oppose all kinds of extremism: ghuluw [excessiveness], tanattu'

[transgressing, meticulous religiosity], and tashdid [strictness, austerity]. A close examination of such texts shows that Islam emphatically warns against, and discourages, ghuluw. Let us consider the following hadiths [traditions of the Prophet]:

1. “Beware of excessiveness in religion. [People] before you have perished as a result of [such] excessiveness.”[364] The people referred to above are the people of other religions, especially ahl al-kitab [the people of the book]—Jews and Christians, mainly the Christians. The Qur’an addresses these people:

<quote>

Say: “O People of the Book! Exceed not in your religion the bounds [of what is proper], trespassing beyond the truth, nor follow the vain desires of people who went wrong in times gone by who misled many, and strayed [themselves] from the even Way.” (Sura 5, Verse 77)

</quote>

Muslims have therefore been warned not to follow in their steps: he who learns from the mistakes of others indeed lives a happier life. Furthermore, the reason behind the above hadith is to alert us to the fact that excessiveness may crop up as an insignificant action that we unwittingly allow to continue and develop into a menace. After reaching Muzdalifa [a town in Arabia] during his last hajj [pilgrimage], the Prophet, peace be upon him, asked [‘Abdallah] Ibn ‘Abbas [619–686] to gather some stones for him. Ibn ‘Abbas selected small stones. Upon seeing the stones, the Prophet, peace be upon him, approved of their size and said: “Yes, with such [stones do stone Satan]. Beware of excessiveness in religion.”[365] This clearly indicates that Muslims should not be so zealous as to believe that using larger stones is better, thus gradually allowing excessiveness to creep into their lives. Al-Imam Ibn Taymiyya [1263–1328] argues that this warning against excessiveness applies to all forms of belief, worship, and transactions, and notes that since the Christians are more excessive in faith and in practice than any other sect, God, the most exalted, admonishes them in the Qur’an, “Do not exceed the limits of your religion.” (Sura 4, Verse 171)

2. “Ruined were those who indulged in tanattu’.” And he [the Prophet] repeated this thrice.[366] Imam al-Nawawi [1233–1277] said that the people referred to here, “those indulging in tanattu’,” i.e., those who go beyond the limit in their utterance as well as in their action. Evidently the above two hadiths emphatically assert that the consequence of excessiveness and zealotry will be the complete loss of this life and of the hereafter.

3. The Prophet, peace be upon him, used to say: “Do not overburden yourselves, lest you perish. People [before you] overburdened themselves and perished. Their remains are found in hermitages and monasteries.”[367] Indeed, the Prophet Muhammad, peace be upon him, always condemned any tendency toward religious excessiveness. He cautioned those of his companions who were excessive in worship, or who were too ascetic, especially when this went beyond the moderate Islamic position. Islam seeks to create a balance between the needs of the body and those of the soul, between the right of man to live life to its full, and the right of the Creator to be worshipped by man, which is man’s reason for being....

The Qur’an disapproves of and rejects the tendency to prohibit worldly goods and ornaments which God has provided for his servants. In a verse revealed in Mecca, God, the most exalted, says:

<quote>

O Children of Adam! Wear your beautiful apparel at every time and place of prayer. Eat and drink, but waste not by excess, for God loves not those who waste.

Say: “Who has forbidden the beautiful gifts of God which He has produced for His servants, and the things clean and pure which He has provided for sustenance?” (Sura 7, Verses 31–32)

</quote>

In another sura, revealed in Medina, God, the most exalted, addresses the believers similarly:

<quote>

O you who believe! Make not unlawful the good things which God has made lawful for you. But commit no excess, for God does not like those given to excess. Eat of the things which God has provided you, lawful and good, but fear God, in Whom you believe. (Sura 5, Verses 86–88)

</quote>

These verses explain to the believers the true Islamic way of enjoying worldly goods and of resisting the excessiveness found in other religions. It is reported that the situational context for the revelation of these two verses was when a group of the Prophet's companions decided to castrate themselves and to roam the land like monks.

Ibn 'Abbas, may God be pleased with him, also reported: "A man came upon the Prophet, peace be upon him, and said, 'O Messenger of God, whenever I eat of this meat I [always] have a desire to make love, therefore, I have decided to abstain from eating meat.'" Consequently the verses were revealed.[368] ...

 1. Defects of Religious Extremism

All these warnings against extremism and excessiveness are necessary because of the serious defects inherent in such tendencies. The first defect is that excessiveness is too disagreeable for ordinary human nature to endure or tolerate. Even if a few human beings could put up with excessiveness for a short time, the majority would not be able to do so. God's legislation addresses the whole of humanity, not a special group who may have a unique capacity for endurance. This is why the Prophet, peace be upon him, was once angry with his eminent companion Mu’adh [ibn Jabal, died 627], because the latter led the people one day in prayer and so prolonged it that one of the people went to the Prophet and complained. The Prophet, peace be upon him, said to Mu’adh: “O Mu’adh! Are you putting the people on trial?” and repeated it thrice.[369]

On another occasion he addressed an imam [prayer leader] with unusual anger: “Some of you make people dislike prayer. So whoever among you leads people in prayer should keep it short, short because amongst them are the weak, the old, and the one who has business to attend to.”[370] ...

The second defect is that excessiveness is short-lived. Since man’s capacity for endurance and perseverance is naturally limited, and since man can easily become bored, he cannot endure any excessive practice for long. Even if he puts up with it for a while, he will soon be overcome by fatigue, physically and spiritually, and will eventually give up even the little he can naturally do, or he may even take a different course altogether substituting excessiveness with complete negligence and laxity. I have often met people who were known for their strictness and extremism; then I lost contact with them for a while. When I inquired about them after a period of time, I found out that they had either deviated and taken the opposite extreme, or had, at least, lagged behind like the “hasty one” referred to in the following hadith: “He [the hasty one] neither covers the desired distance nor spares the back [of his camel].”[371] ...

How superb is the Prophet’s advice to all Muslims not to overburden themselves in worship and to be moderate so that they will not be overcome by fatigue and finally fail to continue. He said: “Religion is very easy, and whoever overburdens himself will not be able to continue in that way. Be right [without excessiveness or negligence], near [perfection], and have good tidings [in being rewarded for your deeds].”[372]

The third defect is that excessive practice jeopardizes other rights and obligations. A sage once said in this respect: “Every extravagance is somehow bound to be associated with a lost right.”

When the Prophet, peace be upon him, learned that ‘Abdallah ibn ‘Umar [died 693] was so absorbed in worship that he even neglected his duty toward his wife, he said to him: “O ‘Abdallah! Have I not been correctly informed that you fast during the day and offer worship throughout the night?” ‘Abdallah replied, “Yes, O Messenger of God!” The Prophet, peace be upon him, then said: “Don’t do that. Instead, fast and then break your fast; worship during the night but also sleep. Your body has a right on you, your wife has a right on you, and your guest has a right on you.”[373] ...

 2. The Concept of Religious Extremism

I would like at this point to draw attention to two important observations. First: The degree of a person’s piety as well as that of the society in which he lives affect his judgment of others as far as extremism, moderation, and laxity are concerned. A religious society usually produces a person sensitively aversive to any deviation or negligence, however slight it may be. Judging by the criteria of his own practice and background, such a person would be surprised to find that there are Muslims who do not worship at night or fast. This is historically obvious. When examining the deeds and practices of people, the nearer one gets to the time of the Prophet, peace be upon him, his companions and the first generation of Muslims, the less worthy seem the deeds and practices of the pious among the later generations. Hence the gist of the saying: “The merits of those nearest to God are but the demerits of the righteous.” ...

Second: It is unfair to accuse a person of “religious extremism” simply because he has adopted a “hard-line” juristic opinion of certain religious scholars. If a person is convinced that his opinion is right and that he is bound by it according to religious law, he is free to do so even if others think that the juristic evidence is weak. He is only responsible for what he thinks and believes even if, in so doing, he overburdens himself, especially since he is not content with only limiting himself to the categorical obligations required of him but seeks God’s pleasure through supererogatory performances. People naturally differ on these matters....

 3. Manifestations of Extremism

The first indications of extremism include bigotry and intolerance, which make a person obstinately devoted to his own opinions and prejudices, as well as rigidity, which deprives him of clarity of vision regarding the interests of other human beings, the purposes of religious law, or the circumstances of the age. Such a person does not allow any opportunity for dialogue with others so that he may compare his opinion with theirs, and chooses to follow what appears to him most sound. We equally condemn this person’s attempt to suppress and discard the opinions of others, just as we condemn the similar attitude of his accusers and opponents. Indeed, we emphatically condemn his attitude if he claims that he alone is right and everybody else is wrong, accusing those who have different ideas and opinions of ignorance and self-interest, and those with different behavior of disobedience and sin, as if he were an infallible prophet and his words were divinely revealed. This attitude contradicts the consensus of the Islamic community, that what every person says can be totally or partly accepted or rejected, except, of course, the hadiths of the Prophet Muhammad, peace be upon him.

Strangely, though some of these people take liberty in exercising ijtihad [Islamic interpretation] in the most complicated matters and issues and pass notional and whimsical judgments, yet they would deprive the contemporary expert religious scholars—singly or collectively—of the right to exercise ijtihad regarding statements which contradict theirs. Some of them never hesitate to give ridiculous opinions on, and interpretations of, the Qur’an and sunna [practices of the Prophet]; opinions which are contradictory to those handed down to us by our forefathers, or subsequently arrived at by contemporary scholars. This indifference is due to their presumption to be on an equal footing with Abu Bakr [first caliph, reigned 632–634], ‘Umar [second caliph, reigned 634–644], ‘Ali [fourth caliph, reigned 656–661], and Ibn ‘Abbas, may God be pleased with them. This presumption might be less grave if these people admitted that their contemporaries who hold different views or approaches are also capable of ijtihad like themselves; but they would not.

Bigotry is the clearest evidence of extremism. An extremist seems to address people in this way: “I have the right to speak, your duty is to listen. I have the right to lead, your duty is to follow. My opinion is right, it cannot be wrong. Your opinion is wrong, it can never be right.” Thus, a bigot can never come to terms with others. Agreement is possible and can be reached when people hold moderate positions, but a bigot neither knows nor believes in moderation. He stands in relation to people as the East stand in relation to the West—the nearer you get to one, the further you move away from the other.

The issue becomes even more critical when such a person develops the tendency to coerce others, not necessarily physically but by accusing them of innovations, laxity, unbelief, and deviation. Such intellectual terrorism is as terrifying as physical terrorism.

The second characteristic of extremism manifests itself in a perpetual commitment to excessiveness, and in attempts to force others to do likewise, despite the existence of good reasons for facilitation and the fact that God, the most exalted, has not ordained it. A person motivated by piety and caution may, if he so wishes, choose a hard-line opinion in some matters and on certain occasions. But this should not become so habitual that he rejects facilitation when he needs it. Such an attitude is not in keeping with the teachings of the Qur’an or sunna, as is clear from the following verse: “God intends every facility for you; He does not want to put you to difficulties.” (Sura 2, Verse 185)

The Prophet, peace be upon him, also said ... “Facilitate [matters] and do not make [matters] difficult.” The Prophet also said: “God loves that His dispensations [to make matters easier] be accepted, as He dislikes [to see people] committing disobedience.”[374] It is also reported that “Whenever the Prophet, peace be upon him, was given a choice between two options, he always chose the easiest, unless it was a sin.”[375] ...

A bedouin once asked the Prophet, peace be upon him, about the obligatory prescriptions required of him. The Prophet, peace be upon him, mentioned only three: prayer, zakat taxation, and fasting during Ramadan. When the bedouin asked if there was anything else he must do, the Prophet, peace be upon him, replied in the negative, adding that the bedouin could volunteer to do more if he so wished. As he was leaving, the bedouin swore never to increase or decrease what the Prophet, peace be upon him, had asked him to do. When the Prophet, peace be upon him, heard this he said, “If he is saying the truth, he will succeed” or “he will be granted paradise.”[376]

If a Muslim in this age observes the religious obligations, maintains loyalty to God, the most exalted, and His Messenger, peace be upon him, and eschews the most heinous of sins, he should be accommodated in the fold of Islam and regarded as one of its advocates. Even if he commits some minor sins, the merits gained by his observance of the five daily prayers, the Friday [Sabbath] prayers, fasting [during the month of Ramadan], and so on will expiate his small faults.

The Qur’an says: “Good deeds remove those that are evil” (Sura 11, Verse 114), and in another verse: “If you eschew the most heinous of the things which are forbidden, We shall expel out of you all the evil in you and admit you to a state of great honor.” (Sura 4, Verse 31) In view of the above evidence from the Qur’an and sunna, how could we expel a Muslim from the fold of Islam merely because of his commitment to certain controversial matters that we are not sure are permissible or forbidden, or because of his failure to perform practices that we are not certain are obligatory or recommended. This is why I object to the tendency of some pious people to adopt and cling to hard-line opinions, not only in their own personal practice but also in influencing others to do the same. I also object to the charges leveled by such people against any Muslim scholar who disagrees with their line of thought by opting for facilitation in the light of the Qur’an and sunna in order to relieve people of distress and undue restrictions in their religious practice.

The third characteristic of extremism is the over-burdening of others without regard for time and place—applying Islamic principles to people in non-Muslim countries or to people who have only recently converted to Islam, as well as to Muslims who are newly devout. With all these, emphasis should not be put on minor or controversial issues, but on fundamentals. Efforts should be made to correct their concepts and understanding of Islam before anything else. Once the correct beliefs are firmly established, then one can begin to explain the five pillars of Islam and gradually to emphasize those aspects which make a Muslim's belief and practice compatible, and his entire life an embodiment of what is pleasing to God, the most exalted. This fact was recognized by the Prophet Muhammad himself, peace be upon him, when he sent Mu'adh, may God be pleased with him, to Yemen. He told him:

<quote>

You are going to [meet] people of a [divine] scripture, and when you reach them call them to witness that there is no god but God and that Muhammad is His Messenger. And if they obey you in that, then tell them that God has enjoined on them five prayers to be performed every day and night. And if they obey you in that, then tell them that God has enjoined upon them taxation, to be taken from the rich amongst them and given to the poor amongst them.[377]

</quote>

Notice the gradation in the Prophet's advice to Mu'adh, may God be pleased with him.

I was shocked and dismayed during a tour of North America to find that devout young Muslims have initiated a great controversy because Muslims sit on chairs during the Saturday and Sunday lectures in mosques instead of sitting on mats on the ground, and do not face Mecca as Muslims do, and also because those who attend wear shirts and trousers rather than loose outer coverings, and sit at dining tables to eat rather than on the ground. I was angered by this kind of thinking and behavior in the heart of North America. I therefore addressed these people:

<quote>

It would be more worthwhile in this materialistic society to make your paramount concern the call to monotheism and the worship of God, the most exalted, to remind people of the hereafter, of the noble Islamic values, and to warn them of the heinous acts in which the materially developed countries have been totally immersed. The norms of behavior and improvements in religious practice are governed by time as well as place, and should be introduced only after the more necessary and fundamental tenets have been firmly established.

</quote>

In another Islamic center, people were creating a considerable fuss over the showing of a historical or educational film in a mosque, claiming that “mosques have been turned into movie theaters,” but forgetting that the purpose of the mosque is to serve the worldly as well as spiritual interest of Muslims. During the time of Prophet Muhammad, peace be upon him, the mosque was the center of religion and of the state, as well as of social activities. We are all aware of the Prophet’s granting permission to a group of people from Abyssinia to sport with their spears in the middle of his mosque, and that he allowed ‘A’isha [wife of the Prophet, circa 614678], may God be pleased with her, to watch them.[378]

The fourth characteristic of extremism manifests itself in harshness in the treatment of people, roughness in the manner of approach, and crudeness in calling people to Islam, all of which are contrary to the teachings of the Qur’an and sunna. God, the most exalted, commands us to call to Islam and to His teachings with wisdom, not with foolishness; with amicability, not with harsh words: “Invite [all] to the Way of your Lord with wisdom and beautiful preaching, and argue with them in ways that are best and most gracious.” (Sura 16, Verse 125) [The Qur’an] also describes the Prophet, peace be upon him, thus: “Now has come unto you a Messenger from among yourselves. It grieves him that you should perish, ardently anxious is he over you. To the believers he is kind and merciful.” (Sura 9, Verse 128) The Qur’an also addressed the Prophet, peace be upon him, defining his relationship with his companions: “It is part of the mercy of God that you [Muhammad] deal justly with them. If you were severe and hard-hearted they would have broken away from you.” (Sura 3, Verse 159)

... [The call to Islam] cannot succeed without wisdom and amicability, and without taking into consideration human nature—man’s obstinacy, resistance to change, and argumentativeness. These characteristics necessitate the exercise of kindness and gentleness when attempting to reach man’s heart and mind so that his hardness can be softened, his rigidity abated and his pride checked. This approach was described for us in the Qur’an as having been followed by earlier prophets and sincere believers who called people to the worship of God, the most exalted. Examples can be found in Abraham’s call to his father and people, in Shu’aib’s call to his people [the ancient people of Midyan], in Moses’ call to the Pharaoh ... in [Muhammad’s] call (Sura 36, Verse 20), as well as in the calls of others who directed people to the truth and righteousness....

No wonder then that people experienced in the call reject and disapprove of the young people’s manner in arguing with those who hold different opinions! Rather than calling people to the Way of God, the most exalted, with wisdom, they are quite often harsh, rough, and crude. No distinction is made between the old and the young; no special consideration is given to those whose age or status deserves special respect, that is, parents, teachers, the learned, or those who have precedence in the call and the struggle. Nor do the young people differentiate between those sectors in the community—such as the laity, the illiterate, and the misled—who are ceaselessly battling to earn a living, and those who actively resist Islam out of malice or treason, not ignorance.

Such lack of insight is still dominant in Muslim society, despite the fact that the early scholars of hadith literature distinguished very clearly between common innovators who do not call others to their innovation, and those who deliberately publicize and defend their innovations. The reports of the former were accepted, while those of the latter were rejected.

Suspicion and distrust are also manifestations of extremism. An extremist readily accuses people and quickly passes judgment contrary to the generally accepted norm: “innocent until proven guilty.” He considers a person guilty the moment he suspects him of something. He jumps to conclusions rather than looking for explanations. The slightest mistake is blown out of all proportion; a mistake becomes a sin, and a sin a mortal sin. Such a reaction is a stark violation of the spirit and teachings of Islam which encourage Muslims to think well of other Muslims, to try to find an excuse for their misbehavior, and to help them improve their words and deeds.

The religious sincerity and integrity of those who disagree with such an extremist are always called into question. An extremist would depict people as being guilty of transgression, innovation, or disrespect for the Prophet’s sunna even if their views are solidly based upon authentic Islamic texts.

One could cite many examples: If you argue that carrying a stick or eating while sitting on the ground has nothing to do with the sunna, you would be accused of disrespect for the Prophet himself, peace be upon him. Not even learned Muslim scholars are spared such accusations. If a scholar renders a decision that facilitates matters for Muslims, he is considered lax on religious issues; if a Muslim preacher tries to call people to Islam in a manner suitable to the spirit and the taste of the age, he is accused of succumbing to and patronizing Western civilization.

Moreover, these accusations are not only hurled at the living but also at the dead, who are unable to defend themselves. No one holding a different opinion can escape unjust indiscriminate accusations, such as being a Freemason, a predeterminist Jahmi, or a rationalist Mu’tazilite.[379] Even the four great jurists of Islam who established the main Islamic juristic schools and who have earned the respect of the majority of Muslims throughout the centuries have not escaped the venomous slander of the extremists. Indeed, the whole history of the Muslim community after the fourth century A.H., with its glorious legacy and unprecedented civilization, has been a target of unjustified criticism. It is considered by the extremists as being the source of contemporary evils, the roots of our malaise. To some extremists, it was a period of conflict and discord, of struggle for personal power; for others, a period of ignorance and even mortal sin.

This destructive tendency is not new. Extremists existed even during the time of the Prophet, peace be upon him. Once, an extremist among the Ansar [literally helpers, meaning the Muslims of Medina] accused the Prophet, peace be upon him, of favoritism in his division and distribution of the spoils of war.

The gravest shortcoming of the contemporary extremists is suspicion. If they understood and comprehended the Qur'an and sunna, they would discover that both seek to foster in the mind of each and every Muslim the confidence and trust of other fellow Muslims.

A Muslim is not even allowed to publicize the minor mistakes and faults of others or become blind to their merits, though some people are interested in criticizing others and in praising themselves. "Therefore, justify not yourselves: He knows best who it is that guards against evil." (Sura 53, Verse 32) Indeed, Islam strongly warns against two characteristics: despairing of God's mercy and suspecting fellow human beings. God, the most exalted, says: "O you who believe! Avoid suspicion as much [as possible]: for suspicion in some cases is a sin." (Sura 49, Verse 12) The Prophet, peace be upon him, also says in this respect: "Avoid suspicion, for suspicion is the false element in talk."[380] ...

Extremism reaches its utmost limit when a single group deprives all people of the right to safety and protection, and instead sanctions their killing and the confiscation of their lives and property. This, of course, occurs when an extremist holds all people—except those in his group—to be unbelievers. This kind of extremism severs any bond between such a person and the rest of the Islamic community. This is the trap into which the Khawarij fell during the dawn of Islam, although they were known for their strict observance of religious duties such as prayer, fasting, and recitation of the Qur'an. However, their thinking rather than their conscience was distorted and corrupt. Hence they were so infatuated with their belief and behavior that they unintentionally deviated from the right path.

The Prophet, peace be upon him, described the devotion of such people by saying: “Any of you would hold insignificant his own prayer compared with their [the Khawarij’s] prayer, and his nightly devotions compared with their nightly devotions, his recitation [of the Qur’an] compared with their recitation.”[381] Nevertheless, he said of them: “They would recite the Qur’an but it would not go beyond their throat, and they pass through religion without a mark.”[382] This means that they slip out of religion as an arrow slips out of its bow. The Prophet, peace be upon him, also said of them that they regard it as their duty to “destroy adherents of Islam and save the idol-worshippers.”[383]

This is why when a Muslim fell into their hands and was asked about his identity, he replied that he was a polytheist curious to find out about God’s message and book. On hearing this the Khawarij told the man that they would protect him and grant him safe passage. In support of their decision, they recited the following verse from the Qur’an:

<quote>

If one amongst the pagans asks you for asylum, grant it to him, so that he may hear the Word of God; and then escort him to where he may be secure. That is because they are men without knowledge. (Sura 9, Verse 6)

</quote>

The irony is that if the man had admitted that he was a Muslim they would have killed him. Unfortunately, some Muslims have not yet learned this lesson. The Jama’at al-Takfr wa al-Hijra [Society of Excoriation and Exodus, a militant Islamic group in Egypt] seems to be following in the footsteps of the Khawarij. They readily brand as an unbeliever anybody who commits a sin and does not immediately repent. Even more worthy of condemnation, in their view, are the rulers who do not implement the shari’a, as well as people who submit to such rulers. Still more sinful in their view are the religious scholars who do not openly condemn such people as unbelievers, as well as those who reject the group’s beliefs and submit to the laws elaborated by the four great jurists of Islam on the basis of consensus: logical deduction, public welfare, or fairness. Moreover, anyone who first pledges support for their cause and joins their group, then decides to leave it—for one reason or another—is considered an apostate and must be put to death. Indeed, they hold all history after the fourth century A.H. as periods of ignorance and unbelief, worshipping the idol of tradition rather than God, the most exalted.[384]

In this way, the group became so excessive in accusing people of unbelief that they spared neither the dead nor the living. The group has thus run into deep trouble, because accusing a Muslim of unbelief is a very serious matter, with very serious consequences—his killing and the confiscation of his property become lawful. As an apostate, he must be separated from his wife and children; there can be no bond between him and other Muslims; he must be deprived of his inheritance and cannot bequeath to others; he must be denied Islamic burial and the prayer for the deceased; and he must not be buried in a Muslim graveyard.

The Prophet, peace be upon him, said: “When a Muslim calls another Muslim an unbeliever, then surely one of them is such.”[385] This means that unless the accusation is validated and substantiated, it will fall back on the accuser, who will face great danger in this world and in the hereafter.

Usama ibn Zayd [Companion of the Prophet, died circa 673] said: “If a man says, ‘I witness that there is no god but God,’ he has embraced Islam, and his life and property should be granted safety. If he said so in fear or to protect himself from the sword, he will account for that before God. We should [judge] the apparent.”’[386] The Prophet, peace be upon him, rebuked Usama when he discovered that the latter had killed a man who had uttered the shahada [acceptance of Islam] following a battle in which the man’s tribe was defeated. When Usama argued that he thought—at the time—that the man did so to save himself, out of fear, the Prophet, peace be upon him, said: “Did you look into his heart after he had confessed that there is no god but God?” Usama relates: “He [the Prophet] continued repeating this to me till I wished I had not embraced Islam before that day.”

Religious law teaches that those who embrace Islam with certainty of mind can only be expelled from its fold by proven and substantiated evidence. Even major sins such as murder, fornication, and drinking alcohol do not justify the accusation of unbeliever, provided that the person concerned does not show disrespect for, reject, or refuse to recognize religious law.

This is why the Qur’an established brotherly love between the person who commits a premeditated murder and the next of kin of the victim, as this verse shows: “And for him who is forgiven somewhat by his [injured] brother, prosecution according to usage and payment unto him in kindness.” (Sura 2, Verse 178)[387]

The Prophet, peace be upon him, also addressed a person who cursed an alcoholic who had already been punished several times for alcoholism: “Do not curse him; he loves God and His Messenger.”[388]

Further, religious law has prescribed different punishments for crimes such as murder, fornication, and drunkenness. Had all of these been unbelief, then they would have been punished in accordance with the law of apostasy.

All the obscure and vague evidence on which the extremists base their accusations are refuted by fundamental and categorical texts in both the Qur’an and sunna. This issue was settled by the Islamic community centuries ago—it is futile to try to revive and renew it.

 23—Rethinking Islam Today

Mohamed Arkoun

Mohamed Arkoun (Algeria-France, born 1928) received his doctorate at the Sorbonne in Paris and joined the faculty there as Professor of Islamic Thought in 1963. In a series of works since the early 1970s, Arkoun has attempted to reshape Islamic interpretation through the use of contemporary social-scientific, particularly linguistic, methods. “One of the most articulate ... liberal Muslims,”[389] Arkoun has embarked on “an intellectual crusade,”[390] engaging Islamic radicals in debate and arguing for pluralism within Islam, acceptance of multiple interpretations of the sacred texts, and a more self-conscious attitude toward one’s own interpretation.[391] The following chapter serves as an introduction to and summary of Arkoun’s work; its style is somewhat more accessible than his French work.

<quote>

Shall I seek other than God for Judge, when He is who hath revealed unto you the Book, fully explained? Those unto whom we gave the Book know that it is revealed from thy Lord in truth. So be not (O Muhammad) of the waverers. Perfected is the word of thy Lord in truth and justice. There is naught that can change His word. He is the Hearer, the Knower. (Qur’an, Sura 6, Verses 114–115)

</quote>

Islam holds historical significance for all of us, but at the same time, our understanding of this phenomenon is sadly inadequate. There is a need to encourage and initiate audacious, free, productive thinking on Islam today. The so-called Islamic revivalism has monopolized the discourse on Islam; the social scientists, moreover, do not pay attention to what I call the “silent Islam”—the Islam of true believers who attach more importance to the religious relationship with the absolute of God than to the vehement demonstrations of political movements. I refer to the Islam of thinkers and intellectuals who are having great difficulties inserting their critical approach into a social and cultural space that is, at present, totally dominated by militant ideologies.

My own ambition as a Muslim intellectual is not the result of my academic training; rather, it is rooted in my existential experience. I entered high school in Oran and then the university in Algiers. It was the colonial time in Algeria, and like all Algerians, I was continually shocked by the sharp, hard confrontation between the conquering French culture and language and my own Algerian culture. (I speak Berber and Arabic.) When I heard lectures on Islam at the University of Algiers I was, like others, deeply disappointed by the intellectual poverty of the presentation, especially when burning issues were raised in Algerian society between 1950 and 1954. The national movement for liberation was countering the colonial claim to represent modern civilization by emphasizing the Arab-Muslim personality of Algeria. As a result of this brutal confrontation I resolved (1) to understand the Arab-Muslim personality claimed by the nationalist movement, and (2) to determine the extent to which the modern civilization, represented by the colonial power, should be considered a universal civilization.

These are the roots of my psychological concerns. As a scholar and a teacher at the Sorbonne since 1961, I have never stopped this ijtihad [Islamic interpretation], my intellectual effort to find adequate answers to my two initial questions. At the same time, this explains my method and my epistemology. For me, as a historian of Islamic thought, there is one cultural space stretching from the Indian to the Atlantic Oceans. This space is, of course, extremely rich in its languages and ethno-cultural variety. It also has been influenced by two axial traditions of thinking: the ancient Middle Eastern culture, which has a special place for Greek thought, and the monotheism taught by the prophets. I learned to discover Islam in this wide, rich, intricate space, which is why I am not comfortable with the English title imposed on me for this lecture. I could not find a relevant translation of the French Penser I’Islam or the Arabic Kayfa na’ qilu al-Islam. Penser I’Islam suggests the free use of reason aimed at elaborating a new and coherent vision which integrates the new situations faced by societies and the living elements of Muslim tradition. Here I emphasize freedom. Rethinking Islam could suggest that I am repeating the well- known position of the islahi—the reformist thinking represented since the 19th century by the salafi school [revivalists, literally followers of the pious ancestors]. I want to avoid any parallel between the modern perspective of radical critical thought applied to any subject and the islahi thinking which, in the Islamic tradition, is a mythical attitude more or less mixed with the historical approach to the problems related to religious vision.

I favor the historical approach, with its modern enlarged curiosities, because it includes the study of mythical knowledge as being not limited to the primitive archaic mentality, according to the definitions imposed by the positivist historicist school since the 19th century. On the contrary, the main intellectual endeavor represented by thinking Islam or any religion today is to evaluate, with a new epistemological perspective, the characteristics and intricacy of systems of knowledge—both the historical and the mythical. I would even say that both are still interacting and interrelated in our modern thought after at least three hundred years of rationalism and historicism. There is no need to insist on the idea that thinking Islam today is a task much more urgent and significant than all the scholastic discussions of Orientalism; the ultimate goal of the project is to develop—through the example set by Islam as a religion and a social-historical space—a new epistemological strategy for the comparative study of cultures. All the polemics recently directed against Orientalism show clearly that so-called modern scholarship remains far from any epistemological project that would free Islam from the essentialist, substantialist postulates of classical metaphysics. Islam, in these discussions, is assumed to be a specific, essential, unchangeable system of thought, beliefs, and nonbeliefs, one which is superior or inferior (according to Muslims or non-Muslims) to the Western (or Christian) system. It is time to stop this irrelevant confrontation between two dogmatic attitudes—the theological claims of believers and the ideological postulates of positivist rationalism. The study of religions, in particular, is handicapped by the rigid definitions and methods inherited from theology and classical metaphysics. The history of religion has collected facts and descriptions of various religions, but religion as a universal dimension of human existence is not approached from the relevant epistemological perspective. This weakness in modern thought is even more clearly illustrated by the poor, conformist, and sometimes polemical literature on the religions of the Book, as we shall see.

For all these reasons, it is necessary to clear away the obstacles found in Islamic as well as Orientalist literature on Islam and to devote more attention in our universities to teaching and studying history as an anthropology of the past and not only as a narrative account of facts. I insist on a historical, sociological, anthropological approach not to deny the importance of the theological and philosophical, but to enrich them by the inclusion of the concrete historical and social conditions in which Islam always has been practiced. My method is one of deconstruction. For centuries religions have dominated the construction of different, intricate Weltanschauungen [worldviews] through which all realities were perceived, judged, classified, accepted, and rejected without the possibility of looking back at the mentalhistorical process which led to each Weltanschauungen [worldview]. The strategy of deconstruction is possible only with modern critical epistemology. Reason needs to be free from the ontology, transcendentalism, and substantialism in which it has made itself a prisoner, especially in the various theologies elaborated through Greek logic and metaphysics.

Thus presented, the enterprise of thinking Islam today can only be achieved—if ever—by dynamic teams of thinkers, writers, artists, scholars, politicians, and economic producers. I am aware that long and deeply-rooted traditions of thinking cannot be changed or even revised through a few essays or suggestions made by individuals. But I believe that thoughts have their own force and life. Some, at least, could survive and break through the wall of uncontrolled beliefs and dominating ideologies.

Where can we start under these conditions? Where is the authorized voice or the accepted theory which could give expression to an Islam integrated into our modern, scientific mentality and at the same time into the religious experience of Muslims? In other words, is it possible to articulate a modern vision of Islam which could have the same impact on the community as the Risala [Treatise] of [Abu'Abdallah Muhammad] Shafi'i [767–820] or Ihya' 'ulum al-din [Revival of the Religious Sciences] of [Abu Hamid Muhammad] Ghazzali [1058–1111]? I refer to these two major books because they illustrate the same intellectual initiative as the one I propose, namely, to integrate, as Shafi'i and Ghazzali did, new disciplines, new knowledge, and new historical insights into Islam as a spiritual and historical vision of human existence.

Actually, I started this project with an article written in 1969 in which I asked “How to read the Qur’an?” One necessarily has to start with the Qur’an because, historically, everything started with what I called the “Experience of Medina,” including the communication of the Qur’an received as revelation and the historical process through which a social group, named believers (mu’minun), emerged and dominated other groups—named unbelievers, infidels, hypocrites, polytheists (kafirun, munafiqun, mushrikun). For the first time in the history of Qur’anic exegesis, I raised the crucial issue of reading texts according to the new epistemology introduced by modern linguistics and semiotics. When I applied this epistemology to the reading of the Fatiha, I received the usual response that there is nothing new in this essay; everything already has been well explained through classical exegesis. Other essays collected in my book, Lectures du Coran [Readings of the Qur’an] (Paris, France: Maisonneuve-Larose, 1982), did not evoke more interest either among Orientalists or Muslims who read French. I mention this fact because it illustrates clearly the concept of epistemological space.

It is true that I use grammatical and lexicographic material collected by classical exegeses. However, the epistemological perspective of linguistic analysis is totally different from the theological postulates accepted without discussion in the Islamic, Christian, and Jewish traditions of thought. This will appear in the following analyses.

I shall not insist any longer here on the decisive importance of linguistics and semeiotics in rethinking the cognitive status of religious discourse. Rather, I would like to stress various views already developed in several essays which I collected in my Critique de la raison Islamique [Critique of Islamic Reason] (Paris, France: Maisonneuve-Larose, 1984). I shall tackle the following points:

1. Tools for new thinking.

2. Modes of thinking.

3. From the unthinkable to the thinkable.

4. Societies of the Book.

5. Strategy for deconstruction.

6. Revelation and history.

Many other problems must be raised and solved because Islam has regulated every aspect of individual and collective life; but my wish here is to indicate a general direction of thinking and the main conditions necessary to practice an ijtihad recognized equally by Muslims and modern scholars.

 1. Tools for New Thinking

Periodization of the history of thought and literature has been dictated by political events. We speak currently of the Umayyad, ‘Abbasid, and Ottoman periods [661750, 750–1258, and 1281–1924, respectively]. However, there are more enlightening criteria that we can use to distinguish periods of change in the history of thought. We must consider the discontinuities affecting the conceptual framework used in a given cultural space. The concepts of reason and science (’ ilm) used in the Qur’an, for example, are not the same as those developed later by the falasifa [philosophers], according to the Platonic and the Aristotelian schools. However, the concepts elaborated in Qur’anic discourse are still used more or less accurately today because the episteme introduced by the Qur’an has not been intellectually reconsidered.

Episteme is a better criterion for the study of thought because it concerns the structure of the discourse—the implicit postulates which command the syntactic construction of the discourse. To control the epistemological validity of any discourse, it is necessary to discover and analyze the implicit postulates. This work has never been done for any discourse in Islamic thought (I refer to my essay “Logocentrisme et verite religieuse selon Abu al-Hasan al-‘Amiri” [Logocentrism and Religious Truth according to Abu al-Hasan al-‘Amiri], in Essais sur lapensee Islamique [Essays on Islamic Thought], Paris, France: Maisonneuve-Larose, third edition, 1984). This is why I must insist here on the new episteme implicit in the web of concepts used in human and social sciences since the late sixties.

It is not possible, for example, to use in Arabic the expression “problem of God,” associating God and mushkil (problem); God cannot be considered as problematic. He is well-known, well-presented in the Qur’an; man has only to meditate, internalize, and worship what God revealed of Himself in His own words. The classical discussion of the attributes has not been accepted by all schools; and finally the attributes are recited as the most beautiful names of God (asma’Allah al-husna) but are neglected as subjects of intellectual inquiry.

This means that all the cultures and systems of thought related to pagan, polytheistic, jahili (pre-Islamic), or modern secularized societies are maintained in the domain of the unthinkable and, consequently, remain unthought in the domain of “orthodox” Islamic thought or the thinkable. In European societies since the 16th century, the historical role that the study of classical antiquity played in initiating the modern ideas of free thinking and free examination of reality is significant; based on this link we can understand the intellectual gap between Muslim orthodoxy and Western secularized thought (see Marc Auge, Genie du paganisme [The Genius of Paganism], Paris, France: Gallimard, 1982).

Tradition, orthodoxy, myth, authority, and historicity do not yet have relevant conceptualizations in Arabic. Myth is translated as ustura [plural: asatir], which is totally misleading because the Qur’an uses the word for the false tales and images related in “the fables of the ancient people,” and these asatir are opposed to the truthful stories (qasas haqq or ahsan al-qasas) told by God in the Qur’an. The concept of myth as it is used in contemporary anthropology is related more to qasas than to ustura, but even anthropology has not yet clarified the difference between myth and mythology, mystification and mythologization, as well as the semantic relationship between myth and symbol and the role of the metaphor in mythical and symbolic discourse.

We still approach these concepts and use them with a rationalist positivist system of definitions, as the Qur’an did with asatir al-awwalin (pre-Islamic mythology of the ancient people). However, the Qur’an created a symbolic alternative to the competing mythical and symbolic constructions of the ancient cultures in the Middle East. Our positivist rationalism criticizes symbols and myths and proposes, as an alternative, scientific conceptualism. We have neither a theory of symbol nor a clear conception of the metaphor to read, with a totalizing perspective, the religious texts. Religious tradition is one of the major problems we should rethink today. First, religions are mythical, symbolic, ritualistic ways of being, thinking, and knowing. They were conceived in and addressed to societies still dominated by oral and not written cultures. Scriptural religions based on a revealed Book contributed to a decisive change with far-reaching effects on the nature and functions of religion itself. Christianity and Islam (more than Judaism, until the creation of the Israeli state) became official ideologies used by a centralizing state which created written historiography and archives.

There is no possibility today of rethinking any religious tradition without making a careful distinction between the mythical dimension linked to oral cultures and the official ideological functions of the religion. We shall come back to this point because it is a permanent way of thinking that religion revealed and that social, cultural, and political activity maintained.

Tradition and orthodoxy are also unthought, unelaborated concepts in Islamic traditional thought. Tradition is reduced to a collection of “authentic” texts recognized in each community: Shi’i, Sunni, and Khariji. If we add to the Qur’an and hadith [traditions of the Prophet], the methodology used to derive the shari’a [Islamic law] and the corpus juris [body of law] in the various schools, we have other subdivisions of the three axes of Islamic tradition. I tried to introduce the concept of an exhaustive tradition worked up by a critical, modern confrontation of all the collections used by the communities, regardless of the “orthodox” limits traced by the classical authorities ([Muhammad ibn Isma’il] Bukhari [810–870] and Muslim [ibn al-Hajjaj, circa 821–875] for the Sunnis; [Abu Ja’far Muhammad] Kulayni [died 940], [Abu Ja’far Muhammad] Ibn Babawayh [923–991], [Muhammad al-Hasan] al-Tusi [995–1067] for the Imamis; [‘Abdallah] Ibn ‘Ibad [seventh century] and others for the Kharijis). This concept is used by the Islamic revolution in Iran, but more as an ideological tool to accomplish the political unity of the umma [community of Muslims]. The historical confrontation of the corpuses, and the theoretical elaboration of a new, coherent science of Usul al-fiqh [principles of Islamic jurisprudence] and Usul al-din [principles of religion], are still unexplored and necessary tasks.

Beyond the concept of an exhaustive tradition based on a new definition of the usul [principles], there is the concept of tradition as it is used in anthropology today—the sum of customs, laws, institutions, beliefs, rituals, and cultural values which constitute the identity of each ethno-linguistic group. This level of tradition has been partially integrated by the shari’a under the name of ‘urf [custom] or ‘amal [judicial practice] (like al-‘amal al-fasi in Fas), but it is covered and legitimized by the Usuli methodology of the jurists. This aspect of tradition can be expressed in Arabic by taqalid [plural of taqlid, the imitation of leading religious scholars], but the concept of exhaustive tradition can be expressed by the word sunna only if it is re-elaborated in the perspective I mentioned.

Likewise, orthodoxy refers to two values. For the believers, it is the authentic expression of the religion as it has been taught by the pious ancestors (al-salaf al-salih); the “orthodox” literature describes opposing groups as “sects” (firaq). For the historian, orthodoxy refers to the ideological use of religion by the competing groups in the same political space, like the Sunnis who supported the caliphate—legitimized afterwards by the jurists—and who called themselves “the followers of the tradition and the united community” (ahl al-sunna wa-al-jama’a). All the other groups were given polemical, disqualifying names like rawafid[Shi’is, literally rejectors], khawarij [Kharijites, literally withdrawers], and batiniyya [Isma’ilis, literally seekers of hidden meanings]. The Imamis called themselves “the followers of infallibility and justice” (ahl al-‘isma wa- al-‘acfala), referring to an orthodoxy opposed to that of the Sunnis.

There has been no effort (ijtihad) to separate orthodoxy as a militant ideological endeavor, a tool of legitimation for the state and the “values” enforced by this state, from religion as a way proposed to man to discover the Absolute. This is another task for our modern project of rethinking Islam, and other religions.

 2. Modes of Thinking

I would like to clarify and differentiate between the two modes of thinking that Muslim thinkers adopted at the inception of intellectual modernity in their societies (not only in thought), that is, since the beginning of the Nahda [Renaissance] in the 19th century. I do not need to emphasize the well- known trend of salafi reformist thought initiated by Jamal al-Din al-Afghani [1838–1897] and Muhammad ‘Abduh [1849–1905]. It is what I call the islahi way of thinking which has characterized Islamic thought since the death of the Prophet. The principle common to all Muslim thinkers, the ‘ulmm’ mujtahidun [religious scholars qualified to conduct ijtihad], as well as to historians who adopted the theological framework imposed by the division of time into two parts—before/after the hijra [the exodus of Muslims from Mecca to Medina in 622] (like before/after Christ)—is that all the transcendent divine Truth has been delivered to mankind by the Revelation and concretely realized by the Prophet through historical initiatives in Medina. There is, then, a definite model of perfect historical action for mankind, not only for Muslims. All groups at any time and in any social and cultural environment are bound to go back to this model in order to achieve the spirit and the perfection shown by the Prophet, his companions, and the first generation of Muslims called the pious ancestors (al-salaf al-salih).

This vision has been faithfully adopted and assumed by the program of the International Institute of Islamic Thought (founded in 1981 in Washington, D.C., “for the reform and progress of Islamic thought”). The publication of the Institute’s International Conference in the Islamicization of Knowledge notes that the “human mind by itself with its limitations cannot comprehend the totality of the matter.” This means that there is an “Islamic framework” constantly valid, transcendent, authentic, and universal in which all human activities and initiatives ought to be controlled and correctly integrated. Since the Islamic framework is part of the “Islamic legacy,” one must always look back to the time when the Truth was formulated and implemented either in the model set in Medina by the Prophet and the Revelation or by recognized ‘ulama’mujtahidun who correctly derived the shari’a using the rules of valid ijtihad.

This is at the same time a methodology, an epistemology, and a theory of history. It is certainly an operative intellectual framework used and perpetuated by generations of Muslims since the debate on authority and power started inside the community according to patterns of thinking and representing the world specific to the islahi movement. I do not want to engage in a discussion of the intellectual and scientific relevance of this mental attitude which is now generalized on a worldwide scale by so-called Islamic revivalism.

To rethink Islam one must comprehend the sociocultural genesis of islahi thinking and its impact on the historical destiny of the societies where this thinking has been or is actually dominant. To assess the epistemological validity of islahi thinking, one has to start from the radical and initial problems concerning the generative process, the structure and the ideological use of knowledge. By this, I mean any kind and level of knowledge produced by man living, acting, and thinking in a given soci al-historical situation. Radical thinking refers to the biological, historical, linguistic, semiotic condition shared by people as natural beings. From this perspective, the Revelation of Islam is only one attempt, among many others, to emancipate human beings from the natural limitations of their biological, historical, and linguistic condition. That is why, today, “Islamicizing knowledge” must be preceded by a radical epistemological critique of knowledge at the deepest level of its construction as an operative system used by a group in a given social-historical space. We need to differentiate ideological discourses produced by groups for assessing their own identity, power, and protection, from ideational discourses, which are controlled along the socio-historical process of their elaboration in terms of the new critical epistemology.

Given the sociological diffusion today of islahi thinking, I must insist on the characteristics of this critical epistemology applied not only for thinking Islam, but also, beyond the rich example of Islamic tradition, for a rationality based on a comparative theory of all cultural traditions and historical experiences.

Any attempt to think an object of knowledge relies on epistemic postulates, as I have said. The difference between the new emerging rationality and all inherited rationalities—including Islamic reason—is that the implicit postulates are made explicit and used not as undemonstrated certitudes revealed by God or formed by a transcendental intellect, but as modest, heuristic trends for research. In this spirit, here are six fundamental heuristic lines of thinking to recapitulate Islamic knowledge and to confront it with contemporary knowledge in the process of elaboration.

1. Human beings emerge as such in societies through various changing uses. Each use in the society is converted into a sign of this use, which means that realities are expressed through languages as systems of signs. Signs are the radical issue for a critical, controlled knowledge. This issue occurs prior to any attempt to interpret Revelation. Holy scripture itself is communicated through natural languages used as systems of signs, and we know that each sign is a locus of convergent operations (perception, expression, interpretation, translation, communication) engaging all of the relations between language and thought.

Remark 1.1: This line of research is directly opposed to a set of postulates developed and shared by Islamic thought on the privilege of the Arabic language elected by God to “teach Adam all the names.” The ultimate teaching is the Qur’an as revealed in the Arabic language. These postulates command the whole construction of Usul al-din and Usul al-fiqh as a correct methodology with which to derive from the holy texts the divine laws. The core of Islamic thought is thus represented as a linguistic and semantic issue. (This is true for all religious traditions based on written texts.)

Remark 1.2: This same line is equally opposed to the philological, historicist, positivist postulates imposed by Western thinking since the 16th century. That is why we have made a clear distinction between the modernity (or rationality) of the Classical Age and the heuristic trends of the present rationality (Prefigurative Age). (I refer to my book, L’Islam hier-demain [Islam Yesterday-Tomorrow], second edition, Paris, France: Buchet-Chastel, 1982.)

2. All semiotic productions of a human being in the process of his social and cultural emergence are subject to historical change which I call historicity. As a semiotic articulation of meaning for social and cultural uses, the Qur’an is subject to historicity. This means that there is no access to the absolute outside the phenomenal world of our terrestrial, historical existence. The various expressions given to the ontology, the first being the truth and the transcendence by theological and metaphysical reason, have neglected historicity as a dimension of the truth. Changing tools, concepts, definitions, and postulates are used to shape the truth.

Remark 2.1: This line is opposed to all medieval thinking based on stable essences and substances. The concept of Revelation should be reworked in the light of semiotic systems subjected to historicity. The Mu’tazili theory of God’s created speech deserves special consideration along this new line.

Remark 2.2: The Aristotelian definition of formal logic and abstract categories also needs to be revised in the context of the semiotic theory of meaning and the historicity of reason.

3. There are many levels and forms of reason interacting with levels and forms of imagination as is shown in the tension between logos [words subject to debate] and mythos [unquestioned words], or symbol and concept, metaphor and reality, or proper meaning, zahir [literal external meaning] and batin [inner meaning] in Islam.

Recent anthropology has opened up the field of collective social imaginaire[392] not considered by traditional historiography and classical theology. Imagination and social imaginaire are reconsidered as dynamic faculties of knowledge and action. All the mobilizing ideologies, expressed in a religious or a secular framework, are produced, received, and used by social imaginaire, which also is related to imagination. The concept of social imaginaire needs more elaboration through many societies and historical examples. In Muslim societies, its role today is as decisive as in the Middle Ages because rationalist culture has less impact and presence there than in Western societies, which, nevertheless, also have their own imaginaire competing with various levels and forms of rationality.

4. Discourse as an ideological articulation of realities as they are perceived and used by different competing groups occurs prior to the faith. Faith is shaped, expressed, and actualized in and through discourse. Conversely, faith, after it has taken shape and roots through religious, political, or scientific discourse, imposes its own direction and postulates to subsequent discourses and behaviors (individual and collective).

Remark 4.1: The concept or notion of faith given by God and the classical theories of free will, grace, and predestination need to be re-elaborated within the concrete context of discourses through which any system of beliefs is expressed and assimilated. Faith is the crystallization of images, representations, and ideas commonly shared by each group engaged in the same historical experience. It is more than the personal relation to religious beliefs; but it claims a spiritual or a metaphysical dimension to give a transcendental significance to the political, social, ethical and aesthetic values to which refers each individual inside each unified social group, or community.

5. The traditional system of legitimization, represented by Usul al-din and Usul al-fiqh, no longer has epistemological relevance. The new system is not yet established in a unanimously approved form inside the umma. But is it possible today, given the principles of critical epistemology, to propose a system of knowledge or science particular to Islamic thought? What are the theoretical conditions of a modern theology not only for political institutions, but also for universal knowledge, in the three revealed religions? We are in a crisis of legitimacy; that is why we can speak only of heuristic ways of thinking.

Remark 5.1: This line is opposed to the dogmatic assurance of theology based on the unquestionable legitimacy of the shari'a derived from Revelation or the classical ontology of the first Being, the neo- Platonic One, the Origin from which the Intellect derives and to which it desires to return. That is why the problem of the state and civil society is crucial today. Why should an individual obey the state? How is the legitimacy of power monopolized by a group over all other established groups?

6. The search for ultimate meaning depends on the radical question concerning the relevance and existence of an ultimate meaning. We have no right to reject the possibility of its existence. What is questionable is how to base all our thoughts on the postulate of its existence. Again, we encounter the true responsibility of the critical reason: To reach a better understanding of the relationship between meaning and reality, we must, first, improve our intellectual equipment—vocabulary, methods, strategies, procedures, definitions, and horizons of inquiry.

To illustrate all these theoretical perspectives, let us give an example from classical Islamic thought. Ghazzali (died 505 A.H./1111 A.D.) and [Abu'l-Walid Muhammad] Ibn Rushd (died 595 A.H./1198 A.D.) developed an interesting attempt to think Islam in their historical context. We do not need an exhaustive analysis of their discussion. The most relevant to our project is to be found in Faysal al-tafriqa bayn al-Islam wa-al-zandaqa [The Decisive Criterion for Distinguishing between Islam and Unbelief] by Ghazzali and Fasl al-Maqal [On the Harmony ofReligion and Philosophy] written as an answer by Ibn Rushd. Ghazzali declared the falasifa infidels on three bases: They deny the resurrection of the body; they deny the knowledge of particulars (juziyyat) by God; and they claim that God is anterior ontologically, not chronologically, to the world. These three theses are matters of belief, not demonstrative knowledge. The falasifa have been wrong in trying to transfer to demonstrative knowledge matters which, in fact, depend on belief. Ibn Rushd used the methodology of Usul al-fiqh to solve a philosophical question; even the formulation of the problem, at the beginning of the Fasl, is typically juridical.

This does not mean that Ghazzali chose the right way to tackle the question. Actually, the most significant teaching for us is to identify, through the discussion, the epistemic limits and the epistemological obstacles of Islamic thought as it has been used by its two illustrious representatives. The new task here is not to describe the arguments (see G.H. Hourani, editor and translator of Fasl), but to think the consequences of the epistemic and epistemological discontinuities between classical Islamic thought (all included in medieval thought) and modern thought (Classical Age, from the 15th to the 20th century, up to the 1950s; Prefigurative Age of a new thought, since the 1950s). Before we move ahead in the search for an unfettered way of thinking Islam today, it is worth noting some theories on the medieval system of intelligibility as it is shown in Ghazzali and Ibn Rushd’s discussion.

1. Both thinkers accept the cognitive priority of revealed truth in the Qur’an. Reason has to be submitted totally to this clearly formulated truth (Ghazzali) or to be elaborated as a coherent articulation of the truth established through demonstrative knowledge (in the conceptual and logical framework of Aristotelian methodology and philosophy) and the revealed truth. This last contention is served by intermingling or interweaving juridical and philosophical methodologies.

2. Both mix at different degrees but with a common psychology commanded by beliefs between religious convictions and legal norms on one side (ahkam, explicated by the science of Usul al-din and Usul al-fiqh) and philosophical methodology and representations on the other side. Left to themselves, the milk-sisters (shar' [religious law] and hikma [wisdom]) are "companions by nature and friends by essence and instinct" (Fasl, p. 26).

3. Both ignore the decisive dimension of historicity to which even the revealed message is subjected. Historicity is the unthinkable and the unthought in medieval thought. It will be the conquest—not yet everywhere complete—of intellectual modernity.[393]

4. Historiography (tarikh) has been practiced in Islamic thought as a collection of information, events, biographies (tarajim, siyar), genealogies (nasab), knowledge of countries (buldan), and various other subjects. This collection of facts is related to a chronology representing time as stable, without a dynamic movement of change and progress. No link is established between time as a historical dynamic process (historicity) and the elements of knowledge collected by historiography. Ibn Khaldun [Tunisian historian, 1332–1406] can be cited as the exception who introduced the concept of society as an object of knowledge and thought,[394] but even he could not think of religion, society, history, or philosophy as related levels and ways to achieve an improved intelligibility. On the contrary, he contributed to eliminating philosophy and to isolating the Ash'ari vision of Islam from history as a global evolution of societies influenced by various theological expressions of Islam.

5. In the case of Islamic thought, the triumph of two major official orthodoxies with the Sunnis (since the fifth century A.H.) and the Shi'a (first with the Fatimids and second with the Safavids in Iran) imposed a mode of thinking narrower than those illustrated in the classical period (first to fifth century A.H.). Contemporary Islamic thought is under the influence of categories, themes, beliefs, and procedures of reasoning developed during the scholastic age (seventh to eight century A.H.) more than it is open to the pluralism which characterized classical thought.

6. The historical evolution and intellectual structure of Islamic thought create the necessity of starting with a critique of Islamic reason (theological, legal, historiographical) as well as of philosophical reason as it has been understood and used through Aristotelian, Platonic, and Plotinist traditions (or legacies).

We shall not do this here.[395] We have to think more clearly about new conditions and ways to think Islam today.

Intellectual modernity started with Renaissance and Reform movements in 16th-century Europe. The study of pagan antiquity and the demand for freedom to read the Bible without the mediation of priests (or “managers of the sacred,” as they are sometimes called) changed the conditions of intellectual activities. Later, scientific discoveries, political revolutions, secularized knowledge, and historically criticized knowledge (historicism practiced as philosophies of history) changed more radically the whole intellectual structure of thought for the generations involved in the Industrial Revolution with its continuous consequences.

This evolution was achieved in Europe without any participation of Islamic thought or Muslim societies dominated, on the contrary, by a rigid, narrow conservatism. This is why Muslims do not feel concerned by the secularized culture and thought produced since the 16th century. It is legitimate, in this historical process leading to intellectual modernity, to differentiate between the ideological aspects limited to the conjunctural situations of Western societies and the anthropological structures of knowledge discovered through scientific research. Islamic thought has to reject or criticize the former and to apply the latter in its own contexts.

We cannot, for example, accept the concept of secularization or laicte as it has been historically elaborated and used in Western societies. There is a political and social dimension of this concept represented by the struggle for power and the tools of legitimization between the church and the bourgeoisie. The intellectual implications of the issue concern the possibility—political and cultural—of separating education, learning, and research from any control by the state as well as by the church. This possibility remains problematical everywhere.

Similarly, we cannot interpret religion merely as positivist historicism and secularism did in the 19th century. Religion is addressed not only to miserable, uncultivated, primitive people who have not yet received the light of rational knowledge; human and social sciences, since 1950–60, have changed the ways of thinking and knowing by introducing a pluralist changing concept of rationality, according to which religion is interpreted in a wider perspective of knowledge and existence.

The project of thinking Islam is basically a response to two major needs: (1) the particular need of Muslim societies to think, for the first time, about their own problems which had been made unthinkable by the triumph of orthodox scholastic thought; and (2) the need of contemporary thought in general to open new fields and discover new horizons of knowledge, through a systematic cross cultural approach to the fundamental problems of human existence. These problems are raised and answered in their own ways by the traditional religions.

 3. From the Unthinkable to the Thinkable

Islam is presented and lived as a definite system of beliefs and non-beliefs which cannot be submitted to any critical inquiry. Thus, it divides the space of thinking into two parts: the unthinkable and the thinkable. Both concepts are historical and not, at first, philosophical. The respective domain of each of them changes through history and varies from one social group to another. Before the systemization by Shafi’i of the concept of sunna and the Usuli use of it, many aspects of Islamic thought were still thinkable. They became unthinkable after the triumph of Shafi’i’s theory and also the elaboration of authentic “collections,” as mentioned earlier. Similarly, the problems related to the historical process of collecting the Qur’an in an official mushaf [complete text of the Qur’an] became more and more unthinkable under the official pressure of the caliphate because the Qur’an has been used since the beginning of the Islamic state to legitimize political power and to unify the umma. The last official decision closing any discussion of the readings of the received orthodox mushaf was made by the qadi [judge] [Ahmad ibn Musa] Ibn Mujahid after the trial of [Abu’l-Hasan Muhammad] Ibn Shanabudh (fourth century A.H./tenth century A.D.).

We can add a third significant example to show how a thinkable is transformed into an unthinkable by the ideological decision of the leading politico-religious group. The Mu’tazila endeavored by their ijtihad to make thinkable the decisive question of God’s created speech, but in the fifth century A.H. the caliph al-Qadir [bi-‘llah, 947–1031] made this question unthinkable by imposing, in his famous ‘Aqida [Creed], the dogma of the uncreated Qur’an as the “orthodox” belief (see G. Makdisi, Ibn ‘Aqil et la resurgence de l’Islam traditionaliste au XIe siecle [Ibn ‘Aqil and the Resurgence of Traditionalist Islam in the Eleventh Century], Damascus, Syria, 1963).

As we have said, the unthinkable or the not yet thought (l’impense) in Islamic thought has been enlarged since intellectual modernity was elaborated in the West. All the theories developed by sociology and anthropology on religion are still unknown, or rejected as irrelevant, by contemporary Islamic thought without any intellectual argument or scientific consideration.

It is true that traditional religions play decisive roles in our secularized, modernized societies. We even see secular religions emerging in industrialized societies, like fascism in Germany and Italy, Stalinism and Maoism in the communist world, and many new sects in liberal democracies. If we look at the revealed religions through the parameters set by recent secular religions, we are obliged to introduce new criteria to define religion as a universal phenomenon. To the traditional view of religion as totally revealed, created, and given by God, we cannot simply substitute the sociological theory of religion generated by a sociohistorical process according to the cultural values and representations available in each group, community, or society. We must rethink the whole question of the nature and the functions of religion through the traditional theory of divine origin and the modern secular explanation of religion as a social historical production.

This means, in the case of Islam, rewriting the whole history of Islam as a revealed religion and as an active factor, among others, in the historical evolution of societies where it has been or still is received as a religion. Orientalist scholars have already started this study, inquiring even into the social and cultural conditions of the jahiliya period in which Islam emerged; but I do not know any Orientalist who has raised the epistemological problems implicit in this historicist approach. No single intellectual effort is devoted to considering the consequences of historicist presentations of the origins and functions of a religion given and received as being revealed.[396]

We need to create an intellectual and cultural framework in which all historical, sociological, anthropological, and psychological presentations of revealed religions could be integrated into a system of thought and evolving knowledge. We cannot abandon the problem of revelation as irrelevant to human and social studies and let it be monopolized by theological speculation. One has to ask, then, why sociology and anthropology have been interested in the question of the sacred and in ritual, but not in revelation. Why, conversely, has theology considered revelation, but not so much the sacred and the secular, until it has been influenced by anthropology and social sciences?

To move a step further in these complex interrelated difficulties and theories, let us try to work out the concept of the “Societies of the Book” (Societes du Livre).

 4. The Societies of the Book

I introduce this concept as a historical category to deepen the analysis of the revealed religions. I emphasize first the significant fact that the three revealed religions have not yet been studied comparatively as we have suggested above. Instead, there is an ancient polemical literature. A descriptive literature, especially on Islam and Christianity, is being developed in line with the Islamic-Christian dialogue. but the theological postulates received in each tradition are still dominating the analyses of the revealed religions.

Scholarship has not yet contributed to changing the intellectual approach in this field of research and reflection. Departments of history of religion or of comparative religions devote a larger place to Judaism and Christianity than to Islam. There are many departments in very famous universities, like Princeton or the Sorbonne, where no chair exists for teaching Islam, and I know that these departments do not even utilize the existing departments of Near Eastern studies or languages because they have different scientific concerns. The books written by Orientalists on Islam are limited and irrelevant. They do not show any comparative curiosity or epistemological critique beyond the traditional theological definitions of the different schools. [397]

This is why the problem of revelation is one of the key topics, but it has been neglected by modern scholarship despite its fundamental role in the historical genesis of societies where Judaic, Christian, and Islamic expressions are found.

I call Societies of the Book those that have been shaped since the Middle Ages by the Book as a religious and a cultural phenomenon. The Book has two meanings in this perspective. The Heavenly Book preserved by God and containing the entire word of God is called Umm al-Kitab [Mother of the Book] in the Qur’an. Geo Widengren [born 1907] has demonstrated the very ancient origin of this conception in Near East religious history (see his Muhammad, The Apostle of God and the Heavenly Book, Uppsala, 1955). The importance of this belief for our purpose is that it refers to the verticality which has constituted the religious imaginaire in the Near East. Truth is located in Heaven with God, who reveals it in time and through the medium He chooses: the prophets, Himself incarnated in the “Son” who lived among people, the Book transmitted by the messenger Muhammad. There are different modalities for the delivery of parts (not the whole) of the Heavenly Book, but the Word of God as God Himself is the same from the point of view of the anthropological structures of religious imaginaire.

